Their successors also were as strange and diuers; for to Muley Mahomet, succeeded his mortall enemy, Hamed. To Abdelmelec, not his owne children, albeit he had diuers; but his bastard Brother, the said Hamed, for the father would haue it so. To King Sebastian, Philip King of Spain, who was (a farre off) a kinsman to him, yet then the neereff that could be found, because the other was neuer married. Here we may apparantly perceiue, how fortune playeth with miserable life, or vnsuccessfull ending in the very greatest, or of highest advancement in this world, as well as those of most meane condition; & that thorow some secret iudgement of God, who can & will dispose of all things, according to his owne good will and pleasure. These matters happened in Africa, in the kingdomes of Marracco and Fez, on Monday, being the fourth day in the Month of August, and in the year 1578.

I could heere alledge many other examples of Christian Kings and Princes, whose endes haue bin scarcely honorable or happy, and that within thirty year of this instant; but because I know, that these times do afford some passionate spirits, who take no delight in such sad relations, and others are of a freer temper, but as void of pitty, as the other are too forward in compassion, not carrying any meane betweene such two extremities; I will forbear to proceede any further in this argument, & enter into some other more apt discourse.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

That Princes are commonly such in their actions, manners, and pietie, as they perceyue their Kings, Princes, and Rulers to bee.

Here neede no doubt to be made, but that it was verie true which Theodorick, King of the Gothes (writing to the Romaine Senate) alledged: That the course of Nature (shoulde sooner faile, then people bee any other then their Princes. This is not onely to be vnderstood of their vertues and vices; but likewise of the gesture of their bodies, yea euen so farre as to their wearing garments. This may easily be prooued; for Alexander the Great but bending his Neck a little towards his right shoulder, al his yong Princes, and other cheefe followers in his Court, did bend theirs also in the very same manner.

Alphonfus King of Arragon and Sicilie, having a wry necke, all such as followed and affected him, enforced to wry their neckes like his; as being perswaded, that it was most commendable in them, because their King and Maister carryed his necke so: as wee finde it recorded in the Booke of the Courtier, and in the life of Pyrhus.

King Frances, the first of that name, vsed continually to wear his haire verie long, and (as it was faide) looking out at a Window, he receiued a wounde on the head; by meanes whereof hee was enforced to cut his lockes, and wear them a great deale shorter then formerly hee had done. Many of his Courtiers, especially such as wore their haire as he was wont to do, caused their long lockes to be cut likewise, and ware them in the same manner as he did. Heereupon afterwarde, diuers Noble and high defended French-men, left off from longer wearing false Lockes and Periwigs, or Gregorians, which they reputed as a signe of Nobility and comelineffe, for holding some place of eminnencie in the Commonwealth, & thence-forward esteemed it as a ridiculous fashion.

Charles the fift, Emperour, wore his beard long, but cut round below, in shape of a pouch or purse. In imitation of him, the Noblemen of Spaine, Italy, Flananders, Germany, and Burgongne, with some other that were his subiects, had their beards after the selfesame fashion, which they termed to bee an Imperiall Beard. King Charles the ninth, King of Fraunce, being at Metz, where the Count of Mansfeld, and Marquess of Biden came to see him, because he shoulde shew them a gracious countenance, he tooke off the Marquesses Bonnet from his head, and put on (inited thereof) his owne, which he commonly vied to wear, that was a German cap, great, thicke, thrummy, and flat, in forme of a Cheefe. In regard whereof, all the attendants in his Court (which was a great company at that time) would needs wear Bonnets after the same fashion. And it grew to such an extremity in affection, that such Cappes and Bonnets, as were vsually sold in Metz for thirty Sols, within three dayes after, could not be bought vnder three French Crowns; and yet (as fo cleare a rate) they were not to be had, albeit the Bonnet-makers laboured night and day in making them, the crowd and presse for them was so great, without any other profite or commoditie ensuing by them, but only that they would be in the Kings fashion.

King Henrie the third, by reason hee had some Vicers in the fore-part of his head, was subiect to a continuall paine & greefe: therefore he wore thicke gummy haire, bound vp behinde (like womens) to couer that defect. The Noblemen and Gentlemen of his Court, had their hayre gummed and bound vp in like manner, although no paine thereto prouoked them: whereupon some were verily perswaded, that men would fall likewise to wear womens garments, they were so forward in the fashion of their haire. If I would insert all the courses and behaviour of the people, in imitating their Princes fond fashions and habits, I must needs be too troublesome to the Reader: therefore I will now discourse on their vertues and vices, with as much breuity as I can.

and from Greece more than any other country (as did many great and excellent Philosophers, amongst whom were Plato, Democritus, and others) was for no other end; but in regard of a King of that Country, named Ptolomy Philadelphus, the onely lover of Learning, and seeker after such men as were learned. And in imitation of him, the Egyptians his Subjects addicted themselves so studiously to ground their vnderstanding in the most laudable Sciences, and that for such long continuance of time, as a man was reputed to haue seene nothing, if he had not traualled into Egypt. Whereupon it is sayde, that Plato (admiring their wonderful full erudition) cryed out by way of exclamation: The Greekes are no better then Children in knowledge, being compared with the Egyptians. Here we may obserue, what honour this good King Philadelphus won to his Subjects, because by his imitation they made themselves vertuous, and given to all commendable qualities.

The like happened vnder the reigne of Manfor, Emperour of Affrica, and all the Spaines, who gouerned in the year of our Lord, one thousand, one hundred, & sixe. This King was such a lover of Learning, that he caused all Bookes written in Greeke, eyther concerning Philosophie, Physicke, or Historie, to be translated into the Arabian tongue. He founded many Colledges, wherto he gaue very great rents, for the maintenance of poore Students, and professors of learning, whereof a great many are at this day to be seene, in the Cities of Fez and Marocco in Affrica, in Trenissen, Tunis, Argiere, Hippona, and else-where, although he was a Mahometane in Religion, yet many other of his successors, that afterwards followed him, and the people themselves (to this day) in those Affricane countries, doe relish of the good conditions, maners, and vertues abiding in that King, adding themselves to Learning. Nor appeared this in men onely, but likewise in Women, according as Leo Africanus testifieth, saying; The Women of Libya, in these our dayes, are very Learned and studious, and about all things else, they are sooner busied in good Bookes: then meddling with clothes, Garmets, or other trifles belonging to house-hold. And I dare boldly maintaine (with many other Learned men, well read in Histories) that but for this King Manfor, and his Arabian successors, Physicke had neuer bene halfe so fertile in remedies, as we finde it now to be in these our dayes.

Garcias d'Horta, Physician to the Viceroy of the Indies, who liued within lesse then thirty yeares, sayeth, that hee had conferred with many Kings both of the Arabes and Affricans; and found them to be learned, as also notably skillfull in the Mathematickes. The like is affirmed by him that hath written the generall historie of India, that Almanfor, King of Tidora, one of the verie greatest Ilandes of the Molucces; was one of the greatest Astrologers in our times, and that the people are not so rude and barbarous, as heere among vs they are reputed to be. Before Manfor, none of them had ever seene the Bookes of Aristotle, Plato, Hippocrates, Galen, and other Greeke Authours, in any other Language then the Grecian.

In the time of this King Manfor, flourished great store of Learned men and Philosophers: such as were Amerroes, Mesfau, Rafis, Rabbie Moses, and diuers others, whose works (at this very day) are read in our Vniuersities, and Commented vpon, by diuerse and sundrie great Schoolemen, and it is not to be doubted, but posteritie (for euer) will rest beholding to them.

The manner of founding Colledges, wherein to instruct poore youths in good Letters; Hospitalls, for the lodging of maymed, sickely, and needie persons; Conuents and Abbeyes, for the dwelling of godly and religious men, wherein to pray for the augmentation of the Church, and prosperity of Christian Princes, were first by Kings and Emperours, and in their imitation, Dukes, Earles, Barons, Popes, Cardinales, and Bishoppes, besides other rich men (among the common people did the like). As Charlemaigne, Leues the ninth, Phillip Duke of Bourgonne, and diuers other: which is a most plaine and manifest Reason, that all Christiendome remaineth yet to this day, embellished with so manie faire and rich Arch-bishoppicks, Bishoppicks, Abbeyes, Priories, Colledges, and Hospitalls.

Learned Ladies in Italy.

Elizabeth the famous and learned Queene of England.

King Henry the fourth, whoe the first man in all Battails, &c.

King Mithridates a notorious drunkard, and his people followe his example.

King Frances, first of that name, because himselfe was learned, and cherished men of learning and knowledge; beheld his reigne furnished with a great number of learned and vertuous Schollers, more then any other that went before him. In the same minde continued his Sonne, successor to his Crowne, and all the children of his successour, not meanelly cherished and enriched by king Henry the fourth, Magret, Grandmother to the King now reigning, was a most learned Lady, of whose excellent & most elegant Poemes, we haue great store remaining among vs. As also of Iane her Mother, both of them being Queenes of Nauarre, (and in their imitation) many other great Ladies of honour, gaue their mindes to the reading of graue Authors, as well Greeke as Latine. Nor is it any matter of meruayle, if in these dayes, wee behold so many Ladies well seene in good Sciences, and among the rest, that Italy affordeth such plenty of studious women: the custome of the country prohibiting, that women should be any great walkers, or so much seene as they are in France. And because that famous Queene of England, Elizabeth, was very skillfull in many Languages, and deeply read in the fayrest and most commended Sciences, as in the Mathematickes, & diuers others: it was also credibly reported, that her house and Court, was bounteously stored with learned and most vertuous Ladies. And that which filled France with such plenty of bold and hardy spirits, was by the meanes of king Henry the fourth, then reigning: who in all battails, encounters, and charging of the enemy, was alwayes the foremost man himselfe; which taught his Captaines & Souldiers to do the like, onely by imitation of his vnpareld exploits.

Now on the contrary, if the Prince be vicious, his Subjects will fauour of the selfe same taste. As we read of one named Mithridates, king of Amasia, who because he was a notorious drunkard, and accounted it as a vertue to drinke immeasurably: his people addicted themselves to that foule vice, so that the most part of them were full of diseases, as goutes, conuulsions, palfies, & alienation of vnderstanding. Marke Anthony, who tearmed himselfe Emperour of the East, so wallowed with his beloued Cleopatra, in the delights of Egypt (that the degenerated quite from the vertues of their former King Philadelphus) and became so addicted to drinking & drunkenness, intermixing rich flowres and precious stones among the wine they dranke; that he gaue such example to his men of warre, and to the people thorow the East, to drinke and gourmandize after the same manner, that they would be drunke euery day, and held it as an admirable vertue: forgetting the honest policy of the Romans, who would drinke no wine while they were in Armes. And so Marke Anthony (albeit hee was a great and worthy Captaine) and all his followers, by hauing discontinued the vertuous exercise of Armes; when hee should come to cope with Octavius Aquilius, was (with small labour) surmounted. And the best generous acte, that Anthony could then devise to do, and for his latest piece of seruice, was to kill himselfe, like another brutish Sardanapalus.

Darius also, the great Monarch and King of the East, about three hundred yeares before Marke Anthony, euene like to him, had (beside his married wife) a multitude of concubines, barbed boys, filders, vaulters, dancers, tooles, players, and other people of as small account in his Army, eating and drinking, before eyther hunger or thirst vrged any necessity. His Captaines and men of command, with all the rest of his Army, he licenced to the like liberty: for each of his Souldiers might haue his two concubines, beside as many Gannedes, and chiefe men tripled, or (at least) doubled them. In the ende, his Army, thought to consist of eight hundred thousand able fighting men; there could not bee found twenty thousand among them all. For according to the example of their king, they were altogether addicted to luxury and drunkenness, and became as people vtterly vnmeet for warre. Therefore both he and they were overcome by Alexanders forces, with small traualle, or losse on his side; because his men were sober, continent, and stout fighting Souldiers, as the king himselfe was. So the Persian Empire, and the Babylonian also, was lost and dissipated in a moment; in regard that their king was lasciuious and of soft temper, which caused his Subjects to imitate his example.

Marke Anthony, whose drunkenness, and dissipation, did overthrow all the East.

A wonderful neglect in so famous a Souldier.

Princes

Perſeus, the powerfull king of Macedon, conquering an trunating his kingdome, and therefore made his Triumph, according as it is remembred by Plutarch, in this manner. Our first remembrance, concerneth the people of Rome in general, with them of all the neighbouring parts round about, attired after their very best ability of performance, and contending for places in houses and windowes, where best they might take view of the triumph. All the Temples and Churches in Rome were set wide open, deckt and richly hung with Tapistry, Greene boughes of Trees, beside plenty of incense and sweet smelling perfumes, and so were all the streetes in like manner. Now because in the City the concourse of people was infinite, resorting from so many feuerall places, in earnest desire to behold such a solemne spectacle, there were certain men appointed with staves in their hands, who had charge to make way for the Triumphs passage, and looke to the peoples safe seating, because the matters prepared for this triumph grew so great, as they were enforced to diuide them into three feuerall dayes.

The first day was scarcely sufficient for entrance of all the Banners, Standards, & vanquished Ensignes; as also for passage of the Statues, Colosses, Tables, and Images, for all these were conuayed along in order, in rich and well appointed Chariots, VVaggons, and Thrones. On the second day, the Armour and munition of the conquered king, and what else belonged to the Macedonians, was brought into the city: which Armours being rich and gloriously glittering, were conveniently placed on best sighted carriages, meete it for their full and ample beholding. After these chariots and waggons, entred three thousand men, carrying silver money (open to be seene) on great Plates and Vessels of silver, each one weighing three talents, of which Plates and Vessels there were 350 in number, and foure men allowed to carry each piece of Plate. The rest that serued to make vp the full number of three thousand men, carried Fountaine Pots, Ewres, Basons, Lauours, very curiously wrought in gold and silver, beside other vessels of the same metalls, most rich and magnificent to behold: and the passage of these companies continued so long, that it required the second dayes whole employment, marching along in due and comely order.

The third day being come, the breake of day no sooner began, but in the first band, & beginning of the Triumph, went Drums, Fifes, Clarions, and Trumpets sounding, not weert and delicately, but in such stearne and vigorous manner, as if they were instantly to enter battail. After them were led six score nine, all white, hauing their hornes richly guilded, and their bodies covered with costly clothes: all these were helde as sacred to the Gods, crowned and decked with garlands, and chaplets of faire flowers, & they that guided the, were braue gallant youths, sumptuously apparelled for this seruice, and for the sacrificing of them; and by these kind went as many comely children, carrying Plates of gold and silver for the sacrifice. Next vnto the king, were ranked such as carried gold money in chargers of gold, being fewenly seven in number. And behinde them, followed they that helped to beare the great Bolle or Cuppe of golde, weighing ten Talents, which Paulus Aemilius had caused to be made, enriched with many sumptuous and vnualeuable precious stones. They which carried the chargers of money, were such as had bin neerest in fauour, about the Kings Antigonus, Seleucus, and other Kings of Macedon, especially the forenamed Perſeus. Next followed the chariot of the conquered King, with the Armes and Weapons which he vsed to weare, his Crown, Scouter royal and rich Robe laid vpon the Armour. Behinde the chariot, were the children to the poore kingled as prisoners, with a great number of his cheefest Officers; as the Masters or Governours of his household, his Treasurers, Chancellors, Secretaries, and others of high employment in his affaires. They all wept, & expressed extraordinary signes of greefe, beholding themselves brought into such a seruitude; which moued all the beholders to much compassion.

Of the children belonging to this king, there were 2 males and 2 females, but so young in yeares, as they were not capable of vnderstanding their misfortunes; whereby the people were so much the more incited to pity their condition, & thought it vnbecoming, that affliction should be scene in such tender yeares. In this Triumph, the Father followed his children, attired after his Countries manner; but yet in blacke habites, pacing on troubled and fearefully, as indeed he had good reason, considering his present estate, and whence he was false.

After the King, followed his friends & fauourites, with a great number of his familiars, who all looking on their King, confounded themselves with sorrow, to see his reuerent cheekes furrowed with teares, and many of the Romans bemoaned his misery. Then after were brought the crownes of gold, which the ancient Cities of Greece had presented to Paulus Aemilius, who followed the triumphantly, mounted vpon a goodly Chariot, clothed in purple tisse of golde, bearing a Lawrell branch in his hand, and a crowne of the same vpon his head. Behinde him followed the people both on foote and horseback, some hauing branches of Lawrell and Palme in their hands, and some with Banners and Pennons, singing in honour of their Captaine, triumphing thus after his victories, with their most delectable sights to behold; and in this order Paulus Aemilius triumphed through Rome. Others also did the like, with some things added or diminished, and so they went to offer their spoyle, in the Temple of Iupiter within the Capitoll; and there, according to the forme and manner, as their blinded religion then required, they gaue thanks to their Gods for the victory obtained. And notwithstanding that in this fashion they obserued & performed their customary triumphs: yet they had a Law for it, according to which Law, they gaue triumph by desert, making a distinction of the gates & streets, whereat they were to enter, and whereby they should passe along, the times also being ordered and appointed. But concerning other things, as sports, playes, & Feasts of diuers kinds, it was permitted, that euery man might augment and enrich his triumph, and his chariot also: for it is found recorded, that they had a custome, to be drawne by four white horses, and yet notwithstanding, some haue bin drawne by as many Bulls.

Great Pompey, when hee triumphed for Africa, he entred in a Chariot drawne by Elephants. Suetonius saith, that Iulius Caesar when hee made his triumphall entrance, had his chariot drawn by forty elephants, VVith the like Beasts triumphed the Emperour Gordianus. And Flautius writeth, that the Emperour Aurelianus, who was king of the Goths, triumphed in a chariot drawne by Harts. VVe reade also, that Mark Anthony in his triumph, had his chariot drawne by Lyons. The Roman Captains had a custome beside when they triumphed, to haue a young childe, or many in their chariots: whereof Cicero maketh mention in his Oration pro Munera. Others caused to be led in their triumphs, an infinite number of wilde and fange Beasts, as Lyons, Onnces, Beares, Tygers, Rhinoceroses, Panthers, Dromedaries, & other kinds of beasts, as did Titus & Vespasianus, according to the relation of Iosephus. Some other also would haue their entrance with diuersity of Musique, as well by instruments as voyces, with infinite other the like delectations. Among all which triumphs, some were more singular then the rest; as those of Pompey & Caesar, of the two Brethren Scipios; and likewise of the Emperours, whereof Iordanus speaks in his Book of Rome triumphing, & according as Paulus Orosius saith, that there were 320 triumphers in Rome, the last whereof was the emperor Probus, from whose time since, Rome ran to her decadence.

In Rome there was yet another kinde of solemne welcom, which was somewhat lesse then triumphing, being called Quatio, and giuen for victories when as something wanted of such necessary conditions as required triumph. As for example, if the Captaine had not bin Confull or Proconfull, or had made war without great resistance, or little bloodshed in battaile, or had conquered people of lesse esteem; or if the war had bin done without expresse authority from the Senate, & such like other conditions, then instead of triumphing, this Quatio was granted to him, & it was performed in this manner.

The Captaine entred Rome on horsebacke, in stead of a chariot, and some of them (in elder times) entred on foote, crownd with the leaues of Myrrhe, which were offerings to Venus, because such triumphing was not reputed Martiall, but (as it were) venereal, according as Aulus Gellius saith. The people attending on this Captaine, were not armed, neyther founded Trumpets, Drums, or any other instruments of warre; but Flutes & sweet musickall instruments, soft and delicate. Neuerthelesse, they entred in order, and with their booty, and the Senate went forth of the City to meete and receiue him, making a great feast for him, as also highly praying & commending him.

I finde that many excellent Captains haue requested & accepted of this honor, and the first was Posthumus Liberius, hauing vanquished the Sabines; and Marcus Marcellus for his victory at Syracusa. Suetonius affirmeth, that Octavius Caesar entred thus, after the Phillippick battailes, & the warre of Sicily. The cause why this small triumph was so named, is described by liny, for in declaring that diuers Captaines were denied this kinde of triumph, and could by no meanes obayne it: hee proceedeth to yeelde a reason, why this Quatio was so termed. The sacrifice (sayeth he) which the Captaine then offered, was a Sheepe, which in the Latine tongue is called Ouis: but the other Triumphers offered a Bull, and therefore vpon the word Ouis, the reception and entertainment made vnto the, was called Quatio, or Oualis. Some other say, that it took name by a certaine found in the peoples voyce, of Oe, or else Oue: but because this is a matter of small importance, it shall suffice to say, that such a thing was named Quatio, eyther of the word Ouis, or of the other voyce of Oe or Oue.

It was also permitted to the Triumphers, to erect their Statues in Temples, & common places of resort: also to build Arches and Colombs, named Triumphall, framed of Marble, and in or on the, to insculpt (most excellently) their battels and victories, for their owne perpetuall memory. The vestiges or footings of the are (at this day) to be seene in Rome: and these things wer thus done, in imitatio of Trophees, anciently vsed among the Grecians, helping themselves thereby in manner following. In the same place, where the Captaine had obtaigned any victory, a great tree was prepared, the greatest therabout to be found, the branches whereof were all cut off; and then vpon the trunk was fastened all the coat-armours of the vanquished, as a victorious and honourable memory, and it was called Tropeum or Trophæum, after the greek word Trophæ, which signifieth a fleeting conuersion, or retreated, because (in that place) the enemy was put to flight, or disgracefull retreat, and so the Romans afterward were glad to follow their fashion.

Salust writeth, that Pompey hauing overcome the Spaniards, planted his Trophees on the top of the Pyrennean Mountaines: and this course (by tract of time) was in such esteeme, that they grew to be made of stone. But this matter can approue it selfe to be much more ancient, & that other Nations haue made vse thereof: for we reade, that Saul hauing vanquished Agag, king of the Amalekites, and beeing come to Mount Carmell, he erected there a triumphall Arch, as a memory of his victory. In brieffe, the honour of triumph was esteemed and affected, more then any other honour in Rome, so that for obayning it, the Captaines would expose their liues to all traualle and perill. Beside, the Triumphers grew to great wealth, both by the enemies spoyle, and the gifts of their friends, and so much the rather haue I reported these things, because Princes may thereby receiue example, how to honour and remunerate their Captains and Soldiers to their merits. But in these decaying dayes, sluggards, and such as doe nothing at all, are as well, if not better respected, then they that adventure their liues and goods, both for seruice of their Prince, & profite of their native country.

glory and fame, onely through their memorable actions, which procured fo many worthy and illustrious Families in the City of Rome.

For our first entrance into this discourse, wee may take an example by the three Metelli, whereof one (according as Salust and some others write) because he had overcome King Iugurthe, conquering also his lands and kingdome of Numidia; was surnamed Numidicus. The second being Quintus Metellus, for the victory he obtaigned against the king of Macedon, was surnamed Macedonicus. And the third, Creticus, because he conquered the Isle of Greece. But much more ancient then these, were Martius Coriolanus, and Sergius Fidenatus. The first was named Coriolanus, after the Towne Coriola in Latium, by him conquered. And the other by the like acte on Fiden, a Towne in Italy. Another Metellus also was surnamed Balearius, because he had conquered to the Romane Empire, the Islands called Baleares, now termed Maiorque and Minorque.

Lucius Mummius was surnamed Achaicus, because hee had subdued Achaia and Corinthe. So the other Brutus, in regard he brought the Gauls in subiection, was surnamed Gallus. The two Scipios, being brethren, were honoured by the names of the people whom they had vanquished; the one in Africa and Carthage, and the other in Asia, because he conquered also in Antioche and in Asia: for hee was the first that displayed the Romane Coullors or Ensignes in Asia. Another Scipio afterward, surnamed Paulus Emilius (of whose triumph we haue already spoken) & Nepheue adoptiue to great Scipio, was likewise surnamed Africinus; because hee assayed and won the great and puissant city of Carthage. Neuerthelesse, hee receiued a greater honour and guerdon, to be surnamed Numantinus, and he himselfe held it in farre higher respect; because in Spain he destroyed Nemantia, and vtterly overthrew the Numantines.

I finde in like manner, that Emperours attributed vnto themselves the surnames of conquered places, speaking them expressly in their Letters missiue and other instruments; namely Seuerus, and his successors after him; as for Arabia, Parthia, Armenia, Germania, and other Provinces by them subdued. So one named himselfe

Arabicus, another Parthicus, another Armenicus, so Germanicus, and Asiaticus; each man according to such victories as he had obtaigned, so did hee magnifie himselfe.

Moreover, for other matters and reasons, the Romane Captaines were illustrated by especial names, for their greater magnificence and splendour. As we reade of Stareus Mantius, who for defending the Capitoll from the forces of the French, was surnamed Capitolinus. The family of the Turquatis receiued that surname, for taking a Chaine or Coller from the necke of an enemy, for a Coller or Chaine in latine is called Torquis, and so were diuers of them therefore named, Quintus Fabius Maximus, because by long delays & dissimulations; hee had held out Hannibal in warre, only for the defence of Rome; they surnamed him Cunctator, which is as much to say, as a temporizer or delayer. And for the same reason also, they termed him (beside) the Shield or Buckler of Rome, which rebounded to his greater advantage and honour.

Marcus Marcellus, who liued also in those times, in regard of his great power and valiancy, the continuall battels which (without ceasing) he gave to the enemy, was called, The sword of Hannibal. And that excellent Captain Sylla, though somewhat cruel, was surnamed Happy, in regard of his prosperous victories. Pompey likewise was so renowned by his successe in warre, that he had the surname of Great giuen him, then which title, I know not what could more haue raised and exalted him. So farre extended the dignity of surnames, granted to Captaines in those dayes, especially to such as were vertuous Commanders and Generals, as they were also called Emperors, which in these more modernet times, is the title of supremest dignity, and which could not then be giuen, but to a Captaine, Prator, Consull, or Proconsull, that had bin victorious in some notable battaile, and had desolated the enemies country, by the death of a great number of enemies: As if two thousand of his men were slaine, there must then ten thousand perish on the enemies side, and not otherwise it was granted.

With this so gracious and happy a surname, was Iulius Caesar, the Father of Iulius Caesar honored, for the victory which he had against the * Sannites & Lucanes, in the time of Sylla. Pompey also was called Emperour, for the memorable victory he wonne in Africa, against Domitius. Marcus Tullius Cicero, being Proconsull in the warre against the Partians, was by them of the Army named Emperour, for the victory there obtained. Julius Caesar, before he was called to the Empire, was styled Emperour, by reason of his many victories. But if this Capitaine had not suffered great resistances in his battailes, he had not bene worthy of that name, & yet notwithstanding he was reprehended, so that Marke Anthony murmured against him, and yet because he had taken a great City, on the further side of the River Eufrates, he was content that they should call him Emperour. After Julius Caesar and his successours, inueiling themselves with the full Seignury of Rome, & knowing well, that the name of King was in horror and detestation among the people, they would be named Emperours, which title hath continued euer since, & is the very greatest of all.

So then we see, that for such honors, the Romans sayled not in their gratification, as well to their strange friends abroad, being vnder their reward, as to the home-borne Sonnes of Rome. Because like as they were powerfull and rigorous, in fighting against enemies; so were they as gracious and liberrall to such as assisted them. So that in the same kinde of bounty they gaue to king Atalus the Prouince of Asia, with the title of king: for which (afterward) he was ingratefull, because (by his testament) hee returned all his profits to Rome. To Eumenes the brother of this Atalus, because he had well serued and assisted the Romans, in the war against Antiochus: the Senate gaue him all the Cities and Townes, which hee had conquered from Antiochus in Asia. To king Deiotarus of Galatia, because hee had ayded Pompey, in the warre against Antistridates, the Romans gaue him the Prouince of the lesser Armenia. In the like manner was king Maffiniffa of Numidia guerdoned, hauing bene embraced by Scipio, as his companion and friend to the people of Rome: to him was giuen all whatsoever he had conquered in the kingdom of Syphax, who had assisted the Carthaginians.

Nor were these gifts and presents allowed to Capitaines, and men of apparancie only; but likewise to them of the meanest condition, they gaue gifts, prerogatives, and great honours. The Consul Marius, knowing the well deserving of two companies, that had fought valiantly against the Cimbrians, a people among the Allemaignes, and were come into Italy with him, he receiued them as Citizens of Rome. When being reproued for doing such a thing contrary to their Lawes, he made answer: In the noise and clattering blowes of weapons there is no voice of the Law heard.

CHAP. XLII.

Of such Crownes, with other recompences and salaries, which the Romans gaue to Soldiers. Also of punishing offenders, comprehending (in this case) an excellent form for warre, and good government of a common-wealth.

HE Romans were not careful only for honouring & gratifying their Capitaines, but offered them (beside) infinite other graces & fauours, rewarding them honourably in diuers and sundry kindes, with Crownes & Jewels; as holding them in particular esteeme and reputation, and according to the merit of their actions in Armes, in the same sort were they respected and required.

When a Capitaine had obtained a victory in some notable battaile, were it vpon the Sea or Land, and had therein taken some Towne by force, or done any other singular enterprize, immediately after, they had a custome to make diligent inquisition, concerning the valour of the particular bandes and Squadrons. Then mounting vpon the Theater, after they had giuen thanks to the Gods for the victory obtained: in generall they commended the whole Army, and especially extolled the band or Squadron, that had fought with most man-hood. Afterward they reuealed particular men in the companies by their names, publishing the worth of their vertue and courage, in no lesse measure then they had deserved: terming them friends and louers of their country, saying also, that the Common-wealth stood highly obliged to them. And this being done, they gaue then presents of Gold and Silver, of Crownes, Girdles, Bracelets, Jewels, as also very excellent armour for horses, made so curiously, & deliuered with such defences and prohibitions, as no man was suffered to vweare or haue the like, without he had deserved it in the same manner. Histories are full of these things, and particularly Titus Livius, speaking of the Consul Papirius Cursor, saith; that he gaue Bracelets of Gold to fourteene Centurions; and afterward to a Squadron, he gaue very rich & costly Ornaments. As much hee saith of Scipio, being in Spain, and other places.

Now, concerning the Crowns which they gaue, they had diuers names, and were according to the degrees of merite. They had the Crowne Obsidionalis, the crowne Triumphalis, the crowne Ovalis; Corona Ciuica, Corona Muralis, Corona Nautica, and Corona Castrensis. Pliny speaketh of them all, and so doeth Aulus Gellius.

But that Crowne of greatest excellence, and more esteemed then all the rest, was Corona Obsidionalis, which extended to the circled or sieged of the Campe, and it was giuen only for hauing deliuered an army enclosed and besiedged within a Towne or Citie, or when a camp was strictly enuironed. So that by such a worthy deede of armes, the place or people accounted themselves to bee deliuered from death, or mercilesse imprisonment: for no other action whatsoever, was this honor & respect to be giuen. The crown was made of greene leaues, for they cared not to haue it made of Golde, or other mettall, but of the grasse and hearbes of the same field, where the enemy had bin ouerthrowne or forced to flight. With this Crown was crowned the Great Quintus Fabius, because when Hannibal was before Rome, hee defended and deliuered it from his besiedging. Emilius Scipio, was also crowned therewith in Africa, for hauing deliuered the Consul Manlius, with certaine bands. Calpurnius obtrayned it also in Sicily, and so did the valiant L. Cincinnatus Dentatus, and some other.

Corona Ciuica, or the Citizen crowne, was made of Oaken leaues and branches, with the fruite or Acornes hanging on it. This was giuen to him that had laued a Citizen, when his life was in extreame perill, killing his enemy, & making good the place where the danger hapned. This crown was so much made account of, that sometimes it felt to such a mans Honour, who for sauing one Romane citizen, at his deliueance slew two of his enemies. But because he defended not and made good the place from future perill, doubt was made, whether he had deserved this Citizen Crowne, or no. Neuerthelesse, Law was dispensed withall, and it was concluded to be giuen him, seeing hee had deliuered the Citizen, and slaine two of his enemies in a place so perillous, which was not in his power still to protect, although the Law imported so much. And albeit a man had deliuered a King, or a Capitaine of confederates and friends, yet could he not haue his crowne to reward him, except hee had deliuered a Roman: I find that Pliny recordeth, that this very fame crown had bene giuen to one, who slewed the first enemy that mounted on the wals of a City or Fortresse, being defended by or for the Romans.

This Corona Ciuica, was the most excellent, next vnto the Obsidional, and might dayly be worne, and in all places. Likewise, he that deserved this Crowne, was of such account and esteeme, as hee might sit in the Theater, or at Feastes, where hee had alwayes his place nereft unto the Senate. And when hee entered, the Senate would rise vpon their feete, to do him honor.

He stood also free and exempt from any Office or charge whatsoever, except his pleasure was to acceptit: and moreover, for his sake, and in regard of him, his Father and Grandfather (if they were liuing) stood exempted also. Many Romans obtained to weare this Crowne, & especially the most valiant Cincinnatus Dentatus, named before, who wonne fourteene of them. The second Capitolinus had sixe; and to Cicero, by particular dispensation, one of them was granted, because hee had defended Rome from the conspiracy of Catiline. These Crownes, whereof wee haue made relation, although they were made but of Hearbes and Leaues, and might

Law may sometimes be dispensed withall on needfull occasions.

The reputation & esteeme of this Citizen Crowne.

What Romans had the honor to weare this Crowne.

might more properly be called Garlands, or like to the French chapels of flowers: yet were they (notwithstanding) much more esteemed and renowned, then if they had beene of the finest gold.

As for the Mural Crowne, called Corona Muralis, it was of golde, and given to him that had assaulted and ascended the walls of a city, or a castle, mounting first vp the scaling Ladder, and both freeing and defending the walles, which caused, that the Crowne was made in forme of an imbristled wall. The first (according to Pliny) that obtained this crowne, was Marius Capitolinus. Scipio also gaue it to Quintus Trebellius, and Sextus Digittus; because that they (both together) wonne first the enemies wall, before any other.

Corona Castrensis, five Vallis, was given to him that (in the fight) entred first into the Barriers, Railes, or Lifes of the enemies Campe, coming off againe with credite and reputation: this Crowne also was made of gold, and shaped according to Battions and Rampires of a field for warre.

Of the like metall was the Nauall Crowne, Corona Naualis, which was bestowed on the man, that first (in fight at sea) boarded and entered an enemies shippe: and it was in the shape of the prow or poynt of a ship. Marcus Varro made no disdaine of this Crowne, when it was offered vnto him by great Pompey, in the war against the Pirates. Offanius presented it also to Marcus Agrippa, and to Sylla: many other likewise had the honor thereof, wherof now I omit to speak.

When any Souldier of Rome, were he noble or ignoble, had made any prooff of his bodie, were it at the course of Launce, or in single combat: the Romaine Captaines or Generals were wont to giue him or them collers or chaines of gold and silver, or bracelets, or girdles, accordingly as they had deserued, with other priuileges and preheminences. And such prizes they might giue to his friends, that had assisted them in the war: but as for the Crownes, they were referred onely for Romaines. Of all which things wee finde many notable examples in the Romaine histories.

Suetonius writeth, that O. Tullius permitted to Marcus Agrippa: that he might bear a Banner of Azure colour: in regard of a victory which hee had obtained at Sea, against Sextus Pompeius. He further affirmeth, that it was he who desired first the gifts of Collers and Flagon chaines, with other particular presents beside, allowed only in such affaires, which would require too long a space heere to report. And heere it is well worth the remembering, that the Romaines were to valiant, that some one man hath wonne the honour of all these rewardes, or the greater part of them. For Pliny and Solinus doe name such men, amongst other Marcus Sergius, who obtained the most part of them. And in the warre at * Thyracynus and Troia, where the Romaines were vanquished by Hanniball, he wonne the crown called Corona Civica, as also in the ouerthrow at Cannas. This man was so valiant, that hauing lost his right hand in the battell, he shewed great valor with the left, and by meanes of a Steele hand made him, in stead of the other lost, he foyled and slew 4. men in one day in the field of Battell ech after other: in which braue day of fight, and others beside, he receiued 23 wounds, & al in the fore part of his body.

Yet notwithstanding, neither this Marcus Sergius, nor any other beside, did euer deserue and attaine to so much as Lucius Cincinnatus Dentatus, Tribune of the people, of whom we spake a little before. Of him write Plinie, Solinus Valerius Maximus, and Aulus Gellius, affirming, that in iewels and presents of price, some greater then other, he obtained onely by actions of Armes, 320. and more. Beside, that he entred Rome with 9. feuerall Generals, when they performed their solemne triumphs, & whom he had assisted in their victories. He had a great number of brooke Spears, shinerd Lances, shafts of Launces, pikes without heads of Steele, giuen to him as signalls of honour. He had 18. collers and gold chaines: 83. of silver: Of armors and furnitures for horses furing war seruice, and thereunto particularly appoynted, hee had fure and twenty: an hundred and fortie bracelets; eight Castrenses; three Murales, one Eliodonale, and I know not how many Nauall. In feuerall fought battailes, hee had taken fure and fourtie wounds, all of them before vpon his bodie; and no more then one only behind, and thirty foure times hee had disarmed and dispoiled the enemy, hauing personally bin present in fixe score encamped battells. Nay, he was so valiant and fortunate in Armes, that hee was firnamed the Romaine Achilles: and although his performances may seeme to the world incredible; yet notwithstanding the multitude and conformitie of histories doe auouch them.

The Romaines, for famous actions in Armes, conceded (beside) other honours and preheminences, as power of publike iudgements, and sitting in the chair of * Curules, which was the seat of the Adies and Prator, and which was permitted to Scipio. Sometimes also there they gaue consent, for the greatest authorities of Souldiers, according as they were suffered by the people to doe: concerning a degree or state, submitted to the libertie of the Patriottes and people. Captaines likewise were permitted to erect triumphall Statues, and to decke and cloathe themselves, euen as if they had bene Consuls. The Senate granted (by forme of salary and congratulation) that they might place in Temples, the armes and spoiles of enemies conquered by the in battels: and such things were teamed Manubie, as much to say, as spoyles and booties taken from an enemy.

Furthermore, the Romaines had a commendable custome, concerning such as had bene slayne in their warres; that their children should haue and enioy the like wages, as they gaue vnto their fathers liuing. And to olde Souldiers, that had long time followed the wars; such good allowance of land, as they might well and easily liue thereon. Suffering them also to dwell in Citties, Townes, and Provinces conquered and subiected, where themselves pleased to make election. In this manner the Cittie of Siuit was made a Colony for Rome by Caesar: which Colonies (according to the common French saying) may be teamed a new dwelling, or transmigration of people. In briefe, the Romaines neuer left a good action vnrequired, nor without some great priuiledge: for the which cause, more valiant men were found among them, then in all other nations beside.

I spare to speake of many other requittals, which the Romaines vied in respect of Armes, thinking already I haue sayde enough. Notwithstanding, it is a matter most certaine, that as they excelled all Nations, in both acknowledging and rewarding honest seruices: so they came not a iote behinde vs, in teaching and correcting where occasion required. For when men were not to be moued by regard of honour and vertue, or by necessity and gaine, to doe what was good; yet they were compelled to doe no vile thing, both in respect of shame, and feare of punishment. For the paines were great and rigorous against such as shewed themselves to be slouthfull and negligent: because when they lost honour, being called thereto, and might by their owne indeuour haue had it; they were well and foundly whipt, till the blood followed. Some were manacled with yrons like flauies; and if they fled away, and forsooke their Captaines in battaile, they were impaled or spitted on stakes, or else crucified: for, answerable to the delict, so was their punishment.

Titus Livius writeth, that the Souldiours of a Squadron, belonging to Appian Claudius, to whom the keeping of a place was giuen in charge, forsooke and lost it. He being desirous to inflict punishment, and yet to mixe it with mercie: they were selected by numbers of tenne, and then to cast lottes, and they on whom the lot fell, were put to death for all the rest. Inluis Frontinus sayth, that Marke Anthony did the very like to a band, which had not defended the rampires, but suffered the enemies to set fire on them. Other inflictions also hee imposed vpon Souldiours, for disobedience and other offences, requiring more time then I am permitted. Wherefore I will shape my conclusion thus onlie, that as those times wanted not remunerations and honours for well doing; so, they were as forward in correcting wicked and bad actions.

CHAP. XLIII.

Of the reason wherefore Sleep was granted and giuen to man: And likewise, that too much sleep is vicious and hurtfull.

Sleep was naturally giuen to man for his conseruation; because there is not any naturall worke, but it hath neede of rest and repose. Aristotle sayth, Every creature that hath blood, sleepeeth: and there he proueth by good reason, and likewise by experience, that fishes doe sleepe. Sleep is a repose of all the senses, and proceedeth from the fumes and euaporations, which (in regarde of foode receiued) arise from the stomacke to the braine, by the coldnesse whereof, the hot vapours are tempered, and make the exterior motions and senses sleepe: then retyring the vitall spirits to the heart, all the members become slowlie, and rest from their trouble, vntill such time as the vitall spirit (which is the instrument whereby the soule frameth her operations, gouerning and commanding the whole body) doth recouer new forces, and ceasing diminishing those vapours, man awaketh from sleepe, and then the senses and powers retaine more freshly, with farre greater power to their operations.

Concerning the occasions of sleepe, Aristotle discouerseth at large in his Booke of Sleepe and Vigilancie: and Plutarke declareth diuers opinions of the Philosophers, beside sundry naturalists. But although it is for the rest and health of the body, yet it must be taken moderately; because long sleepe (saith Aristotle) weakeneth the naturall and animall spirits, even as the moderation thereof doth giue them vigour: for many things are necessarie, which neuerthelesse are hurtfull, if they be receiued excessively. Foode is both needefull and sweete, and yet notwithstanding, if it exceede measure, it harmeth, and hath no rellish at all. In like manner, moderate trouble is wholesome; but ved with extremity nothing is more damageable. And so stay of sleepe, that it should not be taken but vpon necessitie, for recreation and repose of the senses, the spirits and members of the body.

Over-much Sleepe (as it ouer-loadeth the members and senses, making them slouthfull, and enfeebling them by idleness) so it ingendred so many humidities in the bodie, that they make it sicke, and killeth it, because in the time of sleepe, all the moistures of the bodie (with the naturall heate) retire themselves to the exterior partes, and then they make no evacuation of the superfluities and humidities thereof. Also, sleepe immeasurably vsed, nor onely is prohibited by naturall Philosophers and Physitions; but likewise it is reprooued by all wise men of vnderstanding. Aristotle sayth, During the time of sleepe, there is no difference betwene the wise man and the foole. And questionlesse, although a wise man had not any other occasion to make little vse of sleepe, but for equalling himselfe with a foolish Idiot; yet he should auoyd and shunne the excesse (though sleepe maintaineth life, and is very wholesome) in considering with his best cogitations, that he which sleepeeth is not liuing. And as Plutarke sayth in his Booke of the contention betwene fire & water: The man that sleepeeth hath no more strength or knowledge in his sleepe, then if hee were dead. Pliny is of the same opinion, saying; Sleepe taketh from vs the halfe part of our life, considering, while we are in sleepe, we neither know nor feele, whether we are liuing or no. Ouid, and other Poets beside, with men of no mean learning, do call sleepe, The similitude of death.

Saint Paul, in the fourth chapter of his first Epistle to the Thessalonians sayth, Brethren, I would not haue you ignorant, concerning them that are asleepe: in speaking these words, hee plainly meaneth death. Then it followeth thus: Such as sleepe in Iesus Christ, will God bring with him. Sleepe likewise is the resemblance of negligence and slouthfulness, according to Saint Gregorie, who saith; For a man to sleepe, is to keep himselfe and perseuer in his sinnes. If sleepe thus had not bene vnderstood to sinne, Saint Paul would neuer haue sayd so many times: Awake ye now, and sinne no more. A man then may very well shame, to spend the most part of his life sleeping in his bed; for therein he sinneth no less: then he that sitteth all day at a Table feeding: in regarde, that these things ought not to be taken, but for the sustentation of life, and not the hurt thereof, and of the soule also; wherefore sleepe is allowed for sustenance, and not for voluptuousnesse.

Seeing then it should bee employed onely for the health of the bodie; let vs now vnderstand, after what maner a man should lie in his bed for Sleepe, to the end it may be profitable to him. I reade, that the most profitable kinde of sleeping for any well disposed person, is first to beginne sleepe vpon his right side; and afterward (for the most part of the night) to turne and rest vpon his left side; and in the ending of his sleepe, to turne a while on the right side againe. The reason is, because the stomacke of a man is seated in such sort, that the mouth thereof leaneth somewhat more to the right side then to the left; but the hollow heart or bottome thereof, declineth a little toward the left side. So that by lying down to sleepe (for an houre or two) on the right side, the stomacke extendeth it selfe and resteth vpon the liuer. And hence ensueth two speciall commodities; the first, that the stomacke ordereth it selfe, and in that preparation, the foode descendeth downe the more easily: the second, that the humidity of the meate receiued, refresheth the liuer, and by that refreshing, naturall heate taketh strength in the stomacke, to beginne and cause digestion.

After that these two good effects haue followed one another, then it shall be fitting to turne vpon the other side, because by being so turned, the liuer cometh and couereth the stomacke, and embraceth it euen with wings, (as it were) so that his foode retaineth more to the liuer, and thereby perfecteth digestion. Neuerthelesse, it is good in the morning, for a finall consummation of that times sleepe, to turne againe vpon the right side, to the end that the stomacke may beginne to ease and discharge the liuer, and likewise to expell the ayre or superfluitie of the passed digestion. This rule is good, and will bee well acknowledged by him that hath a qualified liuer, and his stomacke not cold, but if at these two members are found and temperate in him. But he that hath an ouer-hot liuer, and a cold stomacke, as many times it cometh so to passe: it is not good for him to sleepe vpon the right side, because the stomacke falling vpon the liuer, straineth and presseth it in every part, heating and enflaming it excessively, so that the vpper part of the stomacke continueth vncouered by the superiour part, cooling and weakening it more and more; whereby the very greatest heate of the liuer carrieth and beareth vpon it, all the little left in the stomacke before, whence ensueth bad digestion, and consequently a sickly disposition. Wherefore the man that hath a cold stomacke, and a hote liuer, it is not wholesome for him to sleepe on his left side; because the stomacke being wholly couered with the liuer, it maketh digestion; and as for the liuer, lying so aloft vpon the superiour part, it is both discouered and discharged, and by that means refresheth it selfe, and is not enflamed at all.

There are some also, that make a custome of sleeping on their belly, which helpeth and comforteth digestion, because it assemblith and retaineth naturall heate in the stomackall part, which is in the better disposition for euacuating superfluities. The contrary cometh to such as sleepe on their backe, with the face openly discouered: in regarde that naturall heate extendeth it selfe abroad, by which meanes digestion is weakened, and the superfluities can not be purged by the mouth, nor by the ordinarie conduites and passages: but remaine in the breast and in the throat, which oftentimes causeth stuffings and suffocations, with Epilepsies and other infirmities.

The wife therefore doe also counsell and aduise, that a man should not sleepe too much stretch out in his bed, because thereby digestion is greatly weakened and impaired: for according to the Philosophers rule; when the vertues and forces are vnited together, the operation is so much the better. But being moderately and indifferently heaped or doubled, the carnositie which couereth the stomacke, ioyneth the more closely to it, heating and strengthening it better then before. These rules whereof I haue spoken, are necessa-

CHAP. XLIII.

Of an ancient use and custome in Spaine, in making their account of times, by these words, Here de Cæsar: What that Here is, and wherefore, and when the use thereof was left.

In ancient times they had a custome in Castile, when-soeuer they dated writings & instruments of reckoning or worth; they wrote downe the words of Here de Cæsar, in such sort as we see downe the year of Grace, or of our Lord God, and the same stile was obserued in Chronicles and Histories, as hath bene obserued by many diligent Readers. And although this matter hath bin seene and discouered by many yet few people haue vnderstood the occasion and originall of this vse, neyther wherefore the word is termed Here.

In mine opinion, there may bee two good reasons rendred. The first, that this word Here was written with an aspiration, and so haue I found it in some places of the Spanish History; although in some other it is not so. But being so, we say, that it commeth of the Latine word Hierus, which is as much to say, as Lord; and thereby it followeth, that Here may be vnderstood for Lordship, Soueraignty, Monarchy, or Reigne and Dominiion: and that Here de Cæsar, implyeth the Monarchy of Cæsar, that is to say, the beginning of Monarchy, which is vnderstood of Octavianus. Of this opinion is Antonius Nebrissenfis, for in his vocabulary for the Spanish Language, he saith; Here de Cæsar, is namely the Monarchy of Cæsar.

Astrologers in their accounts, and especially king Alphonsus in his Tabletes, nameth the beginning of reignes by the word Here: as that of Philip, that of Alexander, that of Nabuchodonosor, that of Cæsar, and many other. And yet notwithstanding, although this may seeme to bee a case cleare and euident, yet there is a kinde of difficulty, wherein it is expedient to yeeld satisfaction. To wit, that as Eusebius, Paulus Orosius, and diuers other write, Christ was borne in the 42 year of the Empire of Octavianus: if it be so, it appeareth that Here should anticipate the 42 years of Christs Natiuity, in regard that it hath respect to the beginning of Cæsars Empire, according to due consideration. Neuertheless, it anticipateth but of thirty eight yeares, according to king Alphonsus his setting downe: wherefore the Text hath not sayled, for euermore Here de Cæsar, precedeth the birth of Christ thirty eight yeares.

I vnderstand this to ensue from Eusebius, Orosius, and all the rest, who naming the birth of Christ, to bee in the two and fortieth year of the Empire of Octavianus, begin their account of his Empire, at the first day of his entring Rome, soone after the death of his vnkle Iulius Cæsar, where he arriuing, was made Capitaine with the Consuls Hirtius & Ponsæus, against Mark Anthony. In setting downe the account of time so, and not otherwise, the birth of Christ commeth iustly to bee in the two and fortieth year of his Empire: notwithstanding, they that make their account by Here, leaue out foure yeares at the beginning. And it seemeth they had good reason so to doe, because in those 4 first yeares, Octavianus held no command in Rome, neyther had the gouernement without resistance: for at the entring of those foure yeares, he had warre against Mark Anthony. Then going afterward to Rome with his troopes, he had the Consulship perforce, in the place of Hirtius, he being dead at his comming.

When these things were done, hee made an accord & conuention with Mark Anthony and Lepidus, where they became all three (one after another) to gouerne for a certaine time, and made the cruell proscription, whereby they did put to death diuers of the principall men in Rome. Moreouer, he and Mark Anthony passed into Greece, in persecution of the murderers of Cæsar, where they fought a battaile against Brutus and Cassius: after whose death and discomfiture, he lost Mark Anthony in those Easterne parts, and returned into Italy, where he opposed himselfe against Lucius Antonius, the brother vnto Mark Anthony, and besiedged him in Perusia, constraining him to yeelde to his mercy. Thus hauing vanquished and expelled all his enemies, hee came (without any contradiction) to Rome, to gouerne Italy, France, Spaine, and Germany: for Lepidus was in Affrica, and Mark Anthony in Asia; therefore his entrance and Seignury, was foure yeares after his comming from Greece.

In regard whereof, the account of Here and Monarchy, beginneth (by good reason) there, which is thirty eight yeares before the birth of Christ: so that Eusebius, Orosius, and all the rest, who set downe the birth to bee in the two and fortieth year of Octavianus his Empire, doe begin their reckoning, from the day that Iulius Cæsar was slaine, he being his vnkle. And this is proued apparantly, because it appeareth by all histories, that Iulius Cæsar was slaine in the year seuen hundred and ten, from the foundation of Rome: & our Lord was borne in the year seuen hundred and fifty two, whereby there is a distance of two and forty yeares, all which are granted to the empire of Octavianus. In like manner, according to Eusebius, Iulius Cæsar was slaine in the year of the worlds creation, five thousand, one hundred, fifty seuen: and our Lord (after the same Eusebius) was borne in the year five thousand, one hundred, ninety nine, wherein there is a difference each from other, of the same two and forty yeares.

If we come to account by Olympiades, Iulius Cæsar was slaine in the second year of the 164 Olympiade; and Christ was borne in the third year of the 194, inclusively; which is also the same difference of two and forty yeares: in which respect, they set the empire of Octavianus, two and forty yeares before the Natiuity. Albeit his true empire began foure yeares after the time when his Here had originall, and thirty eight yeares before the Natiuity: for during those foure yeares, hee was no Lord nor Commander, as all the Roman Histories do approue. Plutarch, Appian, Dion, Suetonius, and more then all the rest, Titus Livius, or to speake better, Lucius Florus saith, That Octavianus com-ming to Rome, when his vnkle was slaine, was but eighteen yeares of age, and was Consul at nineteen. Then the warres being past, and all his enemies vanquished, hee returned victoriously to Rome, & Monarched in the three and twenty of his age. So that by this account, and likewise that of Titus Livius, the empire of Octavianus began foure yeares after the death of his vnkle Iulius Cæsar, which agreeth with the account of Here, thirty eight yeares before the Natiuity.

Some others doe allow of another reason or opinion, concerning this Here, by writing it with a diphthong Æ, without aspiration, and they say it is deriued of the Latine word Aera, for coine or money, Æra consularis, and that it had originall, from the beginning of taxes or tribute money, which was payed to Octavianus, and called Ære, or the tribute of Cæsar, and not the empire of Cæsar, and that it was termed Æra Ære. It is further affirmed, that it was the name of a coyne or money, which was reckoned at a certaine value, and that from the time that was ordered and imposed, so they numbered and counted the Ære. Saint Isidore is of this opinion, speaking thus. Æra singulorum annorum constituta est a Cæsare Augusto, quando primo censu excogitabo Romanorum orbem descripsit. Dicta autem Æra, quod omnis orbis as reddere professus est reipublice. Therefore it appeareth plainly, that this manner of account, came and receiued name of his money and tribute then payed. So hee auoucheth in the chapter following, in speaking of the Quinquenniall yeares, where hee saith: Ad huc enim Consules, ad huc Æra non erant. In like manner it seemeth, that Ambrose Calepine, in his Dictionary gaue this diction such originall, saying. Astralogi quoque initium, a quo supputationes incipiunt, Æram vocant: dicta Æra ex eo, quod omnis orbis as reddere professus est reipublice.

Fryer Alphonsus, of the Order of S. Dominick, in his Eucheridion of times, hath these very words. Another beginning came of accounting by the Here of the same Octavianus, who hauing the whole world in his hand, would know what people he had vnder his Empire: and therefore commanded by Edict, that euery one should be registered in the towne of his birth, so the end, they might giue him (in figure of Seignury or dominion) a kinde of money; and because this money was of metall, the description thereof was named Aera. So that (according to these Authors) this manner of numbring the years by Heres, came from the tribute which they payed, and it was so written in Latine, Aera.

Notwithstanding, there remaineth yet another difficulty, of no meane importance, to wit, it seemeth that the Edict of Cæsar began not so long time before the Natiuitie as the thirty eight yeares which they count of the Here. Also it appeareth by the second chapter of S. Luke, that it began in the yeare when our Lord was borne, because he saith Exijt Edictum à Cæsare: There came out a decree from Augustus Cæsar, and therefore the beginning accordeth not with that of Here. Wherevnto (in mine opinion) answer may be made, that on the hither side of the East parts, to wit, those of Italy, France, and Spaine, this Edict might be begun by the commandement of Octavianus, when hee had bene enstalled Lord and Emperour peaceably in Rome, which was thirty eight yeares before Iesus Christ was borne: but in Affryia and Indea it was not then made knowne, because the Prouinces remained vnder the gouernment of Mark Anthony, vntill they came vnder the Monarchy of Cæsar, and there is no contradiction to be found, but that eight and thirty yeares (before) he gouerned France and Spaine, and measurably impatronizing himselfe of the Prouinces, hee caused the Edict to be accordingly published. Wherefore it might so come to passe, that the first which was made knowne in those Countries, was that whereof S. Luke speaketh, and yet neuertheless, there were other Countries and Prouinces, where that Here had received beginning before.

Venerable Bede sheweth this clearly, writing vpon the same chapter of S. Luke, expounding the words, Et describatur vniuersus orbis, he saith thus. Signant hanc descriptionem, vel primam esse habuerunt, quæ totum orbem conclauserint, quæ utraque iam parte terrarum leguntur fuisse descriptæ. It seemeth this description, to bee the first that was vniuersall to the whole world; because before it, many Citties and Townes in particular, had bene described or set downe. S. Ambrose affirmeth as much vpon the said chapter of Luke, saying: There were found many other Lands and Prouinces, which had bene registred downe. Lucius Florus, in his abridgement of 133. Bookes of Titus Livius, writeth: That Cæsar, some after hee had vanquished Marke Anthony, imposed a tribute vpon all France, which was a little lesse then thirty yeares before Christ was borne.

But whether the cause arose by the first reason, of tearming it by the name of Here, or by the last; it is sufficient that it began eight and thirty yeares before the Natiuitie. This custome of accounting by Heres is very ancient, especially in Spaine, as also among the Arabes and Sarrazines, and I thinke that the Gothes afterward vsed it, and it was not left so long as the Romans reigne endured. Isidore, in writing of the Gothes, and of this Here, approacheth it to be ancient. And although I cannot directly say, when it began, yet I know well enough, that it hath bene long time vsed in Spaine, as appeareth by the Spanish Chronicles, euen vntill Iohn the first, King of Spaine (who lost the battaile of Aluabarasa, in the fifth yeare of his reigne) commanded, that from thence forward, the Here de Cæsar should no more be vsed in writings and histories, but the birth of Christ; which was in the yeare 1383, and in the Here de Cæsar, 1421.

OF NOBILITY POLITICALL AND CIVILL.

THE FIFTH BOOKE.

Nobility, which many of the greater sorts of wits, with great prooffe of vncorrupted verity, & much flowing Eloquence, haue gone about to derue out of diuers foundations, is of three sorts: and is diuided into Nobility Calestiall, which consists in Religion; Nobility Philosophicall, which is got by Morall vertues; and Nobility Politically, whereof this present Treatise is. Out of the two first sorts of Nobility, no man can come Noble, except that he the same, be a good man also. But out of this third sort, a man, although he bee neuer so wicked and vngacious, may yet excell the rest of men, euen in the highest degree of Nobility: so as did Cælogulus, Nero, and such others like.

The matter of Nobility, was in ancient time accounted of two sorts, viz. Theological and Morall: For why, Nobility is a thing honourable, and of itselfe laudable: But without vertue, nothing (according to the opinion of Cicero) can be commendable, or praise-worthy. Of which thing, the seate and scituation of the Temple of Honour among the Romans, was a notable example: whereunto there was no entrance or way, but by the Temple of vertue.

But by the preposterous innouation and change of things, that Nobility which was proper onely to the good, gaue place, and in stead thereof, that Nobility which is alike common vnto the bad and to the good, slept to the helme: yea, euen the word Nobilis (or Noble) it selfe, which some will haue to haue bene so called, as who should say, Nobilis, or remarkable, or for some vertue Notable, began to be indifferently taken into both parts, good & bad: as nobile Scortum, a noble harlot, nobile Scelus, a noble villaine. Neyther in question of Politicall Nobility, are we any more to haue recourse vnto the Diuines or Philosophers, and much lesse to the ancient Romane Constitutions (for the most part) discerning all things by Magistracies, Charges, and Offices, but onely vnto the dispositions of the Princes and Monarchs of the world: who haue the power of the gouernement of the world (as it were in a sort common together with God) after their maner, gouerne Nobility according to their owne pleasure and good liking, and so haue made the same hereditary. And hereof is it, that a stranger, made a Nobleman at Rome, or else where, is not at home accounted in the number of the Nobility, his Prince being thereto vnwilling, and so contrariwise also. Wherefore, they which examine Politicall Nobility, according to any other rule, then the custome of euery Nation, are vterly out of the way. Yet in this so great diuersity of manners and customes of Nations in all places, the same Definition of Ciuill Nobility agreeth vnto them all, viz. Quod sit qualitas, sine Dignitas qua quis legitime à Plebe conditionis existitur.

per gradum erigitur. That it is a quality or dignity, whereby a man is lawfully exempt and by degrees promoted out of, and above the estate of the vulgar & common sort of people. Of this Nobility, there be two kinds, y. z. Nobility Nature, that is to say, by birth: and Dative, which is by the Princes gift. For as for violent Nobility, such as was that of Nemrods, I utterly reject it.

But that these things may be made more manifest, we will by certaine of the better Common-weales, even vnto these our times, deriue the beginning of this dignity, and the manner of obtaining the same, as it were euen from the first infancy thereof, taking both the matter & the examples we therein vse, out of most authenticall and approved Authors, the sentences almost nothing, and much lesse the words, much changed, so that the well affected Reader, cannot of right, lay any thing thereof to our charge.

CHAP. II.

Of the Nobility of the first Age.

Dare contrary vnto the common received opinion affirme, nobility Dative to haue bin before, & more excellent then Nobility Nature, exaple being taken fro Adam himselfe, whom all men know to haue bene made, and not borne: and verily to haue bene a Noble-man (if any other) as formed by God to the Image of himselfe, endowed with all good gifts, and made Lord and Soueraigne Ruler of all creatures; yea, euen of the whole world. But that celestiall Nobility he soone (alas, too too soone) lost, by hearkning vnto his wife: and that worldly Nobility which he yet retained, being vnto his children deriued, began first in them to be Nature, or Nobility by birth. If any man therefore consider Adam his owne race and Progeny, he must needs confesse all the men of that age, to haue bene together Noble. But as in mans body for the preservation of the whole, diuers functions, and offices of members, are required; euen so, in that first society of men (as in all others) a distinction of persons was necessary: wherefore the first Common-weale, which was of the family of Adam, and of his children, consisted wholly of Noblemen (to wit) of the children of one Father, and he the same, being a King, a Prophet, and a Priest; but yet not all of them to be with like honour reuerenced. For he, that first Householder as it were by the decree of Nature, gaue the preheminance and cheefe place vnto his first begotten Sonne, so long as hee kept the right of his Birth-right, which order other families. Afterward following, constantly obserued: so that he which was first by Nature, should be accounted also first in honour. Yet neuertheless, was it altogether lawfull for the Father of the family, to make choise of his own children, that so according to euery one of their desarts, he might bestow vpon them honours, or take them from them.

Of the great number of Adams Progeny, & the discord of the Brethren among themselves, at length arose the diuision of Families, and so consequently the vncertainty and forgetfulness of kindreds, and deadly hatreds and fallings out withall. By warre, the change of mens estates and conditions, and seruitudes are brought in. The vanquished, of Noble become base and vnnoble: & contrariwise, the victors, of base persons, became Noble. Men for the preservation of themselves, haue out of families assembled together into Villages; out of Villages, into Cities; and out of Cities haue growne together into Prouinces, and so into most great kingdoms. In dangers and distresses, according to the rule of reason, wise men are called vpon for their counsel, valiant men for their aide and defence, vnto whom, as vnto men most worthy, the government is committed; whereas the rest are enforced without difference, to obey without any respect of their stocke or kindred.

These things to haue thus bene in the Jewes State and Common-weale, is vnto all men knowne, which are but easily read in the old Testament. First, that Principality and prerogatiue, was giuen vnto the first begotten, you shall easily vnderstand, if you shall diligently consider, that when Adam by reason of his great yeares, was not able longer to attend to the government of the church, and of the common-weale,

Which disperfion being made, euery one of them bare himselfe as Prince of his owne family; which preheminance passed still vnto the first borne of that stocke and family: so that the first begotten of the principall family, still held the same. Neither ought any man to doubt euery one of the Patriarks to haue ruled as cheefe men ouer their owne Tribes and Families vntill that the government of the whole people was deliuered ouer to Moses. But concerning Moses himselfe, we reade in the fourth of Exodus, him and Aaron to haue gathered together all the Elders of the children of Israel, which was the first Assembly. In the 24. of Exodus, the Lord commandeth feuentie of the Elders of the children of Israel, to come vnto him, together with Moses: which feuentie (in the same chapter) are as it were by a knowne name called Nobles or cheefe Persons of the children of Israel. Moses beside, oppressed with the multitude of sutes, following the counsel, of Iethro, chose out of the people certain Captains of thousands which should beare rule ouer a thousand families: others of hundreds, who commanded ouer an hundred: others of fifties who had the command ouer fifty: and others of ten, who bare rule ouer ten: & determined of their lesser sutes and controuersies. Now that there were many Captaines of thousands, euen in one and the selfe-same Tribe, it is out of holy Scripture manifest; and these men, Moses here & there calleth, The Heads of the Fathers, the Heads of the Tribes, Princes, and Heads of the Soldiers; and amongst them were 12 cheefe Princes, especially chosen of the 12 Tribes, who sometimes were alone by themselves chosen out for some especiall commission. But what manner of men Moses made Rulers ouer the Israelites, and what manner of companions he chose forth as assistants vnto himselfe in the government of the common-weale, he himselfe in the first chapter of Deuteronomy thus plainly witnesseth. *And I take vnto you the same season, saying, I am not able to beare the burden of you my selfe alone. For the Lord your God hath multiplied you: and behold, you are this day as the starres of heauen in number, &c. Bring (from among you) men of wisdom and of vnderstanding, & men knowne in your Tribes, that I may make them Rulers ouer you. And you answered me and said, that which thou hast saide, it is good for vs to do. And so out of the Tribes I tooke the Captains (men of wisdom and experience) & made them Rulers ouer you, Captaines ouer thousands, and ouer hundreds, ouer fiftie, & ouer ten, & Officers among your Tribes, &c. But wee endued both by the weight of the words, and by reason, are enforced to cōiecture, Moses being a wise man, in this election and choise, to haue preferred men for their wisdom & experience famous and well knowne, both for the gaining of the fauour and obedience of the people, and also for the better government of the common-weale: neyther to haue any thing regarded such, as boasted onely of the prerogatiue of their birth; for otherwise, instead of helpers, he should rather haue associated vnto himselfe, the perturbors of the publike peace. Wherefore we set downe those feauenty Iudges by the commandement of God, appointed by Moses to haue bin of the dignity of Senators, vnto who some men adde two moe, viz. Moses himselfe, and the High-Priest, as if that six had bin appointed out of euery one of the twelue Tribes.*

Wherefore, by those things which we haue now already spoken, it is euident, as well Dative as Nature Nobility, to haue bin in vse amongst the Israelites, & sometime euen in one and the same family, to haue passed vnto the first begotten alone, or to some other graced with some publike Office in some family, whilst the rest borne of the same flock, in the mean time stucke fast within the bounds of them of the vulgar state and condition. And concerning the kings of the Israelites, it is to be thought also, as it is of the kings of other nations, that they according to their pleasure, ennobled many, cyther by reason, or by affection moued and induced so to do. But lets vs now from the Jewes, passe ouer vnto the Geniles.

CHAP. III.

¶ Of the first Greeke Nobility.

Nothing was euer more vnconstant the the Greek Common-weale, with perpetuall changes still floating vp & down. The beginning of their Monarchy, I (as most are wont) will no further tetch, then from Cecrops. He first called the rude Athenians out of the fields, into a ciuill society, built twelue Townes, and diuided the Citizens of them into Souldiers, Artificers, Husbandmen, and Shepherds. Every City had Magistrates of it owne, neyther did they but in times of great danger resort vnto the King: yea many of them at times tooke vp Armes against their Kings. They which inhabit the Champaigne Country, were commanded by some few. The Mountiniers were gouerned by a popular estate, and they which dwell by the Sea-coast, had a mixt gouernement, in a meane betwixt both. And they which out of the whole body of the people, were called vnto the gouernement of the Common-weale, were honored for Princes, Senators, and Noblemen. Plutarch writeth, such men as were of greatest power in the Cities, to haue bene thrust out by Theseus, that hee himselfe might alone raigine, yet diuided he the people into Senatours, Husbandmen, and Artificers: of whom hee would haue them of the first ranke, to excell the rest in dignity: them of the second fort, to excell the rest for necessary vse; & them of the third, to exceede the rest in multitude and number. But in the choise of the Senators, he had respect vnto their wealth, their learning, and especially their vertue, which things were required also in the person of the King. For Demosthenes in his Oration against Nearus sheweth, after the Common-weale set in order by Theseus, neuertheless by his hands stretched out, to haue appointed a King out of the number of the which were thought to excell in vertue. Vpon the Senators he imposed the charge of bearing of Office, to consider and determine of matters of Religion, to interpret and expound the Law and sacred rights: and when he was desirous more to encrease the City, hee called all men indifferently vnto an equall part of the Common-weale. Wherefore, in Theseus his Gouernment, Nobility was gotten by riches, knowledge, and vertue. After the Kings, there was in the City a double Democratie, one which consisted in the power and gouernment of the richer sort of the Citizens; and another, which rested in them all in generall which were free-men. Solon (the discord betwixt the common fort, and them of the richer sort of the people being appeased) after the slaughter of the Cylonians, restored vnto his country, the Democratically or Popular gouernment, the Oligarchy or gouernment of some few, being quite taken away. He deuised foure orders or degrees of Citizens: Them, which could of their dry & wet commodities, fill fise hundred of their measures (called Moly) hee placed in the first order or degree. Them which could fill foure hundred of those measures, hee placed in the second ranke. Them which could fill three hundred, in the third, and al the rest in the fourth. And called the first of these Atolides, the second Eguites, the third Zeugetes, and the fourth Thetes. All publike Offices, he appointed to be committed to them, which were placed in the three first degrees, and they so hauing borne Office, were accounted in the number of the Nobility, but vnto the fourth ranke was no publike Office or Magistracy communicated; & therefore that ranke was altogether bale and vnno- ble. But after Solon, Aristides, and Pericles participated the Magistracies, euen vnto the basest and lowest sort of the people also, as Xenophon in his Booke concerning the Athenian Commonweale, setteth it down for right and reason, that they, euen of the meaner and poorer sort, should indifferently be called & admitted vnto all preferments in euery part of the Common-weale, for that they more profited for the enriching of the City, then did they of the Nobility. Euen plaine Citizens, hauing well deserued of the Commonweale, were therefore among the Athenians ennobled. So Leo, for that he for the welfare of the commonweale, had solemnly vowed his daughters to death, was accounted & registred amongst the ten Worthies. And Nobility once by the Father obtained, enno-ennobled his Children also.

But the Athenian commonweale was not so lauish & prodigall in the communicating of Nobility, as was in ancient time the Romaine Common-weale sparing and curious in the bestowing thereof. Wherefore this the Romaine State and Common-weale shall afford vnto vs greater store and plenty of matter of this kinde and nature.

CHAP. IIII.

¶ Of the first Romaine Nobilitie.

Romulus to draw strength vnto the city of Rome, but lately before by him built, ordayed an Asylum or Sanctuary, wherevnto the poore and bale people out of Countries and places thereby by flocks resorting, gaue the first encrease vnto so great a city. And out of this rabblement of people Romulus chose an hundred Senatours, which by Iuuenall the Satyricall Poet is in these verses noted.

Et tamen ex longe reptatis, longèq; reuoluis
Non n, ab infami gentem deducis Asylo:
Placuisse primas quisquis saci ille tuorum,
Aut Postor satis, aut illud quod decore nolo.

Yet frō the bale Asylum thou canst but deriue the same:
For he that was first Author of thy stocke and pedegree,
A Shepherd was, or else such one, I list not name to thee.

Then Romulus for their honor, would haue to be created, Fathers: and for their age, Senators, and both them and their progeny he appointed to be of the ranke of them that were of the Senatours descended. But afterward, the Common-weale being communicated also with the Sabines, he chose out another hundred. Tarquinius Priscus (oras some other rather would haue it) Brutus added vnto them another C. called the Senatours of the meaner fort of the People. Valerius Publicola, after the Kings were driuen out, chose threescore and foure more then an hundred, of the order of Gentlemen (in stead of so many Senatours slaine by Tarquinius Superbus) which were called Adelēs, or men chosen: for after the kings driue out, such as he law to be wife, ancient, and of approved honesty, he alcribed into the Senate, as into the most graue & reuerend Councell. After those first foundations of the Romaine Common-weale thus layed. Citizens of Rome descended of the stocke of Senatours (who before had borne the chiefe and greatest Honors) were by the Dictators, Censors, or Triumvirs, created Senatours, and afterward also of the Order of Gentlemen were called into the Senate.

Vv herefore, the Order of Patricij, and of the Senatours, to haue ennobled such as were thereof, there was neuer anie doubt, but concerning the order of Gentlemen, some there be, which make question. Tiraquellus thinketh the Romaine Gentlemen to haue holden the middle place betwixt the Patricij (or them which were descended from Senatours) and the Plebeij or Common People: for that Tacitus calleth them Illustres, or men of marke. Martiall also calleth the Order of Gentlemen, the Lesser Order and the Order of Senatours, and of them that were descended of Senatours, the Greatest Order.

Many are also of opinion, Nobilitie to haue bene giuen amongst the Romaines, by the bestowing vpon them Rings of Golde: and most certayne it is, such gift of Rings to transerre the state and condition of a Free-borne man vnto them to whom they were so giuen, without which free estate no Romaine was deemed capable of Nobility. But when the vse of rings of Golde began in Rome, it is not manifest. Pliny writeth it of long to haue bene the Badge or Cognissance of them which were about to goe Ambassadors vnto forraigne Nations, and the rest of the Senatours, to haue bene without them: neyther was it the manner and fashion for anie other to vse them, then such as had for that cause publicly receyued them. And such Golde rings they vsed onely abroad, and iron rings at home in their houses.

But afterward, the custome of wearing of Gold rings beganne to be vsed of all the Nobility, as it is written in Titus Livius in his ninth booke, in these words: The Senate to haue burnt with such rage, and disdayne, because Cneius Flautius a late freed man was made Adilis, that many ny of the Nobility thereupon, laid aside their gold Rings, and Trappings of their Horses: wherein Plinie witnesseth many to haue bene deceived, which thinke them of the order of Gentlemen to haue then done the same. For that (sayth hee) is also added: but the Trappings were also layde aside, for which the name of Gentlemen is put too. It is also recorded in the Annales, Rings to haue bene then layde aside by the Nobilitie, but not by the whole Senate in generall. Whereby it is manifest, that the Gentlemen as then had no right to weare a Ring, and that it belonged but vnto the Nobilitie onely; that is to say, vnto the Patricij, and the Senators, although they were not themselves Patricij; that is to say, descended of Senators, for that the dignitie of a Senator gaue beginning to Nobilitie.

But after that Iudiciall causes were translated from the Senate vnto the Gentlemen, the vse of Rings together withall, passed vnto them also; which was not then so much the cognifiance of Gentlemen, as it was of Judges, and yet not of all them, but of them which were of greater dignitie and honour. Rings (sayth Plinie) diuide the other Order from the vulgar People, as soone as they once beganne to be men of marke and fame, and afterward. But Rings verily put a middle and a third Order or Degree of men, betwixt the Common-people, and the Senators or Fathers: and that name which horses of seruice before gaue vnto men, this name (I say) the Judges now giue vnto moncy: neyther was that long agoe done: for Augustus the Emperour, disposing of the Courts, the greater part of the Judges wore Iron Rings, and they were not called Equites (or Gentlemen) but Judices (or Judges.) The name of Equites (or Gentlemen) rested in the troops of publique horses. But afterward, in the ninth yeare of the reigne of Tiberius, when the Order of Gentlemen was come into an vnion (for so he termeth it) order was taken for the credite of the wearing of Rings, as that they should be vnto all Gentlemen common. And at length (sayth hee) when as Caius Sulpitius Galba going about to gaine the credite of a youthfull good name with his Prince, by the fines of Tauernes and Victuallling houses) had complained in the Senate, even Chapmen and Pedlers to be defended from the penalty of such their misdemeanor, by the wearing of Rings; it was for this cause by the Senate decreed, that it should not bee lawfull for any man to weare a Ring, but vnto him who being free born, both by his father and grand-father by the Fathers side, was valued at 40. Sesterces. And by the Law Fulvia concerning the Theater, to such as had place and did sit in one of the foureteen orders or degrees. Hereby it came to passe, that they seemed to be of the Order of Gentlemen, which did weare golde Rings, for that it was not lawfull for any fo to doe, but such as had a Gentlemans substance. And therefore Suetonius writeth, Julius Caesar when as in exhorting of his Souldiers, he oftentimes shewed the finger of his left hand, and said, that he could willingly, for their sakes, be content to pluck off his owne Ring; to haue been thought in so doing, covertly to haue promised vnto euery one of them, the right to weare a Golde Ring, and the substance of a Gentleman. But after that it was permitted to all Gentlemen indifferently to weare them; that marke (sayth Plinie) beganne to bee indifferently of all men desired: For before, Gentlemen and Judges were knowne by their Iron Rings; but at length, whilest the Order of Gentlemen is seperated from the Free-borne men, the wearing of Rings was communicated with them: that were bond-men, and of seruile condition: that is to say, with such as were of bondmen and slaues, become free. Howbeit this right of wearing of gold Rings, was not wont in ancient time to be giuen to any other, but to such as had right manfully and valiantly behaved themselves in the wars; neither was the right of wearing of a gold Ring, euer giuen to such, as were of bond-men made free, except they were also made free-men borne, (which was in ancient time a Priuiledge not to be granted but by the Prince.) And it was alwaies in ancient time, accounted a greater matter to be a freeman borne, then to be rewarded with the right to weare a gold Ring: For that sheweth vs euen from our birth to be freemen borne, whereas this right of wearing of a gold Ring, indeed, either blottes out, or as much as it can, watheth away the staines of seruitude; yet so, as that the signe thereof for euer remaineth. But the creating or restoring of a man vnto Gentility, cometh nearer vnto Nature, which bringeth with it all the commodities of naturall Gentry, and that belonged onely vnto the Prince, to restore agayne a man banished or cast into exile, vnto his former estate and place: who being so restored vnto their blood or birth-right, were not onely ingrafted into the number of the citizens of Rome, but also inrolled among the Quirites; that so, they might be partakers of all the honours and offices of the Common-weale. Therefore it is of Plinie called ius Quiritum; that is to say, The right and Priuiledge of the Quirites.

There was also among the Ancients, a certaine right of hauing of Images or Statues, which was by the Senate giuen vnto such, as had notably borne some great Office, or worthily deserued some great honours, which was not so much for the marke and signe of Nobilitie, as of the stocke and Family wherunto they were giuen. For, they which obtayned Statues for their stocke and family, there was no doubt, but that they thereunto brought Nobilitie also. And I know not what greater or more excellent thing there was, then to haue the right and power to vse Statues and Images.

Plinie in his nine and thirtie Booke thus writeth; Apud Maiores, Imagines in stirpis erant, quæ spectarentur, expressis cultus singulis dissonabantur armarijs, ut essent Imagines quæ comitarentur gentilia funera, semper, defuncto aliquo, totus aderat Familia eius qui nunquam fuerat populus. Stemmata vero lineis discurrebant ad Imagines pictas. Tablinæ vero codicibus implebantur, & monumentis rerum & magistratuum gestorum. In the time of our Ancestours, Images and Statues were in their Courts to be seene, liuely counterfaits and portraictures were in all their Studies and Closets placed, to the end that there might bee still Images, to attend and set forth the Funerals of such as were to be buried of that stocke and Family. And alwayes, when any Gentleman of note and marke dyed, all the whole race of them that were then liuing of that house and Stocke, accompanied the dead corpes; and from their Armes, lines were drawne along vnto the painted Images of them whose Armes they were. As for their Studies and Closets, they were full of Bookes and Records, testifying the Noble acts by them worthily performed, and the honourable Offices by them in the State & Common-weale borne and discharged, whilest they yet liued. Whereby it is declared, Statues and Images to haue bin rather the signes of some great Office well discharged, then of any Nobilitie. Neyther, that all the Images, of all that were of the stocke and race of them, to whom the right of Images belonged, were wont to be carried at the Funerall solemnities of their kinsmen, but onely the Images of them, who with great prayse and glorie, had borne and discharged some honourable Office, and who had of the Senate obtayned that right and priuiledge.

Vv herefore Cicero reckoneth vp this right of hauing Images, amongst the ornaments of Magistrates. Such as are, the Gowne, the Senators Robe, the Chair of Estate, and, to haue the preheminance to deliver his minde and opinion first: All which things passed not vnto their posteritie, so that they might vse the same in such sort as did the Nobility, of such as had bene Consuls, Prators, and such like: which the Roman Lawes would haue to descend vnto their Nephewes in these degrees; that as well the women, as the men, vnto the Nephewes sonne, should be accounted of the same dignitie that their Ancestors were of. In briefe, he that had brought the right of hauing of Images into his Family, is to be thought to haue done no more, but that his owne Image might be carried forth at his owne Funerall, and the Funerals of them of his owne stocke and Kindred; and not, that the Images of his posterity, should also in such Funerall solemnity be carried; but onely the Images of them who had gotten the like right. And these Images were kept at home in their houses, and were carried forth at the Funerals of them of their house and stocke, for an example of their Noble acts by them done. But concerning Images and Statues, many thus doe thinke, That they which had the Images of their Ancestours, were accounted and called Ancient Noblemen, and those which had but onely their owne Images, were reputed and called New Noblemen: but such, as had neither Image of their owne, nor of their Aunccestours, they were reputed as base and vnnoble. And yet they of the common sort of the people, having obtained the Offices (called Curules, or of the Iury Chayre of Estate) had also their Images. And thus much concerning the right of Images and Statues: Now will I againe returne vnto Romulus.

As Romulus had diuided the people into two degrees or orders (viz.) the order of the Senators, and of the Common persons, calling their Progeny Patricios and Optimates (or the Progeny of the Fathers, and of the Nobility) and the Progeny of the other Plebeios (or a Progeny descended from the vulgar and common sort of people) so diuided he their Offices and vocations also. Vnto the Patricii or such as descended of the Senators, hee left the liberrall professions (viz.) the bearing of Armes and Offices, the making of Sacrifices, the deciding of controuersies in Lawe, and the administration of all busineses belonging in publike vnto the citie and Commonweale: But to the Common people he left the bearing of Armes, also the tilling of the ground & the feeding of cattle: other base trades and occupations (not becomming free-men borne) he assigned vnto strangers, Marchandize, and seruile ministeries, he wholly committed vnto them.

The Romaines themselves, he would not haue to exercise any base trade, or laborious and painefull businesse; vnto whom hee forbade all vnhonest manner of gaine, for all such manner of gaining was thought vniuely vnto such as were Fathers in the Common-weale: neither in ancient time could one be chosen Senator, or one of the Patricii, but by an expresse Law, to that end and purpose propounded to the people, which was the greatest office belonging vnto a King, a Consull, or a Dictator. But in what things the Patricii were discerned from them of the common sort of the People, is by many examples tried: for the Patricii which excelled in Nobility, and which were honestly begotten and well brought vp, had a Tablet or sewell on their breasts, and little Moones on their feet, for they vfed Iuory Buckles, crooking horned wife, like vnto the Moone, which they say was ordained by Numa, that Senators and their posterity, should vnto their black shooes tie Moones, as if by the Character of the Moone, the number of an hundred had bene designed and figured, in which number the Senators were then contained. But the Tablet they wore was of Gold, made in forme of an heart, where-with they of ancient time, are reported to haue also sealed their Letters: which Tablet free-borne boyes, and the sonnes of such as had serued on horse-backe, vfed to weare, together with the inbrodered Gowne called Prætexta, vntill they were seuentene yeares olde, which time expired, they then in a soleme feast hangd it vp vnto their household, or harth-gods, whom they called Lares. Euerie honourable and noble youth wore this Prætexta or inbrodered Gowne about his coat, but after child-hood past, this Prætexta being left off in the seuenteenth yeare, and sometime in the sixteenth, and fifteenth also, they put on the gowne (called Toga virilis) or Mans Gowne: that which was inbrodered with Purple, was wont to be giuen only to them whose fathers had borne the great Offices (called Curules) or some other great honors. The order of Gentlemen, and the Common sort of People, in ancient time did weare no Purple. The garment of the Tribune of the People, and of them of the Communitie, was a cloake, such as they called Sagæ, Endromides, and Cuculli, Casocks, Mantles, and Clasques with hoodes. But in succeeding times, the Commoners indeede did weare Purple, but yet different from that which the Senators wore (viz.) of a darke colour, and died with the iuyce of hearbs, and not with the right Tyrian purple dye. Beside that, the Patricii, by the institution of Romulus had the Auspices or offices of Divination belonging vnto them, and the Senate the offices of Priesthood. But this ordinance (saith Dionysius) continued not long, for that all things were made common with them of the Communitie. And lest any man should thinke the dignity of the Patricii, and of the Senators to be the same, Tacitus reporteth, the Emperour Claudius to haue selected out of the Senate, euerie one of the most ancient sort of the Senators into the number of the Patricii, there being now but a few left of those families which Romulus called Maiorum, and Lucius Brutus, Maiorum Gentium. But there is another thing

whereat thou wilt happily more maruell, which is, that the Communitie growing strong (as there was a passing ouer from the state of a Commoner vnto the degree of one of the Patricii) so diuerse of the Patricii also went ouer vnto the Communitie, and so became of their numbers. The election of the Senators, according to the alterations and changes of times, belonged sometimes vnto the Kings, afterward to the Consuls, and to the Dictators. After the Kings driuen out, we reade, the Consuls to haue chosen such of the Patricii as were decreed vnto them, and afterward some of the Commoners also to bee Tribunes of the Souldiers with Consulary power, vntill that it was by the Law provided, that the Censors should Warde by Warde make choice of them in the Senate. By and by after a substance was required for the creating of a Senator, and if he that was so chosen, did afterward waste and weaken his said substance, he lost also his order and degree.

Wherefore it is manifest the Romaine Nobilitie to haue bene established in the dignity of the Patricii, and of the Senators, which not to haue bene denied vnto the Order of Gentlemen, we gather of that which followeth, although some others be of other opinion. Dionysius affirmeth, three hundred Gentlemen to haue bene chosen by Romulus, out of the most honourable Families, tenne out of euery Warde. Some of the Gentlemen were such as serued vpon a publike horse, altogether in the Citie; other some of them were such as serued vpon a priuate horse in the Armie abroad. The publike horse the Censor appoynted, and publike Horse-men, or Gentlemen, he created, as well out of them that were descended from the Senators, as out of the Communitie, who at length were for their substance created also, as were the Senators. But a Gentilemans substance was foure hundred thousand Scitricies, which being consumed and spent, the reputation and dignitie of a Gentleman, therewith took end also. Isidore writeth, That although a man were by birth a Senator sonne, yet vntill he came to lawfull yerres, he was but a Roman Gentleman, & so afterward came into the order of the Senators. Livy bringeth in Perseus King of Macedon, thus speaking. Equites Romani principis inuentus, Equites Seminarium Senatus, inde lectos in paruum numerum Consules, inde imperatores creant. The Romaine Gentlemen (saith he) are the Princes of the youth, the Gentlemen are the Seminarie of the Senate, out of them being chosen into the number of the Fathers, they create their Consuls, out of them they create their Generals. The Romaine Gentlemen did weare the Robe of Estate, neither could any man be of the order of the Gentlemen of Rome, but that hee must be free-borne. Wherefore, to be a Romain Gentleman, was somewhat a greater matter, then simply to be a free man borne. Yet Pliny hath written, the wearing of Rings, to haue inserted and put a middle and third Order into the People; and them to haue begonne to be euerie where renowned, and to haue diuided the other Order from the vulgar sort of People, or the Communitie; as if hee should haue said, The Gentlemen at the first to haue bene Commoners, but afterward to haue been men of better note & make: which according to the words of Isidore before recited, may seeme to be compared vnto the Senators children, who were accounted among the Equites or Gentlemen, vntill they came vnto the Senators age.

In the question of Nobilitie, not onely the ignorant, but euen the learned also, much erre, whilst that they agree not vpon the proper signification of these words, Eugenia, Nobilitas, Generosus, Nobilis, Ingenus, Gentilis; that is, Honour of birth, Nobility, a Gentleman, a Nobleman, a man free borne, a Gentleman, For while they interpret Eugenia the Greeke word, Nobilitas in Latine, (and with vs Nobility) the more generall word is brought in place and steed of the more particular: or as the Logicians vfe to say, Genus pro Specie. For why, Eugenia or honour of Birth, is but the one kinde of Nobilitie, called Naxtine, (and not all kinde of Nobilitie) requiring a certaine antiquitie of stocke, of riches, and of vertues as Aristotle would haue it) whose words are these: Non diuites, neque boni, sed qui à virtutibus, diuitiis, vel antiquis bonis descendunt. Eugenes sunt habendi: Not the rich men onely, neyther the good men alone, but they which haue descended from Vertues, Riches, and good Aunccestors, are to be accounted Noblemen borne.

Nobility of birth, which is called Eugenias, is of Ofortus defined: Splendor vel dignitas generis in quo maxima virtutes existerunt vita Communi salutaris & commodas. The lustre or dignity of stocke, wherein most great vertues have flourished, wholesome and commodious for the common vse of mans life. Which Ofortus affirmeth, to be as it were subiect to rottennesse, and with olde age to be able to be consumed and ended. But this rule is not in our Court received. Symon Symonensis in these words reprooveth Ofortus, his name being concealed, or else some other man of the same opinion with him. Supine loquuntur qui aium quendam summa Senectus mentis vini & consilium debilitat, sic etiam Nobilitas splendorem medietate vetustate auget, extrema vero Senectus conficit. They speake ydly (saith he) which say, that as great old age doth weaken the force & iudgement of the minde, so also, the glory and lustre of Nobilitie to be with moderate antiquitie encreased, but yet to be with extreme olde age extinguished. For as the similitude (saith he) agreeth not, so neyther doth it well conclude: For the more auncient that a Stocke or Family is, by so much the credit and reputation thereof is greater. And yet hee the sayde Simon forgetting himselfe in another place stumbleth at the same stone, by setting bounds and limites vnto the same Eugenias, or Native Nobilitie, and by decreeing that a long and continuat race of Noble Progenitours, in whom great vertues have oftentimes shined vnto the number of three discenes, doth make a true Noble Stocke, or Eugenias. And that the beginning of a Stocke or Familie, is no further to be deriued, then from the fourth Predecessor, left in searching further, euen Kings themselves (as saith Plato) should be deriued from Slaves, or Slaves from Kings.

Of this Eugenias or Native Nobilitie, all ages haue best thought, but yet so, as that all the right of Nobilitie should vpon it be ground: for a man may be Noble, although he be no Eugenias, or from Nobles descended; yea, he may be more honourable then he which is so descended, although not so auncient a Gentleman. As a new made Earle, compared with an

Esquire of a most auncient Family. As Agathocles, of a Porter made a King. What was Romulus? VVhat was Tullus Hostilius? And what was Turquinius Priscus?

But let vs now come to search out the signification of the aforesaid words: The Romans diuided their People into Free-men and Slaves; of Free-men, some were of Bond-slaves made Free-men (whom they called Libertini) other-some, were Free-men borne, (whom they called Ingeniti.) The Libertini were Citizens of Rome, who were three wayes manumitted or made free; that is to say, by Will or Testament, or in the open Congregation or assembly of the people, or before some publique Magistrate which had power so to doe. And hereupon happily in auncient time, when as this our Kingdome was much oppressed with seruile state and condition, the word Franklin, for a man made free, or enfranchised, was in vse, except you had rather it to haue beene vsed, for a Free-borne-man.

But they were called Ingeniti, or Free-borne-men, who neyther themselves, neither their Auncestors had euer serued as Slaves. And their Auncestors they reckoned vp, euen from their Grand-father, which is euident by these words of Linus. An vquam fando audistis Patricios primos esse factos non a Carlo dimissos, sed qui patrem Cicere Auumque possint? Did you euer heare it spoken, the Fathers to haue beene first made, and not sent downe from Heauen; but such as could reckon vp their Father and Grand-father: that is to say, nothing but Free-borne-men.

Freedom of birth, opened a way vnto all degrees of Honours, which (euen as Politick Nobilitie) was eyther Native, or Dative; that is to say, by birth, or by gift. Dative Freedom was by certayne Magistrates giuen, and at length onely by Princes themselves, and that two manner of wayes, the one secretly and not so plainly, by the gift of a Ring, the other more expressly by name and perfectly, by restoring of men to their birth or blood. And whereas men of seruile condition were but by one name called and knowne, Free-borne-men, and Men of free estate and condition, had two or more names. And the name which they tooke from their Stocke or Familie, is called Gentile.

Gentile, or proper to them of that race or kindred. And yet it is to be noted, names giuen by chance, sometime to become proper to a stocke or family. As Tullius was a name proper & peculiar to a Family, but Cicero was a name gotten by chance, and signified of the Pulle called Cicer, (or the Ciclope) the forme whereof one of that family had vpon the end of his nose, who thereof was first so surnamed: but that same name of Cicero began to be Gentile or proper to that Family, as to Cicero the Orator, to his Brother, and to their posterity. Tully in his Tropicks defineth, Gentiles esse qui eodem inter se sunt nomine, qui ab Ingenitis oriundi sunt, quorum Maiorum nomen seruitutem seruerit: qui Capite non sunt dimitti, them to be Gentiles (or of the same stocke and family) which are among themselves of the same name descended of Free-borne-men, none of whose Auncestors had serued as slaves, or had beene condemned to loose their liberty, state, or Country.

They which were called Gentiles (or of the same stocke or family) were of necessity to bee descended from Ingeniti or Free-borne-men; for that of Slaves, and of them whom they called Libertini or men of slaves made free, there is no stock or family. Wherefore, the right of Gentility, or of hauing of a Stocke and Familie, although it was different from Nobility, yet is it not to be doubted, but that it was in great esteeme & reuerence among the Romans, and to them, to haue aboue all things desired to bee called Gentiles, as men that had beene descended from some good stocke or kindred. And that desire hath euen yet vnto this day possessed all Italy.

For among the Venitians they are called Gentilhomini, who deriue their stock from the first Inhabitants of that Island; and which are themselves Patricy, or descended from the Senators. And that word Gentilhomie, as it were by hand deliuered from the Italians to the Frenchmen; from the Frenchmen remoued to vs; and at the length, together with the new place of dwelling, hath begunne to put a new signification, differing from that which Gentilis or Gentiles was of, amongst the auncient Romans.

For it is false which some, & they learned also, haue deliuered, Gentilitie to haue been proper onely vnto the Patricians: for why, it was common vnto the vulgar sort of the people (as was Ingenity it selfe) which appeareth by this one place of Strabonius. Patricia gens Claudia (sunt etiam & alia plebeia nec potentia minor nec dignitate) ortu est in Regibus. The Clavian stocke and family, of the order of the Patricy, (for there was another house of them also of the Commonalty, neither in power nor in dignity inferior to the other) rise vp at Regills. But they seeme to haue beene deceived, by that which Linus writeth, Romulus to haue created an hundred Senators, which he called Minorum gentium (or of the greater families) and Brutus another hundred also, called Minorum gentium (or of the lesser families.) But this proueth not, that we must therefore grant, only them of the order of the Patricy, to haue had a stocke and family; neither did this so calling of them, Minorum and Minorum gentium, diuide them from the common people, but the felices among themselves only; for that, whereas they were all chosen of Free-borne-Citizens (and which had their stocke and family) yet such of the as Romulus had created, brought the honour of the order of the Patricy sooner into their stocke and family, then did they whom Brutus had freed vnto them. They are also called Gentiles, who in likeness of name agree among themselves (although there be no kindred amongst them at all.)

Among the Athenians they were called Gentis, that is to say, Gentiles, not they which were ioyned among themselves in stocke or blood, but were of those sort of people, who diuided into Wardes, grew into a certaine society and fellow ship among themselves. For among the Athenians there were foure Tribes, and euery Tribe was diuided into three Wardes, which made twelue VVardes. And euery VVarde was diuided into thirty parts, which they called Gentes or Kinreds. But againe to the purpose.

VVhy a stock or family among the Romans is to be deriued from the Grand-father, neyther could consist but in two at the least (viz.) the grandfather and the father: Some thinke the reason thereof to be, for that the Latins word Gens signifieth a multitude, which requieth mo then one: and yet Gens seemeth to be called, as it were Genus (that is to say a stock or kindred) the Letter V. being taken away. Howbeit these two words differ, the one of them from the other, for that Genus significeth a stocke and beginning; but Genus importeth as it were a certain multitude of Stockes, and of beginnings of Families and Houses.

Ingeniously
th grace
Nature.

Ingenity, or freedom of birth, had the Ornaments thereof from nature, and had respect vnto liberty, which is still denied from the Grand-fathers. But Gentility was a matter of the ciuill Law, and was referred vnto the ancientness of Agnation (or kindred by the fathers side) differing from the other onely in antiquity of stocke: for it is not needfull to deriue or take Agnation farther then from the Father.

Altho it be so, then Gentility and Nobility are all one and the same thing. And they confound Gentility (whereof the common people no lesse want and boast, then doe the Noblemen) with Nobility: which deny him to be a Noble-man by birth, but he whose Grandfather was Noble neither agree they with themselves, when they dare to affirme (but by what authority I knowe not) Nobility together with the seed of the Parents to be passed ouer vnto their posterity, according vnto that saying of Mantuan:

Et patrum in natos abeant cū semine mores.*

The beauty of the fairest branch,
doth from the roote proceede;
And so the Fathers manners do in their off-spring abide.

And otherwise out of Horace:

*Est in Inuencu, est in equis patrum
Virtus: neq; imbellem feroces Progenant Aquila Columba.*

In Bullockes, and in Horses eke,
the Syres worth we proue:
Nor doth the hardy Eagle hatch,
the weake and fearefull Doue.

By which Analogies, the learned Poets verily went about to stirre vp Noble and courageous youths, to the imitating of their Fathers vertues, being otherwise not ignorant Nobility whereof we intreat to be a thing ciuill or Political, & not naturall. And indeed of vnreasonable creatures, there be diuers kinds, but of men there is but one sort. VVherefore, as an Eagle bringeth not forth a Doue, so neither doth a man beget a Hare. But admit that good men are begotten of good Parents, and valiant men, of valiant fathers. But if this be vnto mankind proper, why are not good and valiant children begotten by good and valiant common persons also? or why, they are men as well as the other, but nothing is then this rule more deceitfull. For through the corruption of mans nature, we see it oftentimes to happen, an vnthrifty sonne to be born of a thrifty Father: a foolle, to be begotten of a wise man; a Coward, of a valiant man. Neither is this now any noueltie or new matter, but such as tooke roote euen in the first corruption of our Nature. For accursed Caine was the first begotten sonne of Adam, a most good father, and of him the same was good Abel begotten. Jacob also and Esaú, were the two iunior of a most blessed father: of which two, God loved the one, and hated the other. And if there be any thing of great operation, which is passed ouer together with mans feede, it is altogether vice; so farre off is it from being of any vertue, which is euer with Labour and study begotten, but born neuer. An Emperour (as Ferretus writeth) for his bodily substance is no better then other men; and yet for the highnes of his dignity, is most like vnto God. Demosthenes saith also, wicked Sonnes (as it were) by a certaine fatall destinie) to be borne of good Parents. It is also commonly saide in the Greeke Prouerbe, The misfortunes of the Worthies sonnes. VVhat should I produce the Mathematicians and Astrologers, which affirme Nobility much more certainly to depend of the force and influence of the starres, then of the constitution of parents.

And yet the vulgar sort, and not without cause, vseth to expect some greater thing in Princes children, then in poore mens; of which their hope and expectation, there are many causes alledged, as the great means Noblemen haue, for the best bringing vp and instructing of their children (for it is a shame vnto the sonne if he shoulde degenerate from his Father, being a Nobleman.) In briefe, the plenty of Kinsmen and Friends giuing the good Counsell. Neither was the Poets minde any other, if you marke his conclusion.

Instruction, helps Dame Natures powres,
And teaching, strengthens those minde of ours.

By Natures ingrafted or hidden power, hee vnderstandeth certayne feedes of vertues, which by the goodness of God alone, are yet in mans Nature, which become not otherwise fruitfull then do the feedes of Hearbs, according vnto the manner and fashion that they are manured & ordered with; so that a man well brought vp, may much more easily obtayne Philosophicall Nobilitie, then can a man that hath bene well borne.

Wherefore poore Countrey-mens Children, who know nothing more then their beasts and cattell, seeme rather to be rude Silvans then men. Whereas others, borne in better place, euen in the same Schooles, and in the same Studies, striue with Noble-mens Children, and would to God they did not so do, both with greater profit and praise.

Other reasons yet remaine, which proue Political Nobility not to be a thing substantiall, but meere accidentall: for why, it may be both present and absent, without the corruption of the subject whereof it dependeth; so that the passage thereof may be letted by some heynous offence committed. It is also lost by voluntary departing or relinquishing of the same (when as Nature in the meane while cannot be thrust away with a forcke) which wee reade to haue bene done, of many of the Romaine Patricijs, who refusing their Patriciat dignity, took on them the state and condition of the vulgar sort, or Commoners. Now many, through the Lawyers termes, are in this matter deceived, who call the extinguishing of Nobility for some offence committed, The corruption of blood: which manner of phrase and speech, they vse not, for that Nature Nobility is naturally and essentially in the humour of blood, more than other hereditarie facultie, but because the right of inheritance, which is by the degrees of the communication of blood directed, is by that means determined or ended, & in hatred of the crime, it is called Corruption, with the infection whereof, all their children are polluted and defiled.

Neither can a stronger argument be devised, to proue Nobility not to be mingled with the blood, then that the Nobility of the Grandfather ennobled not his nephew by his son, condemned to lose his liberty, state, or country. Of which this ciuill institution, a naturall reason is giuen; to wit, for that an vnable mean leteeth & hindereth the extreame to be ioyned together. But yet it was wont to be demanded with vs, no otherwise the it was long agoe with the ancient Romans, whether the nobility of the father being a Senator, do profit his son, being borne before his father had obtained that dignity? And whether such Nobility in the son, be Nature or Dative? Whereunto I answer, The child by our custome, to be immediately by his fathers nobility ennobled, & their children, like the boughes of a tree, removed into a richer ground, are green & flourish with the same new moysture that the bodie of the tree doth. And such Nobility hath deferred to be called Nature, for that it extendeth not but to them, which are borne of such a father. As for example: A Baron, being honored with the title of an Earle, his first begotten son forthwith taketh vnto him the title of some Barony, and all his daughters are saluted Ladies and Princesses.

Wherefore we conclude Nature nobility to be drawne from the father, & not to be needfull for vs to seek for it further: for it may be, that sometime it canot be deriued from the grandfather, as in case that some great offence of the father come betwixt: for a man borne of a noble father, is without all doubt by descent noble. But if anie man wil contend him, not properly to be Eugenus or nobly descended; I answer, the common sort of people most of all, do respect the same, but the Iudicial Court to haue thereof no care at all. For otherwise some new Princes should be of lesse Nobility, then some meane Noblemen, if the priuileges of Nobility should be bestowed, after the ballance of proper and true Eugenia. Adde moreouer, that if true Eugenia should be vrged, it requirerth not only our great grandfathers grandfathers, but euen all the rest of our ancestors in continuall order, after them to be Noble, fith, profitable for the Common-weale, good me, & without spot or imputation.

An hard speech indeed, but an harder rule, and a consequence, of all most

Nature Nobility is not necessarily to be deriued farther then from the father.

hardest: Such a noble descended person, is a rare Bird, and yet some such there be: but concerning that matter, heare Aristotles opinion. Eugenis, verily (saith he) I haue found but in few, and no where an hundred good Eugenis. Wherefore the Athenians called their Noblemen by more vsuall words, Eupaterios and Empetrides, as who should say, Men borne of Noble fathers: although I do know these words to be oftentimes confounded with the word Eugenis.

It to be no hard thing to affirme, that Nobility may be deriued from the mother.

I haue frankly affirmed Nobilitie to descend from the father to the children; and what if I should say the same force to be in the Mothers nobilitie also? Surely, both reason and the opinions of Doctors, and ancient customes also, will be present for the defence of this cause. If Nobility draw any thing naturall at all from the Parents, almost the whole constitution of the Childe, is to be giuen vnto the Mother. It hath also such shape (if we may beleue Philosophers) as the Mother conceiue, together with the feede. For first, it taketh life from the Mother, it taketh likewise nourishment of and from the Mother, encreasing from the Mother; and in briefe, by the consent of all men, it, together with spirit and vitall humour draweth from the mother, affections, Vertues and vices. And that such power is in the Mother, it is manifest by the precepts of Philistians, who command Parents to be most careful to what Nurses they put their children to be nursed. In briefe, if the vertue of the Father be in the children to be reuerenced, why should not the Mothers be so also? The manner of the Sex, doth neither diminish nor encrease Nobilitie, which is for it selfe to be desired. Nay, in tender women it seemeth to haue both more admiration and grace.

It is of a certayne Lawyer well written; That amongst the causes for which the honour and dignitie of persons, is encreased or diminished, that is of others the lightest, which is drawne from the difference of the Sexe: Vlpianus reporteth, the sunnes of the women of the Illyenses, of Delphos, and of Pontus, to haue bene assigned vnto the houses of their Mothers, and not of their Fathers. Plutarch writeth, that amongst the Xanthi, the Sons were ingrafted into the stocke and family of their Mothers, and from them the name of the stocke and kindred to be deriued, and not from their Fathers. The same thing Herodotus reporteth of them of Licia: as that they should take the name and credite of their stocke and kindred from their Mothers, and that he was with them a free-borne-man, and Noble, that was borne of a free-borne-woman, and Noble; although his Father were a Slaue or base common person; yea, and by the Lawes of the Romaines, the Sonnes in some cases follow the beginning of their Mothers. Neyther is it a thing vnheard of with vs, nor with other Nations, Sonnes to haue taken vnto themselves, names from their Mother, which were of greater nobility than their Fathers; as Rainatus de Clara. Spartianus and Trebellius Pollio, haue written, Matricianus or Matrinus, to haue bene by his Mother noble, his Father being but onely a valiant and martiall man. You may also with Cornelius Tacitus reade this sentence: Iam depulso Nerone, quisnam eligeretur inquirebant, & omnium ore Rubellius Plancus, cui Nobilitas per matrem ex Iulia familia. Nero being now deposed, great inquiry was made, who should be chosen, and Rubellius Plancus was in euery mans mouth, who was nobly borne by the mothers side of the Iulian Family. And from these, Virgil, Ouid, and Statius Papinius disagree not, whose verses I haue thought good here to set downe.

What

What wanted in the Fathers blood, the Mothers did requite the same; And the base house reioyced much, by such a match to grow to fame. By Mothers Stocke accounted blest. And Fathers vertues with the best.

Now the Reason which many Doctors bring, to proue the Sonne to be partaker of his Fathers Nobilitie, is this; Eugenis thing compound, partaketh of the forme and matter which agreeth to both the parents. Wherefore, where the Law repugneth not with reason, this rule is to bee holden for true.

And now concerning Nobilitie Datine (or by birth) I haue thus much spoken: and from hence I will directly proceede vnto Nobilitie Datine, or to Nobility which commeth by gift.

CHAP. V.

¶ The diuers beginnings of Nobilitie Datine.

Being about to search out the other kinde of Political or Civil Nobilitie (viz.) Nobilitie Datine, and that euen from the first beginning thereof, certayne things before sayde, seeme heere necessarily to be againe to be called vnto remembrance. Their argument is first to be refused, which say: That seeing Adam was a common Father vnto all men, whereof commeth it, that one man should be better then another? It is thereunto answered out of the same Olde Testaments, out of which the question is risen, being of the like Authority and credite both with the Christians and the Iewes. Noah when he had planted a Vineyard, and had tasted of his planting, hauing drunke of the wine, lay drunken and bare in his Tent. And Cham seeing the priuities of his father, tolde it to his brethren, who upon a naturall honestie and vertue, with a Cloake cast upon their shoulders covered their sleeping father with their eyes turned from him, and not seeing their Fathers nakednesse. But Noah awaked, and knowing what his younger sonne had done vnto him, he cursed Cham, commanding him to be a slave of all Ianes. By this shamefull and vnworthie fact, Cham with all his generation, carryed away his Fathers curse, feruitude, and the Title of obscure and base persons; whereas contrary-wise, Sem and Japhet found all the Names and Titles of Honestie, Nobilitie, and Vertue, and their Fathers blessing withall.

The Datine Nobilitie, whereof our present speech is, was for many causes raysed and inuented. And first of all, vpon vrgent necessitie. For when as euill and wicked men preuailed, and good and honest men were oppressed: it was necessarie the good to be distinguished from the badde, and for the preservation of the publique tranquillity, to be seperated and diuided from them: wherefore, wise, iust, and vertuous men, and the lights, as it were, of the world, shining before others, were set ouer the rest, that they might bee vnto all men an example of godlie and honest life, that they might decide and determine all things. And at that time such wise men and prouiders for the Common-weale seemed by vertue to procure vnto themselves Nobilitie. For the olde Prouterbe preuailed with them: Vertue, and not blood to ennoble men. Such men were by the People called, chosen, & appointed Counsellors and Iudges, who by their subiects were elected and created Kings and Princes. And they, which for their worthy deeds had obtained such honorable Titles and Offices, ennobled both themselves and their posterity.

Another cause also why Nobilitie began to be honoured, was the Ignorance & vnskillinesse of the vulgar and Common sort of people, who haue their fence, reason and vnderstanding so dispersed and scattered, as that they cannot gather, discern, or iudge any thing certaine, firme, or sound. Wherefore, for the maintenance of the publique peace and tranquillity, it was necessarie to make choice of Princes (that is to say, of Gouvernours) men, for their vertue and wisdom, famous and Noble, who might compose and set in order the troubled estates, for lacke of knowledge disordered, and with singular wisdom, and action, as it were by a certaine cunning, drawe the rude people vnto a more ciuill kinde of life, and courtesie of behauiour: such as were Iupiter, Pallus, Ceres, Bacchus, Apollo, and many others. And these men, by their wisdom, vertue, and skill, obtained not onely the Titles of Nobilitie and Dignity, but were of the vnskillfull multitude, accounted for gods also, and receiued from them euen diuine honors.

We see Nobilitie to haue risen also, of the abundance of wealth and riches: for many pinched with extreme poutie, enforced to hang vpon the richer sort, and giuing themselves altogether ouer into their power, repured them for Noblemen, and for such, both esteemed of them, and honoured them.

Nobilitie also beganne of Noble and worthy acts done; for in auncient time, when as Nations were by their enemies oppressed, if any valiant and courageous man had from such oppression deliuered his Country, he therefore was about other men worthily honoured. Many also in auncient time by Martiall prowesse obtained Nobilitie, and therefore of the people accounted Noble: as was Dauid for the death of Goliath the Philistine. Some, immediately from God were elected and called vnto Nobilitie, as Iosua, Gedeon, Iephth, and the rest of the Iudges of Israel, who were Generalls ouer great Armies: other some, were againe by God chosen euen from the Plough, to be rulers ouer the people, as the Princes of the twelve Tribes of Israel. King Saul called out of the field; Dauid from feeding of his flock, who thought themselves vterly vnworthy of such a princely calling. But such as God hath ennobled, are of vs about all others to be accounted most noble.

Yea, no small part, but euen the greater part of Datiue Nobilitie, gained vnto themselves honor and glory by their skill in martiall affaires, carrying home with them victory and triumph ouer their enemies; so as did Horatius Cocles, Titus Manlius, Scipio Africanus, and his brother L. Scipio Asiaticus: I speake not of great Emperours, such as were Vespasian, Domitian, Nerva, Traian, Antonius, Senerus, Theodosius, and many others, who were part of them accounted Fathers of their Country; part of them Benefactors, but all of them best Princes, whose Images are vpon their Coines, euen yet carried about, and publique Statues were in the honour of them, with certaine solemn Ceremonies erected, to the intent that all others with their valour and vertue, should with their deedes, as it were, in striuing-wise, aspire and grow vnto the like glory.

Others also, borne of most base and low condition, who by Armes in time of warres, for their wisdom and courage, haue beene promoted to be great Emperours, Casars, Dukes, Princes and Earles: as were Tullius Hostilius, Numma Pompilius, Tarquinus Priscus, Iulius Caesar, Octavianus Augustus, and such other like, from hence, tooke the beginning of the Titles of their vertues. For certaine it is, at the first vnder the Roman Empire, when as they had subdued the Germanes, Italians, the Spaniards, the Britains, the Gauls, and other most mighty kingdoms, Dukes, Earles, and Barons, not then to haue bin in such sort, as now they be, but from thence to haue afterward spring vp and risen. All their Offices were executed by Tribunes and Lieutenants. There was a greater Tribune, who was next vnto the Emperour and his succellour. There was also a great Officer called Tribunus Celerum, Lieutenant of the Armie, of the light armed and most readie Souldiers. Those which with a Cohort, or band of men, were the Keepers, and had the guarding of the Emperours person, and they among the Romans, which were of the first Order, next after the Emperour, were called Tribuni Celerum, as they were long agoe in the time of Romulus, and of the other fixe kings succeeding him.

The great Officers, called Magistri Equitum, or Maisters of the Horsemen, had like power with the Dictators, and with the Emperors, as Lucius Feneftella, Pomponius Latius de Magistratibus Romanorum: and also Flauius Vegetius, and Marcus Cicero doe, intreating of Martiall affaires, describe. But Pomponius Latius writeth Romulus to haue called the General of an army, whom the Germanes call Hertzogen Tribunus Celerum. Salust in his Treatise concerning the Conspiracie of Cateline, hath called them Dictatores, & Imperatores; that is, Dictators & Emperors. Beside that, Great Magistrates called

Præfetti Prætorio, were of so great credit and authority, as if appeale had bin made from their sentence, they might againe appeale from the Emperour vnto the Præfetti Prætorio. For most wise, good, and iust men, by the Emperours chosen out, were created Præfetti Prætorio, vnto who they were wont to commit almost the whole estate of the Common-weale. The Emperour Senerus granted many things vnto the Great Officers called Præfetti urbis, and Præfetti Prætorio, of all which, heere to speake, were but needlesse. For heere we speake onely of the authority of the Præfetus Prætorio (or Captain of the Guard) which the Emperour onely gaue vnto him, who is the chiefe, liuely, and very essentiall Law it selfe: who were of power to thrust Citizens into exile, and to restore them vnto their estate againe. Whereby it is most euident, Princes and Governours of People to haue had the power and authority of the sword, to punish the offenders, and to administer Iustice: whereby they were afterward thought to procure and get a great name of Nobility, both vnto themselves, and to their posterity: and right probable it is, the authority of Princes and Dukes to haue first risen of the Tribuni and Præfetti: which Princes, at such time as the Romane Emperours removed out of Germany & Italy into Greece, are read to haue taken vnto themselves the Imperiall power: which authority and regall priuiledges wee see (euen at this day) by Kings and Emperors to bee granted vnto Dukes and Princes: so that the election of Princes & Dukes dependeth not of their Subjects (as doth the election of Kings) but is Datiue, as of gift, to be referred vnto the fauour and bounty of the Emperours and Kings, to whom they haue bene subiect. And in the former times, the names of Duke and Prince were names of Offices, and not of Honours and Dignities. And so in the times of the Romans, the Roman Kings, their Dictators and Consuls, & also their Emperours, were in the administration of their ciuill affaires, all martiall men, both horfemen and footmen.

But beside these great Offices of the Tribuni and Præfetti, there were other publique offices and charges; some called Ordinarij, for that they kept orders in the army, and stood in the front of the battaile. Those in the time of Augustus, were wont to be called Augustales: and of Fl. Vespasianus, Flauiales: some called Aquiliferi, carrying an Eagle in their Ensignes, and other some called Imaginary, bearing the ensigne of the common or generall Army of the people of Rome notable with the Letters, S.P.Q.R. that is to say, Senatus Populus Que Romanus: or the Senate and people of Rome, whom wee can more fitly compare vnto none, then to our Standard or Ensigne-Bearers.

But if wee would heere prosecute all things in order, this Treatise should without measure encrease. But now in this place wee onely goe about, slightly as it were to shew the beginnings of Noble Dignities & Offices, least any man should suspect them to be but altogether things faigned, and vpon no reason grounded. Rehearsing these things in the mean time by the way, that when we shall come vnto our owne age, it may appeare, how much Powers, Dominions, and Nations differ among themselves. For they who in auncient times were vnder kings and emperours appointed Governours ouer Regions and Countries, are now become hereditary possessors thereof: & they which before were but Noble Ministers or Seruants, are now become absolute Nobles.

Beside that, in the mean time it most plainly appeareth of that which is aforesaid, that the kindred, stocke, and descent of the Nobility in former ages flourished and became famous onely for vertue, noble actes, and valour of minde. And that Vertue being set apart, wee are all forasmuch as concerneth mans nature, the sonnes of Adam. Wherefore, according to the rule of Theologicall or Philosophicall Nobility (whereunto our Ancestors especially addicted themselves) to boast of Nobility by birth, without vertue, was but a vaine thing.

Vix ea nostra duco.*

For our proud Stocke and Pedigree, and things we did not make, VVee scarce reckon them for our owne, or for our owne them take.

VVherefore wee pray and exhort all men, men, that forasmuch as vertue commeth not by inheritance, every man would endeavour himselfe, of himselfe to become Noble. For they which otherwise vaunt and boast of Nobility, seeme only honouers of vertue, vpon another mans credite, and liue not by their owne, seeing that they be rather base persons, bearing themselves brag, vpon another mans vertue. But for the most part quite out of order, so the fashion and manner of the world now is. For what cannot flattery, the fauour of Princes, and too much indulgency do, and bring to passe.

PARERGON.

It is sufficiently manifest, by that which is aforesaid, what the iudgment of my Friend and Vncle Robert Glouer was, concerning Politicall Nobility in ancient time, amongst the Gentiles: which Philosophers heeretofore, haue fer forth to vs. as a wauering thing, (and Diuines as a thing vncertaine) whilst they in speaking thereof omitted the Ciuill Rights of persons.

It were verily to be wished, that the ornaments of vertue should euery where be conferred and bestowed vpon none, but vpon such, as in whom vertue it selfe resereth: for that as the encreasing of honor, so the credite and reputation thereof also, is propounded to be gotten, not by ambition, but by industry. But seeing that Politicall Nobility is another thing, whereof there be diuers beginnings, and those of such sort and condition, as maketh in euery man that hath them, a beginning and excellency proper and peculiar to themselves: it is from the rest of the kindes of Nobility (viz. Theological and Philosophicall) by this only difference distinguished, that whilst they rest onely vpon Religion and Vertue, this Ciuill Nobility resteth vpon the custome of Nations.

In the prosecuting whereof, for that he finished not the same, I verily tooke it most grieuously: for many things seemed to me to be therein wanting, which might much haue concerned the matter: As the peculiar forme of enebling of men, vsed in euery kingdome apart, and especially in this Empire and Island, as the very method and order of the worke seemed to me to make shew of. But forasmuch as he in his life time perfected not these things: For,

—Absolut clarum cito mors Achillem.—

Vntimely death soone tooke away
Achilles, and clos'd him in clay.

Least Tenuiss head being onely by Aepelles perfected, the body being not yet drawne, the whole worke in the meane time altogether imperfect or deformed, should lye neglected and vnregarded, I thought it a thing worth the labour, to supply that defect, with such things as hereafter follow: to the intent, that at length amongst others, I might in fewe words, and as it were at a glimpse, itew what orders of Nobility are with vs also: what Rites and Ceremonies are vsed in promoting of men vnto the degrees of Nobility, that from hence the forme of creating of the being before vnderstood, I might afterward with greater fruit, and fuller pleasure, come vnto the persons themselves, with their families, marriages, changes, and noble acties; and at length in a iust volume (if God shall see it good) more at large, and fully delight the Readers.

But if we shall compare these old and most ancient times of the Romane Empire with ours, wee shall finde no signe or token of that ancient Nobility in the Courts of Princes. If you shall seeke for such as they called Patricij or Senators (whom the Romanes reuerenced as men sent downe from heauen) you shall finde them no where but in Citties, exercising Vltury and Merchandize (trades vnto the Romanes forbidden) at whom (although within their owne walled they be much regarded and esteemed) our noble Courtiers were wont to scorne & jest. Or else if it please you, goe vnto the time of Pope Urban, who (forsooth) made Charles the Sonne of King Lemes the 8. in France, a Senator of Rome, when as he should rather of his owne right, haue graced him with the Cardinals hat. In deede, it was a very ridiculous comparison son of the French King his Sonne with a Senator of Rome, as the matter now standeth.

Wherefore let vs see, and as breiefely as we can touch, how, & by what degree after the empire of that City (which first built by Shepheards, at length became Mistress of the whole world) began to decline from so great an Estate, together with the change thereof, by little and little, drew with it the change of Noble dignities and titles also.

After the translating of the Romane empire by Constantine the Great, all that excellency of publike dignities, whereof it is exprefly and sufficiently enough before spoken, seemeth to haue bin changed into a certaine other forme, and a new manner of ennobling of men to haue bin deuised. And verily, the names of Honours and Dignities in the east-empire, seeme to haue bene diuers from the west-empire: and the Latines, after the empire rent in sunder, and seated at Constantinople, seeme to haue bene subiect vnto the Greekes. For he that was there next vnto the Emperour, eyther by reason of the neerenesse of blood, or by institution, and was of the Latines called (Primus) was of the Greekes, by a generall name saluted Despotes; that is to say, Lord: as he is at this day calld Monsieur among the French men. The later *VV*riters, were wont also to call him, the same man Sebaston, according as the emperors had deuised honourable titles, where-with they might grace their friends, and binde them vnto them. The third in dignity from the emperor, was the Sebastocrator, whom hee whom they called Cesar, followed as fourth.

But whilst the emperor Basilius, was wont to be called Sebaston, & also Cesar, he the same man, at one & the same time enioying all these titles, these dignities were then as offices, and not as titles of honour. But afterward, they as honourable names of dignities, euen without any offices at all belonging vnto them, began to bee according to the emperours pleasure, bestowed and disposed of. And for a time, the next in honour vnto the emperor, was called Cesar: as The king of the Romanes at this day, is in the *VV*est. But afterwards, Sebastocrator was the second in honour, & Cesar the third, at such time as Alexius Comnenus appointed his Brother Isaacus to be Sebastocrator: of whom Zonaras speaketh more at large. And last of all Alexius Paleologus being Despotes, was made next in honour vnto the Emperour, vnto whom he the same Emperour Comnenus hauing no Sonnes, betrothed his eldest daughter Irene, and graced him with the Title of the Despotes, as hee which should haue bene heire of the empire, if he had not before dyed.

Protosebastus had the first place & degree of honour from the emperor. And at length Panhypersebastus begā to be the most stately and maiestical name of all others, being a new title, of a new dignity, inuented by Alexius Comnenus, to graunte Michael Taronitus withall. Eparcus was also a name of great honor, as who should say, the cheefe of all the Princiual Prefidents. Contostaulus was General of the Auxiliary forces, which out of France, Sicily, and Italy, serued in the East. Wherof he was called The Great Contostaulus: and otherwise Comestabilis, which of the Italians is interpreted Constable. Trungarius was he, which had the command of a Fleet at Sea. But him which commanded the Army at Sea, they called, The great Duke, and in Greek, Δούξ, for distance sake, imitating therein the Latines. For he which led the Army at Land, was called Egemon; but hee which ruled at Sea, was called Dux. And ouer the Army at land, commanded alwayes, eyther the emperor himselfe, or the Despotes, or the Sebastocrator, or the Cesar, or the Panhypersebastus. And vnto this Great Duke whom they had as cheefe Admirall, they made subiect & all the Drungars of their Fleete, their Admirals, their Proto-Comites, and him the Great Drungarius himselfe, before whom they also appointed the emperors Statue on horse-backe (which they called Contus) to bee carried before him in their forces at Sea. They had also their Great Logotheta, whom we at this day call the Chancellor. Their Logariastes, whom the Frenchmen call Controlleur. And their Protolator, or Marshall of their Army. Their Primicerios also and Primaugulios, and many others of that sort, I willingly passe ouer, least in prosecuting of euery one, my discourse should grow too long and tedious. These were all honorable dignities, and that for the most part not so much for the necessity of their Offices or order, as so made by the fauour and good liking of the Emperor.

But whilst it seemed so good vnto the Emperours, so to appoint the seate of the Empire at Constantinople (where all things now lye swallowed vp of the Turkes) they left the westward of their Legions, and strengthened onely with Fortes, vndefended and subiect vnto the inuasions & fury of the barbarous Nations: vpon the fall and decay whereof, the ruine of the East Empire (at length) ensued also. Italy and Affricke was at that time governed by their Exarchi, Toparchi, Comarchi, Carthulary, Spatharij, Gustalli, and Capitani. But at length, when Narjes the Eunuch, and one of the Romane Patricij, was by Iulianus the Emperour, appointed Governour, he brought in them whom they called Consulares, Præsides, and Correctores. But after, that hee that Narjes, prouoked with the injuries and despightes of Sophia the Emperesse (and with anger enraged) had called in thither the Longobardes out of Pannonia, they became by little & little to vary, concerning the titles of Honour, and names of Dignity.

For Narjes being dead, Longinus (one of the Romane Patricij also) by the same Emperour chosen Governour or Exarcha in his stead in Italy, for the repressing of the Longobards, but a little before called forth by Narjes, and euen now about to come, ordained Dukes thoroughout the Prouinces (haply to the imitation of Constantine the Emperour, who is reported to haue provided by Law, that Countreyes and Townes should be assigned to Dukes, Earles, and olde Captaines, which hauing lōg serued, were to be rewarded for their good seruice done and past.) And vnto this purpose tend the words of Guicciardine himselfe, which I haue thought good hereunto also to adioyne.

By the translation of the Empire vnto Constantinople (saith hee) a way was opened vnto the power of the Roman Bishops; for the authority of the Emperours, daily more and more weakened and decreasing in Italy (both by their continual absence, as also for that they were still busied with warres in the east) the people also by little and little revolting from them, & the City of Rome it selfe, being at length oftentimes by the Goths and Vandals taken & sacked;

the authority of the Emperours began to decay and vanish away in Italy. But the barbarous people, at length againe driuen out of Italy by the power of the Emperours, the government began againe to be managed by Greeke Magistres (of whom he which commanded ouer the rest, was called Hexarchus, and had his seate at Rauenna) who appointed Governours ouer the rest of the Cities of Italy, which Governours they called Dukes. From hence, came the name of the Hexarchatship of Rauenna, wherein all places were comprehended, which had no Dukes of their owne, but were vnder the command of one Hexarchus. Not long after, a notable change and alteration of matters ensued from the Longobardes: For they, a most fierce and cruell people entering into Italy, possessed the country called Gallia Cisalpina, of whome it hath also taken the name of Lombardie. They added also vnto their Government Rauenna, with all the Hexarchatship thereof, besides many other parts of Italy, extending their armes as farre as Picenum, Spoleum, and Beneuentum, ouer which, they appointed Governours to rule and command, whome they called Dukes, &c. So the Longobards raging and roaming farre abroad in Italy, at length, with thirty of their Dukes, in vaine attempted to haue taken the Citie of Rome. And so it came to passe, according to the manner of warres, that the Titles of the dignities of the former empire being neglected, all things began to bee governed by the Generals and Commanders of the armies, viz. by such as they called Dukes, Earles, and Princes.

These people, Charles the Great, son to Pippin King of France, by the Romans called into Italy, hauing taken Ticinum, the Metropolitall Citie of the Insulubres, & there slain Desiderius (of a Comitable promoted to be King of Italy) ouercame and subdued, and was forthwith by the generall consent of all men chosen emperor of the VVest Empire: who as hee would haue the Empire it selfe to be called, The French Romane Empire, so euen in the beginning thereof he had a purpose to make it hereditary, and made the Great men, & such as were with Honourable Titles graced, to be altogether free: and bound them by oath, as men in Fee, holding onely of the King, and of the Emperour: so that if by chance they should fall from their faith and allegiance, or dye without issue, hee then ordained those their dignities to be transferred vnto others: & that his ordinance was called Inuestitura, or an Inuestiture. The bounds and townes of his kingdom, he committed to be governed by Counties or Earls. The bounds & borders they called Marches, or Marches: whereupon, the Governours of the Marches, began to be called Marchiarum Comites, (or Counties of the Marches) and at length Marchiones, or Marquesses. And them who he set and placed in the Prouinces for the administration of Iustice, and the keeping of the people in their allegiance, were then called Missi (or Men sent) or otherwise Legati: that is to say, The Emperours Legats or Lieutenants. But such as the people afterward of them felues created, for the administration of Iustice, and the government of Cities, being two or more in number, being chosen after the manner of the ancient Roman Common-weale, were called Consuls. The French Romane Empire, with this successe made by Charles the Great, was left vnto his posterity almost hereditary: which in short time after also, vnder the Emperour Charles the Grosse (Nephew in the fourth degree vnto Charles the Great, & before, King of Germany) deuclued from the Frenchmen vnto the Germanes. Vnto whom also (within a few yeares after) Otto the Great, king of Germany, and he Emperour, also succeeded; who following the steps of Charles the Great, gaue such perfections vnto his beginnings, in bestowing and disposing of honours & dignities, as that he is not so much for his firname and noble actes, to bee compared with the most mighty emperours, as for his wholesome Lawes, and heroical Ordinances, of all posterity of right for euer to be commended. For this man, after the ancient manner of the Longobards and French, entertaining euery most valiant man into his wars, graced with Royalities such of them, as had done him worthy & faithfull seruice (and these Royalities were all manner of dignities, lands, & governments of Prouinces) which he according as he thought good, bestowed vpon such as had of him well deserved. And now men began more plainly to make a difference of titles and dignities. For the titles of Dukes and Counties (being with the ancient Romans but the bare names of personall offices and charges) now receiued other customes: and a Duke (at first chosen for his vertues & noble acts) they now began so to call him of his Dukedome: as they did also a Marquess, of his Marquisat, and an Earle of his Earldome. And he which had the command of people, from some King, Marquess, or Earle, was called Capitaneus (or a Capitaine). But they which had such command from Capitaines, were called Valufores (or Valufores). And they which had it from these Valufores, were called Valuini (or Valuines). Whereupon this new beginning of Politicall Nobility, being far & wide disperfed through the kingdomes of the Empire, they at length were deemed rightly Noble, according to the manner and custome of euery place & Countrey, who eyther themselves, or their ancestors liued, so graced with thuse, or such like priuiledges.

And these be the things, which according vnto the variety and alteration of times, we haue read in the most approved Authors, concerning the titles of honors and dignities. In recounting of which, we haue thought this most especially worth the noting, that all the streames of Nobility (but especially the greatest & cheefest of them) came and issued all out of the Campe. Which degrees of honour and Nobility, before that wee compare them with ours, it shall not repent vs in distinct ranks, orderly to runne through the beginning of euery one of them.

And first to begin withall, They in Campes were called Princes, or Princes, (of whom at this day, we euery where make so great account) which serued in the first ranks, excelling others in strength and age; and which followed the Spearemen, diuided into fifteen bands or troops, so placed, as it were for a refuge & reliefe for them: to the end, that if in battails the Spearemen should bee enforced to retire, they might in safety flye vnto those Principes, as vnto principall men of more approved and assured seruice. Whereof Castra Principalia, the Principall Tents, and Porta Principalis, the Principall Porte, where those Princes or Principall men were wont to lye with their bands; are so often read of in Liue.

Next

Next vnto Augustus the Emperour, they which in the emperors name gouerned the Roman affaires, were called Principes Senatus, or Princes of the Senate. But afterward, the emperour would haue the place or title of a Prince, to bee a dignity next vnto a Kings, who amongst the ancient Saxons were called Ethelings, and with vs Cyones. But now it is as it were a generall name, diuersly giuen and attributed vnto many at once, and orderly comprehending in it all the greater sorts of dignities: yea in some places, according to the manner and custome of the places, the title and dignity of a Prince, is inferior vnto the title and dignity of a Duke, or an Earle.

Dukes or Dukes tooke their names from the Latine word Ducendo, as who should say Ducitores or Leaders; for that they marching before, led their followers. Whereof we read the Latine phrase, Ducere bellum, that is to say, to leade Warres for Gerere bellum, to make warre. And so Hij bellum assidue ducunt cum Gente Latina. These men make continuall war with the Latine Nation. And they which as Dukes or Generals were leaders of Armies, were wont to vse such Ensignes as the Consuls did: whereupon, the word Ducatus, sometime signified the Region or Country, ouer which the Duke commanded: and other while, the Military gouernment and commanding authority it selfe. Vnto which manner of men, for things by them honourably and valiantly in the warre achieved and performed, triumphall Ornamentes were sometimes awarded. Amongst the ancient Germanes, vnto a Generall or Leader of an army, were assigned twelue Counties or Earles to attend vpon him.

Marquesses were so called of a certaine iurisdiction bound vnto some certaine place. So he which had the command and gouernment of any frontier Territory or Sea-coast, was called Marchio, or a Marques: and they which receiued of the Fees, were properly accounted the Palatins of the king, or of the kingdom, as men standing with the Generals Ad valvas Regni, at the gates and entrances of the kingdom. Other some there bee, which goe about to deriue the word Marchio from Marca (a word of the Celts) from whence they deriue the word Mar-

chare in French, to ride: and the Marchio as a people so called, for that they excelled in good horse-manship.

Now of Counties or Earles, as there were diuers kindes, so of them amongst the ancient VVriters, are read diuers and sundry sorts and orders; such as among the rest were Comites Sacri Palatii, or Counties of the Sacred Pallace: Archiatr (or Principall Courtiers) and Comites stabuli, or Constables. For Desiderius from a Consul, by the Longobards chosen and appointed to be king of Italy, was slaine by Charles the Great. And it is elsewhere read, hee sent Burchardus the Constable, with his Fleet to Corfica.

There were also Comites Militum, or Counties of the Souldiers, of whom the Romans would haue alwayes two residing in the East, and were therof sometimes called Comites Orientis, or Counties of the east. And in breuel, there were Counties of Provinces: such as were the Counties of Spain, of Brittaine, and of the Saxon Coasts in Brittaine.

The Gustafus in Italy, and a County, seeme in ancient time to haue bene all one: There be some also, which beleeue a County in olde time to haue bene called Comarchus.

The name of a Vicount sheweth a beginning not to be doubted of: For he to whom the County in the Camp committed the authority of his iurisdiction, was called Vice-Comes or Vicount; as were in the ancient time the Proconsul, & the Proconsul his Lieutenant or Deputy.

But whereof the Barones or Barons were so called, is not yet wel knowne; For vnto the Romans as concerning their dignity, they were vnto us vnknewne: howbeit, that they shime it to be a Latine word, by that saying of Cicero to his friend Atticus, Apud Patronum reliquosque Patronos te in maxima gratia possunt: Hee brought you into great fauour with your Patron, and the rest of the Barons.

Other some obtrude vnto vs the greek word Baro, which signifieth Grave. But howeuer it commeth to passe, if credite be to be giuen to our most learned Lawyer Bracton, the Barons were still accounted for most valiant men, for hee would haue them to be called, Robora belli, or the strength of warre. And by the Lawyer Baldus, a Baron is defined to be a man ha-

uing from his Prince the power and authority of the greatest, middle, and lowest correcting of offenders. But sufficient it now concerning these matters, to haue sayde thus much, as purposing of the same, to speake more at large hereafter.

And let vs now come nearer vnto the matter, by comparing of ancient things, with others of latter time; to the intent, that by applying of those ancient things vnto this our Age and Time, the reason as well of the Names as of the Dignities themselves, may the better and more manifestly appeare.

Like as the Empire of the Greekes, was by the Turkes ouerthrowne and brought to nought, euen so also was the Empire of the West, by the cunning and ambition of the Bishops of Rome, rent in sunder and weakened. Which, how great it was, the very ruines thereof doe now scarcely declare. The maiestie whereof, is yet by the Seauen Princes Electors (of the Germanes called Electores) vnto the Ornament of the Christian world vpholden and maintayned. The Septemviri of Germany, the Emperour Otto the third, and Pope Gregorie the first, ordained in the yeare 960. Vnto whom afterwards the Emperour Charles the fourth engaged the revenues of the Empire (hauing promised vnto euery one of the Electors, an hundred thousand crownes) that he would appoint Wenceslaus his sonne, heire of the Empire. But the Money being not payed, it came to passe, that the Patrimony of the Romaine Common-weale, which was appointed to the vices and maintenance of the warres (and for that onely cause was subiect to alienation) was priuately distributed and diuided amongst them, vnto euery one of them apart, whereby the power of the Empire was afterward almost brought to nothing, the Seauen Princes Electors of Germany, keeping all vnto themselves, and compelling the Emperors by oath, that they should not reuoke the Lands and Pawnes before engaged.

And Kings, to whom it was a pleasant thing to be deliuered from another mans power and command, erected to themselves Monarchies.

But they which in most great Kingdoms hold the second place, next to the Kings and the Kings sons, are according to the forme of the Emperors stur, called Dukes. The title of an Archduke is but one alone, belonging to the house of Austria, by the Emperour Frederick deuiled, to grace his nephew Philip withall, at such time as he was to marry Iane the heire of Spain.

The name of Vaynode, is a title of dignity onely in Transilvania, and Valachia. And so also is the Doge of the Venetians, who is also called a Duke.

And as in warres Counties or Earles were assigned vnto Dukes, so our Counties now at this day, are thought next in dignity to follow the Dukes.

For a Marquesse at this day, is nothing else in his owne proper signification, then a Countie vpon the Frontiers & Borders: which in the Germane tongue is more significantly called a Marckgrau: with whome a Countie is called Graf. And whereof come those honourable names of the Psatzgrau, Landgrau, Marckgrau, Isingraue, & Burggrau: that is to say, The Countie Palatine, the Countie of the Province, The Countie of the Borders, The County of Rhene, The County of the Castle or Garrison. And yet according to the diuers custome of places, Marquesses in some places are preferred, and goe before Counties or Earles.

The beginning of a Vicount, the very etymology of the name it self hath taught vs.

Barons are also euery where according to the dignity of their degree, power, & grauity accounted honourable. France hath also onely four peculiar Great and principall Lords, whom they call Vidames (viz.) Chartres, Chalons, Amiens, and Gerbry. So hath it pleased men according to the custome of places, vnto new forms of Honours and Dignities, to giue olde names. But nothing is euery where, and in all places so sincerely obserued and kept, as is that olde and generall diuision of People, into Noble and Vnnoble, with a certain difference of the Vnnoble sort among themselves, as of the Nobler sort among themselves also.

For such with easie exercises get their linings, such as excell in wit in the knowledge of Martiall affaires, in learning, in wealth, or in vertue: these men, in these times, are as it were the Seminaries of Nobility (as were in ancient time the Gentlemen whom they called Equites, among the Romans, the nursery of the Senators.)

Many noble & famous Gentlemen, haue also from Lawyers and Merchants disceded. And although some of the vulgar & common sort of the people, be among them of better account and reputation, then some others of them, yet in respect of the Nobility, they are altogether base and vnnoble: like as all free-borne men, which are not of the vulgar and common sort of people, are indifferently and alike noble, according to the French Prouerbe: Je suis Gentilhomme comme le Roy, I am a Gentleman as well as the King. Il foy de Gentilhomme: The faith of a Gentleman.

Yet it is to be knowne, antiquity and high functions, to haue their estimation in Politicall Nobility, as they haue in other things. And heereof as seemeth vnto me, are those distinctions of Nobility, named, and vnnamed: or of the greater and lesser Nobility, as some others would haue it. And Named Nobility I call that which is by hereditary succession graced with Titles and Fees. As a king taketh that his denomination of his kingdom: a Duke, of his Dukedome; an Earle, of his Earledome; and a Baron, of his Barony: who may also be called Maiors Nobles, or The greater Nobility, although not altogether so properly, for that that distinction of Nobility, indifferently comprehendeth all sorts of Noblemen, & the higher Magistracies (bestowed vpon men for teame of life only, or during the Princes pleasure.) The rest of the Nobility vnder the degree of Barons, may be called Nobles Innominati (or vnnamed Noblemen) or Minors Nobles, that is to say; the lesser Nobility.

And yet there are some of them which seeme to haue Named Nobility, although they be not in the same ranke and order to be placed: such as are Knights and Esquires. But forasmuch as the Titles of Knighthood and of Esquires, are not hereditary, they are accounted amongst the lesser Nobility.

The Frenchmen in the meane time, and we Englishmen also, doe by more knowne words, better discern the greater Nobility from the lesser, but not without a certaine injury and wrong done vnto the latine tongue, from which wee deriue our Nobility. For who is he which knoweth not the Latine word (Nobles) indif-ferently to comprehend all such as are about the common and vulgar sort of men? Which word is in French or English expounded (Noble). By which word, the common sort of Englishmen calleth or noteth no man, vnder the degree of a Baron.

The rest vnder the degree of Barons, are in French called Gentilshommes, and in English, Gentlemen. Of which, such as are neither Knights nor Esquires, we call them but onely Gentlemen, without any addition; and in French, Gentilshommes simples, or plaine Gentlemen. Although it may be that some of these may can shew more Armes of their stocke, and denue their Pedigree further, then can some others of greater dignity, or euen the emperor himselfe.

Wherefore, in Politicall Nobility, being simply vnderstood, these plaine termed Gentlemen are not inferiour vnto the Princes themselves, but yet in honour and dignity much. For the titles of Kings, of Dukes, of Marquesses, of Earles, & Barons, are as it were the names of most honourable Offices, and by reason of such additions, one becommeth more famous and nobler then another.

These things being thus somewhat more at large and in general spoken, concerning Nobility, seeme as it were to open the way vnto the particular degrees thereof with vs. But the diuision of the orders & degrees of men, which our English Common-weale and Empire well beareth, at other times, by others sette forth, is exceedingly well set downe: who haue diuided the same into a King, into Nobility of the greater and of the lesser sort, Citizens, Men liberally brought vp, and Labourers. But forasmuch as I haue purposed to speake onely of the degrees of Nobility, and that the intention and scope of this worke tendeth no farther, I haue determined to entreat onely of the Kings, and of the cheefe named Nobility, whom it pleaseth vs to call, The Peeres of the Kingdom, The Common Fathers of the Common-weale, & in briefe, by one name, Great Estates, or Noblemen.

Yet in so great contentions of things, and inundations of forraigne Nations, where-with this our Island from the first inhabiting thereof, hath bene oftentimes troden vnder foote, and for a long time

most greuously afflicted: to write such a serious discourse, as to set downe, what were the beginning Titles of our Noblemen, with the orders and degrees of honours, seemeth a thing most difficult and hard.

Concerning which things (freely to confesse the truth) seeing that I haue not well satisfied my selfe; I dare not with too much hasty confidence to affirme much, especially seeing that heere, as well as elsewhere, the Victors haue still especially endeouored them-selues, not so much to oppresse the people by them subdued, as they haue done to innouate their customes, and to change their lawes. Seeing that it is by Nature ordered, that with the same fate where-with Monarchies and Kingdomes are ouerwhelmed, euen the Nations themselves, and Noble Families fall, and come to vtter ruine also.

For first, the Romans by subduing the Brittaines, the naturall Inhabitants of this Island, went about with their Legions to ouerthrow all things.

But the Romans about five hundred yeares more or lesse after, being againe transported into France, the Saxons, or rather English-Saxons, called in by the Brittaines vnto their aide, raised warre against their Hoasts, and thrust them quite out of their auncient Seates, and first of all others, gaue vnto the kingdom the name of England. And these people the Danes also for a space thrust out of the kingdom.

But at length, when as this kingdom began (as it were) againe to breathe vnder Edward the Confessor, a most holy King, and last of the English-Saxons race, he being forth-with dead without issue, gaue occasion to the Normanes to passe ouer. VVho at length preuailing, (Harold who with-stood them being ouercome) and the English-men being thrust out of their auncient inheritance, began forth-with to assigne the Landes and groundes in euery place vnto their companions and fellow-souldiours, and also to bring in the Normane customes and fashions.

Many things for all that, are yet extant in the most auncient Records, euen in the Heptarchy of the English-Saxon Kings, concerning those Noble-Men which were Rulers ouer the Countreies of Chester, Leicester, and Lincolne, whom we reade to haue bene indifferently also called Dukes, and Counties of the Mercians. The Danes had also their Heretoches, and the Princes of their Heretoches. And Edward, the King and Confessor yet reigning, euen in the time next vnto the coming in of the Normans, in the charters and monuments of Churches, are found there to be Ethelings, Chytops, Patricij, Consuls, Earles, Palatines, Dukes, Senators, Stalkers, Thayni, Theothani, Ministers, and Princes. But yet with great inconstancy, of such their names and callings. For whom thou shalt reade to be called Counties, thou shalt else-where finde euen at one and the selfe-same time to be called Dukes. But the stile of Cyto, at first signified the Kings eldest Sonne, but afterwards, it was a title common to all them that were descended of the Kings blood.

The Titles of Countie and Consull signified the same thing, differing but in that Comes (or a Countie) was to be called a Comitatus (or of a Shire or Countie) and a Consull of Consulendo, or of giuing of Councell. A Stalder, and The Governour of the Kings house, to haue bene all one, it is out of diuers writings manifest. The Patricij and Thayni were Noblemen of the better sort; and I could almost affirme them to haue bene equall vnto our Barons at this day. Ministers and Princes, who in old Charters are set as lowest witness, seeme to haue bene names of one and the same signification, and alike signify Noble-men: but what degree of honour or Nobility they were of, is altogether vnknowne. Neither seeme these honourable Titles to haue bene forth-with together with the victory, by William the Normane changed. For these men whom King Edward the Confessor in his Charter, concerning the Priuiledges by him granted to the Abbey of Waltham, in the year 1062: taketh to witness by the name of Counties Palatine (whom he but euen a litle before had called Dukes) and by the names of Procurators, Chamberlaines, and Princes of his Court: the Normane himselfe, in the second year after his victory, in his confirmatory Charter granted vnto the same Abbey, doth by the same Stiles and Titles take to witnesse also.

But, after that he had now confirmed the kingdome vnto himselfe in safety, the Counties whom he by his Royall Charter had rewarded with Counties and Lands, began to be one from another, distinguished, by the addition of the Title, of such and such a Countie. As witnesse Alanus Countie of Richmond; witnesse Hugh Countie of Chester; witnesse Roger Countie of Shrewsbury and Arundell.

VVherefore the English Saxons by little and little, eyther dead without issue, or oppressed, or thrust forth into exile, and to liuing in other places, all things were so framed vnto the Norman manner, as that of our Nobilitie at this day, there is not any which can so much as any little breathe of the Stock and Race of those most ancient Saxons.

These foundations of the auncient VVorthies and Nobility beeing layde by William the Conquerour; and oftentimes afterwards, by Successours, according to the diuerse occasions and occurrents of times, by little and little continued and augmented, beganne at length in the reigne of King Henry the third, and Edward the first, to shine forth, who hauing now vanquished the VVelch-men their Neighbours, and contending with the Scottes bordering vpon them, for Principallitie and Soueraignetie, entreating of all things concerning the Common-weale, with the three States of the Kingdome (which consisted of the Nobilitie, the Clergie, and the Communitie) they themselves in their Royall Maiestie sitting in Parliaments, appoynted vnto euery man a preeminence, according to the place of his dignitie: from whom, especially all the Nobilitie of our age, may seeme to deriue the diuerse and appoynted degrees of Dignities and Honours.

VVherefore a King, whom may with vs bee also called a Monarch, hauing in himselfe the supreme power, is of such great Maiestie, as that besides GOD alone, hee hath none his Superiour. Who from Equitie and Iustice seeking his chiefeist praise and commendation (when as any matter of greater weight or importance is to bee decreed and set downe, concerning the welfare and honour of the Common-weale) dothey-her make new Lawes, before conceived by the three estates of the Kingdome, or else abrogateth the old; and free from all homage for his Empire, is with the sacred solemnities of his Countrey, with a royall Crowne, by his subiects crowned, whom afterwards we with great reuerence obserue and honour, both in the time of peace, as also in the time of war, as that (forasmuch as hee himselfe is the fountaine of all Nobilitie) he may for his onely pleasure and good liking, blesse and grace whom hee will, with Offices, Dignities, Honour, Nobilitie, and Riches.

Amongst the Nobilitie or Peeres of the Kingdome, the Prince is the chiefe, who is alwayes but one and himselfe alone, for hee is to be deemed the Kings eldest sonne, or heire apparent of the Kingdome, and hath of long beene graced with the Title of the Prince of Wales. The Kings sonnes in auncient times, before the coming in of the Normans, were wont to be called Ethlinges, that is to say, Clytons, (as more Noble than the rest, whom they in Latine called Indylis, or Noble) as Edgar Clyto, Alured Clyto, and others. Our Princes of Wales are now with vs, the same that the designed Cæsars were among the ancient Romans, as who should say, heires of the Imperiall Maiestie; and whereupon at this day, the Germans appoint him which shall be emperor, King of the Romans, and the French stile him that is to succeed in the Kingdome, the Dolphin: but the Spaniards, together with vs, call him which is to haue the kingdome after the death of the king his father, The Prince, or Infant.

The first that was by this name called after the coming in of the Normans, was Edward, the eldest son of King Henry the third, who (his Father Henry being dead) and hauing there vanquished Leolin, was the first that vntied the Principallitie of Wales vnto the kingdome of England: vnto whom also, John the Scot earle of Chester, being dead without heyres male (other lands and reuenues being assigned vnto the sisters of the aforesaid Earle) the king his Father had giuen the same countie.

At length King Edward the third gaue vnto Edward his eldest sonne (a most famous and renowned warrior) then

The Prince of Wales.

The 5th Prince of Wales.

then Prince of Wales and Earle of Chester, the Countie of Cornewall also, which hee then had made a Dukedome: and by this meanes it is come to passe, that afterwards our Kings eldest sonnes or heyres, were by the Kings royall Charters, with great solemnitie in full Parliament, created Princes of Wales, and Earles of Chester, (with the Countie of Flint, which belongeth vnto the Dignitie of the Sword of the Countie of Chester) but are called Dukes of Cornewall, euen from the first houre of their Natiuitie.

They which are accounted of the Nobility after the Princes of Wales, we call Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, Vicounts, and Barons. Aboue which, if I shall also place the most famous Fellowshippes of Knights, of our (by farre) the most honorable order, taking name of the Garter, I not shal haply seem to haue done amis: forasmuch as it maketh Knights, and sometime them of the Lesser Nobility, (excelling others in vertue and valour) almost equal, not onely vnto Noble-men at home with vs, but euen with Kings and Emperours abroad. But of them we are else-where to speake.

A Duke.

All these Noblemen (I say) in the beginning to haue beene Generalles and Leaders of Armies, or Gouvernours of Countreies, it is before declared. But afterward, as pleased the Emperours, to haue beene giuen them for terme of life: and at length strengthened with lands and fees, we see them to haue obtained a certayne hereditary perpetuity: wherefore, a Duke, who in auncient time was, as it were, the Constable of the Kingdome, and whose chiefe seruice was, to leade and conduct the Kings Armie in time of warre, now graced with Fees, and once authorized by the King, is become an hereditary Title. Our Kings descended of the Norman blood, so long as they themselves were Dukes of Normandie, graced no man with this Title of Duke, till Edward the Third; who first of all (as is before sayd) exalted the Countie of Cornewall into a Dukedome: vnto the example whereof, many hereditary Dukes were in like manner by our Kings created, howbeit that at this day we haue none.

A Marquisse.

Next vnto Dukes in order follow

Marquesses, who in auncient time were called Gouernours or Marschalls of the borders or Marches: a Title vnto vs, but in the time of King Richard the Second, verily vnknewne, who in the tenth yeare of his reigne, by his Royall Charter first created Robert Vere earle of Oxford (his Minion) Marques of Dublin the Metropolitall Cittie of Ireland. By which example, many others afterwards obtained the like Creations by Inheritance.

An Earle.

Concerning either the etymologie or the office of an Earle amongst the Auncients, I haue else-where briefly touched some things, and leaue the same to bee more at large by others entreated. Of Earles with vs, haue alwayes beene both of greatest authority and dignity, and of much greater antiquitie then either Marquesses or Dukes.

Neyther is it any let at all, but that an Earle may be called Earle of any Countie or place, from whence he receiueh no profit, neyther therein holdeth any iurisdiction. Indeed it is in auncient Charters, declared them in old time to haue bene Feod-men, and to haue beene rewarded with the third penny of the profit of that Prouince wherof they were called Earles; but now the maner is with vs, that the Titles of Earldomes, are according vnto the Kings pleasure conferred and bestowed, without any possession of the places at al: vnto whom, the King, in stead of the third Penny, is wont to appoynt a certayne summe of money, to be yearly receiued out of the Exchequer, or his Customs: as wee will hereafter more at large declare.

A Vicount.

Concerning the beginning of a Vicount with vs, there is no cause why I should from farre deuiue it; forasmuch as we had none of them before the time of King Henry the sixth. For he in the eighteenth yeare of his reigne, created John de Belemonte, or Beumont, a Vicount: Whereupon that which in auncient time was the name of an office, we now at this day do acknowledge it bee a certayne name and Title of Dignitie, as it were in the midst, betwene an Earle and a Baron; as wee doe a Marquisse; betwene a Duke and an Earle. This Degree of Nobilitie hath inuestiture from the Kings themselves, with certain solemne ceremonies,

as the other degrees of Nobility haue.

Now the last of all, aswell in order as specially in dignity, come fourth the Barons, whose conioyned power, compared with the rest, hath in the great affaires of the Common-weale alwayes bene the greatest. Of whose beginning yet truth it selfe doubtfully wauerech. Lucas de Penna in Lib. Cude mancipij, in his 16. book sayeth. Quid Reges cum plures haberent filios nec omnes Reges posse fieri (quod regnum diuidi nequeat) prospicerent: amplius cuique dabant Castra cum iurisdictione & Imperio, unde Barones dicerentur, id est, filij alij excellentes. For that Kings when they had many sonnes, which they well saw could not all be made Kings (for that a kingdom cannot be diuided) they gaue vnto euery one of them great Castles, with iurisdiction and command, whereof they should be called Barons (that is to say) Their sonnes, higher in degree then others. Other some will haue the word Baro, to haue bene deriued from the Greeke word βαρος, signifying gravity. But if it may be lawfull for vs with coniectures to contend, I deeme it not amisse, hereunto to ioine the curious conceite and iudgment of a certaine most learned man, and of great reading, who marking the great power and authority of Barons, supposeth them in the beginning to haue bene the Generals or Leaders of Nations & people, dispersedly roaming and stragling vp and downe without any certaine resting places, after the empire was rent in sunder, who equally diuiding the lands by force or leaue by them gotten, as it were by tutelary law gouerned the people, holding of them in fealty, and subiect to euery one of their iurisdiccions, eyther with a meere souerainty apart, as Monarchs, or vnder some other common Prince.

Whereof, Radus happily hath called a man of greatest, middle, and meane authority and command, Baronem, or a Baron. But they which were in power and authority in a manner like and equal, were before in Latine called lares homines (or like men) but of the Frenchmen and Italians, (speaking more contractly) parhomines, and parhomini, and thereof they might, saith he, bee called Baroni and Barones: for with a more easie pronounciation, they in their words easily admit b for p. And to giue more credite to this matter, he ioyneth thereunto the force of diuers Languages. For they whom the Frenchmen from the beginning, called Barons, we in the same sence in ancient time, called Thaini, and at this day in english, Lords, whom the Germanes, as it were by a circumlocution, doe more fitly call free-herren, which with vs truly signifieth free Lords: that is to say, Lords hauing free iurisdiccions and territories. But from whence this very word Lord is sprung (which is not so much peculiar vnto Barons as to all Noblemen in general) remaineth yet doubtfull.

Forasmuch as we after our manner and fashion, are wont to call all Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, and Vicounts, (and some of the greatest Officers and Magistrates of the kingdome also, although they bee not Barons) after the manner of Barons, Lords: some say it to be a primitive & original word of it selfe, sprung out of the Saxon word hlaford, which is interpreted Lord: Other some also, suspect it to haue bene a deriuatiue word, and to haue bene first brought out of Burgundy: for it is manifest, the emperor Probus to haue sent hither into Brittaine the Burgundians, whom he had overcome in the year 282. Who hauing heere seated and settled themselues, did vnto the Romans right good seruice, it at any time rebellion did arise or was stirred vp against them. And in that place they commonly call Alloids, which signifieth, Free and discharged from all homage and seruice; which manner of possessor or owner, is euen at this day called Alloids: whom we, resting almost vpon the same reason, do in english call, A Lord. Contrary vnto those Alloids or Lords, are the Lewdes or Lewds, as subiect vnto the Alloids, where of perhaps the word Laydes is vied amongst the Scots, whom they with vs call also Lords.

But as concerning words and etymologies, let euery man giue as he list: now forer the names be deemed of, it is for the most part of all men granted, that free-herren or Lords (call them whether you list) to haue in all places liued as Free-borne men, and of great esteeme, & I verily think them to haue bene the same, whom Cæsar calleth Regulos in France: where euen yet vnto this day, certaine of the most olde and ancient Barons, are reported ported and reputed by a certaine right of their Baronies, to contend for precedence with the new Earles. But how full of authority and dignity the name of a Baron and of a Baronage is, shall very plainly & easily appeare, if wee shall eyther respect the antiquity thereof, as they which of ancient time haue hereditary Iurisdiction annexed vnto their honour and dignity, and whereof wee at this day retain a shew in our Lords courts, commonly called a court Baron: or looke into the most honourable and reuerend prerogative of the in the cheefest assemblies of the kingdome. For all Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, and Vicounts, haue their seates with the Barons, in the highest assembly of the kingdome, in Parliament, onely by the name of their Baronies; Inasmuch, that the greatest Duke sitting in Parliament (although he be placed according to the preheminece of his degree) yet holdeth his place only by reason of his Barony: neyther is it for any other reason granted vnto our Archbishops and Bishops (as it was in ancient time vnto some Abbots and other of like sort) to sitte there, but that they haue the possession and dignity of some Baronage or Barony annexed and ioined vnto their Bishoppricks; yea, the eldest Sonne of a Duke who soeuer, although he be commonly called an Earle, as also the eldest sonne of an earle, although by the flatterie of custome, and in respect of his blood he be called in Latine Dux or Dominus in French Signeur, and after our manner, a Lord, yet if wee shall consider the force of the Law, they are not to be numbered either amongst the earles or the Barons, but only to be accounted Esquires; neyther can they challenge any voyce or suffrage in the Parliaments of the Kingdome, so long as their Fathers liue. Howbeit, wee haue it often in experience (I confesse) that as often as the King shall see the eldest sonne or heyre of a Duke, Marquess, or of an Earle, as well in wisdom and counsell, as of yeres ripe and stayed, and whom he shall deeme worthie to bee present at the greatest assemblies of Parliament, him he promoteth vnto the height of that honour: and by a VVritte of Summons (as they terme it) his father yet being alie, according to the name & stile (if he be the sonne of a Duke) of his Barony, or if he bee the sonne of a Marquess, or of an Earle, by the name whereof he was before called, and whereof hee was heire apparant, and into the inheritance whereof his father also before came.

This I say, sometime is done, and may be done, by the fauour of the Prince onely, whose prerogative is so indeterminate as that he may promote vnto honors, and admit into Parliaments whom hee pleaseth. As for example; it pleased our deceased Queen Elizabeth in the year 1575. by her Writ of Summons, to call William Poulet, Baron St. John of Basing, at this day Marquess of Winchester, (viz) the eldest sonne of John Poulet, Marquess of Winchester, and to assigne vnto him a place amongst the Noblemen of the Vpperhouse, due vnto the ancient Barons of St. John, vntill that their heires male sayling, the heire generall of the same family, had married with the stocke of the Poulets. This I say, the Queene might doe by her royall prerogative onely, the age and towardliness of the young Baron being respected and looked into, which he could no way by right haue challenged, his Father yet liuing.

Henrie Stanley, Earle of Darby, was by Writ of Summons called vnto Parliament, his father yet liuing, by the name of Baron Strange of Knokin, and placed in the same seate wherein the Barons Strange of Knokin were wont of ancient time to sit. The like we now of late haue also seene to haue bene done to Gilbert Lord Talbot (at this day Earle of Shrewsburie) sonne and heire to George earle of Shrewsburie, but of late deceased: which places they could not by prescript for me of law as yet challenge vnto them, for that their Fathers then alie, possessed both the dignities & reuennewes of the aforesaid Baronies. So that I say, they were onely by the fauor of the Prince promoted vnto such honour and degree, whilst that their fathers yet liued.

For wee rightly acknowledge no Barons, but them whom the Kings Royall Maieitie hath first by his Charter created, or else the Parliaments preheminece & dignity designed; who so called and once admitted, and in Parliament placed, are alwayes after to bee held and accounted Barons, and to be reckoned amongst the Nobility of the Baronaage of England, iurici-

For that vnto the most honourable the gite of honor, are no where open, so things which are once granted vnto any man by the Prince, are not to be againe returned vnto his lord or disgrace.

ther doeth it any where appeare, anie of them to haue bene afterwards reiected or degraded, except by chance their possessions were so far diminished, as that they were by no means able to maintayne so great an honour. For, as in ancient time the Romane Senators, which had waisted or decayed their Senators substance were cut of Senate remoued, euen so (I say) such are either of their own accord to absta in from coming into the vpper house of our Parliament, or else (I may say perhaps) are not thereinto admitted, although that they for euer still retain the stile and name of their Barony.

And these be they whom we acknowledge to be Noblemen: But how they bee now amongst themselves together, and seuerally apart, both in dignitie and preheminence distinguished, is out of the forme of their Creations or admissions to be better discerned: which things we will declare by the Letters Patents, or of Summons, giuen vnto euery one of them at the time of their Creation, (which Letters, we by two names call, viz: Royall Charters, and Parliament Writts) and by the ceremonies after our manner, ioyned into their Inuestiture, and the custome of their precedence, beginning first with the Baron himselfe.

For why, the name of the Baronage of England is right famous, and more honorable then the rest: resembling the ancient shew of a Reuerend Romane Father, re-gifted to be one of; counsell of estate, & of the Senatory Dignity; and with vs giuing an entrance vnto all the higher degrees of honor, as did that among the ancient Romanes.

In elder time, it was for a certain space giuen vnto none, but vnto men for their martiall prowesse renowned, vnto whom the ensigne of a Barony was also giuen; as was the right to weare a Ring of Gold granted vnto the Romane Gentlemen. But afterward, not onely they whom martiall prowesse had commended, but euen they also whom their Nobility of birth, their manners, fortune, or wisdomme hadde at home ennobled, were wont by the Kings Writ of Summons, to be called forth vnto the high assembly of Parliament. And at length also, King Henrie the 6. brought in the fashion to create some by this very name, by vertue of his Royall Charter:

which manner of forme and fashion, together with that other of calling by Writ of Summons vnto the Parliament, we onely at this day haue in vse, in forme following.

Letters of Summons, or Parliament Writts (as they call them) for the promoting of any one, or of whomsoever, vnto the Dignity of a Baron, in full Assembly of Parliament, are in a prescript appointed forme in this sort made: Changing onely such things as are of order to be changed.

ELIZABETH, by the Grace of God, Queen of England, France, and Ireland, Defendresse of the Faith, &c. Vnto her faithfull and well-beloued Henry Norris of Ricot Knight, greeting. Forasmuch, as Wee by the aduice and consent of our Councell, for certaine high and urgent causes, concerning the estate & defence of our kingdome of England, and of the English Church, haue appointed a certain Parliament of ours, to be holden at our Citie of Westminster, the eight day of May, next comming, and there to haue speech and conference with you, and with the Prelates, the States, and Nobility of our sayde Kingdome: Wee firmly enioyne & commaund you, upon the Faith and Allegiance wherein you are vnto vs bound, that the weights of the aforesaide businesse, and the imminent dangers considered, all excuse whatsoeuer set apart, you be there personally present the day and place aforesaide, to conferre with vs, & with our Prelates and Nobility aforesaide, concerning the aforesaide businesse, & there to shew your aduice. And of this, as you loue vs, and honour the safeguard & defence of Our Kingdome, and the Church aforesaide, and the good dispatch of the affairs aforesaide, in no wise faile you.

Witnesse Our selfe, the day of in the yeare of Our reigne the fourteenth.

An-

Another manner there is of creating of Barons by Charter: whereof this is the forme.

ELIZABETH by the Grace of God, of England, France, and Ireland, Queen, Defendresse of the Faith, &c. Vnto all Archbishops, Marqueses, Earles, Vicounts, Bishops, Barons, Knights, Governours, Free-borne men, and all our Officers, Ministers, and Subiects, whomsoever, vnto whom these present Letters shall come, greeting. Wee well perceiue and see the height and tipe of our Royall Dignity, not onely to be beautified, but encreased also, whilst the titles of honors, are by vs conferred vnto men for their vertues renowned, and in our most weighty affaires well experienced. For Wee thinke our Royall Crowne to be so much the more adorned and enriched, when as Wee call and promote graue and wise Men, especially such as are for the Nobility of their iustice famous, and for their wisdomme renowned and mighty, into part of our Royall carefullnesse, vnto the degrees of Honour and Dignity, and the government of the Common-weale. Wherefore, Wee considering the long seruite, which our well-beloued and faithfull Councillor, William Cecil, our principall Secretary hath many waies done, as well in the time of our Progenitors, Kings of this kingdome, as also his faithfull, and most pleasing loyalty towards vs at all times, euen from the first beginning of our Reigne, not onely in the notable and graue affaires of Councill, but beside also, hath not ceased daily to doe, in all other expeditions for our Kingdome in general: and also the circumspection, courage, wisdomme, dexterity, integrity, providence, care, and fidelity of him the saide William Cecil, towards vs, our Crowne and Dignity.

Know you therefore, that Wee of our speciall Grace, certaine knowledge, and meercion, haue set, giuen, and in our Countie of Northampton promoted, made, and created, and by the tenor of these presents, do set, ordaine, and create him the aforesaide William Cecil, vnto the state, degree, dignity and honor, of Baron of Burghley: and vnto the saide William, haue imposed, giuen, and granted, and by these presents, doe impose, giue, and grant, the Name, Stile, and Title of the Baron of Burghley. To haue, and to hold, the same State, Degree, Dignity, Stile, Title, Name, and Honour, vnto him the aforesaide William, and the heyres male issue of his body for euer. Willing, and by these presents for vs, Our heyres and Successors granting, that the aforesaide William, and his Heyres male aforesaide, may successively teare and haue, and euery one of them may haue and beare the said Name, State, Degree, Stile, Dignity, Title, and Honour: and may be called and stiled, and euery one of them may be called and stiled by the name of the Baron of Burghley. And that he the saide William and his heires male aforesaide, shall successively in all things, be holden for Barons of Burghley: and shall so be used and reputed, & that euery one of them shall be used, holden, and reputed, as Barons. And that the saide William, and his heires male aforesaide, may haue, hold, and possesse, and their heires male also aforesaide, and euery one of them may as Barons, haue, hold, and possesse a seate place, and voice in our Parliaments and Councells, amongst other Barons, within our kingdome of England. And also the saide William, and his heires male aforesaide, may haue, enioy, and vse, and euery one of them, shall by the name of the Baron of Burghley, haue, enioy, & vse, all the Rights, Priuiledges, Preheminences, and Immunities, of right and lawfully belonging vnto the state of a Baron in all things; which other the Barons of our said Kingdome of England, in former times, in better sort, more honourably and more quietly, used and enioyed, or at this present doe enioy and vse: and this without any fee, great or small, to be therefore to our vse in any wise giuen paide, or made into our Housperry of our Chancery, or elsewhere, for that expresse mention of the certainty of the premises, or of any of them, &c. These being witnesses. The most reuerend father in Christ, Matthew Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate and Metropolitane of all England, our welbeloued & faithfull Councillor, Nicholas Bacon knight, Keeper of our great Seale of England, and also our welbeloued Councillors and Councillors, William Marquesse of Northampton, Henry Earle of Arundell, Thomas Earle of Suffex, President of our Councell in the North parts of our kingdome, Henry Earle of Huntingdon, Ambrose Earle of Warwick, Master of the Chancery, Francis Earle of Bedford, Robert Earle of Leicester, Master of our

The rites and Ceremonies vsed in Creating Barons by Charter.

William Cicill Knight, attired in a robe and Mantle, and in this forme brought forth, the xv. day of Februarie, the xiii. yeare of the reigne of Queene Elizabeth, was in the royall Pallace at Westmonastery, in a great assembly of Courtiers, made Baron of Burghley. First, the Heralds go before, by two and two together, whom Garter alone followeth, carrying in his handes the Royall Charter; Henry Cary, Baron of Hunsdon, carried the Barons Cloake: after whome followed William Cicill Knight, in the midst, betwixt Edward Baron Clinton, on the right hand, and William Brooke Baron Cobham on the lefte: who entering into the Chamber of salutation (which wee commonly call the Presence Chamber) & making there obeysance thrice, approached vnto her royall Maiesty; where Garter first deliuered the Charter to the Earle of Sussex, then being Chamberlain of the Queenes house, who gaue the same vnto the Queene, and the againe deliuered the same vnto John Wolley Esquire, to be read: VVhere, at the word (Inuestiimus, or we haue inuested) the Queen put vpon him the Barons Cloake, and the Charter being read, pronounced him the sayde William Cicill, Baron of Burghley, and his heyres male after him, as is before declared.

VVhich thing being done, the charter was againe deliuered vnto the Queene, who forthwith gaue it to the Baron to be kepte; who at length, after moost great thanks giuen her, for the honour by him receiued, in his honourable attire, with a great noise and sound of Trumpets, departed to dinner, euen in the same maner that he came in.

After mid dinner, Garter with the rest of the Queenes Heralds, comming neere vnto the Table, and hauing first altogether cryed aloud, Largezse, forthwith proclaimed the Queens stile in Latine, French and English, and so with-drawing themselves a little farther off, and againe repeating Largezse, he repeated the stile of the new Baron in these words: Dis tres-noble Seigneur Guillaume Cicil Cheualier, Baron de Burghley: and so hauing done their obeysance, and altogether crying twice Largezse, they departed.

The manner and forme of admitting of Barons by Rescript or Writ.

His (I say) is the manner of creating of the Named Nobility, by royall Charters: now a fewe things remaine, to shew how the newe Barons are by VVrits of Summons chosen into the Parliaments: and in what sort they being thither called, are there placed. The forme of the writ wee haue before shewed, and the forme of theyr Admission is this.

Henry Compton, Henry Cheney, & Henry Norreis Knights, were by writs, called to be present at the Parlement at Westmonastery, vpon Thursday the 8. day of May, in the 14. yeare of the reigne of Queene Elizabeth, vpon which day, after that the Nobles were set on their seats, these three attending without, were by turnes in this maner brought in, and admitted into the vpper house. Garter K. at Armes, came before bare-headed, hauing on his royall coat, whom two of the last made Barons, attyred in their Cloaks, robes, and Mantles followed, bringing in the knight that was to be in his new honour inuested, in the middle betwixt them. Him at length they bring vnto the Chancellor, vnto whome the Knight hauing made once or twice Obeysance, deliuereth his Writ of Summons.

mons to be read, wherein he declareth by what power & authority he is come thither: the Chancellor after the writ read with great courtesie welcomming him, dismisth the new Baron (in his Barons attire) to take his place, which place (Garter going before them) they shewe vnto him: but the writ is by the Chancellour deliuered vnto the Clarke of the Parliament to be laid vp.

In the like manner were the other two Knights afterward brought in and admitted, and in their due order in their seates placed. So they which entred into the Parliament but Knights onely, goe out thence and are so accounted Barons, and enioy the like honor with the rest of the Barons of the kingdome.

The Kings Charter for the Creating of a Vicount.

The Copy of the L. Patents of K. Henrie the VI. creating Jo. Beaumont, vicount of Beaumont.

HEnry, by the grace of God, King of England, and of France, Lord of Ireland, &c. To all Arch-Bishops, Bishops, Abbots, Priors, Dukes, Earles, Barons, Iustices, Sherifffes, Gouernors, Bayliffes, Ministers, and other his faithfull Subjects, vnto whome, &c. Greeting. Know you, that we, when as wee see it to becomme our Maiestie, with principall honors to promote them, who with dutifull seruice dayly attend vs, especially in such things which proceed from our meere Prerogative & gracious bounty; and them chiefly, whom the remembrance of their fathers and former Ancestors hath ennobled, and the merites of their owne vertues haue with manifest obedience and loyalty graced: that vertue so rewarded, may in it selfe be strengthened, and withall allure many vnto vertuous actions.

Heereof it is, that wee considering the Noble discent of our most dearly beloved cosine John Lord of Beaumont, & the good seruices which his Ancestors faithfully performed vnto our Progenitours, together with the most acceptable Offices which he euen from his infancy, hath hitherto commendably done vnto vs, and yet dayly performeth, as he desireth hereafter to continue the same, and to doe vs so much the more better honour: VVee of our especiall Grace, in this our present Parliament, giue vnto the aforesaid John Lord of Beaumont our cosine, and the heires male of his bodie, the name of the Vicount of Beaumont; and do really inuest him the faide John, with the Armes of the Vicount of Beaumont, and assigne vnto him in our Parliaments, Councils, and other assemblies, a place aboue all the other Barons in our Kingdome. Vnto whom as it shall be more fit, and as it is shewed in the very State of a Vicount aforesayde, wee of our meere motion and bounty, haue giuen and graunted for vs and our heyres, as much as in vs is, vnto the aforesaid John and his heyres, together with the Name, Armes, and place aforesaid, twentie Markes to be yearly receiued vnto him, and to his heires male yssuing out of his owne body, out of the former illues and profits, of our countie of Lincolne to bee paid by the hands of the Sheriffe of the sayde county for the time beeing, at the Termes of Easter and S. Michael, by equall portions. To haue & to hold to him and his heires aforesaid, the Name, armes, place, and twenty Marks as aforesaid for euer; for that expresse mention, &c. VVitnesse our selfe at Red. Ing. the twelfth of February, in the eighteenth year of our reigne.

By the Writ of our Primate Seale.

Here is so great a similitude and likeness in the Rites and ceremonies in creating of a Vicount, with those which are vsed in the creating of a Baron, as that but chaunging such things as are of necessity to be changed, a man would thinke them almost the very same. But this difference there onely is; that a Baron is conducted betwixt two Barons, whereas a Vicount hath an Earle on his right hand, and a Baron on his left (in case there want Vicounts) to conduct him, and is by halfe a gard vpon his shoulder aboue a Baron, as by the Picture following in the next Page appeareth.

The Royall Charter for the creating of an Earle.

The Copie of the Letters
patents of Q.
Elizabeth,
creating Walter Deuereux
earle of Essex.

Elizabeth, by the grace of God, Queene of England, France, and Ireland, Defenderre of the faith, &c. Vnto all and singular Archbishops, Dukes, Marqueses, Earles, Vicounts, Bishops, Barons, and all others, vnto whom &c. Greeting. Seeing that they whom the Diuine prouidence hath put and placed in a Monarchy and Royall Seate, that they being as it were the Lieutenants of him that heavenly Monarch, vpon earth, may well, vprightly, religiously, decently, and wholely rule, gouerne and maintaine, whatsoeuer is to their custody and gouernment by God himselfe giuen and committed: and that the Monarchs in their Monarchies, represent the same thing that the eyes do in the body, whose office it is to direct all the members of the body: Monarchs and Princes therefore as eyes of the Commonweale, ought diligently to intend, to looke about, and to search into all States and degrees of their Empire, without which wee must needes confesse, no ciuill administration, or politickall gouernement, to be possibly made or framed. And so necessary is the preservation of orders and degrees of men in great Empires, as that after they once see the Nobility of the States and Degrees broken, rent, impaired, or shaken, or (as many things happen after the manner of men) by death afflicted or weakened, they ought with all speed to amend, repaire, increase, and augment the same: so that others, whom both their owne vertues, and the glory of their Stocke and Ancestors hath ennobled, being called vnto Nobilitie and honour, the glorie of Degrees and States may for euer in the glorie and brightnesse thereof bee preferred and kept. Wherefore wee now seeing one honourable and glorious order of Nobilitie amongst the rest to growe few; and knowing right well our most famous and renowned Cousin Walter Vicount Hereford, Knight of our most Noble order of the Garter, Lord Feners of Charsley, worthily and valiantly to haue for vs behaued himselfe in that seditious tumult of wicked Traytors and Rebels, raised of most wicked and vagracious men in the North parts of our kingdom: In which tumult and power of armed Traytors, a most great and horrible danger was, not vnto our Kingdome onely, but euen vnto our person also intended: so that partly by his conduct, not onelie the cruell furie and rage of the Traytors and Rebels, was therein that place repressed, but many of the Rebels also were vnto our obedience reduced, and so to the state of our Kingdome before sore troubled, became againe to be well quieted and pacified.

Wee therefore, for these causes and things by him so worthily performed, willing to promote him the sayde Walter vnto the State, Honour and Dignitie, of the Earle of Essex: and for that the aforesayde Walter is descended of the Noble Stocke and Family of the Bouchiers, late Earles of Essex, & is by the common Law of our Kingdome, next heire vnto Henry Bouchier late Earle of Essex. Know you, that wee of our especiall grace, certaine knowledge, & meere motion, haue erected, created & promoted the said Walter to be Earle of Essex, and also to the state, degree, dignity and honour of the Earle of Essex: and by the Tenour of these presents, do erect, create, and promote him to be Earle of Essex. And vnto the same Walter haue impos'd, giuen, and bestowed the name, stile, and title of the Earle of Essex; and by these presents, do impose, giue, and bestow the same. And him the said Walter, in such the state, stile, honour, and dignity of the Earle of Essex, by the girding vnto him of a sword, and the putting on of a Cap of Honour, and a Coronet of Gold, do grace, inuict and really ennoble by these presents. To haue and to hold the state, degree, dignitie, stile, name, and honour of the Earle of Essex aforesaid, with all and singular the preeminences, honours, and other such things whatsoeuer vnto the state of an Earle appertaining or belonging, vnto the aforesayd Walter, and the heires male issuing from his bodie for euer. Willing, and by these presents, granting for vs, our

heires & successors, that the said Walter, and his heires male aforesaid, shall the name, state, degree, dignity, stile, and honour aforesaid, successiue haue & beare: and shall by the name of the Earle of Essex aforesaid, be called, and stiled, and euery one of them shall be called & stiled. And that the said Walter and his heires aforesaid, shall in all things successiue be holden, vsed, and reputed, and euery one of them shall be holden, vsed, and reputed, as Earles of Essex. And the said Walter and his heires male, shall haue, hold, and possesse, and euery one of them shall haue, holde, and possesse a place in our Parliaments, and in the Parliaments of our Heires and Successours within our Kingdome of England, among the other earles, as earle of Essex; and in such sort, as the aforesayde Henrie Bouchier, late earle of Essex had, held, and possessed the same.

And the said Walter also, and his heires aforesaid, shall enioy and vse, and enioy one of them by the name of the earle of Essex, shall enioy and vse all & euery the rights, priuileges, preeminences, and immunities in all things orderly and of right vnto the state of an Earle belonging; and which other earles in all things, orderly & of right, haue before these times, in better wise more honourably and quietly vsed and enioyed, or do at this present enioy and vse.

And for because, that as the height of State and Honour encrease, so greater charges and burdens necessarily encrease also: and that hee the sayd Walter and his heires aforesaid, and euery one of them may the better, more seemely, and honourably maintaine & support the aforesaid state of the earle of Essex, and the burdens lying vpon him the said Walter and his heires: We therefore of our more abundant grace, haue giuen and granted, and by these presents doe giue and graunt, for vs, our heires and successors, vnto the aforesaid Walter, and his heires aforesaid, for euer, twenty pound of Fee, or yearly rent, to be yearly receiued, of the issues, profits, and reuenues, of our great and little Custome and Subsidie graunted vnto vs, or hereafter to be graunted vnto vs, our heires and successors, arising, growing, or comming, within the Port of our honorable Citie of London, by the hands of our Customers and Collectors, or the Customer and Collectors of our Heyres and Successors there, for the time being, at the Tearmes of S. Michael, and Easter, by euen portions, to be euery year payed. By reason that expresse mention of the true yearly valour, or of any other valour or certainty of the premises, or of any of the, or of any other gifts or grants by vs, or any of our Progenitors, before these times made vnto the aforesaid Walter earle of Essex, in these presents appeareth not: or any Statute, Ordinance, Act, Prouision, Proclamation, or restriction to the contrary thereof, before had, made, set forth, or provided, or any other thing, cause, or matter whatsoeuer, in any thing notwithstanding.

These being VVitnesses. Our faithfull Councillor, Nicholas Bacon knight, Keeper of our great Seale of england: and our most wel beloued Cousins, Edward earle of Oxford, Lord Chamberlaine of england, Reinold earle of Kent, William earle of Worcester, knight of the most Noble order of the Garter, Henry earle of Rutland, Thomas earle of Suffex, of our aforesaid order of the Garter knight, and President of our Councill in the North parts of our kingdome of england: Henry earle of Huntingdon, of the aforesaid Order, &c. Ambrose earle of Warricks, of the aforesaid Order, &c. Edward earle of Hertford, Robert earle of Leicester, of the Order aforesaid, &c. Thomas Vicount Bindon. And also the reuerend Fathers in Christ, Edmund Bishop of Sarum, & Edmund Bishop of Rochester, our Almoner, And also our wel-beloued and faithfull, William Lord Howard of Effingham, Lord Chamberlaine of our House, of the Order of the Garter aforesaid, &c. William Lord of Burghley, our principall Secretary of the Order aforesaid, &c. Henry Lord Strange, Arthur Lord Gray of Wilton, of the order aforesaid: William Lord Sanders, Edward Lord Windsor, Thomas Lord Wharton, Robert Lord Rich, Thomas Lord Paget, John Lord Darcey of Chiche, Robert Lord North, Edmund Lord Chandos, of the aforesaid Order of the Garter, &c. Thomas Lord of Buckburff, William Lord Deleware, Barons, Francis Kneller knight, Treasurer of our House, James Crestes, Knight, Controullor of our House. And our well-beloued and faithfull

The Rites and Ceremonies of creating of an Earle.

THe ſame Walter Deuereux, Baron Ferrers of Chartley, & Vicomte Hereford, hauing on an inner Gowne of purple like, and covered with a Robe of Liſtate, & a velvet Mantell of the ſame colour, and going in the middle betwixt the erle of Suffex on his right hand, and the erle of Huntingdon on his left, both of them in their Robes was conducted from the Queens Chappell vnto the Queens preſence. Next before him went the erle of Leiceſter, carrying a Cap of Eſtate, an ls. Coronet of Gold: & the erle of Bedford on the left hand, bearing before him a Sword, with the Hiltis vpward. Before theſe alſo went Garter, the chiefe K. of Armes with the Charter alone, and before him al the reſt of the Heralds, by two & two together. When they were now come vnto the Chamber of Preſence, after they had thence made their moſt lowe obeiſſance, with ſome little ſpace betwixt, they drew neare vnto the Queene then ſitting in her Chaire of Eſtate, where the aforeſaid Walter kneeled downe, the reſt ſtanding by. There the Charter was firſt deliuered vnto the Queene, who gaue it to William Cecil, Baron of Burgheley, who deliuered the ſame vnto William Cordell Knight, Maſter of the Rolles, to read it aloud. Where at theſe words (in the Charter) Gladio cinctus &c. the Queen put about his necke a Sword, hanging ouerthwart towards his left hand: and at theſe words Coppa & Circuli aurei, ſhe alſo put vpon his head a Cap, with a little Coronet. And afterward reading that which was left, pronounced him the ſaid Walter before Vicomte Hereford, now created erle of ſſex, for him and his heires male, as in the Charter it ſelfe before ſet downe more at large appeareth. Theſe things being done, the ſame Maſter of the Rolles (in ſtead of the Secretary, for the helping of whom he had read the charter) deliuered it to the Earle of Oxford, Great Chamberlaine of England: but he deliuered it vnto the Queene, who alſo gaue the ſame vnto the Earle of Effex to be kept. But he after great thanks, with great humility giuen, withdrew himſelfe aſide among the other Noblemen ſtanding there by, expecting another, comming to be created earle. In like maner, & at the ſame time alſo, Edward Baron of Clynton and Say, and Admirall of England, was for himſelfe and his heires male, created earle of Lincolne.

Theſe things altogether finiſhed, they departed in the ſame order that they came in, with the Trumpets aloud ſounding, whom the Heralds received. Garter went before, whom the new Earles followed in the middle, betwixt the Earles of Suffex and Huntingdon. And being ſo attired in the Ornamentals of their creations, were conducted to dinner into a dining Chamber prepared for the ſame purpoſe. Where, after they had ſit ſpace, at the comming in of the ſecond courſe, Garter with the reſt of the Heralds entring into the dining Chamber, crying aloud, Largeſſe; he alone proclaimed the Queens ſtile, firſt in Latine, after in French, and thirdly in english: and hauing twice repeated the word Largeſſe, & withdrawing themſelues a little farther from the Table, proclaimed the ſtile of theſe laſt created Earles, in french and english in theſe words.

Du tres hault et Puissant Seigneur Gautier d'Enverux Comte de Effex, Vicomte Hereford, Baron Ferrers de Chartley, et Cheualier du tres noble ordre de la Jarretiere.

Of the moſt high and mighty Lord, Walter of Enverux, earle of Effex, Vicomte Hereford, Baron Ferrers of Chartley, and Knight of the moſt honourable order of the Garter.

Du tres hault et puissant Sir Edouarde Conte de Lincoln, Baron de Clynton et Say, grand Admirall d'Angleterre, et Cheualier de tres noble ordre de la Jarretiere.

Of the moſt high & puiſſant, Sir Edward, earle of Lincoln, Baron of Clynton & Say, great Admirall of England, & knight of the moſt noble order of the Garter.

¶ The Kings Charter concerning the creating of a Marquesse.

Edward by the grace of God, King of England & of France, Lord of Ireland, &c. Vnto all Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Priors, Dukes, Earles, Barons, Iustices, Sherifes, Governours, Ministers, Balives, and all his faithfull Subiects; greeting. Know you, that forasmuch as our Royall Maiesty, after most great victories obtained ouer our enemies, is by the power of Almighty God promoted vnto the Regall Dignitie, and our Hereditary Royall seate: and lest that so great glorie of our Name, should euen in the verie rising thereof, for want of Children, faile, it came most happily to passe, that we were in lawfull marriage ioyned vnto our best beloued wife, Elizabeth, Queene of England, of whom we haue raised certaine more strong stayes of our future Royall Posterity, that is to say, Edward our eldest Sonne, Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester, Richard Duke of Shrewsbury and of Yorke; with a notable encrease of other our Children also: which thing greatly both perswadeth and enforceth vs, euen from our heart, to giue the greatest thanks wee possibly can, vnto the most glorious and high GOD, Defender of our Royall right, and Reuenger of our wrongs; and with gracious fauours to prosecute, and with greater honour and fauour to grace and beautifie her the same our wife, hauing of vs best deferred, and all her Progeny. But to the intent that our first begotten Sonne aforesayd, and the rest of our best beloued Children, compassed about with the faithfull, trusty, and sure strength of their neare and deare friends, as it were with certaine walles, may the more strongly be defended; we will not passe ouer vnrewarded, Thomas Grey their Brother by the Mothers side; whose noble Stocke, exceeding towardlineffe, worthy valour, but most of all, whose honourable vertues, we with the sincere affection of loue embrace: for

why it seemes a thing most certain, them being brought vp in naturall society, and bound together with that sweete remembrance, them to haue dwelt in the same dwelling place before they were borne, to beare a certaine common and especial loue amongst themselves for euer: and that they who in so strait a degree of consanguinity & loue are ioyned together, if any one of them should bee of so small dignity and reputation, as that for poverty hee should not be able honourably to serue his greater kinsman when he ought vs to do: we thinke it not vnbecomming vs to provide therefore, so as shall best seeme vs. And therefore we willing that the sayde Thomas should bee promoted with a greater patrimony, and more notable Titles of honour and dignity, that so he may stand in better stead, and become a greater Ornament vnto vs, our Children, and the Common-weale: of our speciall grace, certaine knowledge, and merer motion, do ordaine, make, and create him the said Thomas, to be Marquesse Dorset: and also by these presents vnto the said Thomas, giue and grant, the stile, honour, state, title and dignity of Marquesse Dorset: and by the Girding vnto him of a Sword, and by the putting on of a Cap of Honour, do inuest him of the stile, title, name and honour of Marquesse of the place aforesayd; together with all the prerogatiues vnto the same honour and dignity appertaining and belonging. To haue and to hold the said name, stile, honour, state, title, and dignity of Marquesse Dorset, together with all the appurtenances, dignities, and other things whatsoever, vnto the state of a Marquesse of our kingdom of England, as well in our Sessions, Parliaments and Councells, and of our heires, or otherwise howsoever it be vnto the same honour and dignity appertaining and belonging, vnto the aforesayde Thomas and his heyres male issuing out of his body for euer. And also of our more plentifull grace we haue giuen and graunted, and by these presents do giue and graunt vnto the aforesayd Marquesse towards the supportation of the sayde name, stile, honour, state, title and dignity, 35. pounds of lawfull money of England. To be had, leuied & receiued yearly vnto the sayd Marquesse, and the same his heires aforesayd, (viz.) twenty pounds there-

HENRY by the grace of God, King of England, and of France, Defender of the Faith: & Lord of Ireland: to all and singular Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Priors, Dukes, Earles, Barons, Iustices, Sherifes, Governours, Ministers, and all Balives, & others his faithfull Subiects: Greeting. Know you, that forasmuch as a Royall Seate, & the height of regal dignity, with the greater State and Maiesty, consisteth in the multitude of persons of both Sexes, as well of men as women: and that the gouernment of our kingdom is so much the more, with the more excellent honour strengthened, by how much the more noble States, and higher Dignity of both Sexes are vnder it, or support it. VVee therefore vnto the premises directing our sight, and willing to establish our Royall Scepter with the encrease of Nobles, and especially such as are from Royall race descended. For a Royall Seate once placed, is with the presence of many Princes to be attended. VVherefore vpon this consideration, as well for the Nobility of her Stocke, as for the excellency of her vertues and conditions; and other the shewes of her honesty & goodnesse, worthily to be commended. VVee by the content of the Nobility of our kingdom then present, make, create, and ennoble; and by these presents make, create, and ennoble our Cousin Anne Rochford, one of the Daughters of our well-beloued Cousin Thomas, Earle of Wiltshire, and of Ormond: Keeper of our priuate Seale, to be Marchionesse of Pembroke: and also by The putting on of a Mantle, and the setting of a Coronet of gold vpon her head, as the manner is, do really inuest vnto her the Name, Title, State, Stile, Honour, Authority, and Dignity, and other the rest of the Honour, vnto the same belonging and annexed.

To haue and to hold the Name, Stile, Title,

thereof to bee had and receiued vnto the said Marquesse and the same his heyres, of the Fee-farme of the Towne of Dorset, by the hands of the Bourgeses of the faide Towne for the time being, at the tearmes of S. Michael, and of Easter, by equall portions. And the other fifteene pounds the remainder thereof, to bee had and receiued yearly vnto the faide Marquesse, and his heyres aforesayde, of all the Customes and Subsidies, to vs already granted, or to be granted, and of eyther of the, and of euery part, or of euery parcell of the same, comming and growing in that Port of our Towne of Southampton, by the hands of our Customers or Collectors, or of our heyres in the Port for the time being, at the aforesayde Tearmes by equal portions. For because that expresse mention of the true yearly valour of the premises, or any of them, or of any other gits or grants vnto the faide Thomas, before these times by vs made, is not in these presents made: or any statute, acte, or ordinance to the contrary, made, set forth, or ordained: or any other thing, cause, or matter whatsoeuer notwithstanding: and these things without any fee thereuppon, to our vse in any wise to be payed. These being Witnesse: Our most famous first begotten Sonne, Edward Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester, and of Flint. The most reuerend Fathers, Thomas Cardinall and Archbishop of Canterbury, & George, Archbishop of Yorke. Our most renowned Brethren, George Duke of Clarence, and Richard Duke of Gloucester: and the right reuerend Fathers, Thomas Bishop of Lincolne, our Chancellor of England: and Thomas Bishoppe of Hereford. Our well-beloued Cousins, William Arundell, Henry Essex, Treasurers of England, and Anthony Rivers Earles. And the welbeloued and faithfull Clarke, our Elquire John Russell, Doctor of Law, & keeper of our priuate Seale: And also our welbeloued and faithfull Thomas Stanley, & William Hastings, Knights: with others. Title, State, Honor, Authority, and Dignity of the Marchionesse of Penbrooke vnto the aforesaid Anne, and the heyres male yssuing of her body for ever. And to the intent, that the sayd Anne as becometh the name of the Marchionesse of Penbrooke, & the Nobility of her state may the more decently and honorably, maintaine and support the burthens to be laid vpon her, we haue giuen and granted, & by this present Charter doe giue, grant, and confirme vnto the said Anne, and her heyres aforesaid, thirty and five poundes yearly, to be receiued to her & her heirs aforesaid, of the firme rents, issues, reuentions, obventions, profits, and emoluments, of our Countie of Penbrooke aforesaid, arising and growing, as well by the hands of the Sheriffe of that Countie for the time being, as by the hands of the Bailiffes, Farmers, or other occupiers of our Countie aforesaid whosoever, at the Termes of Saint Michael the Archangell, and of Easter, by equall portions to bee payed. For that expresse mention of the true yearly valew, or of other giftes or grants by vs, vnto the aforesaid Anne in former times made, in these presents appeareth not, or any statute, act, ordinance or prouision to the contrary therof made, set forth, or provided, or any other thing or matter whatsoever, in any thing notwithstanding. These being Witnesse. The most reuerend Father in Christ, Ed. Archbishop of Yorke, and the Reuerend Father in Christ, Step. Bishop of Winchester our Secretary, and John Bishoppe of London, And also our wel-beloued cosins Thomas Duke of Norfolke, our Treasurer of England, and Charles Duke of Suffolke, Earle Marshall, Thomas Earle of Wiltshire, Keeper of our private Seale: John Earle of Oxford, our Chamberlaine of England: and George Earle of Shrewsbury, Steward of our house: Thomas Audley Knight, keeper of our great Seale: William Sandes of Fine, Knight, Chamberlaine of our House: and Walter Deuerex of Ferrers Knight, Barons: William Fitz Williams, Treasurer of our house: and William Pantler, controller of our house, Knights: and others. Giuen vnder our hand, at our Castle of Windsor, the first day of September, and in the 24. yeare of our reigne.

The Rites and Ceremonies vsed in Creating of a Marchionesse.

THIS Anne the daughter of Thomas Earle of Wiltshire, and of Ormond, vpon a Sunday, viz. the first day of September, 1532. in the 24. yeare of King Henry the eighth, was at Windsore in this manner inueiled.

The King himselfe attended vpon with the Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke, the Marquesses, Earles, Barons, and other the Great estates of the Kingdome, together with the French Ambassador, and a name of the Priuy Counsell, went into the Chamber of Salutation, which they commonly call The Presence, and there fate him downe in his chaire of Estate. Vnto the which place the aforesaid Anne was conducted with a great traine of Noble Countiees, both men and women. The Lords went foremost, Garter K. of Heralds, first carrying the Kings Charter. After whom, the Noble Lady Mary, daughter to Thomas Duke of Norfolke, vpon her left arme, carried a robe of estate of Cambion Veluet, furred with Ermiones, and in her right hand a Coronet of Gold. Her, the aforesaid Anne followed, with her hayre loose, and hanging down vpon hir shoulders, attired in her inner garment (which they call a Surcoat) of Crimson Veluet, lined with ermions also, with strait sleeves, going in the middest betwixt Elizabeth, Countesse of Rutland on her right hand; and Dorothy, Countesse of Suffex on her left; whom many Noble Ladies & Gentlewomen followd. But she being brought towards the Kings Royall Seate, thither made her obedience, and coming vnto the King fell downe vpon her knees. The King gaue the Charter before delivered vnto him, vnto the Bishop of Winchester his Secretary to be read, which as he was reading aloud at these words Montella in ductionem (in the Charter) the King put vpon Anne the Marchionesse the Robe of estate, deliuered him by the Lady Mary; and at the wordes Circuli aurei, put also vpon her head a Coronet of Gold. At length, the Charter being read, the King gaue vnto her two Charters, viz. the one, of the creating of her to bee a Marchionesse, and to the heyres male yssuing out of her body for ever. And another, for the receiuing of a thousand poundes reuenew yearly, for the maintining of that her dignity. All which thinges at length performed, she gaue the King most humble thanks, and so hauing on her Robe of State, and a Coronet vpon her head, with the Trumpets aloud sounding, departed.

Estates

THE Rites and Ceremonies for creating of a Marquesse, altogether agree with those vsed in creating of a Duke changing onely such thinges as are of necessity to be changed, but that Marquesses haue a Marquesse and an Earle to conduct them at their creating: the rest of the difference is out of the portraiture beneath set, as followeth.

CHAP. XIII.

The Kings Charter for the creating of a Duke.

EDWARD by the grace of God, of England, France and Ireland, King: Defender of the Faith, &c. to all Archbishops, Bishops, Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, Barons, Iustices, Sheriffs, Gouernors, Ministers, and to all Bishops, and other his faithful Subjects, &c. Greeting. Seeing that there is nothing which more becometh a Prince, then to shew himselfe bountifull and liberrall, especially vnto such as haue of him well deserued, & good seruices vnto him performed: wee therefore reuoluing in our minde, with how many, how great & worthy seruices our most deare and well-beloued Vnkle Edward, earle of Hertford hath honoured vs: wee haue therefore thought him worthy, whom wee should promote vnto an higher degree of honour and dignity: neyther can we but for such his great deserts towards vs, but in some part with due deserts againe requite him. Know you therefore, that wee of our speciall grace, certaine knowledge, & meere motion, and by the aduice of our Councell, do create, ennoble, make and ordaine, him the aforesaid earle, to bee Duke of Somerfet. And by these presents, giue and grant vnto him the saide earle, the name, title, state, stile, honour, authority, & dignity, of the Duke of Somerfet: and him of that name, with the title, state, honor, authority, & dignity, & other honours to the same belonging & annexed, by the girting vnto him of a sword, and by the putting on of a Cap, and a Coronet of Gold upon his head: and the deliuering vnto him of a golden Verge, do really inuest. To haue and to hold the name, stile, state, honour, authority, and dignity, of the Duke of Somerfet, vnto our aforesaid Vnkle, and to the heyres male of his owne body, and of the body of Anne, now his wife, already begotten, and of the body of the same Anne hereafter to be begotten. And if it shall happen the saide Duke to dye without heyre male begotten, or hereafter to bee begotten of his body, and the body of the saide Anne now his wife: VVee will and grant, that if by the death of him the saide Duke, the heyres male of his body, and of Anne now his wife shall decease or dye, then Edward Seymour Esquire, the saide Dukes Sonne of the body of Katharine the first wife of him the saide Duke deceased, shall be Duke of Somerfet, and shall beare, haue, hold, and enjoy vnto him the aforesaid Edward Seymour, and the heyres male from the body of him, the same Edward lawfully descended, the name, state, title, honour, authority, and dignity of the Duke of Somerfet, with all the honours vnto the saide Dukedome appertaining & annexed. And also by the girting vnto him of a sword, and the putting on of a Cap, and a Coronet of gold upon his head, and by the deliuering vnto him of a golden verge, shall be thereof really inuested. And if it shall happen the aforesaid Edward to dye without heyre male of his body lawfully begotten, then we will, and grant, that the heyre of the now Duke of his body lawfully begotten, by any other his wife which he shall hereafter marry, shall bee Duke of Somerfet, and shall beare, haue, and enjoy the same, vnto him & his heyres male, lawfully begotten. And also the state, title, honour, dignity, and authority of the Duke of Somerfet, with all the honours vnto the saide Duke appertaining & annexed. And also by the girting vnto him of a sword, and by the putting on of a Cap, and a Coronet upon his head, and the deliuering of a golden verge vnto him, shall therein be royally inuested. And that the same Duke and his heyres aforesaid, may according to the decency of the said name of the Duke of Somerfet, and the Nobility of his and their estate, more honourably beare themselves. And that the same Edward and his heyres aforesaid, if they shall chance to be Dukes of Somerfet, may the more honourably maintaine, and beare the state and honour of the aforesaid name of the Duke of Somerfet: and for want of such issue, that then the heyres male of the body of the saide Duke hereafter to be begotten of the body of any wife, which he shall hereafter marry, may in like maner more honorably beare the state and honour of the aforesaid name of the Duke of Somerfet: we haue giuen and graunted, and by this our present Charter,

Charter,

Charter, giue, graunt, and confirme, for vs our heyres and successours, vnto the aforesaid duke of Somerfet, a certaine annual rent of forty pounds, of good and lawfull money of England, issuing out of our Mannor of Crikerum, otherwise called Crokhorne, Stokegersy, Wikefitzpane, or of any of them, in our County of Somerfet, being late parcel of the possessions of Henrie late Marquess of Exceter, which came vnto the hands of the late most noble and inuincible Prince, King Henry the eight, our most renowned father, by reason of the attainder of the saide Marquess, of high treason attainted, and which now are in our hands. To haue, hold, and receiue the aforesaid yearly rent of forty pound, vnto the aforesaid duke of Somerfet, and his heyres aforesaid, at the Feasts of the blessed virgin Mary, and Saint Michael the Archangel, by equall portions, to bee yearly paid by the hands of the Receiuers, Farmers, Tenants, and other whomsoever, Occupiers of four Manors, Lands, and Tenements aforesaid, or of any of them, being parcel of them. And after that, for want of such issue, vnto the aforesaid Edward, and the heyres male of his body lawfully begotten. And for defect of such issue, to remaine from thenceforth, vnto the heyres male of the said Duke of his owne body begotten, by any other his wife, which he shall hereafter marry. And that these our Letters Patents, or the Inrolment of them, vpon the onely shewing of the same, or of the enrolement of them, shall be yearly, and from time to time, as well vnto our Chancellour, and our Councell of our Court of Augmentation and Reuencion of our Crowne, for the time being, as vnto all others our Ministers, Receiuers, and other our Officers, their heyres and successours whatsoever for the time being, a sufficient warrant and discharge in this part, for the deliuey and payment of the saide yerly rent of forty pounds, vnto the aforesaid Duke and his heyres aforesaid. And for defect of such issue, vnto the saide Edward Seymour, and the heyres male of his body lawfully begotten. And for want of such issue, vnto the heyres of the saide Duke, of his body lawfully begotten, by any other his wife, which he shall hereafter marry. And if it shall happen the saide yerly rent of forty pound, or any part or parcel thereof to be behind & vnpaid at any of the aforesaid Feasts, in which it ought to be paid as is aforesaid: then we grant for vs, our heyres and successours, vnto the saide Duke, and his heyres aforesaid, and euery one of them: and for lacke of such issue, vnto the saide Edward Seymour, and his heyres aforesaid: and for want of such issue, vnto the aforesaid heyres of the saide Duke, whom he shall lawfully beget of the body of any other his wife whom hee shall hereafter marry, and to euery one of them, into the aforesaid Mannors, and euery one of them, and into all and euery the aforesaid Lands and Tenements, or any parcel of the saide Mannors, Lands, or Tenements, to enter, and there to distraine, & the distresses there fo by them, or any of them taken, to drive, leade, carry away, impound, and with them, and euery one of them to detain, vntill the aforesaid yearly rent of forty pound, together with the arrearages (if any there shall be thereof) shall vnto the aforesaid duke and his heyres aforesaid, or vnto the saide Edward or his heyres aforesaid: or the heyres of the saide Duke, or some one of them, be fully and wholly contented and payed, by vs, our heyres and successours, or the assignes of vs, our heyres, or successours. And for that expresse mention, &c. These being VVitnes. The most reuerend Father in Christ, Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate and Metropolitan of all England; and our well-beloued and faithfull Councellour, William Poules Knight, Lord Saint John, Great Maister of our house, &c. John Russell Knight, Lord Russell Keeper of our priue Seale: and also our most well-beloued Cozins, Henry earle of Arundell, and Francis earle of Shrewsburie, &c. Given vnder our hand at the Tower of London, the sixteenth day of February.

CHAP. XIII.

The manner of Creating of a Duke.

In the year one thousand five hundred forty seven, the xvii. of the Moneth of February, and in the first year of the Reign of Edward the sixth of that name, The Nobility being called together and assembled into the Tower of London. Edward Seymour, the aforesaid Earle of Hertford the kings Viceroy, & Protector of the kingdom, with others promoted vnto the diuers degrees of Nobility, was in this wise created Duke of Somerset. He himselfe being appareled in an inner Robe of honour, the Herald went before him in their Heraldic coates, the chiefe of whom, Garter following alone, carried the Charter. The Earles of Shrewsbury and of Oxford, going together, the Earle of Shrewsbury on the right hand, carried a Verge of gold, & the earle of Oxford on the left, carried the Dukes Cap, with a Coronet of gold. Next vnto whom followed the Earle of Arundell, carrying a Sword with the hilts vpward. At length the earle of Hertford himselfe was conducted in the midst, betwixt the Duke of Suffolke, and the Marquess of Dorchester: When they in this manner, attired in their Robes of honour, were come into the Chamber of Salutation (which they commonly call The presence Chamber) they after thrice obeysance made, went vnto the king, sitting in his chaire of Estate: where forthwith the earle kneeled downe, all the rest standing about him, Garter king of Heralds, deliuered the Charter vnto Baron Poyer, the Kings Secretary, who gaue the same vnto the King, and he deliuered it vnto him againe to be read aloud. And when he came vnto the words investimus (or we haue inuested) the king put a Dukes Mantle vpon the Earle: and at the words (gladio cincturamus) girt him with a Sword: at the words (cappa & circuli aurei impositionem) the King himselfe in like manner with his owne hand put vpon his head a Cap with a Coronet of gold vpon it: and at length, at those wordes (virga aurea traditionem) the King himselfe gaue into his hand, A verge of gold: which done, the Secretary read the rest, even vnto the end of the Charter: where in he pronounced him the said earle of Hertford, to bee Duke of Somerset: at which time, the King forthwith gaue the Charter vnto the Duke to be leapt: who after thanks giuen vnto the Kings Maie- tie for so great an honour and dignity received, in this sort attired, stood by the Chaire of Estate, whilst the Noble-men returned to bring in others, who were also to be created.

CHAP. XV.

The Kings Charter for the creating of the Prince of Wales.

The Copy of the letters patents of King Henry the 6. creating Edward his first begotten Sonne Prince of Wales, and Earle of Chester.

HENRY by the grace of God, King of England, and of France, Lord of Ireland, &c. To all Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Priors, Dukes, Earles, Barons, Iustices, Vicounts, Gouvernors, Ministers, and to all our Balues, and faithfull Subiects, Greeting. Out of the excellency of Royall preheminance, like as beams from the Sun, do inferior honours proceed: neyther doth the integrity of the royall luster and brightnesse, by the naturall disposition of the light, affording light fro light, feele any losse or detriment by such borrowed light: yea, the Royall Scepter is also much the more extolled, and the Regall Throne exalted, by how much the more Nobles, Preheminences, and Honours are vnder the power and command thereof.

And this worthy consideration allureth and induceth vs, which desire the encrease of the Name and Honour of our first begotten and best beloued Sonne, Edward, in whom we behold and see our selues to bee honoured, and our royall house also, and our people subiect vnto vs; hoping by the grace of God (by coniecture taken of his gracious future proceeding to be the more honorably strengthened, that wee may with honour preuent, and with abundant grace prosecute him, who in reputation of vs, is deemed the same person with vs. VWherefore, by the Councell and consent of the Prelats, Dukes, Earles, Vicounts, and Barons of our kingdome, being in our present Parliament, we haue made and created, and by these presents make and create him the said Edward, Prince of Wales, and Earle of Chester. And vnto the same Edward we giue and grant, and by this Charter haue confirmed, the Name, Stile, Title, State, Dignity, and the honour of the said Principality and County. And him of the said Principality and County, that hee may therein in gouerning rule, and in ruling, direct and defend, we by a Garland upon his head, by a ring of gold vpon his finger, and a verge of gold, haue according vnto the manner inuested him. To haue and to hold the same vnto him and his heires, the Kings of England for euer. Wherefore, we will, and straightly command, for vs and our heires, that Edward our Sonne aforesaid, shall haue the Name, Stile, Title, State, Dignity, and Honour of the Principalltie of Wales, and of the County of Chester aforesaid, vnto him and his heires the Kings of England aforesaid, for euer. These being witnesses. The reverend fathers, John, Cardinall and Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, Primate of all England, our Chancellor, and William Arch-Bishop of Turke, Primate of England; Thomas Bishop of London, and William Bishop of Norwich: our most wel-beloued Cousins, Richard Duke of Torke, and Humphrey Duke of Buckingham, our wel-beloued Cousins, Richard Earle of Warwicke, Richard Earle of Sarisbury, John Earle of Wilshire, and our beloued and faithfull Raffe Cromwell, Chamberlain of our house, William Faulconbridge, and John Stourton Knights Dated at our Pallace of V Westminster, the XV. day of March, and in the yeare of our Reigne, XXXII.

By the King himselfe, and his Councill.

CHAP. XVI.

Things required vnto the Creation of the Prince of Wales.

First, an honorable habite (viz.) a Robe of Purple Veluet hauing in it, about XVIII.elines, more or lesse, garnished about with a fringe of gold, and lined with Ermins.

A Surcoat or inner Gowne, hauing in it about XIII.elines of Veluet, of like Coulour, Fringe, and Furre.

Laces, Buttons, and Tassels (as they call them) ornaments made of purple silke & gold.

A girdle of silke also, to gird his inner Gowne.

A sword with a scabberd made of purple silke and gold, garnished with the like girdle he is girt withall, thereby shewing himselfe himselfe to be Duke of Cornwall by birth, and not by Creation.

A cap of the same veluet that his Robe is of, furred with Ermins, with Laces and a Button, and Tassels on the crowne thereof made of Venice gold.

A garland or a little Coronet of gold, to be put on his head, together with his Cap.

A long golden Verge or Rod, betokening his gouernment.

A Ring of gold also to be put on the third finger of his left hand, whereby he declareth his marriage made with Equity and Iustice.

All these things were almost with Royal sumptuousnesse prepared for Edward, Sonne to King Henry the eight, to haue beene created Prince of Wales, but prented by his Fathers death, hee was crownd King, sixt of that Name: yett the forme, with the Rites and Ceremonies belonging to the inuesting of the Prince into the Principality of Wales, you may perceiue, by that which is before declared.

PRINCEPS WALLIAE

CHAP. XVII.

Of the Crowning of the King.

Concerning Charters & Writs of Summons vnto Parliament, whereby the Kinges of England, onely upon their good liking & meere motion (as they use to say) are wont to conferre Named Nobility, wee haue already spoken: and now at length we are come vnto the rites and Ceremonies of the Coronation of the Kinges themselves, as they are after our manner with vs Crowned. Concerning which, a few things are now to be saide.

Nothing assuredly is more excellent then the Royall dignity, if we shall respect the Maiesty of the name of a King, either among the nations or in holie Scriptures. The Romanes in ancient time, appointed three Degrees of their greatest Dignities of all which, the Regall power was the cheefest and highest. Next after the dignity of a King was the Dictatorship, in the third place, followed the power which the Generall of their Armies had, whom they called Imperator. Hee that great Iulius Caesar, when after the victory of Pharsalia, had bene oftentimes by his army saluted Imperator, yet for all that, vied he not the name of Imperator, but Dictator. For why, the name of a King, after the time of Tarquinius, was for a great while growne into hatred, and become odious in the Citie. Howbeit, at such time as he was about to make an expedition against the Parthians, hee affected to bee called a King: affirming it to be contained in the Books of the Sybils, the Parthians not possible to bee conquered and subdued but by a King.

The Dictators most high power, was in all things like vnto the power of a King: and such as a man may say to haue bin equall vnto the power of a King. This was (as Varro witnesseth) chaunged into a great Magistrate, whom they called Magistrum Civium (or Master of the Citizens) which manner of Governour of a Citie, the Germanes vsed to call, Burgue Meistre.

The name of Imperator or Emperors, was at first but an Office in an Army, and a bare Title; which yet at length became a dignity of greater State and Maiestie, then any of the rest; and yet at length so fell, as that the Maiesty and magnificence of the Christian world, is maintained onely by the power of Kings. Vnto foure of whom onely, it is written to haue bene proper in ancient time to bee anointed, viz. vnto the Kings of Ierusalem, of England, of France, and of Sicily.

The French writers report, the French Kings within the bounds of their owne kingdom, to be styled Imperatores or Emperors. Chassaneu also affirmeth, the king of England, to bee in England, a Monarke. And if the name of Christianissimi, or the most Christian king, bee glorious vnto the French kings, and the name of Catholici or Catholique vnto the kings of Spaine, the kinges of England haue also a stile whereof to reioyce, as (viz.) not in Title, onely to be styled Fidei Christiane & Catholice Defensores, or Defenders of the Christian and Catholique Faith, but euen with vndaunted Maiesty, to be of both acknowledged the great Champions and Protectors of the same. But concerning attributes or additions of Stiles and Titles, I list not for to strue. But, seeing that the kinges of England for their royall dignity, giue God the thanks onely; and that it is onely by the grace of God (as they vse to say) by hereditary succession, by them obtained: they hold it vnto them confirmed by the suffrages of the people, with the requisite forme and ceremonies of Coronation, Consecration, and Inuention. Which being of ancient time (the kingdom afore shaken with Danish wars) oite kept at Kingston vpon Thames, is now vsually holden and made at Westminster, a city ioyning vnto the city of London, in forme following.

The

The ancient forme of the Coronation of the Kings and Queenes of England.

Inprimis. The King to be newly crowned: the day before his Coronation, shall be brought forth in royall Robes, and shall ride from the Tower of London, to his Pallace of Westminster with his head vncouered, being accompanied on horsebacke with his temporall Lords, his Nobles, the Commons of London, and other his seruants.

The seate of Estate.

Item. Let there be provided against the day of Coronation, in the Kings great Hall at Westminster, a Chaire of Estate, fittingly provided with hangings of silke and embroidery, with Cushions and Carpets of Arras accordingly.

The Scaffold.

Item. Let it be provided, that a Stage or Scaffold bee erected in the Church at Westminster, with steps on eyther side: let it be orderly futed with Cloathes and Carpets on all parts, and likewise on the floore.

The Royall Throne.

Item. Let it bee provided, that vpon the said Scaffold, there bee erected a Throne or Chaire, wherein the King is to sit: Let it bee accordingly futed with rich furniture, and Cushions of cloth of gold.

The Abbot of Westminster.

Item. It is to be obserued, that the Abbot of Westminster for the time being, by the space of two or three dayes before the Coronation of the King or Queene, shall instruct them what duties they are to performe in the celebration of their Coronation; as also to prepare their consciences, before the receiuing of the Sacred unction. And if the Abbot be dead, sick, or absent in some remote Country, or lawfully hindered; the shall one of the Monks of the saide Monastery (nominated by the Couent of the same Church) supply the office of the said Abbot in this case.

Of the Kirtle and Surcoat.

Item. Vpon the day of the Coronation, the King that is to be crowned, shall be placed in the foresaid Chaire of Estate, in the foresaid Hall (but being first bathed:) and after his bathing, a Kirtle and Surcoat of Veluet shall be prepared for him, open on the breast, betweene the shoulders and blades of his armes: Let his open Kirtle and Surcoat bee fastened together with loops of siluer: and vpon the Kirtle let him be clothed with other royall Robes, and let him bee thod with Sandals.

Procession.

Item. Let a solemne Procession be prouided by the Abbot and Couent of VVest: from the fore-saide Church to the Kings seate, in the fore-said Hall. In which procession, there shall be arch-bishops, Bishops, and other Prelates. Then the King shall descend, and so follow the Procession into the Church at Westminster, and he shall goe vpon blew cloth spread vpon the ground, from the foresaid Chaire to the Stage (or seage) erected in the fore-saide Church. And in the said procession shall be sung such like Hymnes, as are accustomed to bee sung in the reception of Kings and Queenes.

The Crosse, &c.

Item. The Crosse, Sword, Scepter, and Royall Mace (ensignes of honour) shall be borne in the procession, by the Abbot, Prior, and Senior Monks of Westminster into the Pallace, and there shall they be surrendered to diuers of the Lords, to be borne before the King to the Church.

The Barons of the five Ports.

Item. The Barons of the five Ports shall carry a rich Canopy vpon siluered staves ouer the King or Queenes head, in the fore-saide procession vnto the saide Church.

The Abbot of Westminster.

Item. The Abbot (or the Monke supplying his place) ought alwayes to be neere about the King and Queene to giue instructions.

Vv3

The

The Arch-bishop ought to demand the good liking of the people.

After the King hath a little reposed himselfe in the Chaire or Throne erected vpon the Scaffold, then the arch-bishoppe of Canterbury, shall goe vnto the fouresquares of the Scaffold, & with a loud voyce, aske the good liking of the people, concerning the Coronation of the king. Meane while the king shal stand vp in his Throne, and turne himselfe vnto the fouresquares, in like manner, as the Archbishoppe speaketh vnto the people. And after the said demand, the Anthem Firmetur manus tua, &c. shall be sung.

The Orffertory of the King.

The anthem being ended, the king shal descend from the Scaffold, vp to the high Altar, the Bishops leading him: whereupon he is bound to offer a Mantle, & one pound of gold: therein fulfilling his commandement, who said; Non apparebis vacuus in conspectu Letui.

The King prostrateth himselfe.

The Offering being finished, the king boweth himselfe vpon the Pavement, before the Altar, being before prepared by the Kings Officers, with cloaths and suitable cushions of velvet, vntill the Arch-Bishop ha' made ouer him the Prayer, Deus sit illi, &c. And then ought a Sermon to be preached vnto the people.

The King taketh his Oath.

The Sermon being ended, the king approacheth vnto the Altar to take his oath, which he ought to performe vpon the sacrament of our Lords body. Then let the Hymne, Veni creator spiritus, be solemnly sung. Which being begun, the King shal prostrate himselfe before the high Altar, vntill the Letany and Preface bee wholly sung ouer him. Which being finished, let the king arise and sit in his chaire, therein reposing himselfe a while.

The anointing of the King.

After this, let the King arise from his chaire, and goe vnto the Altar, and there shall he put off his Robes (except his Kirtle and Surcoat) and there let him receiue Vnction, the Quier meane while singing; Inseruent Salomonem; with the prayer following. Then let him be anointed in fieu places, (viz.) in the palmes of his hands, on his breast, betwene his shoulders, on the blades of his armes, and on his head, with holy oyle, in forme of a crosse; and afterwards making the signe of the crosse vpon his head with the Churline, the fastenings and Mantle being first opened. Item, after the foresaid Vnction, and wiping with linnen cloaths (which ought afterwards to bee burnt) let the opened places for the anointing be closed again by the Abbot of Westminster, or his Deputy.

The Abbot of Westminster shall take off the Kings Cap.

After the anointing of the kings head, let it bee covered with a linnen Cap, because of holy vnction, and so let it remain vntill the eight day after the vnction: vpon the which day, the Abbot of Westminster or his Deputy, shall come vnto the king, and take off the aforesaid linnen Cap, and shall wash & mundifie the kings head. After the said washing, the Abbot of Westminster, or his assignes, shall put vpon the King, royall habiliments, viz. a Sindon fashioned after the Dalmatin fashion, with hose and sandals: and then let these royall Robes bee sacred by the arch-Bishop: as Patet in Libro.

The King shall be clothed with a Mantle by the Abbot.

These Offices being finished, the aforesaid king shal be arrayed by the Abbot of Westminster, or his assignes, with a long Cloake or Mantle, woven with faire Imagery of gold, before and behind, with his Buskins, Pantofles, and Spurs fitted to his legges.

The setting of the Crowne vpon the Kings head.

After the King is thus arrayed, then let the Crowne be placed vpon the kings head by the arch-bishop, and afterward let a Ring be put on the Kings hand by a Bishop.

Of the Sword.

After this, let the Royall Sword bee blessed, and the said King shall receiue it from the Bishop, and shall gird himselfe with the said sword, and receiue the Bracelets: afterward, let him bee clothed with a Royall

Royall cloake.

The offering of the Sword.

After this, let the King offer the said Sword vpon the Altar to God: which the worthiest earle then present is to redeeme for one hundred Shillings; and to carry it naked before the King. The price whereof pertayneth vnto the sayde Altar.

The receiuing of the Scepter.

After this, let the King receiue a paire of linnen Gloues, & after that the Scepter, with the Crosse in his right hand, and the Mace in his left. Then being blessed, he shall kisse the Bishops, by whom (as also by the residue of the Nobility) he shall bee honourably conducted to his Royall seate, the Quier singing, Te Deum laudamus.

The Prelates, and the residue shall make their homage.

After this, let the Prelates and Lords make their fealty and liege homage to the Lord: ing: and then let Masse begin. Item, whilst Gloria excelsis is singing, the King shall be censured by a Deacon: and at Credo, he shall kisse the Booke.

The offering of Bread and Wine.

Whilst the Offertorie is singing, let the King approach to the Altar, & make his offering of Bread and Wine: and after that let him also offer a Mark of gold: which being done, the King shall a little bow downe his head, whilst the Arch-bishoppe doth blesse him with two Orisons, which being finished, let the King be brought back to his Throne or estate.

The kissing of the Pax after the Agnus Dei.

The kisse of the Pax after the Agnus Dei being receiued: let the King descend from his Estate, and humbly approach the Altar, and there receiue the body & blood of our Lord: which being receiued, the Abbot of Westminster shall minister vnto him wine out of a stone Chalice, pertayning to the King, and then immediately the King shall returne to his estate.

Masse being finished, let the King descend from his Throne, and goe vnto the high Altar, and let the Archbishops, Bishops, and Nobilitie go before him to the Shrine of Saint Edward, where the King shall be arrayed with other Robes; all which shall be offered vpon the Altar of Saint Edward.

The taking off the Robes.

The great Chamberlaine (viz.) the earle of Oxford, shall vnclotte the king of the foresaid Robes in a withdrawing place neare to the Shrine: which Robes, as they are particularly taken from the King, so shall they be laid vpon the said Altar by the Abbot.

Another Crowne.

The King attired in other honourable apparell, shall approach vnto the Altar of Saint Edward, where the Archbishop shall put another Crowne vpon his head.

The King returneth to the Pallace.

The said King being thus crowned, & carrying in his hand the Regall Scepter, from the Shrine to the high Altar, and from thence to the scaffold, then shall he descend thorow the midle of the Quier, by the same way as hee came into the Church, the foresaid earles carrying the Swords before him, returning with great glory vnto the Kings Pallace to dinner.

The delivery of the Scepter.

Dinner being ended, and the King withdrawne into his chamber, the Scepter shall bee deliuered to the Abbot of Westminster, or his deputy, by the Kings owne hands, to be kept in the said church of Westminster.

¶ The Coronation of the Queene.

And note, that in the Coronation of the Queene, Procession shall be celebrated: and if she be crowned with the king, then ought she to be annointed vpon the Crowne of her head, and on her breast: and if she be crowned alone, then ought shee to be annointed vpon the Crowne only crosse-ways with the Churline.

The Kings Oath vpon the day of his Coronation.

The Archbishop of Canterbury shall demand the King, saying: Plesseth it you to confirme and obserue the Lawes and Customes of ancient times, granted from God by iust and deuout Kings vnto the English Nation, by Oath vnto the said people, especially the Lawes, Customes and Liberties, granted vnto the Cleargie and Laity, by the famous King Edward? The King answering that he will performe and obserue all the premises. Then shall the Archbishop reade vnto him the Articles whereunto he shall sweare, thus saying, Thou shalt procure vnto the Church of God, vnto the Cleargie, and people, firme peace, and vnto in God, according to thy power: He shall answer, I will performe it.

Art thou pleased to cause to bee administered in all thy iudgements indifferent and upright iustice, and to vse discretion with mercie and veritie. He shall answer, I will doe it.

Art thou pleased, that our upright lawes and customes be obserued: and doe thou promise, that those shall bee protected and maintained by thee, to the honour of God, according to thy strength. He shall answer, I grant and promise.

The petition of the Bishops.

The Admonition of the Bishops vnto the King followeth; and must be read by one, (viz.) by the Bishop of Lincolne: Lord King, wee desire your pardon, that you would vouchsafe to defend to euery one of vs, and to the Churches committed vnto vs, our Canonically Priuiledges, with equitie and iustice, as a King in his Kingdome ought to doe vnto euery Bishop, Abbot, and Churches committed vnto him. Hee shall answer thus

The Kings answer.

With a willing and deuout heart, I promise vnto you, and I pardon euery one of you, and the Churches committed vnto you. I will confirme the Canonically priuiledges, minister equitie and iustice, and will defend them by Gods fauour, as farre as I am able, euen as a King ought with vprightnes to do, vnto euery Bishop, Abbot, and the Churches committed vnto him.

The Oath of homage made vnto the King.

I become your man liege of life and limbe, and troth, and yearely honour to you shall beare asenit all men that now liue. So helpe me God and Holy doome.

Item, that the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, shall first make his fealcie, then the Bishops, and afterwards all the Nobles of the Kingdome.

CHAP. XVIII.

A briefe Description of the pompe and Ceremonies at the Coronation of Edward the sixt, King of England: according to the ancient manner, used in the Consecration of the Kings of England.

Henrie the eight, the most inuincible K. of England, being dead, who departed out of this life at Westminster, the 28. day of January, 1546. and 38. of his reigne. Edward Seymour, erle of Hertford, King Edward his Vncle, accompanied with most of the Nobilitie of the whole Kingdome, forthwith went to Enfield (in the Countie of Middlesex) vnto Edward, now at length (by right of succession vnto his Father Henry) King of England, France and Ireland. Whom the Munday following (viz.) the last of January, he with the great applause of the Citie, and of the people by the way as hee went, was brought from thence vnto the Tower of London.

The same day the Heralds from an high Stage set vp in the midst of Westminster hall (with a great found of Trumpets) out of a Royall Charter, sealed with the great Seale of the kingdome, proclaimed the death of the aforesaid King Henry the eight, and the Inauguration of K. Edward the sixt to come. Which Charter was dated the 31 day of Iannarie, and the first yeare of King Edward.

Vpon Friday following (viz.) the 4. of February, it was through the most famous places of the City of London, by the Heralds proclaimed and notified, that whosoever they were which by right of Fee, were bound at the Coronations of Kings, to performe their Offices or Seruices, should vnto the Kings Commissions therefore appoynted, in the White hall, hall, the vij. of February exhibite their petitions: who according to the ancient custome of the kingdome, should determine vnto euery man their rights and seruices, against the twentieth of the same month, the day appointed for the Coronation of the King.

Vpon Thursday (which was the first day of February) the Nobility and States of the Kingdome assembled into the Chamber of Presence (as they call it) euery one of them in order one by one, did their reuerence and duty vnto the King, sitting in his Royall Seate, kissing his hand, and saying; Long liue the Kings Maiesty.

After that the Chancellour declared vnto him the Will of his dead Father, and the Names of his Executors: and that for lacke of yeares, he was not yet himselfe able to gouerne his Kingdome (for now hee was but going vpon the tenth yeare of his age) he told them, that the Earle of Hertford his Vncle, was by common suffrages chosen Tutor of his person, and Protector of his Kingdome. VVhich when the King had approved, that the erle refused not that charge, they altogether, and oftentimes doubled and redoubled; Long liue our King Edward: and, God saue our King.

The next day (viz.) vpon Friday, the Noble men meeting together in the Starre-chamber, there bound themselves by Oath vnto the King: at which time and place also the Maister of the Rolles, and the chiefe Officers of the Chancery, were sworne truly and sincerely to enrolle the VVill and Testament of the aforesaid King Henrie the eight, being dead.

The Sunday following, the King by his Vncle the Protector, was after the accustomed manner made a knight, who by and by after with the same Ceremonies created the Maior of London, and certaine others, knights.

But vpon the Monday, the Commissioners hauing well considered of the matter, and hauing read the Suters Petitions on both sides, gaue sentence concerning Seruices, after the manner to be performed at the time of the Coronation, of which in their place and order more is to be hereafter said.

The VVednesday following, was wholly bestowed in the magnificent performing of the rites and ceremonies of the Funerall of King Henrie the eighth. VVhich done, they entred into consultation concerning the Coronation of the new King. And first of all, for the greater solemnitie of the pompe, the Earle of Hertford was graced with the Title of the Duke of Somerset. At which time others also, with other honourable Titles, were with great solemnity honoured also.

After dinner, the Knights of the Garter assembled together into the Kings Chamber, where the King attired in the ornaments of that Order (as of right he should, highest) and with ioyned voices, chose the Marquesse Dorset, the earle of Darbie, and others, into the fellowship of that Order.

At length, vpon Saturday (viz.) the 19 day of February, the king with a most magnificent pompe, went through the midst of the City, from the Tower of London, vnto the Pallace at Westminster, the great Ordinance both out of the Tower, and the Shippes, on euery side thundering.

And in this order they went.

First, all the Kings Messengers by two and two together.

After them the noblemen of lesser note, or Gentlemen by two and two together also.

The Sergeants of the forraigne embassadors, by couples.

The Trumpettors with great noyse founding on both sides.

 The Sergeants at Armes, & the Heralds on both sides.
 The Constable of England, who for that time was the Marquesse Dorset, carried the Sword: on whose right hand went the earle of Warwicke as Chamberlaine of England; and on his left hand the earle of Arundell, supplying the place of earle Marshall.

The Duke of Somerset Protector of the kingdome, went a litle before the king toward the left hand.
 The King himselfe went vnder a Canopy or Thole, borne by sixe Knights, (the footmen going about him) before which, two Gentlemen Vihers went with white Straues.
 Next after came the master of the Horse, with a royall Palitrey richly furnished.
 After came nine Pages of honor (whom we call Hensch-men) bare headed, and mounted vpon great Horses, whom Sir Francis Brian their Captayne followed.
 Then followed the gentlemen of the priuy Chamber.
 The gentlemen Pensioners, with their Polonian Partisans, guarded on both sides from those Courtiers which represented Normandy and Aquitaine, euen to the Guard.
 Then came the Captaine of the Guard, with his band of the Yeomen of the Guard.
 The Seruants of the Noble-men and Gentlemen shut vp the troope, going in order according to the honour and dignitie of their Lords and Masters.
 In this order they came thorough the middle of the City vnto the Pallace at Westminster: The Pageants in the meane time, with diuerse shewes euerly where set forth, and the Orations made, &c. I for breuitie sake purposely omit.
 Vpon Sunday, the twentieth day of February, at nine of the clocke, the King was carried downe the Riuer, from the Pallace vnto the Hall at Westminster, where first in the Chamber of the Court of Augmentation (which now is called the Court of Wardes) he attired himselfe in a Roabe of Purple veluet, with a long trayne, furred with Ermin. His inner Gowne was of the same kind of veluet, furred with Minener, and fringed round about with Gold. These were called Parliament Roabes, but vpon his head he did weare a Cappe of blacke Veluet. The Noble-men in like manner also being attired in their Roabes of honor, attended vpon the Kings Maiestie, from thence to the Marble Chaire set in

in Westminster Hall, and from thence vnto a Royall Throne set vp for him in S. Peters Church at Westminster. But the way whereby he went, was by the Kings Almner all couered with blew Cloth.

And in this order they set forward.

All the Gentlemen went by two & two together.

All the Esquires by two and two also. The Secretaries of the Latine & French tongues.

The Senators or Aldermen of London. The chiefe Porter or Vsher alone.

Three Crosse.

They of the Quier of the Church of Westminster in their Coapes.

The Subdeacon of the Kings Chappell, with the singing men of the same.

Secretary Paget, with the Emperors Ambassadour.

Garter King of Armes, and the Maior of the City of London.

The Earle of Rutland carrying Saint Edwards Spurres, and with him the Earle of Huntingdon, carrying S. Edwards Staffe.

After that, three drawne swords; the first whereof was borne by the Baron of S. John, great Master of the Kings house: the second, by Baron Russell, keeper of the Priuate Seale: the third, which is called Cortaina was carried in the middle betwix the other two, by the earl of Darby.

A Sword was also carried before in the Scabberd vnder drawne, vnto which vpon the left hand was ioyned the Earle of Arundell, as Earle Marshall in stead of the Protector.

The Duke of Somerset Protector of the Kingdome, carried the Crowne, whose right side the Duke of Suffolke with a

At length the Kings Maiesty went vnder a Thole or Canopy, which the Barons of the five Ports (by an ancient right) did beare; supported on the right hand by the Bishop of Durham, and on the left by the Earle of Shrewsbury.

The Earle of Warwicke, as great Chamberlaine of England, held vp the Kings traine: whom the Marques of Northampton assisted on the one side, and Baron Seymour of Sudley, Admirall of England, both of them of the Kings priuy Chamber.

The Gentlemen of the priuy Chamber. The Noblemen of the kingdome, attyred in the Robes of honour, euerly one of them according to his place and ancientesse: whom the Gentlemen Pensioners, the Captaine of the Guard, & the Yeomen of the Guard themselves did follow.

The King in this order being brought to Saint Peters Church, was placed in the Chaire of Saint Edward the King, in the middle of a Throne, seven steppes high. This Throne was erected neere vnto the Altar vpon a Stage, arising with steppes on both sides, couered with Carpets and hangings of Arras. Where, after the King had rested a litle, being by certaine Noble Courtiers carryed in another Chaire vnto the foure sides of the Stage: he was by the Archbishop of Canterbury declared vnto the people (standing round about) both by Gods and Mans Lawes to be the right and lawfull King of England, France, and Ireland; and proclaimed that day to be crowned, consecrated, and anointed. Vnto whom he demanded, whether they would obey and serue, or not? By whom it was againe with a loud cry answered; God save the King: And euer line his Maiesty.

This being done, he was againe placed in the Chaire of the Throne, the Quier singing of an Anthem: The King from thence descending vnto the Altar, there offered his Cloake, and certaine Money, (viz.) XX. Shillings, and afterward lay downe flat before the Altar, the Archbishop saying certaine Prayers; as Deus fidelium, &c. And afterward in formall words, swore an oath vnto the King before fore the people.

There the king being againe prostrate, the Archbishop againe kneeling downe, beganne the Hymne Veni Creator spiritus, &c. and said other Prayers over the King: two other Bishops beginning the Litaney, which at length ended, the King arose and came againe vnto his throne: and from thence was brought to a returning place (commonly called a Transe) where having put off all his former garments, hee was by the Chamberlaine of England apparelled agayne with other, (viz.) a Crimson Coate, open vpon the backe and the breast, the shoulders and the Elbowes, with a linnen Cappe vpon his head, wrought with gold. The Chamberlaine in the meane time, from the Stage proclaimed vnto the people the Kings geard dward.

The King brought back againe out of the Transe vnto the thronce, and from thence vnto the Altar, vnder a cloath of golde (the strings of his Coate and Shirt being opened) was by the Archbishop with formall prayers vnto God, vpon the Palmes of his hands, vpon his breast, betwixt his the shoulders, in the ioynts of his Armes, and Crowne, with hallowed oyle and churline anointed, the Quire in the meane time singing the Anthemie In excelsis Deum, &c.

After this anointing (the oyle being lightly wiped off) the openings of his coate and shirt were agayne by the archbishop closed, who put vpon his hands a paire of Linnen Gloves, and a Linnen Cappe, (brought thither by the great Chamberlaine,) and so brought backe vnto the Transe, was with a Royall Roabe againe reuelled.

At length returning againe vnto the Altar, hee there offered vp the Sward wherewith hee was girt, to be afterwards with five pound in money redeemed. The royall Ornaments were after that consecrated. The King sitting before the Altar, the Archbishop and the Protectour brought vnto him three Crownes.

The first was the Crowne of Saint Edward the King.

The second was the ancient Crowne of the Kings of England.

The third was of all the richest, made for that day, and for that purpose (and fit for the Kings head) which being all by turnes, with the great sounding of Trumpets, and the applause of the People, put vpon his head: the Quire also singing Te Deum laudamus, &c. The Archbishop put a Ring vpon the third finger of the Kings right hand, at which time hee was likewise by the Maister of the Jewells bedecked with Bracelets and other most rich and most precious Jewells.

The Earle of Shrewsbury delivered the Scepter into the Kings hand.

The Archbishop delivered vnto him Saint Edward the Kings hilde Staffe.

The Earle of Rutland offered vnto him a paire of golden Spurs.

The Duke of Suffolke gave vnto him the golden Globe.

The Earle of Oxford delivered him the other Royalties.

Hee in this manner attired with all Royall Ornaments (viz.) apparelled with a royall Roabe, and crowned with a Crowne vpon his head, carrying in his right hand a Scepter, and a golden Globe in his left, being brought vnto the Thronce, hee satte downe in the Chaire of S. Edward the King. Where first the Duke of Somerset Protector of England, vpon his knees in formall words did his due homage and fealty vnto the King and his heires, the kings of England: whom the Archbishoppe of Canterburie followed and kissed the Kings knee. The same againe did all the rest of the Nobility, which could so doe. But such as stood about (and with the shortnesse of the time excluded, could not come ne) the Protectour vpon his knees pronouncing their homage, holding vp their hands, cryed out with loud voyces together, Long live EDWARD the sixth our King.

Divine service at length being done by the Archbishop and two Bishops, the King at the offering time came downe vnto the Altar, where in the pater of S. Edwards Chalice, he offered an hallowed little Crosse or Cruet of Wine, and a pound of gold: and then having bowed downe his head, the Archbishop payde certaine Prayers, and blessed the King, and so returning vnto his Thronce, there kissed the King.

Last of all, hee being brought vnto the Altar, the Archbishop taking the Crowne Crowne from off his head, layde it vpon the Altar. From thence the King going into the Trauers, delivered his royall Ornaments vnto the Deane of Westminster to be layde vpon the Altar: and in his inner purple Gowne (commonly called a Surcoat) furred with Ermins, with a Crowne vpon his head, returning vnto Westminster Hall in the same order wee before saide; staved a while in that chamber (which we call the Court of Wardes) vntill the Tables were royally furnished. The stately furniture of the Hall at that time, the multitude of Tables, the variety of dishes and sauces, and the delicate magnificence of the feast, I willingly passe over.

Yet this it is worthy to remember, that the Earles of Oxford & Huntingdon held water vnto the King, which the Earle of Huntingdon before tasted.

The Earle of Rutland held the Towell.

The Marquesse of Northampton was the Carver, & before tasted the Dishes.

The Earle of Suffex was Sewer of the first course, and placed it vpon the Table.

Before the coming in of the first course, the Marquesse Dorset at that time Constable of England, with a little silver staffe (the signe of his office) and the Earle of Arundell with the rod of the Marshallship, mounted vpon trapped horses, al in cloth of gold came riding into the Hall.

Four swords were all the dinner time carried before the King.

The Ambassadors of forraine Princes, the Bishops and Noble-men, the Maier of the City of London, the Barons of the five Ports, &c. were in their order set at Tables in the same Hall.

After the second course, the kings champion (surnamed Dimock) a knight in complete Armour, mounted vpon a great Horse, couered with a Caparison of cloth of gold, and attended vpon with an Herald in his Coat of Armes, came into the Hall: who euen at the first, with a proud gatewent vnto the King, and with great reuerence made to him his lowe obedience. Afterward praucing his carrying Horse, by a trumpet sounding four times in the Hall, challenged to combate him whosoever he were, that should deny Edward the sixth of that name, to be the true, vndoubted, and lawfull King of England, France, and Ireland. And so often he cast downe his Gantlet vnto the ground, as a pledge of his challenge so made: which when no man would take vp, the Herald delivered it vnto him againe: which done, the King did drinke vnto him in a Cup of gold, which he thankfully accepted, and challenging the Cup due vnto him as his Fee, so departed.

Last of all, Garter king of Armes, with the rest of the heralds, having made thrice obeysance before the King, all (aloud, in formall words proclaimed the kings stile, in Latine, French, and English, in this sort; Largeesse, of the most Soueraigne, and most invincible Prince and King, Edward the sixth, by the grace of God, of England, France, and Ireland King, Defender of the Faith: and of the Church of England and Ireland, next vnder Christ in Earth supreme head: chiefe of the most Noble order and Knight-hood of the Garter. Which same stile, when he had in Latine and French, and so in three other places of the Hall beside repeated, they oftentimes altogether crying our aloud, Largeesse, so departed.

A little before the ende of the Feast, the Maier of London (as the manner is) in a Cup of gold, gave a Cuppe of spiced Wine (which we commonly call Tocras) vnto the King to drinke; which after hee had tasted of, hee gaue the Cup vnto the Maier, as due vnto him for his fee.

The rest of the time was spent in creating of Knights of the Bath, and of other Knights, and in appointing of Luffings & Tiltings: All which, as not appertaining to my purpose, I omit; as also the variety of musique, the diuers kindes of shewes, & other things in number infinite, which wonderfully graced & set forth the magnificence of this coronation: of all which things, let them say more at large, which saw cyther the same, or the pompe of the Coronation of the most Soueraigne Queene Elizabeth, with the wonderful happinesse of her Reigne, and the applause and ioyfulnesse of the people on every side.

Whilt the Offertory is ſinging, the king and queene deſcend from their Throne, and come downe to the Altar. The King maketh his Oblation; fiſt of Bread and Wine: ſecondly, of a marke of gold. The queene after him offereth likewiſe.

After which, the Archbiſhop pronounceth the bleſſing ouer them: that ended, the king and queene are brought back to their chaires hard by the Altar. The Archbiſhop proceedeth with the Communion. After the Archbiſhop hath communicated himſelfe, and thoſe which aſſiſted him, the king and queene come vnto the ſteps of the Altar, there to receiue the holy Sacrament.

The Archbiſhop miniſtred the body, the Abbot the Cup. That done, the king and queene are brought backe to their Throne about the Stages.

There they ſtay till the Communion be ended. After which, they both goe into the Chappell of King Edward the Confeſſor, there they put off the Crownes wherewith they were crowned.

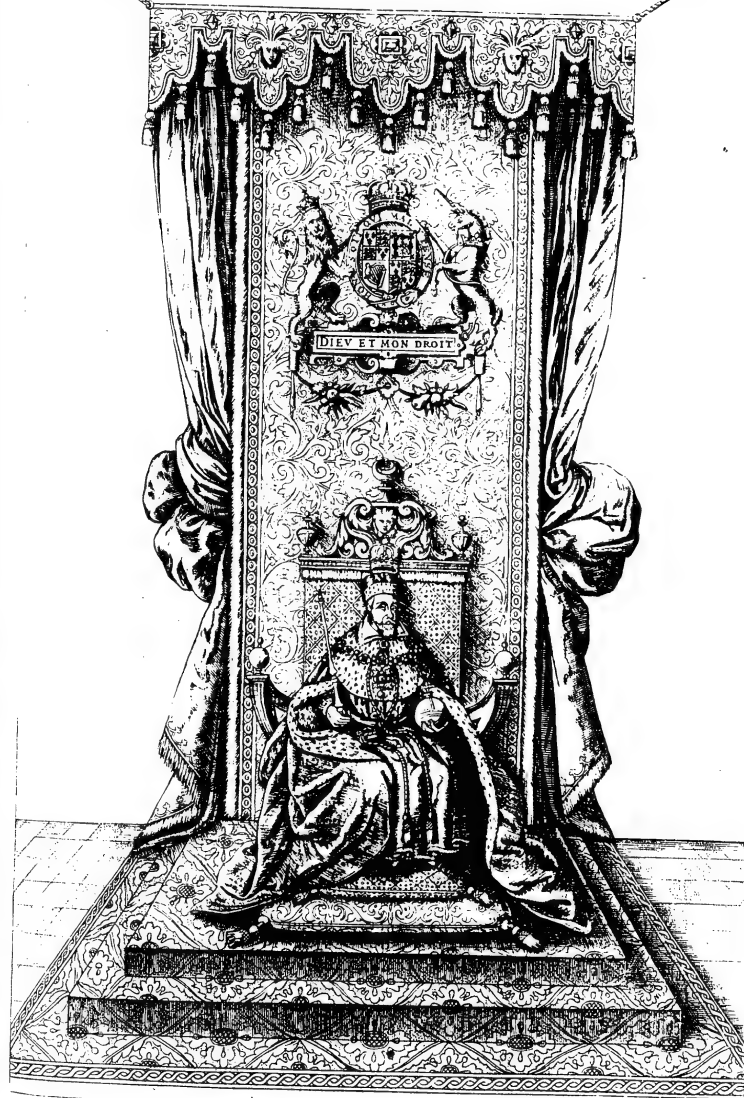

They withdraw themſelues into their Trauers. The King putteth off King Edward's Robes wherewith hee was inueſted.

Hee is arraid with his owne Robes royall, by the great Chamberlaine of England. Then comming forth, the Archbiſhop puts on the king & queenes heads the Imperiall Crowns, which they are to wear. The King taketh S. Edwards Scepter in his hand, and the queene hers. The traine is ſet in order, and they returne the ſame way they came.

After the king and queene returne to the Pallace.

The Scepters are deliuered vnto the Abbot of Westminster, to be kept there among the reſidue of the Regalia.

REGIA MAIESTAS

Huberto I have described what manner of men the named Noblemen haue bene with us. The forme of their Charters and Rescripts I haue set downe, with what Rites and Ceremonies they are after our manner and fashion created: and the Maiestie of the Coronation of the Kings themselves, we haue declared. Here now a great field is opened vnto me to speake of the right of the Nobilitie, and of their Priuiledges; but forasmuch as they rest rather vpon Customs, then vpon positive Lawes, I haue of a set purpose omitted many things, proceeding but so farre as the Statutes of the Kingdome may be my warrant and safety.

CHAP. XX.

A Statute and Act of Parliament, made in the one and thirty yere of Henry the eight, concerning placing of the Lords in the Parliament chamber, and other assemblies and conferences of Councell.

Orsomuch, as in all great Councils and Congregations of men, hauing Degrees and Offices in the commonwealth, it is very requisite and conuenient, that an order should be had and taken for the placing and fitting of such persons as are bound to resort to the same, to the intent that they knowing their places, may vse the same without displeasure or let of the Councell: therefore the Kings most royall Maiestie, although it appertaineth vnto his prerogative Royall, to giue such honour, reputation, and placing to his Counsellors, and other his Subiects, as shall be seeming to his most excellent wisdom, is neuertheless pleased and contented for an order to be had and taken in this his most high Court of Parliament, that it shall be enacted by the authoritie of the same in manner and forme as heereafter followeth.

First, it is enacted by the authoritie aforesaid, that no person or persons of what estate, degree, or condition soeuer he or they be of (except onely the Kings children) shall at any time heereafter attempt or presume, to sit or haue place at any side of the cloth of Estate in the Parliament Chamber, neither on the one hand of the Kings highnes, nor on the other, whether the Kings Maiestie be there personally present, or absent. And forasmuch as the Kings Maiestie is iolly and lawfully Supreme Head in earth vnder God, of the Church of England, and for the good exercise of the said most royall dignitie and office, hath made Thomas Lord Cromwell, and Lord Priuie Seale his Vicegerent, for good and due administration of Iustice, to be had in all causes and cases, touching the Ecclesiasticall Iurisdiction, and for the godly information and redresse of all Errours, Heresies, and abuses in the said Church. It is therefore also enacted by authoritie aforesaid, that he the said Lord Cromwell, hauing the said Office of Vicegerent, and all other persons which heereafter shall haue the said Office of the grant of the Kings highnes, his heires or successours, shall sit and be placed, aswell in this present Parliament, as in all Parliaments to be holden heereafter, on the right side of the Parliament Chamber, and vpon the same forme that the Archbishop of Canterbury sitteth on, and aboute the same Archbishop and his successors, and shall haue voice in every Parliament to assent or dissent, as other the Lords of the Parliament haue.

And it is also enacted, that next vnto the said Vicegerent, shall sit the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, and then next vnto him on the same Forme and side, shall sit the Archbishoppe of Yorke: and next vnto him on the same side, the Bishop of London; and next to him on the same side and Forme, the Bishop of Durham; and next vnto him on the same side and Forme the Bishop of Winchester; and then all the other Bishops of both Prouinces of Canterbury and Yorke, shall sit and be placed on the same side after their ancencies, as it hath bene accustomed.

Chap. 20. XXXI. yere of Henry the eight.

And forasmuch as such other Personages, which now haue, and hereafter shall happen to haue other great Offices of the Realme; that is to say, the Offices of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord President of the Kings most honourable Councell, the Lord priuie Seale, the great Chamberlaine of England, the Marshall of England, the Lord Admirall, the Grand-Master or Lord Steward of the Kings most honourable household, the Kings Chamberlaine and the Kings Secretary, haue not heerebefore bene appointed and ordered for the placing and sitting in the Kings most high Court of Parliament, by reason of their Offices. It is therefore now ordained and enacted by the Authority aforesaid, that the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord President of the Kings Councell, and the Lord Priuie Seale, being of the degree of Barons of the Parliament, or aboute, shall sit and be placed aswell in this present Parliament, as in all other Parliaments hereafter to be holden, on the left side of the Parliament Chamber, on the hither part of the forme of the same side, aboute all Dukes, except onely such as shall happen to be the Kings Sonne, the Kings Brother, the Kings Vnkle, the Kings Nephew, or the Kings Brothers or Sisters sonnes.

And it is also ordained and enacted by authority aforesaid, that the great Chamberlaine, the Constable, the Marshall, the Lord Admirall, the great Master, or Lord Steward, and the Kings Chamberlaine, shall sit and be placed after the Lord priuie Seale, in manner following: that is to say, every one of them shall sit and be placed aboute all other Personages beeing of the same estates or degrees, that they shall happen to be of; that is to say, the great Chamberlaine first; the Constable next; the Marshall third; the Lord Admirall the fourth; the Grand-Master or Lord Steward the fifth; and the Kings Chamberlaine the sixth.

And it is also enacted by authority aforesaid, that the Kings cheefe Secretary being of the degree of a Baron of the Parliament, shall sit and be placed afore and aboute all Barons, nor hauing any of the Offices before mentioned. And if he be a Bishop, that then he shall sit and be placed aboute all other Bishops, nor hauing any of the Offices afore mentioned.

And it is also ordained and enacted by Authority aforesaid, that all Dukes not afore mentioned, Marquesses, Barons, Viscounts, and Barons, not hauing any of the Offices aforesaid, shall sit and be placed after their Ancency, as it hath bene accustomed.

And it is further enacted, that if any person or persons, which at any time hereafter shall happen to haue any of the said Offices of Lord Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, Lord President of the Kings Councell, Lord Priuie Seale, or cheefe Secretary, shall be vnder the degree of a Baron of the Parliament, by reason whereof, they can haue no interest to giue any assent or dissent in the said house, that then in every such case, such of them as shall happen to be vnder the degree of a Baron, shall sit and be placed at the vppermost part of the benches, in the midst of the said Parliament, either there to sit vpon one Forme or vpon the vppermost benches, the one of them aboute the other, in order as is afore rehearsed.

Be it also enacted by Authority aforesaid, that in all trials of treasons by Petres of this Realme, if any of the Petres that shall be called heereafter to be tryers of such treasons, shall happen to haue any of the Offices aforesaid, that then they hauing such Offices, shall sit and be placed according to their Offices, aboute all the other Petres that shall be called to such trials, in manner and forme as is afore mentioned and rehearsed.

And it is also enacted by Authority aforesaid, that as well in all Parliaments, as in the Starre-Chamber, and in all other Assemblies and Conferences of Councell, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord President, the Lord priuie Seale, the great Chamberlaine, the Constable, the Marshall, the Lord Admirall, the Grand-Master, or Lord Steward, the Kings Chamberlaine, and the Kings Secretary shall sit and be placed in such order and fashion, as is afore rehearsed, and not in any other place, by authority of this present Acte.

The Parliamentarie Pompe.

CHAP. XXIII.

(Viz.) The forme and manner of the going of the States vnto the Parliament, seriously collected out of diuers examples. Wherein I thought good, especially to propound that most stately going of Queene Elizabeth, in the xxij. yeare of her reigne.

On Sunday (the xxij. day of November) in the Chamber of Prefence (as they doe terme it) it was proclaimed that the Noble-men and States, and to all others which were bound to attend vpon the Queenes Maestie, the next day to be holden at Westminster, should bee ready at nine of the clocke before noone, to giue their attendance, the Queene then lying in her royall house called Saint James, neare vnto Westminster. The next day at the appointed houre, the Noblemen put on their Parliament Robes in the Countsell chamber, and the Bishops theirs likewise, in another chamber next vnto the chappell: from thence they, by the Garden going into the Parke, mounted on horse-backe, attended the coming forth of the Queene. About eleuen of the clocke the most gracious Queene, attired also in a Parliament Roabe, at the going out of the Garden, mounted in a Chaire of Estate, like vnto a Chariot or Horfletter, carried betwixt two white Horses. This Chaire was on enery side open, but that behind a couering hanging forth aboue, semicircle-wise, was with two hile pillars of Silver supported: vpon the top whereof, stood on high a Crowne of golde: and vpon two other pillars at her teetes, stood a Lyon and a Dragon glistring with golde, made with wonderful cunning, supporting the Queenes Armes. This Chaire (which I might rather call a Throne) being altogether cunningly garnished and gilt, was most magnificently bedeckt with cloth of Silver (as they call it) and with Cushions of the same. Wherein, as in that the Queene had placed herselfe: directly two and two in this order set forward.

First went the Maitrises or Mellengers of the Kings Court.

Afterward the Gentlemen of last note. Squiers.

Henry Erle of Kent, went in another place because he carried the Sword.

George Earle of Shrewsbury, was absent being sicke.

Henry Earle of Northumberland, Then prisoner in the tower of London.

Edward Earle of Oxford, went in another place, because he was high Chamberlaine of England.

Phillip Earle of Arundell.

An Herald or King of Armes.

William Marquesse of Winchester: Hee in another place carried the Cap royall.

Heere were places fit for Dukes: all whose parliament robes (a thing worth the noting) differed nothing from the Barons, but that they wore the guardes vpon their shoulders, three or foure fold. For although all Dukes, Marquesses, and Earles, in their creations are attired with garments of Silke and Veluet, which are called Roabes or garments of Honour: yet in Parliaments they vse the same that Barons doe, made of Skarlet, with certayne differences of white Furze, for as fringes or edgings on their shoulders: for that there they al sit by reason of their Baronies, and according to their dignitie take their places.

Thomas Bramley Knight Chancellour of England; with William Cicill Baron of Burghley ridde together. But the great Seale of England, was by one footman carried before the Chancellour: but hee himselfe was attired in a Gowne of black Veluet lined with Sables.

John Whitgift also, Arch-bishoppe of Canterbury: with Edwin Sands Arch-bishop of Torke followed next after them.

Clarenceux King of Armes.

Two Sergeants at Armes with silver scepters, which we call Maces, gilt.

Garter chiefe King at Armes, in his Heralds coate, hauing the chiefe gentleman vther on his right hand.

The Marques of Winchester did beare the Cap royall, vpon whose left hand the Earle of Worcester carried the Rod of the Marshallship of England, in stead of George Earle of Shrewsbury, then earle Marshall, who was then in the Parliament Chamber, although he was not heere present, for that he was sicke of the Gout.

The Earle of Kent after them carried the sword, on whose right hand went the earle of Oxford, then great Chamberlaine of England, and on his left hand the Earle of Leicester, Seneschall, or Steward of the queenes house.

The queenes Maiesty carried in a chaire as we haue before said. She her selfe decked vp in a purple Robe, furred with Ermine. But her inner Garment was of purple veluet also, more straighter vnto her body, turned vp at the hand, with the same furre.

Foure Quiries of the Stable (whom in French they call Esquires) and the Footmen in their rich Coates were attendant about the queene: and without them all along in a ranke, waited the Gentlemen Pensioners with their Partisans.

After them followed the Earle of Darbie, Master of the Horse (instead of the Earle of Leicester, who at this time supplied the place of the Steward) leading a spare horse of state: by whom on the left hand rode Charles Howard, Baron of Effingham, Chamberlaine of the queenes house, both of them attired in their Parliament Robes.

After these followed also Christopher Hatton, Knight Vice-Chamberlaine, with many Noble women, Ladies, and other Noble Courtiers.

In this order and Royall pompe, the queene came vnto the South gate of S. Peters Church at Westminster, where the Bishop of Sarisbury, the Kings Almoner, and Doctor Goodman Deane of that Church, with the Prebendaries, and all the quier receiued Her in their Coapes. Without the Porch was set a Forme, furnished with Carpets and Cushions, at which the queene vpon her knees, receiued of the Deane the golden Scepter of S. Edward, which he layde vpon the Cushion before her: and hauing receiued a little Booke of the Deane, vnto her selfe softly prayed. Afterward she came into the Church, vnder a stately Canopy of Cloth of Silver, which fixe Knights supported.

The Marchionesse of Northampton, and the countesse of Oxford bare vp the train: Baron Howard of Effingham being Chamberlaine supporting her: Christopher Hatton Vice-Chamberlaine going on the other side, but not supporting her. But forasmuch forasmuch as the Queenes robes made of rich silke and Ermine, were too weighty and chargeable for her well to beare, the Earle of Arundell on the right hand, and the Earle of Penbrooke on the left, held them vp from her shoulders.

Before the Lord Chancellour and the Lord Treasurer, went the singing men and Quiristers, singing of Psalmes, and when the Queene was now come vnto the royall withdrawing or retyring place (commonly called the Trauerse) prepared for them vpon the right hand of the Quier, neare vnto the Communion Table: the Noble-men tooke their places vpon Formes, beneath the Trauerse, but the Bishops fate themselves downe beneath the Pulpit, on the north side of the Quier.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, after a psalme sung, made a sermon, the sword and cap of Honour beeing in the meane time borne before him.

The sermon with a psalme ended, the Queene on foote vnder a Canopy, went vnto the south gate of the Church, carrying in her hand the Scepter, dedicated to King Edward the Confessor. In which place, these restord it vnto the Deane of Westminster, of whom shee had before receiued it, to be againe layd vp.

It is worthy note, that whilst the Queenes Maiesty was hearing diuine seruice in the Church, the Earle of Leicester (for that time Steward of the Queenes house) went vnto the Lower Parliament house, to be there present at the answer of the Rescripts, (which our Lawyers call the Returne of the Vittes) before sent forth for the summoning of the knights of the shires, and for the Burgeses of the townes thither, and met the Queene coming vnto the vpper Parliament house.

The Queene being come thither, first retired her selfe into her owne priue Chamber, where resting her selfe a little, the Noble-men in the meane while, had in due order placed themselves in the vpper house: and at length the Queene her selfe came forth, the Sword, the Cappe, and the Rod of the Marshallship of England being borne before her, and the other Officers going before her, shee went vp into the Royall Throne, the Nobilitie of the Kingdome sitting downe about her.

In the middle of the vpper house lie great Sackes of cloth filled with wooll: vpon the vppermost whereof sitteth the Chancellour, and vpon those which lie towards the sides of the house, sit the Maister of the Rolles, the Queenes Secretary, the Judges, the Barons of the Exchequer, and certayne Lawyers, aswell Ciuitians as Common Lawyers. Vpon the lowest of all, sitteth the Clarke of the Parliament house, with the Clarke of the Crowne, behinde whom the other Clarks write, resting vpon their knees.

When the Queene was set, and that they of the neather house (viz. the Knights of the Shires, and the Burgeses of the Cities) were let in, the commanded the Lord Chancellour, standing on the right hand by her, to make his Oration: who turning himselfe vnto the Nobilitie, and the rest there present, declared vnto them, in her Maiesties name, that this assembly of Parliament to be for three causes called (viz.) For the glorie of Almighty God, and the furthering of true Religion: For the health and preservation of her royall Maiesty, and the welfare of the Common-weale. Which after that hee had aloude and most eloquently at large declared, turning his speech vnto the Knights and Burgeses, standing on an heape together below: hee willed them to make choyse of their Prolocutor, and to giue notice of him so chosen, to the Lordes of the Priuy Counsell from whom they should expect what the Queens pleasure and answer was concerning him so chosen, to be afterward presented.

When the Chancellour had ended his speech, the Clarke of the Parliament rising vp in French, and with a loud voice proclaimed the names of them, which as Delegates had the power within certain dayes to understand of the affaires aswell of the Kingdomes of England, France, Scotland, and Ireland, as of the Dukedoms of Normandie and Aquitaine; and to heare and examine the requests and petitions of them of the islands and parties beyond the Seas.

Which things being done, the Chancellour prorogued the Parliament, the Queene descending from her Throne, and retiring into her Priue Chamber, there put off her parliament robes: which when when the Barons had in like manner also done, they in order (with the Sword, the Cappe of Honour, and the Rod of the Marthallship carried before her) attended her vnto her Barge, wherein shee from thence was downe the Riuer carried backe vnto her Pallace (called White Hall;) through which she passed into the Parke, where she mounting vpon a most couragious Horse, the Nobility, States, and most honourable men and women attending her, shee happily returned vnto her Pallace of S. James, from whence she before came.

Vpon Thursday following, the day appointed for the presenting of the Prolocutour, the Queene about three of the clocke in the after noone, by the Parke came from her royall house of S. James, vnto her pallace of White Hall; and when she had in her Chamber put on her Parliament robes, she went to her Throne, the Sword, the Cappe, and the Rodde of the Marthallship, being after the wonted manner carried before her: The Lord Chamberlaine going on the right hand of the Sword, and the Lord Steward on the left, with the Lord Treasurer, Garter, the Vishers, & the Sergeants at Armes going before them. At length, when the Noble men were set downe, the Chancellour on the right hand, and the high Treasurer of England on the left hand, stood beside the Queene without the barres.

Then at length, the Knights of the Shires, and the Burgesses of the Cities being admitted in, brought in their most learned Lawyer (viz.) John Puckering, who standing at the barre, and hauing thrice made most lowe obeisance, sayd what he might, to shew himselfe vnfit to vnder-take so great a burthen, requesting most earnestly, that they would make choice of another Prolocutor, vnto whom the Queene by the Chancellour made answer, That shee liked exceeding well of the choice of him already made, and that she ratified the same.

Which done, the Prolocutor framed himselfe to another manner of speech, wherein hee particularly rehearsed what great benefits were redounded vnto the Commonweale, by the most wise gouernement of her royall Maiestie: he declared her singular vertues, her very naturall and motherly care ouer her Subjects: But especially in that she had then called together the Estates of the Kingdome, there to consult and consider of the most weightiest affaires of the Common-weale, earnestly admonishing the Bishops to provide for the Ecclesiasticall and Church matters: the Nobilitie and the rest to bee carefull of the profite and welfare of the Common-weale. In the conclusion of his speech, he most humbly requested, that the auncient Rights and Priuiledges of the Lower house of the Burgesses, (viz.) of freely deliuering of their speech and minds, and of being free from Arrests, as well themselves as their Seruants, during the time of the parliament, might be kept whole and vntouched. And if that in any thing not well by them vnderstoode, they should happen to offend, he requested leaue aswell for himselfe as for the rest, to haue access vnto her royall Maiestie.

His Oration at length ended, the Chancellour, by the Queene commanded, and in some poynts, by her instructed, highly commended the Prolocutors Oration, and in the Queenes name graunted the leaue he had requested.

Which things being so on both sides dispatched, the Queene rose and retired herselfe into her private Chamber, put off her Parliament robes, and so attended vpon with the Nobilitie, came downe: and at the West side of the Parliament house, mounted into her chaire of Estate, a very royall one; and from thence with a great traine of Noblemen and honorable Ladies attending her (the Earle of Kent carrying the Sword before her) shee by Torch-light through the Parke, returned vnto her Pallace of Saint James, from whence she before came.

The manner of sitting in the Upper house of Parliament, is in this Platforme following in the next Page, most truly and lively described.

CHAP. XXII.

The manner of restoring of renewed Nobilitie before lost.

HE maners and formes of creating of Noblemen, with their Rites and Ceremonies, by Charters and Rescripts, or Writs of summons, we have before described. Now heere at length I have thought it good, to ioine heereunto the manner of restoring of dignities & honours before lost. Such as have by their owne or others fault, lost their honorable stiles and titles, are wont to bee vnto the same by petitions, exhibited vnto the Kings in full Parliament restored: which I would say, to be a confirmation of renewed or restored Nobility. Whereof the request of Margret, daughter to George Duke of Clarence, in Parliament, in the first yeare of King Henry the eight, (to omit others) may serue for an example. Whereby she is restored vnto the Stile, State, Name, Title, Honour, and Dignity of the Countesse of Sarisbury, fro which Edward her Brother Earle thereof, had by his guilt fallen. The Petition it selfe is longer then is necessary to be heere inserted. It is in English extant in the Records, & is shut vp with these words.

Which petition being read, and to the full vnderstood, and consented vnto by our said Lord the King, by the aduice and assent of the Lords spirituall and temporall, and of the Comynalty in the aforesaid Parliament being: and also by the Authority of the same Parliament, it was vnto the same Petition thus answered.

*Sic sit facte come il est desire.
Be it done according as it is requested.*

CHAP. XXIII.

Customes.

Haue said Politically Nobility, shall subiect vnto the dispositions of Princes, and change of time; to rest alwayes vpon the customes of Nations.

For first of all, it is manifest, dignities which were but the bare names of personal Offices, to haue at length become hereditary and successory: and yet with diuers Lawes circumscribed.

For although women in Germany born of Dukes, Earles, or Barons, are according to the manner of the Empire styled and called Dutcheffes, Countesses, and Baronesses; yet by the Law of the Imperiall grant, the Principalities themselves, with the Fees thereto belonging, descend vnto the Males onely, who sayling, they reuert vnto the Emperour. Which thing, the most great Dukedome Carinthia, prooueth to be so. For Ericus the last Duke being dead without heires male, the dukedome by the Lawes returned againe vnto the Empire: which Lewes the Emperour afterward bestowed vpon Albert Duke of Austria.

Sigismund the Emperour also, the right line of the dukes of Saxony being extinct, gaue the dukedome in the yeare 1423. vnto the Marquesses of Bismia; and the Marquisat of Brandenburg, vnto the Burgraues of Noriburge: whose successors enioy now at this day enioy the same.

The same we reade to haue beene done in Italy: For Venceslaus the Emperour in the yeare 1490. graced the Vice-county of Milaine with the Title of a Dukedome: but so as that for want of heires male, it should together with that Dignitie, bee made a part of the Imperiall patronony. And in the remembrance of our Grandfathers, we reade of certayne (as well at Naples as else-where,) to haue bene by the Emperour Charles the fifth created; but yet alwayes with that common Lawe of Reuerſion, that so soone as the last of the male descent should dye, they should be made Imperiall dignities. Yet heere by the way we must remember, that the Emperours did not at all times doe all things according to the vttermost of the greatesse of their power; but sometime by a new beneficiary or bountifull covenant, being requested so to doe, suffered those titles of honours to descend vnto the daughters (no heires male remaining) mitigating the extremity of the law, by wise mens interpretations thereof, regard being still had, eyther of the Commonweale, or of some former agreement, or of the time present.

In France, Rennatus Choppinus, disputing of the Royall Demaine, maketh a distinction of dignities. For he affirmeth all Military and masculine dignities, by the Law Salique to be annexed vnto the Fees Royall, neyther by any meanes, by meere Law, to come vnto the Women, although that the heyres male faile; except by speciall and expresse words it bee before otherwise provided: which hee saith, himselfe to haue seene and read. Yet in the meane time he affirmeth, private Principalties not to be denied to women: which hee manifesteth by the example of the County of Arminack by a womans right deuolued vnto the King of Nauarre, as by many others also.

And to mee, now writing and running ouer some few things concerning our owne affaires, it fortuned a certaine most ancient writing to come vnto my hands, taken out of the ancient Saxon Lawes, and lent me by William Lambert, a great admirer of reuerend antiquity, and a most earnest restorer thereof. Which writing, although that both in tongue and character it meere found Saxon like, yet seemeth it in some things, to fauour of the Danish maters, as also of the ancient lawes eyther of the Britons themselves, or of the Saxons, shaken and rent in sunder, vnder the rule and government of the Franes.

But the writing it selfe written in the Saxon tongue, translated into English, word for word, & into Latine, according vnto the true sense and meaning thereof, here following is contained.

These

The name of a Baron from whence and when it came into England.

These ruines or rubbishes of antiquity,
make shew of a perpetuity of Nobility, euen from the beginning of this lland, but times are changed, and we in them also.
For King Edward the Confessor, last of the Saxon blood, coming out of Normandy, bringing then in the Title of a Baron, the Thynes from that time began to grow out of vs; so that at this day men remember not so much as the names of them.
And at length, that name of Baronage began to be both in dignity and power to magnificent about the rest, as that in the name of the Baronage of England, all the Nobility of the Land seemed to be com-prehended. As for Dukes, they were (as it were) fetcht from long exile, and againe renewed by King Edward the third. And Marquesses & Vicounts, were altogether newly brought in by King Richard the second, and King Henry the first.

But our Kings descended of the Norman blood, together with the Crowne of the Kingdom, granted an hereditary & successory perpetuity vnto honourable titles, such I meane as are the Titles of Earl-domes and Baronies) without any difference of sex at all. Which thing I thought good to make manifest, by the examples of the more ancient times. In the reckoning vp whereof that I may the better acquit and discharge my selfe; in the very entrance of my speech, there be 3 things, whereof I would haue the Reader by the way, to be especially forewarned. First, concerning the disposition and inclination of our Kings, in the creating of the nobility. Secondly, of the custome of transferring of honours and dignities by Families. And thirdly, of the force of time, & the change and alteration of things. For why, our Kings (who only and alone, doe in their kingdom beare the absolute rule and sway) are with vs efficient causes of all Politicall Nobility. The Titles of Named Nobility, by our custome, haue this naturall and common together with the Crowne it selfe, that the heyres male sayling, they deuolue vnto the Women, except in the first Charters it be by expresse words otherwise provided; and yet so, as that regard is alwayes to bee had of the time, which is euery where wont to beare sway in the formality of things.

In this manner William the first, King and Conqueror, Harold being overcome, hauing obtained the Soueraignty, according to his pleasure bestowed dignities & honors vpon his companions and others, (viz.) some of them so annexed and comioyned vnto the Fees themselves, as that euery yet at this day, the possessors thereof, may seeme to be ennobled, euery with the possession of the places onely. As our Bishops at this day, as also certaine ecclesiasticall Abbots and Priors; who by reason of the Baronies ioyned vnto their Bishoppricks, enjoy the titles and preeminence of Barons in the highest assemblies of the kingdom in Parliament. Othertyme of the dignities and honors, he gaue and granted also, together with the lands and fees themselves. As he gaue to Hugh Lupus his kinsman and a Norman, the earl-dome of Chester. Ad Conquirendum & tenendum sibi & heredibus, adeo libere per gladium sicut ipse Rex tenait Angliam per Coronam. To conquer and hold it to him and his heyres, as freely by the Sword, as the King himselfe helde England by the Crowne. With the Earldome of Richmond hee graced Alanus Rufus, his Ne-pew, and then Earle of Britaine in France and his heyres: Ita libere & honorifice ut eundem Edmuns Comes antea tenuerat: so freely and honorably as Earle Edmun had before holden the same. And the Earl-dome of Arundel, which Harold possessed, he granted with a fee vnto Roger of Montgomery. The first two of which honors (the heyres male sayling) by women either ones passed into other Families, but the latter Earldome, Robert the Sonne of Roger being attainted of treason, returned vnto King Henry the first, who gaue

the same in dowry vnto Queene Adeliza his Wife.

The succeeding Kings more sparingly, bestowed such dignities to bee holden of them in Fee, granting only for the better and more honourable maintenance of their stocke and honour, the third part of the Pleas of the County (as they terme
it) which they in their Charters called Tertium Denarium, or the third penny. So that hee which receiued the third penny of any Prouince, he the same man by the same ancient Law of succession, was called Earle of the same Prouince: and so by custome the women, the heyres male sayling.

And if any Earle or Baron dying without Sonne, had many women his heires, howsoever order was, either by covenant, or by way of partition taken, concerning the Lands and possessions, according to the common Lawes of the kingdome, yet the dignity and honour, a thing of it selfe indisuisable, was full left to be disposed of, according to the Kings pleasure. Who in bestowing thereof, for the most part respected the prerogative of birth.

By which right, King Henry the third, after the death of John the Scot, dead without issue (other lands and reuenues being by agreement giuen vnto his three Sisters) vnto the Earldome of Chelster, with the honor thereof vnto the Crown. This is also manifest in the Earldome of Arundell: which (after Robert of Belisime, Sonneto the afore said Roger of Montgomery, driuen out by Henry the first) King Henry the second bestowed vpon William of Albini, Queene Adeliza his Mothers Husband, and by a new Charter, confirmed it in Fee, together with the inheritance to him and his heires, with the third penny of the Pleas of Suffex, whereof he created him Earle. But Hugh the great, Nephew of this William the first, being dead without issue, all the inheritance of the Earldome was diuided among his foure Sisters. Whose dignity and honour for all that, together with the Castle of Arundel, was by Edward the first, at length giuen to Richard Fitz-Alan (viz.) the Nephewes Sonne to John Fitz-Alan and Isabel, the second of the afore said Sisters.

Now let vs passe from Henry the third, vnto Edward the first his Sonne. When as for a time a great dissention was betwixt him and certaine of his Nobility (viz.) Gilbert of Clare Earle of Hertford and of Gloucester: Humfrey of Bohun, earle of Hertford and Suffex, and Constable of England, and Roger Bigod Earle of Norfolke, Marshall of the kingdome, and that all those Noble-men, at length had lost their Earldomes and Offices, they being reconciled vnto the King, afterward by new Charters received the same againe in this manner.

The first of them, received the same vnto himselfe & Joane the same kings daughter his second wife, for tearme of both their liues, and to the Children to bee by them two begotten (his two Daughters by his first wife being excluded.) This Joane (called Joane of Acon) bare vnto her husband Gilbert, a Sonne called also Gilbert; but shee the second time, secretly married vnto one Radulph, of Mont Hermer (without the King her Fathers knowledge) in her owne right, made also the same Radulph Earle so long as shee liued. But the at length being dead, Gilbert her sonne, by the afore said Gilbert, succeeded againe into the Earldome, Radulph his Father in Law being yet aliue. In the very same manner he restored the Earldoms and Office of Constableship vnto the afore said Humfrey of Bohun, vnto whom also he gaue in marriage Elizabeth, another of his Daughters, widdow to John Earle of Holland: and vnto the third, he restored the Earldome of Norfolke, and the office of the Marescall, with a yearly encrease of a thousand Markes; yet vpon condition, that the heires male of his body to be begotten, sayling, both of them should returne againe vnto the King. At length, this Roger dyed without issue, in the xxxv. year of him the said Edward the first viz. in the last yeare of his reigne: and King Edward his Son, the second of that name, by a new Creation & Charter, gaue the Earldome and the Marshallship vnto Thomas of Brotherton his Brother, and his heires male.

These things wee haue thus propounded, thereby to shew, how according to the diuers dispositions of Princes, & changes of times, it hath by little and little varied in the first bestowing of dignities and honours. Of which thing (that new Law) and to them of ancient time vnknewne, made by King Edward the first himselfe, seemeth afterward to haue bene of no small weight and moment, whereby, hee fauouring certaine priuate men, more carefull of their owne surname, then of their posterity, it was thought vnto him good, & so decreed, to make Fees to belong to men only. That law I say, which I would in Latine call Genitilium Municipale, & which the Lawyers commonly call lex Tallatium, and Tallabile: or the Law of cutting off: for that it cutteth off successions before generally, and restraineth them vnto the particular heyres of Families: which seemeth also to haue giuen an occasion of change in the giuing and bestowing of dignities and honors.

For euer since that time, in the creating of any new Earle, it is begonne to be altogether by expresse words in all Charters provided, that it shall bee but for terme of life onely, or descend vnto the heires males alone, the Women being quite excluded. And this I need not by examples to prouee; for why, the thing it selfe proueth the same. But the force and efficacy of this Lawe of Entaile, (or of cutting off) I haue thought good thus in few words to declare.

The Lands and Fees of the earledome of Oxford (Robert Earle of Oxford and Duke of Ireland, being condemed of treason) by that Law came to Albericus Vere vncle to Robert, who therefore in Parliament, requested of the King, the Title of the Earledome also, and obtained the same. This is also most manifest, by the example of the Earldomes of Arundell and of Surrey, ioyned together in the family of Fitz-Alan. For Edmund Fitz-Alan Earle of Arundell, married the onely sister and heire of Earle Richard, and of her begot Richard, happy with his twice marriage. Vnto this Richard, the sonne of Edmund, and his heires male by Alenor of Lancaster (his second wife) begotten, and to be begotten, the Castle, Honour, and Lordship of Arundell were entailed in the one and twentieth yeare of Edward the third. And afterward (viz.) the same yere, Earle John his brother being dead without issue, enriched also with the encrease of the Earledome of Surrey, he was called Earle of Arundell and Surrey. Of Alenor Richard begot a sonne, called Richard, at length Earle of Arundell and Surrey also: and John Fitz-Alan his second sonne, in the right of his wife, called Baron Maltreuers. This Richard had Thomas, his onely Sonne, dead without issue; and foure Daughters his Co-heires (viz.) Elizabeth, Joane, Margaret, and Alice, who diuided the Earledome of Surrey amongst them. Howbeit the dignity therof was granted to John Mowbray duke of Suffolke, begotten of Elizabeth the eldest sister; who by the ancient custome of Succession challenged vnto himselfe the Earledome of Arundell also. But John Baron of Maltreuers, Nephew to the first John Fitz-Alan, and Baron of Maltreuers, by his sonne John opposed himselfe against this man, and withstood him, challenging vnto himselfe the possession of that caitle and demaine of Arundell, as fallen vnto him by the good right of the Law of Entaile.

For Thomas the last Earle being dead without issue (as is afore said, he alleged the demaine of the Castle nor to belong vnto the Sisters, but to descend vnto his heires male and kinsmen, of whom hee himselfe was nearest of kinne vnto the said Earle Thomas: of which Fee, seeing by Law he held the possession, he affirmed the Title of honour and dignitie more sily to agree vnto himselfe then to lie in vaine, and to no purpose hidden in the Duke himselfe. Which thing, although hee could not obayne, yet John his sonne, a most famous warrior, after the death of his Father, with the applause and good liking of all men, obtained by Acte of parliament, in the eleuenth yeare of King Henry the sixth. Of whom also, for his great deserts and most noble vertues, he was the yeare after, rewarded with the dukedome of Thurania in France. And this John, both Earle and Duke, being dead, Humphrey his son, in short time after dead without issue (notwithstanding his sister) left the earledome of Arundell entailed vnto William his vncle, in whom afterward it took such root, as that we haue seene it in the male line, to haue brought forth most famous and renowned Earles, euen vnto this our age.

And what wee haue sayd concerning Earles, the same be it said also of Barons created by Charters. But in Barons created by Relcripts or Writs of Summons yet resting vpon most auncient custome, not so.

For in them (one onely excepted, sent forth to Henry Bromflet, wherein it was provided him, that same Henry and his heires male of his body lawfully begotten, only to be Barons of Fe/ty) women, the heires male failings, were not in ancient time forbidden or embarred, but that they might be accounted, and by name siled honourable, with the preeminence of the dignity and calling of Barons. And after they had borne a Childe, according to the auncient fauour of our Lawes, and the reuerend custome of the Kingdome, graced their husbands also with the same honour; & with the same by inheritance ennobled ennobled their children; yea, even without the possession of those places, from whence the names of such dignities and honours may seeme first to haue risen. For Fees and locall possessions, circumscribed by the Lawe, are translated and carried from one family to an other, and vsually enrich their Lords and owners the possessours thereof: but yet of themselves, neyther bring nor take away Nobilitie, either Dative or Native. By Examples to manifest these things were but needelesse; for why, all the most auncient Baronies, and the more auncient sort of the Barons at this day, are in this poynt on my side, and giue voices with me. Now, if any man studious of these things, by chance meeting with some things of other nature, shall more curiously dispute against these matters, vnto him I would oppose, eyther the force of time, or the carelesnesse and lacke of looking vnto. But, Customes are still like themselves, neyther are we to detract from the authoritie of Kings, who although they haue such supereminence, and vnderminate prerogative, as that they may seeme sometimes to haue of fauour graunted, some things beside the Lawes; yet shall it not appeare them requested, to haue done, or yet suffered any thing to be done, contrarie vnto the Customes of Stockes and Families. So they sometime not regarding the solemnities of Ceremonies and Charters, haue onely by their becke (that I may so say) suffered dignities and honours to be transferred, as in Ranulph Blundeuill, Earle of Chester, and of Lincolne to be scene. For the Earledome of Chester, he permitted after the manner, to descend to John the Scot his Nephew, by Maud the eldest of his Sisters. But the Earledome of Lincolne, (the King thereunto consenting) hee yet aliae deliuered vnto Hawisia another of his Sisters, now married to Robert Quincy, by his deede, in the fuenteenth year of the reigne of King Henrie the third, in these words following.

Ranulphus Earle of Lincolne, vnto all men present, and to come, which shall see this present Writing, greeting. I would haue it to come vnto the generall knowledge of you all, mee to haue giuen and graunted, and by this my present writing, to haue confirmed to the Lady Hawisia of Quincy, my most deare Sister, the Earledome of Lincolne, (viz.) as farre forth as it vnto mee belonged, so that the may thereof be Countesse. To haue and to hold the same of my Lord the King of Englan, and his heires, vnto the said Hawisia and her heires, freely, quietly, fully, peaceably, and wholly by right of inheritance, with all the appuriances, and liberties vnto the aforesaid Earledome belonging. And that this present Writing may stand in force for ever, I haue thought it good to frame and strengthen the same, by the setting of of my Seale. These being witnesses.

Hawisa with this her brothers writing in this manner endowed, was forthwith Countesse of Lincolne, who yet liuing, presently gaue the same to John Laide her sonne in lawe. So also I may not passe ouer Hugh Courtney the first of that family and name, in the time of King Edward the third: for he, when hee had for many yeares after the death of Isabell de Fortibus (whose sole heire hee was) quietly possessed the lands and Fees of the earledome of Denfbire, without eyther the Title or Inuestiture of an Earle, and that at length contention arose betwixt him and the Kings officers of the Exchequer, for the repayment of the third penny, for that hee as yet vsed not the Stile of an Earle, hee hauing written Letters supplicatorie vnto the King, then busied in the warres in Scotland, receiued answer; That taking vnto himselfe the Name and Dignitie of an Earle, hee should cause himselfe, from that time forward, to be named and called Earle of Denfbire, in these words.

The King to his welbeloued and faithfull, Hugh of Courtney the Elder, &c. Greeting, &c. Whereas you, as appeareth by your Petition exhibited before vs and our Councell, haue of long bene sued for the repayment of eightene pounds, sixe shillings and eight pence, of the yearly Fee of the Earledome of Denfbire, which Isabell de Fortibus, late Countesse of Denfbire, whose heire you are, and the heires of her the said Countesse, and yours, Earles of Denfbire, yearly yearly receiued by the hands of the Sherifes of that Countie that were for the time being, and which you likewise after the death of the aforesaid Countesse, as her heire for a certaine time receiued: And for that they haue bene from you detained, because you haue in no wife named and tiled your selfe an Earle: as by the Certificate of the Treasurer, and of the Barons of our Exchequer, by our commandement made in to our Chancerie, more at large doth appeare. Wee, for that the inheritance which was the aforesaid Countesses, and the inheritance of her Predecessours, and yours, the Earles of Denfbire, vnto you descended by hereditary right, and that you at this present hold the same inheritance; willing in this part to prouide, as well for our owne Dignitie, and the equitie of our Kingdome, as for your honour: will and command you, in requesting you, that in taking vnto you the name and honour of an Earle, you from henceforth cause your selfe to be called Earle of Denfbire, knowing that wee will make the aforesaid Fee to be yearly paid vnto you, as it hath bene wont to be paid vnto the Earles of Denfbire your Predecessours. Witnesse the King at New-castle vpon Tine, the two and twentieth day of February, & in the ninth yeare of our reigne.

Last of all, we haue scene this same not long since, in Phillip Howard confirmed. For hee, after the most auncient right of the Earledome of Arundell, tooke vnto himselfe the Title of Arundell, the Queene onely consenting therunto, and approving the same; no forme of Charter repeated, or of any forme of his Creation being therunto ioyned.

Whereto it seemeth also to appertain, that our most auncient Earles were of auncient time wont (according to the diuersitie of the places) where they for the most part chose to dwell, to be called by diuerse Titles of Dignities. For Reynold who was Earle of Conuall, for his continuall dwelling at Frislon, was oftentimes called Earle of Erison.

Robert of Ferrars the younger, Earle of Ferrars in Normantie, and of Derbie in Englan, sometime wrote himselfe Earle of Tutbury, a Castle (vide licet) in the Borders of Staffordshire built by his Progenitors. Baldwine and Richard of Ricars, were sometime called Earles of Exeter, and sometimes Lords of the Ile of Wight, for their continuall dwelling in the same places; when as yet in the meane time, they were both Earles of Denfbire. William also of Albiniac, Earle of Arundell and Suffex, the first of that name, in the Letters of agreement betwixt king Stephen and king Henrie the second, set himselfe thereto a Witnes, by the name of William Earle of Cirester, for that he there oftentimes dwelt. Adde heereunto also if you please, the Earle of Penbrooke to haue bene called the Earle of Strigulia, of the Castle of Strigulia, built by William Fitz-Osborne Earle of Hersford, and the Seate of the Earles of Penbrooke.

These things (I say) were of olde and in auncient time, but now at this day, not so. For such is the force of time, and change in altering of the forms of things, as that it eating out of the olde, bringeth still in new. So vnto Earles, whom we said in auncient time to haue bene rewarded with the third penny of the Province whereof they were earles, to maintain their Honour and Dignitie, a certaine summe of money is at this day yearly payed them out of the Exchequer, and they enjoy the Titles of such places, as wherein they haue not any iurisdiction, administration, or profite at all. Barons also, who as the Fathers and Senators in auncient time among the Romans, were chosen by their Seueritas; were in like manner wont to be esteemed and valued by Knights Fees (for why, hee which had and possessed threene Knights fees, and a little more, was then to be accounted among the Barons) are now, more sildome times chosen for their vertue, their great wealth, and large possessions.

Neither is there any let, but that a man may hold and still retaine the name and Title of a Barony, the head of which Barony (as they tearme it) he hath afterwards sold or alienated to some other common person.

In briefe, our Kinges royall maiesty is alwayes like it selfe, constant, and the same; which hauing regard to the vertue, stock, wealth, wealth, and substance of any man (whereby hee may with his Councellor seruice, profit the Common-weale) may in euery place freely giue and bestow Dignities and Honours, sometime chusing moe Barons then one, out of one & the same family, the custome of the succession of the former and more auncient Baron, beeing still kept whole, and not in anie hurt: as we see, Edward the sixth wisely to haue done in the familie of the Wiltoughbies, which family (that for breuitie sake I should not reckon vp moe) beside the most auncient Barony of the Wiltoughbies of Eresby, brought forth another Barony also of Parham. Wherefore wee acknowledge our Kings to bee the Fountaines of Politicall Nobilitie, and vnto whom we may with thanks, referre all the degrees of Honours and Dignities; wherefore I may not, without cause, seeme to reioyce on the behalfe of our Nobilitie of Britaine, which hath alwayes so had Kings themselves, Authours, Patrons, Gouernours, and Defenders thereof, that when Lands, Fees, and Possessions, subiect to Couenants or agreements, are still tossed and turneoyled with the stormes of the Iudiciall Courts, and of the Common Lawe; it is onely vnto the Kings themselves beholden, and resteth vpon heroically orders and institutions, proper and familiar vnto it selfe. So that

*Per titulos numerentur aut semperq; renata
Nobilitate viri: et prolem sua sequantur:
Continuum propria seruantia lege tenorem.*

By Titles great, mens Aunccestors were knowne still as they came,
And so their owne posteritie,
do still enjoy the same;
And flourish long without decay,
with euerlasting fame.

For the Noble-men, for deciding of sutes concerning their Honours, and for the giuing vnto euery man that which of right belongeth vnto his Farme and Dignitie, haue their Tribunnall or proper Martiall Court, which they are wont to call, The Court of Chivalry: whereof, when wee shall come vnto the Order of Knight-hood, wee shall say somewhat more.

The Court of Chivalry.

CHAP. XXIII.

Noblemen of the lesser sort.

He named Noble men which our Country of England beareth, and in honour excelling, I haue with as much breuitie as I could, declared, and in painting of it forth, proposed it vnto the eye: with what Lawes also they are created, and with what orders of successions they after our manner liue, I haue in few wordes briefly shewed. Now if I had vnto these also ioyned the Fellowes of the Order of the Garter, I might well seeme to haue ended this Treatise, beeing about to haue written nothing at all, of those whom wee call Noble men of the lesser sort, or Vnnamed: but the earnest and continuall craving vpon of certaine of my friends, ouercame mee. Wherefore, seeing that it is neyther altogether strange from our purpose, and may be done without straining of the Methode of that I haue taken in hand, both the place, and the requests of my friends haue inuited mee by the way to ioynne heereunto these few things heereafter following:

The Noblemen therefore of the lesser sort, are in three sorts or ranks diu-dely comprehended.

The first ranke or order, is of Knights: The second is of Esquires: The third, of them we call onely by the name of Gentlemen.

Those whom the Frenchmen simple call Gentilshommes, and wee in English Gentlemen, wee thus distinguish into three sorts:

First, hee which deriueth his Stocke with Armes from his Aunccestors, is by blood a Gentleman.

Secondly, hee which beareth Armes onely, although he be not yet by Stocke a Gentleman, is yet called a Gentleman, and giueth Gentry vnto his Sonnes.

Third-

Three degrees or rank of Noblemen or Gentlemen
as he is called by birth.

Plaine Gentlemen, with

of arms.

Esquires.

Doctore.

Thirdly, hee which is of reputation onely for his learning, or for some Office or function which hee beareth, is onely for himselfe, is in common estimation accounted a Gentleman; although he had a common person to his Father, and leaue his Sonnes common persons also.

An Esquire, who sometime is also called Scutifer, or a Shield-bearer, and in ancient time Homo ad Arma (or a Man at Armes) in French Escuire, and in English a Squire, or an Esquire, is next vnto a Knight: as hee who in ancient time following a Knight, by his side bare his Armes, as a most faithfull elow-souldier with him, from whence perhaps, they whom wee at this day in our Kings houses, account Squires for the bodie, seeme to haue taken their beginning.
But that which at first was by institution a militarie Office, is now become a degree of dignitie: whereof, Antiquitie it selfe, and the custome of our Kingdome hath brought forth vnto vs foure kinds.

The first doth comprehend all the younger iounges of Barons, and of other Noble-men, and their first begotten Sonnes also; who together with their being sit borne, make the dignitie of Esquireship successorie, so long as their issue male faileth not.

Another kinde (and that most auncient) is of them, which are borne the eldest Sonnes of Knights, and their eldest Sonnes also.

The third is of them, which of auncient time graced with Armes belonging vnto their Stocke and Family, are the first begotten and chiefe of their house and Stocke. And these by a certayne prerogative of being the eldest or first born, goe before all the rest of the Gentlemen of the same Family aside descended, and are accounted Esquires.

The fourth kind respecteth the common-weale, and the Kings house. For they which beare publicke Offices in the Common-weale, are of Gentlemen in reputation made Esquires. Such as are the Iudges, the Kings Attorney, and Prolocutor: the Sergeants at Law, and other Officers of like sort belonging vnto
the Exchequer.

Vnto these also wee may especially ioynne, if not preferre, such as proceede

Doctore of Diuinitie, or otherwise in other professions in the Vniuersities. For Doctoreship is a Title of Dignitie more noble, then they which are Gentlemen but by their Stocke onely: vnto whom also after our manner, in the Kings Commissions concerning the publike affaires, so much praeminence is giuen, as that they may well seeme in dignitie, to bee compared with Knights.

In the Kings house also, the Appari-tors, commonly called Sergeants at Armes, Heralds, and all seruing in the Kings Court, whom for the praemi-nence of their Offices, we also call Sergeants, are made Esquires with chaunces, (viz.) with a Collar made of Silver and blacke S S put about their neckes by the Kings themselves.

Knights (in French called Cheualiers) are with vs called either Knights Barnerets, Knights of the Bath, or Knights Bachelors.

Other there be of the Garter also, but of another sort, then that they are to be comprehended in a kind, to be compared with these as in due place is to be shewed.

■ Banneret is a degree of Honour, esteemed the last amongst the greatest (I meane Nobilitum maiorum) or the first with those of the second ranke. Three formes of creations I haue obserued, as sometimes vnder the Royall Standard displayed: the person hauing the lower end of his Pennon cut off into a square (such as Barons vse) receiueth that Honour: Or as Edward the third enioyned
William de la Poole by Patten, Vi statum & honorem tenet et continuet Banne-retus, To him and to his heires: Or as Nicholaus de Grey was declared, by Writ of King Edward the second, to be, De familia Regis inquam Bannerettus; thereby meaning, both Precedencie and Salary accordingly.

The two other Knight-hoods Bachellors, and of the Bath, admit this difference betweene them, that to the one from ecclesiasticke grace of the Soueraigne (to attend himselfe or Queene in their inaugu-rations, or his Childrens creations) there is annexed a Ministeriall duetie to their knighly dignities; the other, nothing being left but their bare Stile and proper Merite; and therefore they are eyther in the Record, mentioned by none other

ther name then Milites simplici, yet had in former ages (as well as other degrees of honour) many worthy and religious ceremonies, as also peculiar robes at their Creations (as appeareth copiously both in story and record.) But they by injury of times, and promiscuous admissions (which somewhat declined their reputation) had bene fully lost, had not the other preferred the memory and use of such venerable order.

As for right of precedency betwene these two; or whether such temporall service enlarged to the one more then the other, inuiceth a perpetuall priority or no, I leave it to the discussion of those, to whom in due of place, and depth of Judgement, it properly belongeth.

No man is borne a Knight, but men vpon their knees receiue that Dignity (which is not but together with life lost, or taken away) of the King, or his Lieutenant generally; hauing regard eyther to his stocke, his vertue, or his fortune, or his aches done at home or abroad; lightly striking him that is so to be created, vpon the shoulder with a drawne Sword. The Prince speaking these words in French; Soyez bon Cheualier d'oresenuant au nom de Dieu: (Be from hence-forth a good Knight, in the name of God.) And they which are so made Knights, hauing killed the Sword, and this word (Sir) being added vnto their names, for tearme of their liues, are euery where (after the French manner in calling of their Kings) distinguished from other men; Sir John Norris, Sir Francis Drake. A dignity indeede of it selfe so found, apparant, & full of honor, as that it euery where becometh most great Dukes and Earles: and which euery Kings themselves haue not disdained kindly to thank one another for. For so we reade our King Henry the second of that name, to haue made Malcolme King of the Scots, Knight at Turwin in France, for his good seruice at Thelouise, in the year 1159. And Alexander, the Sonne of William King of the Scots, being not 14. years old, to haue receiued the order of knighthood in England, in the year 1212. Hugh Perre restored vnto the Earledome of Oxford, was by the King made Knight. Henry of Lacy also in the right of his Wife, and by the resignation of his Mother in law, promoted to be Earle of Lincolne, recei-ued the third penny of his Earledome from the time he was made knight, about ten yeares more or lesse before he was created Earle. Beside that, the ancient Register of the Church of Abingdon thus recceth.

Richard Earle of Chester, with his mother Ermentrude, lodged in the Towne of Abingdon; Farrinus the Abbot, and the Countesse his Mother, earnestly calling vpon him, confirmed for wel done, whatsoever was done concerning the Land of Wimondisleie, and with his writing strengthened the same. Which writing, he appointed to be sealed with his Mothers Seale, for he being not yet knighted, all the Letters by him any whether directed, were closed with his Mothers Seale. And for this cause it is, that it is noted, the writing to be signed rather with the seale of the Countesse, then of the Earle himself. Of which writing, this is the forme; Richardus Comes Cestrie, & Ermentrudis Comitissa Mater eius, Nigillo de Oylly, &c. Richard Earle of Chester, and Ermentrudis the Countesse, his Mother, to Nigill of Oylly, &c.

This same thing doe also the ancient formes of the Parliament writs testifie. For it is manifest, Kings haue bene wont to summon the Nobility of the kingdom vnto their Parliaments. Iohanni Marchioni de Montacuto Cheualier (vnto John Marquesse of Montacute Knight: And Henricus vis. Henrico Vicecomiti Bourchier Militi (Henry the viscount Henry Count Bourchier Knight.) 1. Edward 4. &c. Which manner of calling, although it hath begun of long to grow out of use in others of the Nobility, yet eyther in calling out of new Barons, or in summoning of the olde, it is still right seriously obserued: as Gulielmo Brooke de Cobham Cheualier (vnto William Brooke of Cobham knight.) And Gulielmo Cecil de Burghley Militi (to William Cecil of Burghley knight) when as they both were commonly knowne and called Barons or Lords of Cobham, &c. of Burghley: so that a man would almost say, the order of knights to bee the Seminary of the Baronage of England.

I let passe in the meane time, with how great solemnity of the kingdom, and charges of the Subiects, Kings in ancient time were wont to conferre and bestow this Military honour and dignity vpon their their eldest Sonnes, (viz.) the Princes of Wales, and with what luster and magnificence, Emperours and Kings ioyned in league together, (by a certaine mutuall and as it were natural power of monarchs among themselves, in bestowing Nobility according to the Lawe of Nations) haue dismissed one anothers Subiects & Ambassadors, graced with this Dignitie. I list onely heereunto to ioine an auncient forme, with the Rites and Ceremonies thereof, out of an old Chronicle of a certayne namelesse writer; Anno (saith he) 1316. Dominus richardus de Rodney factus fuit Miles apud Keynsham die translationis Sancti Thomae Martyris in praesentia domini Almarici Comitis de Penbroke, qui cinxit eum gladio, & Dominus Maurinus de Barkley super pedem dextrum posuit unum calcar: & Dominus Bartholomaeus de Badelismere (Baron & viceroy) supposuit aliud super pedem sinistrum in Aula, & hoc facto, recessit cum honore. In the year 1316. Lord Richard of Rodney, was made Knight at Keynsham, vpon the day of the translation of Saint Thomas the Martyr, in the presence of Almaricus Earle of Penbrooke, who girt him with the Sword: and the Lord Maurice of Barkley put one Spurre on his right foot, and the Lord Bartholomew of Badelismere (both of them Barons) put the other Spurre vpon his left foot in the Hall; and this done, he with honour departed. But now according to the manner of the time, we liue after another fashion; and in this, as in other things, the change and alteration of things hath taught vs, what an alteration of things the long continuance of time is able to make. So in thinking of the beginning of Knights, and as well of the antiquitie of the Order of Knighthood, as of the preheminance thereof aboue other dignities and honours, I can scarce relesue my selfe, but that this name of olde should seeme to make shew vnto me of some (I wot not what) magnificent and maiestical things contayned in the same, and more excellent then Nobility it selfe: and mounting (as it were) into the royall Thronoes, sitteth as it were a Iudge in the Iudgement seate, and the Protectour of all ciuill Nobility. For the deciding of suites concerning honours, and for the preservation vnto euery man the right of his fame or dignity, the naturall tribunall Seate or Court for the Nobilitie, is euery where called Militaris; that is to say, the Martiall or Military Court, and commonly, the Court of Chualier: the forme wherof with vs is this. The appoynted place for the holding thereof, is the Kings Hall: wherein the Constable of the Kingdome, and the Marshall of England sit as Iudges, where any Plaintiffe, either in case of dignities or of Armes, or of any other sute or controuersie concerning Nobility and Honour, may sue the Defendant. But the forme wherein the Constable of England was wont to call the Nobility and Gentry vnto his Countor Iudgement seate, was on this sort:

Iehan filz de Fey Constable d'Angleterre, &c.

Iohn the Kings Sonne, Constable of England, and Varden of the East-marches toward Scotland, to our welbeloued Cozin, Sir Rafe Neule, Earle of Westmerland, and Marshall of England, greeting. We command and charge you that you came to come and appeare before vs at Westminster, the ninth day of May next coming, before Monsieur Edward Hastings, to answer to Monsieur Reynold Lord of Grey, and of Rutheyn, concerning that which he shall then charge him with in our court of Chualier, concerning the full vsing and bearing of his Armes, and to that the Lord Grey saith, and as it shall be more fully declared at the same day; and further to doe and receiue that which the Lawe and the custome of our said Court shall in this part require. Returning before vs at the aforesaid day with this our Precept, al that you shall therein haue done. Given at Westminster vnder the Seale of our Office, the first day of May, in the reigne of my most dread Lord and Father King Henry the fourth, after the Conquest, the eight.

Iehan filz. frere, e Vceilem Roys, Duc de Bedford, &c.

Iohn, Sonne, Brother, and Viceroy to the Kings, Duke of Bedford and Arundell, Earle of Richmond, and of Kendall, and Constable of England, vnto our welbeloued Cozin, Iohn duke of Northfolke, Marshall of England, greeting. We command and charge charge you, that you cause to be arrested, and to come before vs or our Lieutenant at Wexminster, vpon the 15. of S. Hillarie next comming, William Clopton of the Countie of Suffolke Esquire, then to answer before vs or our Lieutenant in the Court of Chiuallrie, to Robert Eland of the Countie of Lincolne esquire, to that which he the said Robert shal then charge him with by the way of Arms, as hauing set and put to the Scale of his Armes to a false and forged writing, done to the hurt and danger of him the said Robert an hundred pounds, and more then that, as he saith. Returning before vs at the sayd day, with this our Mandate, all that which you shall haue therein done. Given vnder the Scale of our Office, the 23. day of November, in the fixeteenth yeare of the reigne of our Lord the King, & since the Conquest of England, the hundred.

The forme of the prosecuting of the action, is on both sides tryed, by the looking into of Letters Patents, auncient Charters, and of Euidences (as they tearme them) and by Witneses. All things are (for the most part) acted by their Aduocates, in Writings, in Latine or in French. At length the definitive Sentence, according vnto equitie and right, and our owne heroycall custome, and not after any strange maner, sealed with the publike Scale of the Office is openly read, and afterward is deliuered to the Earle Marshall, to be put into execution. If any thing chance to be vnprovidedly done, or vnaduisedly in the suite ouer-slipped on eyther part, it is lawfull for them to appeale vnto the king, who is wont to referre the whole matter vnto the Bishops, and other Ecclesiasticall persons, vnto the learned Lawyers, and others of most vpriight life, to be diligently againe examined & expounded. And euen in this very manner it was argued, adiudged, and appealed, betwixt Reynold Baron Gray of Ruthen, and Edward Hastings Knight, concerning the Armes of the Hastings, in the reigne of King Henry the third. Likewise, betwixt the Barons of Louell and Morley, for the Armes of the familie of Burnell. And Richard Scroope Plaintife, against Robert Grosuenuor Defendant, in an Action of Armes in the ninth yeare of the reigne of King Richard the second.

But this I leaue to the iudicious labor of that noble person and excellent iudgement, who now can onely repaire the lamented ruines of that Iurisdiction, hauing bequeathed vnto him the Genius of those his renowned Auncellours, that so many yeares filled vp with famous memory, the Iudgement Seate of this Royall Court, referring the eye of further search, eyther to the Kings Records, or to those Registers of Armes and Honor whome it concerneth most to seeke out such Monuments with the Genealogies of Families, and the Armes of Stockes and Kindreds to distinguish the same, to write things done, and to register them vp in Bookes, for the perpetuall remembrance thereof. And who themselves acknowledging the high Constable, and the Earle Marshall of England for their Patrons, receiue yearly pensions from the Kings, and are by them with notable priuiledges rewarded.

Heere at length I might haue a large occasion to speake of the solemne Ceremonies of the Heralds; of their institution, immunities (both in time of peace and warre) and of the auncient reputation had of them amongst all Nations: if it were lawfull for mee to roame at large beyond the breuitie I haue vnto my selfe propounded, and whom therefore I had purposed in silence to haue passed ouer. But, lest I writing of so many degrees of out Noblemen, and so great things concerning Politicall Nobility, (in leauing to be spokemen for themselves) I might seeme to haue spoken vnaduisedly, and not indifferently, I thought it good briefly, and by the way, to touch these things concerning Heralds. They were in auncient time Forlifers, or as Messengers of the publike faith and credit. But since the time Princes and Monarks, for dispatch of their affaires, first began to haue their Ambassadors still resident one of them with another, the reputation of Heralds is so impaired, as that they euer where liue as men neglected, & quite ouerthrowne. Yet what our Heraldes be, and in what houses, and vnder what Lawes they (by the fauour of our Kings) together with vs in safety dwell, I will heere, as it were, in a short Inuentorie, propound vnto the eye of the Reader.

The

Three Kings, which of their offices are called

Garter, who goeth first, as cheefe Ringleader of the all: not so much for the antiquity of his creation (for he was first created by King Henry the first) as for the super-eminence of the Order of the Garter.

Yorke.

Foure Pursuiuantes, which in Heraldrie you may call learners and followers, vnto whom other Names are giuen also, (viz)

Rougedragon.
Portculis.

All those by the names of Kings, Heralds, and Pursuiuants, are by the Kings themselves immediate, or by the Constable of the Kingdome, or the Marshall with the Kings Authority, crowned with Crownes, graced with Collars, attired with their rich Coates, named by their names of addition, and with certaine appointed Ceremonies created, receiue their yearly stipends out of the Kings Exchequer, to consult and meete together, about Armes and Authentical Monuments, and helping and profiting vnto the Art of Heraldry. And they by the Kings Charter Incorporate, are endowed with a publike house in London, the cheefe City of the Kingdome: where (besides the Immunities and Priuiledges whereby they liue) they are with the preheminences of their degrees and functions, one from another distinguished.

Are set to preserve the dignity and reputation of their society, and governe the rest, as for example.

For some of them.

Other some are pointed to obey (viz.)

Garret King of Armes, for the supereminent Dignity of the Garter, is of the cheefe; whose peculiar Office it is, with all dutifull service to attend vpon the Knights of that order. To advertise them which are chosen of their new election, to call them to be entailed at Windsor, and to cause their Armes to be hangd vpon their seats. At their buriall, to have a care of their Funerall Rites & Ceremonies. Wherefore, (beside the yearly wages given him by the Knights) he is by the King himselfe rewarded with a Salary double to the rest. In every new Emperour, King, Prince, Duke, Marquesse, Earle, Vicount, Baron, or Knight, to be into this order enlauded, hee challengeth of him the vppermost Garment, which he on that day weareth. He also sheweth vnto every new Baron, called vnto the Parliament, the place wherein he is to sit among his Peeres, and ordereth other things concerning their order.

Clarentius, who is King of Armes of al the East, West, & South Prouinces of England, on this side of the Riuer of Trent.

Norroy, who is also acknowledged for king of Armes through the north part of the kingdom, beyond the Riuer of Trent.

Heralds and Pursuivants

These two haue by charter power to visit the Noblemens Families, to ser downe their Pedegrees, to distinguish their armes, & in the open Market-place, to reprove such as falsely take vpon the Nobility or Gentry. And to order euery Mans Exequies & Funerals, according to their Dignity, & to appoint vnto them their Armes or Ensignes, &c. And in all things govern the Heralds as well as Garter.

Who in all things endeavour themselves for the defence of their society, & to their own lawfull profice in private, and willingly depend of the commandements of the Kings

And these onely are the Kings Heralds, with vs so called, for that they receiue wages of the kings, and with publike seruice, serue all the Nobility of the kingdom.

Howbeit, Noble-men and Peeres of this Land, in ancient time had their Heralds peculiar vnto themselves. For Chester the Herald, and Falco the Pursuiuant, liued at the command of the Prince of Wales, and serued him. Humfrey, Duke of Glocester, and Earle of Pembroke, had the Herald Pembroke his household Seruant.

Richard also, Duke of Glocester, hauing now obtained the kingdom, would needs haue his Herald Glocester, to be called King of Armes for all Wales. Charles

Drum

Brandon Duke of Suffolke, retained Suffolke Herald, and Marlowe the Pursuiuant, his Seruants. The Marquesse of Dorchester, kept Grobby the Herald. The Earle of Northumberland kept Northumberland the Herald, and Esperance the Pursuiuant. Arthur Plantaginet, Vicount Lisle, took vnto himselfe the Pursuiuant: and Baron Hastings, Hasting the Pursuiuant. These it pleased me to haue out of many others rehearsed, who serued Noblemen in their peculiar and domestick seruices. But the condition of the Seruant is made better, by the dignity of his Lord and Master, so these forenamed Heralds liued not with like authority or priuiledges as with the Kings.

So I breesely touch all things, for the beautifying and setting forth of Politicall Nobility: Now at length (by the Heralds leaue) let it bee lawfull for mee to ioyn hereunto and insert some few things concerning Armes, whereby Noblemen are wont to be knowne from the vulgar sort, and to be among themselves by families diuided, being wont in ancient time to be more sparingly bestowed, then in this our age, and onely vpon such as had with their good seruice deserved them.

But such kinde of Armes seeme not to haue taken beginning, but of such military rewards, as were wont to be giuen vnto well deseruing men, in the Roman Common-weale. For the Romans, alwayes most strived for the obtayning of honor and glory, for the nourishing whereof, they with ornaments and rewards, laboured to stirre vp mens mindes, for the performance of noble actions, both at home and abroad. In warres flourished Military guises, Trophies, Triumphall Armes, Letters Laureat, &c. In time of peace, at home were shewed honourable Titles, Images, Statues, and such like. Things indeed wisely at first deuised, and afterward so together with the Empire encreased, that how many, and what manner of Crowns, Bracelets, Chaines, and Crests, euery mā had deserued; what manner of trappings, Speares, Darts, or Belts, they had gotten: these they were wont in their expeditions in the wars, to beare in their Targets and Bucklers, or set vpon their Helmes; and againe, returning home, in time of peace, euery good Seruitor did hang them vp in their houses; and those Ornaments they

by the name of Armes, were wont by long order of succession, to deliuer ouer vnto their posterity: and heereof those armes of Families, heere and there dispierced by the Nobility, vsed in diuers kingdomes, were (if it please you so to thinke) of the Germanes called Teutagen, in our language Armes, and in Latine Arms, for that with them the enemies were repulsed.

These things the ancient Roman Coyne declare, and the credible ancient Romane Writers; the vse whereof so at length preuailed in kingdomes, that as names distinguished men from men, even so Armes diuided Nations from Nations, and Families from Families: first granted by Kings themselves, but afterward by the Heralds (Kings of Armes) by a Royall transmissiue power granted vnto them, they euery where especially seruing the Politicall Nobility, vnto whom I willingly leaue these things. And therefore the name and office of the Heralds was euery where notable, and well bebecoming an honest man; whom they of ancient time went to call the Fosterers of Politicall Nobility, the Arbiters of Equity, the Protectors of Verity, the Ambassadors of Princes, and the Writers of mens noble actes.

But woe is me, that I carried with a certaine winde of this Method, haue thus euen against my will landed vpon our Heralds, whom (I know not by what destiny) euery man sigheth and mourneth to see them working their owne destruction. Although indeed it be not so much to be maruailed at, seeing that the cause is right manifest (for lawfull bee it for mee to say the truth, which the thing it selfe specketh) (viz.) the want of the Martiall Court, or Court of Chindry, wherof I but now spake. For why, Nobility is selfe beeing oftentimes hurt or impaired the Heralds themselves therewith languish alio.

And yet for all that, heroy call truth wāteeth not her Patronnes, euen amongst the most Noble and reuerend Antiquity, although as it were banished, and almost a stranger in her owne house, hath together with the Muses, her most louing, kinde and earnest Patronnes, and who were not euen vnto my selfe also wanting in the perfecting of these my endeuors & purposes.

These are the Orders and Degrees, of both our sorts of Nobility, Named and Unnamed. Now into what ranks they are among themselves divided, and what honour they owe one of them unto another (by a certaine right of precedence) receive heere in briefe.

- 1 THE Kings Maiesty.

- 4 Dukes not descended of Royall blood.
- 5 Dukes eldest Sonnes descended of the Royall blood.

The Sonnes of Knights, which are of the Kings priuy Councill, for the time, hold the places which their Fathers being knighted, were knowne to hold, beneath the Barons Sonnes. But the antiquity of the creation of euery Knight is to bee regarded: by which reasons, the Sonnes of the elder Knights, goe before the Sonnes of them that were more later created. Amongst Esquires, the antiquity of their Families, their wealth, and publike offices are considered; whereby it commeth to passe, that the wiues of them of the chee-fer Families, or of such as beare great Offices take their places before others.

Howbeit, wee see no certainty to bee heere set downe concerning the places of Esquires or their Wiues, neyther concerning the places of younger Brothers wiues forasmuch as many such things oftentimes chance, as cannot in any certaine rules be comprehended: like as it vseth to happen in Named Nobility (viz.) in Princes, Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, Vicounts, and Barons.

*Now at last let vs passe vnto
Knights of the Order of the Garter.*

E said in the beginning, in the diuiding and reckoning vp of our Nobility, it not to be beside our purpose, if I should vnto them also ioyne the fellowship of the order of the Garter, of others (by farre) the most honourable. For that it maketh Knights, and sometime them of the lesser Nobility also, being me for their vertue and valour, both in peace and warre about others famous, not only equall vnto Noblemen at home, but almost even vnto Kings themselves & Emperors. An order verily of all the orders of the Christian world (if it be to be compared with any other) most ancient and most famous, wherein the most true Nobility it selfe, together with Religion and vertue, attended vpon with fife and twenty most famous Knights, is seene that (I may so say) with vndeified Maiesty to sit in the Royall Throne. Wherefore, seeing that it is an order of so great dignity, and more famous then any other Nobility; & greater, then that it can in ranke with the other orders be included, as which includeth all the other degrees of Nobility, I haue purposed as briefly as I could, here to set it downe alone, and there-withall to conclude this Treatise.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXV.

The Order of the Knights of the Garter, when, and by whom it was ordained.

Edward the third, the most inuincible King of England and of France, a Prince principally endowed with al manner of piety, magnanimitic, and wisdom, in the xxij. yeare of his reigne, after he had oftentimes ouer the Frenchmen and Scots triumphed, vnto the honour of Almighty God, whereunto he (as becomed a deuout King referred al things) in his Castle at Windsor, ordained the Military Ornaments and Ceremonies of the Knights of the Garter: whereunto he gaue the name of the Blew Garter (but commonly called the Garter) and wherein hee appoynted the Kings of England as chiefe, and fife and twentie Knights or Fellowes and Companions together. Who being men both for their martial prowesse and birth, most famous, and most chosen Chieftaines solemnely sworne, and binding themselves together with a bond of mutuall and perpetual friendship, for the defence of the honour and dignity of their Colledge and Fellowship, refuse not to vndergoe any danger, no not death it selfe. And therefore they are called Fellowes of the Garter, for that they haue the Calfe of their Leg bound about with a little Girdle, set with precious stones, which we call a Garter: the speciall Cognisance of the order, whereon it is in French, in golden Letters thus writte: Hon. Soit. Qui. Mal. T. Penfe. All these Knights once yearly attired in the Robes and Ornaments of their Order, meete together vpon the 23. day of April, a day dedicated to Saint George, The Rites and ceremonies, where-with they for the most great preheminece of their Order, are with most great solemnity chosen and entauled at Windsor, and the Statutes vnder which these Fellowes and Companions liue, seeing they can in iust Volumes be scarce contained, cannot heere in few words be expressed. Wherefore I list onely to rehearse the names of them, which from the beginning, or together with king Edward himselfe, were the Founders thereof, or else haue by our Kings from time to time, for some their vertue about others, bene still chosen to be Fellowes of that most honorable Order, in stead of them that were dead, euen vnto this our age.

THE PERORATION, OR EPILOGVE OF THE WHOLE VVORKE.

Thus haue I at last concluded this Treatise of Nobilitie Politicke, Naturall, and Native, as breecely as I could, and the greatnesse & dignity of the subiect would permit. First, generally; as applyed to the Customes of Countries, whereto the same is tide; then particularly exemplified, by the Rites and Ceremonies in vse among our selues. Wherein, if seeking to adorne the magnificence of so stately a Theame, with eloquence of words, and beauty of style, as it selfe doth deserue, I seeme to haue failed, I must plead for my selfe, as a plaine meaning man, that sometimes through zeale and deuotion to the Church, vnderooke to carue an Image, representing the Deity and greatnesse of his God, out of trembling and feare, was forced to craue ayde of skilfuller workmen, hauing nothing to excuse the weaknesse of his wit, and expire wi hall, the horror of his worke, but pious simplicitie. Euen such is my case; For I willingly confesse, that being doubtful of my selfe when I tooke this Taske in hand, yet my hope and comfort was, that howeuer I might erre, and heerein bewray my skill, my faults prouing veniall, I might giue occasion, to stir vp riper wits, to further the perfection of this rude and rough-hew'd worke, and Vvhettston-like at least, to set and sharpen others.

If now by the sight and view heereof, (such as it is) any like to take the paines from the theathe, to the blade; from the shape, to the substance; & from the shadow, to the body, to wade any further; the Volume now succeeding, aswell of all the Persons, as their atchievements of honour, marriages, alliances, and descents, that euer this Monarchy hath innestred & ennobled with the titles and degrees of Politick Nobility, from the Earles vpward, (Vice-Comes and Barons make a Volume of themselves) digested into Catalogues, will further declare.

A worke, though not so perfect as the time may make it proue, for at the beginning, what thing was euer so? (Without price be it spoken) of extraordinary study, care, and industry. Wherein, if only for the publike, I haue thus employed my selfe, and done my best endeavour, Tu scilicet one begeth the other. Let no man take occasion to taxe me of double diligence, much lesse of affectation, selfe-love, or flattery, that propounding thus a Pilgrimage pretended to bee generall, I haue spent my whole deuotion on the Saints of Great Brittain. I was to fit my mould to the matter already framed, and therto wholly bending and deuoting with my selfe, I aimed withall in secret to redeeme to faue a subiect (subsisting euerywhere on speciall Lawes and Rites) from the wandering Ideas of discounting Philosophers, and contemplatiue Diuines to her owne proper Station, and peculiar Customes, that others else-where desirous of the like, I might seeme rather to giue, then to lay their good example.

It remains then now, to make good my first diuision into Celestiall, Morall, and Politick Nobility, that I lay downe

the dignity of each by themselves, that by plaine demonstration and comparing of their Essences mutually together, the world may see, how euen this of Great Brittain (which heere I call Ours) is of it selfe absolutely, the most assured Pattern, and best ordered of all others.

By Gods eternall prouidence, it is so fore-ordayned, that for ornament and safety of humane life and Nature, we see and seele daily, some steppes as it were of diuine intelligence, and seeds of Morall vertue, still fostered vp within vs, euen in this lower world.

Est Deus in Nobis agitante calefimus Illa.

That (diuine intelligence) by heavenly inspiration, doth teach vs to know God, and moues vs to serue him with all holinesse of soule, and religious obseruation.

This (vertuous disposition) by an inbred ingenuity, becomes the Mother of this our Positiue Nobility. For, as these two still ioyned together, first open the way by steps and degrees (though by diuers passages) to come to Kingly Grace, and Soueraigne Eudochyis, Daintely; so

Ex Ingeniis sunt Eugenes Eugenes, from inbred Ingenuity, men first become Generous, which also leades them on in the selfe-same Nobility Natiuely. For as godlinesse or piety, by diuine inspiration, and in-bred Ingenuity, by vertues infusion, makes vulgar men exempted, and so honestly respected about their fellows, that nothing may disgrace them, but iniquity and heresie, yelding inatter and occasion to this kinde of Nobility that subiects obtaine from Soueraigne grace & fauour, Daintely: Euen so, where grace becomes so fixed in the person of any, that nothing can remoue it but Death or high-treason; it begets generosity by descending to posterity, Natiuely. So that, as to be gloriously happy in the world to come, by diuine inspiration from God to man, by the name of piety, proceeds from Christianity imputatiuely. And as to be honourably esteemed before God and man, by the name of piety, proceeds from Ingenuity, by the name of probity, proceeds from civility infusiuely; so to be lawfully exempted from the vulgar sort, by the name of Generosity, proceeds from grace, Mediate or Immediate respectively al worthily ennobled in their feuerall kindes and places: whereby the meaneft Subiect being thus made happy, becomes as well Nobilis (which wee call a gentleman, and the French sound Gentilhomme) as the Emperor himselfe, saying; *Foy * de Gentilhomme*. And, Me voycy Gentilhomme aussi bien que le Roy. Though in English and in French, the word it selfe seeme straightened. For we call no man Noble, but from the Baron vpward, where Nobilis in Latine, includes the meaneft Gentleman, as well as Lords and others. The names of Kings, Princes, Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, Vice-Counts & Barons, &c. being titles of preheminance, to distinguish the celebrity of each mans place & function, for orderly precedence.

Thus then, though none become Christians by the rules of piety, carnally; and our inbred-ingenuity, proceed not from our Parents by the rules of probity, naturally; yet a Gentleman, one may be both reputed, and so called by the lawes of celerity, alias Cheualry, alias Heraldry, euen for humanity, and honest conuersation ciuilly, and so become ennobled in himselfe and his posterity Politically. For, "Est aliquid clarum Magnorum splendor Aurum" "Illum posteritas emulaculac habet."

And as to be a Christian, is the glory of all Nobility, and to be an honest man, is of it selfe most honourable: so to be advanced by the eye of Soueraigne Maiesty, with such Ensignes of Nobility, as demonstrate his celebrity in himselfe and his posterity, is properly most Noble; Armes being in this respect ordayned to limit Families, as proper names do men. Whereby (this) stands distinguished fr the other (two.)

For the first, from religious imputation, being hid fro the world, makes Christians only glorious by faith, with God in heauē.

The second, from vertuous infusion, makes honesty most honorable, & vertue still admired by good works among men.

And this third, from absolute affection in Soueraigne loue and grace, makes subiects rise ennobled respectiue abroad, but properly at home, for seruices performed in the Church and Common-weale.

Now, all that haue the happinesse to be glorified in heauen, or honoured vpon earth, or ennobled at the least, receiue it first or last from God, & his Lieutenants, whose infusiue grace and greatnesse, are the grounds of all our credits.

The first, by Diuines, being religiously taught taught, and the second by Philosophers, being morally disputed, like Twins of one birth, or cousin-germans at least, by piety and probity in a heavenly kinde of kindred, makes mortall men immortall, and by fame to liue for euer. But the third, which this Treatise hath begot, or gladly would restore; being mere positiue with Kings, within their kingdomes, and Orphant-like committed to their care and speciall trust, depends vpon their wils, their Rites and Country Customes. From whence it is, we see such Rankes of Nobility, such feuerall names of dignities, and titles of honor, bestowed vpon Subiects for Piety and Probity, conspicuous in the world by Soueraigne grace and fauour. Who at first, being but meane, and of slender beginnings, become at last extolled to places of renowne, from the foot-stoolle, aduanced to the type and top of honour, & the same like ebbes and floods, with time againe decline.

These kindes of Nobility thus feuerally laide open, and by a three-fold disposition made apt to be diuided, are not (notwithstanding) so at odds within themselves, that their Natures and their Essences admit no reconciliation, or may not be vnited in one Person altogether.

For the first, being celestiall, and meere ly diuine, admits no worldly vanity, whose Soueraigne is God, and whose Robes of perfection wee shall then put on vpon vs, when wee come to bee presented before Christ our King in Heauen. This is our cheefest glory, our summum bonum, and highest blisse, whereto who strives to rise, and hopes to attaine, must worke it out by faith, and lay his foundation on the true Christian-Catholique and Apostolique Religion; without which, euen Vertue her selfe, with all her Morall Lessons, auails vs nothing, as pointing onely to this end, ayms at this happinesse, but obtains it neuer.

And they that being heere conuersant with me on earth, haue their mindes fo cleare and enlightened from aboue, that fore-seeing this end, they bend themselves thereto, and by a prudent care and constancy, still ayiming at Iustice, seeke onely the good of the Church and Common-wealth. These (I say) by their vertues once conspicuous, become for euer famous, and worthily honoured with that kinde of Nobility, which Philosophers lo magnifie and extoll vnto the world.

Now, these also at length being noted by their names, and made knowne to Soueraigne Kings (that as Gods with God Almighty rule heere the earth in common) are by them ennobled; first Daintely, with that Nobility, which descending to posterity, by right of inheritance, is Natiue of it selfe, and in all places subiect to peculiar Customes. From whence it comes to passe, that seeing Honesty, the height and type of honour, and vertue the way that leads vs thereto; we admire more Nobility Daintely, being truly deriued and raised for it selfe, then that which is Natiue, and descended from other, as whose person first for vertues sake, being for it selfe beloued, becomes with all illustrious, and layes the foundation of happinesse in others. Nam Genus & Progenies, & Quæ non fecimus ipsi: tunc ea nostra voco. For though in Nobility Politike and Ciuill, Generosity by antiquity, seeme to be respected: and to be borne a Lord, be more Noble, then so to be created; yet is it not so honourable, though farre more generous. For Vertue of her selfe being euerly way magnificent, first honours the Father, then dignifies the Sonne, & magnifies posterity, which by the Gretians is more significantly spoken, and better vnderstood, by their Eugenes and geniæ applying this to Ingenuity, which belongs vnto the minde, and that vnto Celebrity more proper to the kinde.

Thus then at the last, is that Celestiall, Morall, and Politick Nobility, that at first I propounded: whercof, when Diuines in their Sermons seeme to speake, and Philosophers by discourses goe about to dispute, they demonstrate nothing but Allegoricall Ideæ, and imaginary shadowes, the substance whercof, wee must hope to finde in Heauen; when as heere euen on earth, for the good & furtherance both of Church and Common-weale, it is cherished and dignified at the hands of Soueraigne Kings, and as fittest for graue Councillors placed next vnto themselves, whereof this rude Treatise contains the truest patternes that the world affords; namely, The Nobility of this Monarchy of Great-Brittain. THE SIXTH BOOKE.
OF THE GOVERNEMENT and Administration of Iustice, obserued in the Common-wealth of Genes or Geneway.

CHAP. I.

The people of Liguria are contained betwixt the Rivers of Tarus & Maera, along the Sea-coast, & the downefall of the Apennines. Of all which country, the city Genes or Geneway (most noble for antiquity and power) hath (for the larger part of time) held the rule and Soueraignty because both for buildings, as also in nobilitie of actions, and in respect of valiant men, it hath euermore beene very notable among all the rest of former times. This Cittie gracing the South with hearbs, beaureous lookes, is most proudly built vpon the Sea-coast, and hath her backe vpon the North, at the foote of a mountaine: euen as if she were defended downe the mount, and cometo repose her selfe vpon a Plaine, the mountaine remaining on her backe part to defend the citie from the furious North. It is not altogether plaine nor mountainous, but participeth both of the one and other giving about the compass of fixe miles, so faire and goodly as can be desired.

And because concerning her Antiquitie, we can not deliuer any thing certaine (in regarde some doe maintaine, that it was built by Genoa or Iuno, the daughter of Saturne; others, by Genius, the companion of Phaeton; and some by Ianus, who was said to be Noah) it shall be sufficient therefore to say, that it was accounted a city two hundred and ninetie yeares before the coming of Christ on the earth, as manifestly appeareth (setting aside Titus Livius in the Decade of his eight Booke) by a Table of Brasse, found (no long time since) in the Valley of Pozzereta, and placed in the Church of Saint Laurence: whereon is engrauen in auncient Letters, That in the Consulship of Lucius Caelius, and of Quintus Manilius, Iudges were sent from the Senate of Rome, to discide the variance betwene the Pilluri, and the people of Geneway, concerning the neare neighbouring valley. And because as well the sententiall execution, as the gaole deliuerie of prisoners, which were in respect of that strife maintained, was to succcede and follow in Geneway: therefore we may heereby comprehend, that the City (vntill that time) consisted vpon some other considerations.

Now,

Geneway possessed countries in the East part in former times.

The people of this nation addicted to merchandize greatly.

The readers of the Genewayes for all dangerous occurrences.

Andrea Doria Admirall to the King of France, and deliuerer of Geneway fro French straddance.

Now, this so noble Cittie, in former times held a great estate, and was possessed of many Countries in the East parts: and now it is very powerfull by Sea in all respects, sometimes seruing the Duke of Savoy, sometimes the king of France, euer being traueled with much busines, either in regard of being an illustrious and famous Cittie, or because it is the passage, and (euen as it were) the gate for going from the mountaines into Italy. Whereupon some conceiue and are perswaded, that it was called Ianus, as a Gate for Italie, and not Ianus of Ianus, who was old father Noah. But let it be in maner howsoeuer, the men of this nation are industrious, euermore attentive to merchandize, whereby they attaine vnto great wealth, and as with other people it fareth, euen so amongst them, there is alwayes great plenty of money, because no one priuate man, but very many more beside, haue made passage of five hundred thousand ducats, euen after the best valuation.

And yet these men so great and wealthy, being molested by some parcialities, which diuers times haue endangered Italy, are now, and so haue beene for no small time, ready with their weapons in hand, expelling now one familie, and soone after another, from the State; and now the Nobles gaining superiouritie, after ward the popular fort; one side fauouring the A. torni, another the Fregosi, and at length reduced (by the benefit of prince Andrea Doria) to the present libertie which they now enioy. For Geneway being in the power of the French, and Doria departing from seruice to the King of France, to whom hee was Admirall: at one and the selfe same time, deliuered both himselfe and Countrey from feruilitie to the King of France, and queltionlesse with vnconquerable corage. For he might haue impatronised and possessed himselfe of the whole State, being entreated and euen (as it were) constrained by his friends, that he would vouchsafe to take the command of them: but he rather affected (setting aside all ambition) to restore them to their former freedom, with so much glory to him in future ages, as so rare an example in him did iustly merit: whereto (perhaps) hee might be the rather incited, by the enuie

he bare to Christopher Columbus, because, if he opened to modern people the other part of the world, which had for so many yeares beene shut vp from all other: so this other (with wel governed thoughts) spurning at all appetite of dominion, might open to his owne Citizens (with their libertie) the State so long lockt vp, by the discord of their owne opinions. Wherefore, deserviedly the Genewayes erected a Statue to his perpetuall glorie, and the memorable renowne of his immortal actions: as for his immodest gift by his worthy industrie, was done to Columbus, by the Princes of Spain.

Geneway thus receiving in anno 1528. her nouell reformation; entred vpon the same forme of gouernement which it now maintaineth. A description was then made, and therein set downe all the Families of account, as well noble as popular, appearing as descended of fixe houses in Geneway: and the reckoning grew so, that in Geneway there were found 28. Families. All the rest remaining out of this account, and yet were of some consideration, but not derived from those fixe houses: were aggregated and written downe in the aforesaid number of twentie eight families, by the title of Nobilitie, excluding the remainder of the people and Plebeians. And notwithstanding this entrance thus made, there was an addition to the number of these Nobles, of tenne persons in like sort ennobled, either for their riches or vertue, and these were made choice of euery yeare, applying their paines still fro hand to hand.

With all this providence, they could not yet so well preuaile, but in the yeare of our Lord, one thousand five hundred seauenty and foure, a new tumult arose in the Common-wealth, and as in the wonted ciuile dissensions: so a diuision happened that yeare, betwene two factions, termed olde and new. The principall occasion which moued this contention, was, that the olde side, being not contented to haue the greater part of authoritie in the Common-wealth; did mortally hate the new side, abhorring & disdaining (albeit that the new side, both for auncient Nobility, and true vertuous merit, were equal to them in all respects) to ioyne in kindred with them. This was infinitely infinitely displeasing to Matthio Senarega, a Citizen of inoffensive authority, and who (at that time) was great Chancellor, and chiefe Secretarie of the Common-wealth; also had beene principall of the new side more then once, and both of the publike & private Councell; with very singular Eloquence hee intreated them, affirming, that it was not well, that such diversitie of interests and private respects, should have lie in one and the same City: shewing also by lively reasons, how unachievable it was by every man, and likewise profitable for the State, that all should converse and like mutually together.

But the words and evident reasons of Senarez, failing of sufficient efficacy, puff'd up the olde side with greater obstinacie, yet drew a farre better opinion of the new, prouoking fo farre to defend them, that oftentimes he was in danger of his life among them. For the old side did great yemne, that the authoritie of Senarez should reach to such a height, that in him onely should be reposed, the efficacy of the publike and priuate gouernement. Neuerthelesse, Senarez opposing their pernicious demonstrations with wonderfull wisdom, mooued especially (as the same went) by a generous dislike, wrought in such fort, that the new side assumed the chiefe place in gouernement, excluding (well-neare) all the olde, constraining them to forsake their Countrey, if they attempted any Armes or violence against the new side.

These words would much have stirred the Common-wealth, if Senarega, fore-seeing the weighty perill, and preferring the publique good of all (being most iustly to be affected) before any private respect whatsoever, had not bridled the head-strong course of intended hostility. Wherefore he wrought so painfully with the Generall themselves, the Emperour, the King of Spain, and especially with Pope Gregorie the thirteenth, all faccording him with their helpful assistance, as the tumults in the City were quietted, and after some few desperate accidents, the furie of Armes was quite blasted, wherein both the faithfullnesse of Senarega, and his admir. ble welcome constantly appeared. He being appointed (by vniuersall consent). Ambassadors to Rome, with infinite providence and care (to the honour of the Common-wealth, and his owne great reputation) discretely qualified both factions, already growne to such a head on either side, both by power and maleuolence; as not only threatened danger to the Countrey it selfe, but likewise to haue filled all Italy with innumerable calamities and confusions; whereof the Pope (by his Breues) declared most honourable testimony, writing the actions of Sextus to the * Doge, as also to the Procurators of the Commonwealth of Genewy.

The great Council.

FROM the whole bodie of the before-recited Families, is congregated a Councell of foure hundred persons yerely, who together with the Duke and the Gouernours, haue the charge of the Common-wealth in their power.
This Councell maketh election of the Duke, and of the eight Gouernours, (because the Gouernours are the full number of eight) and haue care of the State for two yeares continuance. They manage matters of importance, and concerning generall good, as also for the confutation of the Segnoria: and these Gouernours (with the Duke) are properly called the Segnoria. But and if they are at any time to handle some occasions, which are not so important and weightie, but of meane consideration: The Segnoria haue a lesser Councell in readie seruice, consisting of an hundred men of the Nobilitie, elected by the Segnoria by lotterie, and out of the maine bodie of the foresayd four hundred.

The Duke.

THe head or chiefe of the Commonwealth is the Duke, because he hath the Title and Honour which appertain vnto him: and it is an ancient custome in the Citty, whereto by varietie of names, diuers persons haue attained, but by any course of Lawe. He continueth but two yeares, and in all that time of his authority, he dwelleth in the publique Pallace; hauing five hundred high Germaines as his Guard, representing Heretics in the forme of an absolute Soueraignetie. At the beginning of the assumption of his magistacie, for two dayes hee is clothed in his Ducall ornaments; but afterward, and the whole confidence of his regiment, hee weareth other habites, but yet of Velvet or crimson Sattin, and sometime purple. His authoritie is very important, because hee onely, and not any other, may propound what cause hee will in Councell and in the Senate, which is forbidden vnto any other Senatour. Whereupon, whoeuer would record any Lawe to the Common-wealth, or else propound a motion of some important matter, he must break it to the duke, and passe it by his meanes.

The manner of the Dukes elections is thus : The third day of the month of January, the Senate doth assemble with the lesser Councell, without the person of the passed Duke ; because hee hauing ended his Office of two years, returneth the first day of January home to his own house as a priuate person, and remaineth a Procurator all his life time . The lesser Councell with the Senate, doe elect among them (by ballot) eight and twenty Noblemen, one for each Familie, who so soone as they are chosen, are called in to the Pallace, and there (sitt vpp in a place by themselves, and there, together with those Senators, who eyther in regard of age, or by contumacie of the Families are not capable of the dukedome) they elect eightene men amongst themselves, one for a Familie; and those eightene, together with the fame Senators, doe elect another eight and twentie, which eight and twentie are called, and being lockt vp with the aforesayde Senators, they proceed by balloting them that are to bee propounded to the Councell to be Duke . But heere you must know, that they may propound no more to the great Councell, but foure persons onlie, and in the election of that number, it is necessarie, that the eight and twentie doe agree in two third parts among themselves, with the part of the aforesayde Senators . This being agreed between them, before they come forth of the Consiatorie, they elect another eight and twenty, one for each Family, who returne together with them, from balloting the aforesaid four. And they rise from their Election with the two thirds, and put in place of him or them (not formerly approved one, or more, but of the number of the Senate: which being done, the Councell meete together, and they propound the names of the four men concluded on and elected by the Electors: whereupon, hee of the four that hath the most ballots, is named for Duke. And at the time when I wrote this discourse in that honourable degree of Duke, was chosen the most courteous and famous Lord, Paulo Baptista Caluso, sometime a Iudge, a most worthy man, for goodnelle of life, and practise in the worlds occasions.

Of the eight Gouverneurs.

THEre sit vpon the Bench (with the Duke) eight Gouernours, as his counsellors, and their Office doth endure for two yeares: and they, with the duke are named the Signaria, and gouerne the Common-wealth. All these together cannot deliberate on any thing, wherein the interest of the people is concerned, or of any chiefe important business; but they call for the ayde of the Great Councell. These Gouernours are elected by two at a time, at fixe and sixe months; and their elections made in this manner.

The leffer Councell and the Duke being assembled together, they elect eight and twenty men, one for euery Familie, who being chosen by the Senate and Duke, doe propound sometimes twelue, sometimes foureteen men to the great Councell, who (by balloting) do make election of one of them at a time. The next day following, they obserue the same order in electing the second, to wit, the leffer Councell do elect another eight and twenty, and that eight and twenty performe the rest as hath beene said. Euery one of the eight Governours ending his office, remayneth Procurator or Attorney for two yeares space: so that in the Colledge of the Proctors, there are alwayes eight, that stand for the gouernement of the Common-wealth, and all these come into the Senate with the duke, and with the eight Governours, deliberadeliberating together on important matters; and thus with these Governours & the Duke consisteth the whole summe of the State. Two of them haue abiding in the Pallace, the other keepe at their owne houses; and they change by turnes two at a time, at three months, and three months.

Of the Procorators or Proctors.

Concerning these Proctors, some of them liuing, doe come to be in the Office of Duke, and some doe remaine in charge but two yeares, and they are such as haue bene Governours. They haue care for procuring all publike occasions, collecting the rents and reuenues, and other such like businesse, being men of chiefe reputation, and of no meane importance.

Of the Poteitate or Proctor.

AL the forenamed Magistrats, do onlie attend vpon the gouernement of the Common-wealth. Next now, concerning matters of Iustice and Iudgement (speaking first of criminall causes) they are guided and ordered in common by a forraigne Poteitate, who is a doctor, and they graunt him an honourable stipend. He hath his residence in a Pallace, which is neare to the Dukes, and he heareth and iudgeth all offences happenings; but can assigne no capitall punishment, without consent of the Senate. Two other Doctors, being strangers also, doe assist him, whereof the one is called the Iudge of Malefactours, and the other Fiscall or Attorney generall: and by the ayde of these two Iudges, all processe and suites are formed against guilty persons, dealing also in cases of like nature. Beside these afore-named, the Poteitate hath his Vicar, who attendeth vpon Civile causes, only executive.

Of the extraordinary Office.

There is an Office of seauen men, called Extraordinarie, and these do represent (as it were) the Princes person, because he is busied in administration of the Common-wealth. Their care consisteth, in reforming and prouiding of variances, and granting tutors to Schollers. And because contention is forbidden betwene Parents and Parents, and betwene poore and rich by ordination: these men doe appoynt what magistrate they meete, to heare offending parent and kindred, as also the strifes betwene poore and rich. Their Office continueth the space of sixe months, and is of much dignitie.

Of the five supreme Sindicators.

There is also a Magistracie, wherein are five men, called supreme Sindicators; They haue authority to arraigne, not onely the Duke, but the Governours also, after the expiration of their charge; and they haue the like power ouer all other magistrats of the Commonwealth, to punish both the Duke and Governours, finding them to bee delinquent.

And when the Duke is out of his Office, and that the Governours haue fulfilled their magistracie; a Proclamation is published by these Supreme Sindicators, That if any man haue ought to charge the Duke withall, or the Governours, let them appeare in their presence, and Iustice shall be done them. In which respect, the Duke and Governours haue eight dayes assigned them for this scindication; which being past, and they found in error, they are punished: but being innocent, they haue a Patent assigned them of their innocence, whereby they are after called to be Proctors; because they cannot enter as Proctors, except they haue the Patent from these Supreme men, to allow their expedition. Finally, the greatnesse of this Office is such, that the Common-wealth is elected for one of these Supreme Sindicators, the Prince Andrea Doria, the deliuerer of his Countrey. They are elected by the lesser Councell, with the Senate, and sit in the Pallace next to the Senate, for their respect.

Of the Rota.

Because wee haue formerly spoken of criminall occasions, now let vs say somewhat concerning civile causes. Wherein ye are to know, that the Common-wealth doe make choice of five do-

Such as the Duke arraigne the Officers of highest estimation to their Office

The Duke and Governours haue eight dayes for their triall.

Other Doctors, being strangers, appointed to determine in civile causes.

The Proctors come to the highest dignitie at all.

The Poteitate is an Officer chosen abroad and not of the city.

Two Iudges more assist him.

Seauen men represent extraordinary Officers, and what their charge is.

Of the Generall.

THE Common-wealth hath continually a Generall, who is appointed for Armes, to serue in all occurrences, and in times of warre. At this instant it enioyeth (well deserving such a degree, and to the satisfaction of all the Nobilitie, much pleasing to the whole host of Souldiers, and vniuersall liking of the people) the Lord Agustino Spinola, a most honourable and valiant Gentleman of that City, full of incomparable botanie and knowledge, not onely in the occasions of Armes, but for all managements of the world belike.

Of the Office of Saint George.

THE Office and Magistracie of Saint George, most noble among all the rest in the Cittie, was obtained in the yeare, 1497. It is now (by length of time) the confirmation of that Common-wealth, which, in those younger dayes had not any naturall riches or wealth, fitting the qualitie of such a Countrey: yet notwithstanding, it wanted not men of quicke and apprehensive iudgement, to find out the way, and forme some means for procuring of moneys, that might arise to common vse: whereupon, they that liued in those ancienter yeares, and gouerned the publike occasions, tooke vp moneys of particular persons, some by constraint, others with much willingness. And true it is, that in this money matter, such priuate persons as disburied any summes, the publike vse payed them, tenne, nine, eight and seauen in the hundred, according to the varietie of times, to the end, that they might not suffer any endammaging, by such seruice as they did for publike benefit.

Proceeding in this course, it made men willing, ready and cautelous, in seeking security for their moneys, dayly put into the publike Banque, by selling to some (as for example) the power and insurrection of toll for meates; to others, the imposts of wines, and to others the taxations layd on corne. And these contracts made both in publike and particular, was teamed among them Bargaining and Buying, as when particular men bought any thing of the common fort, or in generall.

Bbb And

tors, forraignes or strangers, at euery 2. yeares, which bodie of authoritie is called Rota. These men attend vpon Civile causes onely, and dwell in the Dukes pallace: All such matters as they censure on, are guided by ordinarie course of the Imperiall Lawes, forming their Processe and suite, according to the iudicarie order appointed for the Cittie, which is after the auncient manner.

Of the Censors.

NOW, as concerning Arts, Trades and Mysteries, Censors are appoynted to that charge. These men do provide, that buyers, sellers, and all such as trafficke in handi-crafts, shall haue measures, weights, and all things else to them belonging, iust, and according to the auncient Lawes. And here we are to obserue, that euery Art hath chiefe or head men, who are called Consulles, which make election of Artits amongst them. These Consulles haue authoritie in the matters of their Artes, and amongst these Consulles, such as deale in silks, may command much ouer their men: so that their power extendeth, to put them to the halter, to banish them, and perforce send them to the Gallies, or to giue other castigations to delinquents.

Of forty Capitaines.

IN the Cittie of Geneway there are forty Capitaines, of the number and bodie of the Nobilitie, and they are changed euery yeare. These men haue vnder them an hundred men (for one) of the people, so that they make (in all) foure thousand persons, and the Common-wealth is serued by them at all occasions. For they make a garde in time of the least suspicion; and when the Signoria is abroad, these forty Capitaines (bearing them company) are all clothed in Veluet, goodly and honourable ornaments, meete to attend on so great Lords. Moreover, all men in the City, and the whole Burrough, that are apt to carrie Armes, are registred downe, from the age of twentie, to threescore, and are reduced vnder the gouernment of these Capitaines, who (with them) stand alwayes obliged to be readily armed with weapons in hand, according to the auncient custome ordained.

Care for maintenance, such as deale in all profit-fits.

And it was ordained, that whosoever disbursed an hundred pounds, hee was said to hold one place among the buyers: he that disbursed two hundred, had two places; and hee for three hundred, three, and so it passed from hand to hand. So that this kinde of commerce and vñance multiplied greatly, and had names of diuers ordinations; as of the Capitoll, of Saint Paule, and others of their profession, by dealing in Salt, and diuers other beside, whose Titles and Names grew by their trading, and helde correspondencie particularly among the best Citizens, having care for iust payments, and the dues of the profits, with consideration of the Banquer, who alwayes ordered the contracts made publicly or privately. Heereupon, the number of dealers daily encreasing, both by forraigne Nations and home-bred friends, which required diuersitie of Governours and Ouer-seers, and which else would grow to great confusion: it was therefore ordered by the Signoria, that all the Banquers should bee reduced and vñied into one absolute Societie, and named the Company of Saint George.

Eight governors or Ouer-seers of the Banquers,
with their allowances.

Being thus ordained, they were also appointed to bee governed by eight Citizens from yeare to yeare, who provided and gaue order, how the Banquers should let out their summes, and receiue in their interests and allowances, whereby they held the emminencie in the Office of Saint George. And in regard they perceived, that this Office governed these matters with wisdom and iustice, businesse daily encreasing, and the number of places supplied by new persons: alienation of profits grew among the Commons, and the charge of the Office euery way to be greater, by reason of lands and communities interested with them, so that the Office attained to many priuiledges: first, by the Signoria of Geneway, and afterward of many Popes, Emperors and great Lordes, which came to dominion in the City: So that the Office of Saint George, although it depended on the common people, as also the Signoria of Geneway: yet all that came to the gouernement or Seignurie of the Cittie, were sworn to conserue the Priuiledges of the Magistracie of Saint George, and to maintaine it. And because (naturally) things take original of weake beginnings, and to in procelle of time attayne to perfection: euen to did this magistrall Office, being much better ruled now, then it could be at the beginning.

First, in answering the profits to all Banquers, they are not so determinate nor certayne, as at the original: but yet according to the proportion of former allowances, lesse or more, and according vnto expences for the conseruation of things of especial care, and according to the fruitfulness of tolles and taxationes, beside diuers other benefices, assigned by the Commons to the Banquers: they are farre more secure, and more neatly qualified, concerning mens consciences.

Moreover, this place hath obtained Seignurie and dominion by many good and sufficient allowances, which it could not haue at the beginning. Beside, euery way are made new rules and orders, whereby there is farre better expedition of Causes, for the punishing of delinquents, and submission of the people to gouernement.

And whosoever doeth consider, the high account of this Magistracie, shall finde the body of the Cittie; thereby to containe in it selfe two communities, the one great, the other lesse. The great is gouerned by the Pallace, and comprehendeth all the Cittie; the lesse is gouerned by Saint George onely, as concerning the occasions before remembered, and comprehendeth all the Banquers and changers.

The first Communitie, or the greater, is subiect to variation, and is many times vnder regiment, rather to bee tearmed Tyrannicall then otherwise: but the lesse is alwayes free, firme, and vnder the Citizens. And certainly, which is a matter admirable, and rarely found, eyther by Philosophers or others, that haue discoursed on causes concerning Common-weales, to obserue: that within the circuite of one and the same wall, and all at a time, there should be tyrannie and liberty, life ciuile and corrupt, iustice and licence.

Of eight Protectors of the Office of Saint George.

Concerning this Office of S. George, there are eight men appointed to gouern it, who are called Protectors. They continue for a yeare, and are elected euery six months foure times, by the whole number of the Banquers, or Creditors for lands, & Creditors for letting forth certain summes, after this manner. Among the whole number of City Creditors, by lot are chosen 80. men, who meeting together soone after their election, they make a sūuey among al those foure score, and select out of them foure and twenty by balloting, who being shut vp in a roome by themselves: they may not sūnder or depart, till they haue ballotted for the eight Protectors, and in this ballotterie, sixteene ballots doe confirme the election.

In the yeare 1444. an other Office was made of Saint George, consisting of men, which was then called the Office of foure and fortie, in regard of a thousand, out of which number: they were created. The occasion of creating these eight men, was, that being the space of thirty seven yeres, the Office had encreased and augmented, that the eight Protectors could not (in a whole yeare) terminate nor restrain the busie occasions happening, whereby the emoluments and interests of some creditors arose so great, and other moneys in diuers manners: it was thought fit (for setting downe good order to such Remaines, which were (in effect) the riches and substance of the office) that a necessary participation of the gaires should be digested, for the creation of such as should helpe in this prouident care, for generall vtilitie of the Office of Saint George, and yet to be carried in secret manner, for taking away all occasion of tyranny. And to eight Citizens were chosen, of which two are changed yearly: and they take charge of collecting and gouerning such ouer-plusses as do arise yearly, by the managements of the eight Protectors.

This Office hath vnder protection the Ille of Corsica, and many other Citties and important places: and thence ensue the expences layd out for their conseruation.

CHAP. II.

An excellent Relation, concerning the estate of Religion and Common wealth, which was obserued among the Iewes.

It is not to bee doubted, but by the singular counsell of our eternall God, the Father of our Lord Iesus Christ, who created mankind, whereby a Church might bee assembled and congregated: a perpetuall historie concerning the creation of things, was given to men.

And although that the Philosopher Democritus, and others like to him, dreamed of an eternitie of a former world, or else of innumerable worlds, and made a mockerie at the beginning of things, and thought such a recital to be but fabulous: yet notwithstanding wee holde them to be most true, considering, that Almighty GOD approved the Writings of Moses by apparant testimonies, as by the raising vp of the dead and others.

Now, albeit wee receiue the auncient Historie of the Church, and singularly allow it for the Diuine authorities: yet there are many more Euidences of truth besides; for, the auncient names of people, doe agree with the succession of the Fathers that related them, and the order of Empires hath bene such, as they were foretold to be, and so should be in their succeeding times.

The Propheticall Historie then is the truest, and the most auncient of all others; and the reason of that continued Historie, was, not onlie to let vs know the beginning of mankind: but much more to notifie vnto vs, the Promises of the Sonne of God, and to giue vs certainty of the first, and no way to be corrupted doctrine of God, and of the restifications so oftentimes rendered to other by that doctrine, what the gouernement of the Church hath bene; for it was preferred in the diuersitie of tumults amongst Empires, like to a Shippe floating vpon raging and tempestuous billows, what the battailes of the Church haue bene, and the exercises of Faith.

Now, it was a great blessing of God, that hee gaue a certayne seating vnto his Church, euen as an Academic, for more then sixteene hundred yeares in a commodious place, betweene two most potent Kingdomes of Egypt and Babylon, to the end, that throughout them both the voyce of his doctrine might be heard. There the Promises were repeated, and the Miracles adiuised, which are witnesses of the presence of God: whose will was to haue those things set downe in writing, to the end that Posteritie might be informed by true doctrine, in the conflicts of the Church, and her manifold recoveries.

And although nothing is found in writing by publike authority, touching the last times, yet notwithstanding, our Lord was careful to haue the latter Historie knowne, which hath bene declared partly by Isephus, and partly by Philo, whereof I haue made a collection, because the more studious might enioy a continuall Historie of the Iewish people, euen to the destruction of Ierusalem. And it pleased God, that a continued successe of histories should remaine to men: for seeing that Propheticall histories reached so farre as the reigne of the Persians, or to King Cyrus; the Greeke and Latine histories afterward, reported the great mutations of the following Empires, which also was seconded after by the Apostles writings, concerning the Sonne of God, borne of the Virgine Marie, crucified and raised againe; and after the Apostles, Eusebius, Epiphanius, and Nicephorus pursued in the Ecclesiasticall History. Wherein I make no doubt, but all such as are well aduised, will confesse, that the knowledge of the order of Times is necessarie, to understand when the Doctrine was revealed, the Sonne of God manifested, the Church congregated in diuers kinds, sometimes agitated by tempestuous stormes; and yet (after all) graciously deliuered. Wherefore, let vs giue thanks to God, for bestowing on men the continued Historie of his Sonne; and let vs keepe such Writings religiously: wherein hauing taken some paines, I hope it will proue pleasing to all Christian Readers.

CHAP. III.

A Catalogue of the High-Priests, or soueraigne Sacrificers, beginning with Seria and his sonne Ioseph.

BOth these were led captiue into Babylon, by Nabuchodonosor King of the Chaldeans, and dyed in exile. Ishus or Iesus, the sonne of Ioseph, came backe into Iudea with the Prince Zorobabel, sixe hundred and thirtie yeares before the Natiuitie of Christ. He liued vnder the Kings of Persia, Cyrus, Cambyses, Darius the sonne of Hystaspes, Xerxes, euen to the twentieth yeare of Artaxerxes, Long-hand, and presided (as chiefe Priest) first sixe and thirtie yeares. Afterward, in regard that the building of the Temple was hindered, he went into Babylon to Darius, the sonne of Hystaspes, whom the Holy Historie nameth Ashuerus, and was absent the space of eight yeares. After his returne hee was twenty yeares more in the high-Priesthood. Philo is of opinion, that he wrote the Historie of Iudith, which others (neuerthelesse) holde to be more ancient.

The

The sonne of Iesus was Iachim.

Iachim helde the Priest-hood eight yeeres, in the absence of his brother, and eight and fortie yeares after his death. Hee liued vnder Long-hand, and Darius the Bastard, vntill the twelfth yeare of Artaxerxes Ashuerus, who was also named Atmenon; hee did set downe in writing the Historie of Hister, and the memorie of Phurim was by him instituted, as Philo writeth.

Elijah was his sonne, who was in Office of the Soueraigne Priest-hood one and twentie yeares, vntill the foure and thirtieth yeare of the reigne of Artaxerxes Atmenon.

Iudas or Ioiada sonne to him, was high-Priest foure and twenty yeares; vntill the third yeare of the reigne of Darius, who succeeded next to Atmenon.

Iohn and Iesus were his sonnes, the latter whereof beeing fiered with ambition, insinuated himselfe (by the power of giftes) into the fauour of Vogeses, Satrape of Persia, to take (by his helpe) the chiefe Priest-hood from his Brother: But immediately hee payed the penaltie due vnto his wicked presumption; for in a debate and blowes being moued in the temple, he was slaine by his brother. Heere was the beginning of the euils in Iudea, about an hundred, sixtie and seauen yeares, after the returne from Babylon.

Iohn hauing murdered his brother Iesus in the Temple, was the cause of bringing the people into a miserable seruitude. For, the Satrape Vogeses being aduertised of the death of his friend Iesus, entred with a mightie Armie into Ierusalem, prophaned and pilled the Temple, saying, That he might aswell doe so, as the high-Priest to soyle it with the blood of his owne Brother: he collected the tribute money rigorously for the space of seauen yeares together, proceeding therein so saire, as forcing the Iewes to pay an hundred crownes of the Sonne, for every beaſt that they sacrificed. Iohn held the high-Priest-hood foure and twenty yeares, euen vnto the death of Oebus, and the beginning of the reigne of Artanes.

His Sonnes were Iudas and Manasses.

Manasses following the example of Iesus, to strengthen himselfe against his brother, made alliance with Sannabalat the Chutean, sent Satrape by the last Darius into Samaria, and tooke to wife his daughter Nicossa. But in regard of this vnlawfull marriage, hee was reuelled from the Sacerdotal Office, with diuerſe others for the same cause. Beeing bereft of the Priest-hood, hee made his recourse to his Father in lawe in Samaria, who after he had obayne leave of Alexander the Great; builded a new Temple vpon an high mountayne in Samaria called Garizim, shapening it after the forme and magnificence of that at Ierusalem, and there hee caused his sonne Manasses to preside.

This diuision of High-Priests, was afterwards the cause of great tumults in Iudea; for, as all they which were expelled from Ierusalem, for transgressing the Ceremonies of Moses Lawe, as also for some other offences, betooke themselves to this new Temple: in a short time after, they grew to such an head and strength, that inciting those Sacrificers, Apostates and Samaritans against the Iewes: it likewise gaue occasion to many riotous courses and theueries on either side.

Nothing was found by posteritie of this Manasses: but two hundred yeares after, the Temple on this Mount of Garizim was destroyed from the toppie to the bottome, by Iohn Hircanus, sonne vnto Simon the Asmonean, and Successor to him.

Iudas administred the high-Priesthood for seauen and twentie yeares, vnder Artanes, and the latter Darius, euen to the time of Alexander the Great. He depriued his brother Manasses (and the rest) of the right of Priesthood, because (contrary to the Law of Almighty God) they had married with strange women. While Alexander the Great besieged the Citie of Tyre, hee demanded aide and tribute of this Iudas, such as the Iewes had formerly payed to the Persians. Whereunto he returned answer, That in the life time of Darius (to whom hee tooke his oath)

But Iddus beeing thereof admonished in a dreame, tooke his Priestlie garments, and went to meete him in great humilitie, accompanied with all the Sacrificers and Citizens. Alexander beholding the Soueraigne high Priest, alighted on his feete, and gaue vnto him reuerend adoration. Being demanded what should moue him to reuerence an enemy, that came with ſubmiſſiue entreatie vnto him: hee replied: At the time of my abiding in Macedon, and thinking on the Empire of Asia, a man was presented to mee in my sleepe, in the same or like habite as the High Priest wearres, who perswaded mee to undertake the expedition of Asia, and gaue mee good hope of prosperous successe.

When hee was entered the Citie, he was so farre from offering the least taste of an enemy, that, after hee had sacrificed, headonred the Temple with magnificent gites, and at his departing hee gaue them libertie to vse the Lawe of their Fore-fathers, and the immunities of the leauenth yeare, wherein the fields were not sowne.

The sonnes of Iddus were Onias and Manasse.

Manasse Nephew to Eleazar.

Concerning Manasse, wee reade not any thing, but that hee succeeded next to his Nephew Eleazar, and was a friend to Seleucus Gallenicus, and that vnder his gouernement, the Samaritanes being disleased at the Iewes in despite of the Temple, and seruices there performed, they put to fire and sword the whole territory of Ieruſalem. Some are of opinion, that this man was not the brother to Onias, but rather the brother vnto his wife, and make thereabout some controuersie.

A Catalogue of the High Priests Onias called the Ancient.

In this mans time, Ptolome, the sonne of Lagus, desiring to make the people of the Iewes become tributaries; as hee entered vpon a Sabaoth day into the Citie of Ieruſalem, to offer Sacrifice (the Iewes not daring to take Arms, for feare of doing contrary to the Law) vsed great cruelty against the Inhabitants, of whom he led away into Egypt some thousands, as captiues and hostages.

The cruelty of Ptolome against the Iewes.

The Sonnes of Onias were Simon and Eleazar.

Simon was named Iustus, for pietie and benignitie towards his Nation. The Iewes enioyed peace vnder him, all the while as the Successours of Alexander the great, Antigonus, Demetrius, Seleucus and the rest, fought in Asia and Greece for the Monarchie.

Simon admired Iustus for his piety and was gracious to him.

Eleazar succeeded after his brother Simon, as Tutor to Onias the second, being as yet a child. In his time, Ptolome Philadelphus enfranchised about an hundred thousand Iewish slaues, led into Egypt, partly by the Kings of Perſia, partly by his father Ptolome the sonne of Lagus.

An hundred thousand Iewes got liberty by Ptolome Philadelphus.

Moreouer, he sent Ambassadors with magnificent Presents to Eleazar the high Priest, requesting to haue three score and twelue Iewes, that could translate the Writings of Moses and the Prophets, out of the Hebrew language into the Greeke. Which being done, hee sent them backe againe with great gites, and a Table of golde dedicated to the Temple, and other Presents of especiall value. His vnckle Manasse succeeded after his death; vnckle by the mother only, according to some: for the Greeke word signifieth vnckle both by father and mother.

The 3 sonnes of Simon, and a daughter also.

Simon had three sonnes, Tobias, whom Philo and Saint Luke in his third chapter calleth Mattathias; Ioseph, that pacified Ptolome. And Annas Thyranus, the last Prince of the Iewish people, of the Lineage of Iuda, and house of Daniel: who liued himselfe, for feare of Antiochus the Noble.

After this man, the high Priests drew vnto themselves the gouerning in all affaires.

The daughter of Simon the high Priest

Priest, was married to Tobias, of the house of Daniel.

Onias being left a child by his Father, at last, in his age succeeded to Manasse in the High-Priest-hood. By his auarice he offended Ptolome, King of Egypt, and raised him in rage against the Iewes, because hee refused to pay the ordinary tribute. For the high-Priests were wont to pay their reuennues yearly to the Kings of Egypt for their Citizens, amounting to twenty Talents, that is, twelue thousand crownes of the Sunne. But Ioseph afterward appealed Ptolome, who was Nephew to Onias by the Sisters side, a Prince of the posterity of Daniel.

Onias succeeded his sonne Simon.

Philo saith, that he was surnamed Iustus. Vnder him, Iesus the Sonne of Syrach wrote his Booke called Ecclesiasticus. And that Simon had three sonnes also, who (each after other) quoynted the Priest-hood, which Iosephus testifieth apparently. The Sonnes of Simon, were,

Onias. Iesus, otherwise called Iason. Onias, also called Menelaus.

The great Onias is commended in the second Booke of the Machabees, for his piety and iustice, and is saide, that hee was a friend to Seleucus, Brother to Antiochus the Noble; who sometimes furnished all necessary affaires in the Temple, with the reuennues of the Realme of Syria. But afterward, another man, called Simon, who had the charge of keeping the Temple, hauing conceyued malice against Onias the high-Priest, reported to King Seleucus, that there was an infinite masse of gold hidden in the Temple, which the Priests applied to their own priuate vses. And this was the cause, that the king wold no longer furnish the Temple with the wonted monyes; but also sent Heliodorus, to make seizure on the wealth, and commit it to the Kings Treasury. But as hee would haue audaciously haue entered (with his followers) into the secret place of the Temple, he was smitten downe, & very neere dead, yet recovered againe by diuine mercy, and by the prayers of Onias.

Heliodorus sent to seize on the wealth and treasure of the temple.

Afterward, the discord so encreased betweene the Prince of the high-Priests, and the Traitor Simon, that many murders were committed by the friends of Simon; which made Onias to retire himselfe towards the King Seleucus, and gaue way to the fury of his enemies. But before Onias could get thither, Seleucus was dead, and Iason, Brother to Onias, had obtained by bribes and gits to Antiochus the Noble (succeeding the deceased King) the administration of the high-Priests office. Whereupon, Onias doubting King Antiochus as much as his Brother; durst not go to him, but went to a ſeie place, neere to Daphne, a city of Syria, & being drawne thither by deceitfull means, was also slaine by Andronicus, Lieutenant to the King, and at the request of Antiochus, who Iason hauing expulſed, possessed himselfe of the high Priests Office, as heereafter shall be declared.

Iason getteth the High Priests Office from his Brother Onias.

The murder of great Onias.

The Sonne of this Onias the Great, was Onias.

Onias being left young at his Fathers death, and afterward growing to more ripenesse of yeares; standing in feare of Alcinus the high-Priest, he fled into Egypt to Ptolome Philometor, accompanied with some of his fellow citizens. There Ptolome gaue him permission, to builde a Towne and a Temple, in the Territory of Heliopolis, in resemblance of that at Ieruſalem; which was called Onion, five great miles from Memphis, now called the great Cayro. For in regard that Ptolome waged warre with Antiochus the Noble, & stood in need of his neighbours succors; he was perswaded by Onias to builde a Temple, as if by that meanes, all the people of the Iewes would league with the Kings of Egypt, & take their part. About 230. yeeres after this Temple was built, at the same time as the City and Temple of Ieruſalem were ruined, it was also depoyled of all her Iewels, and shut vp by Edict from Vespasian the Emperour.

Onias flyeth into Egypt, to Ptolome Philometor.

The building of a new temple in Egypt.

The Sonnes of this Onias, dwelling in Egypt, were Helcias and Annas.

Theſe two Brethren, beeing Colonels of the Egyptians Army, ayded valiantly Cleopatra; so that her Sonne Lathyrus being excluded, she obtained the kingdom.

The two brethren Commanders of the Egyptians Army.

But after that Ptolomy had recollectd his forces, and passing into Egipt through Iudea, Heliodorus putting him to flight with his Army, died in Syria of a sharpe disease. For the rest, wee reade nothing of the posterity of the high-Priests of Egipt.

Iefus, named Iafon also, second Sonne to Simon, after the death of Seleuchus, bought of Antiochus, brother and succesor to Seleuchus, the high-priesthood, for five hundred Talents, that is to say, three Tunnes of gold, as wee speake vulgarly, promising him beside as an over-plus, forty eight thousand crownes of the Sun, as an annual tribute. And to gaine himselfe more grace with this wicked King, he builded places in Ierusalem, for the exercising of young people, in such pastimes as he had instituted, and these were to bee performed, at such times as the people vied in dance in the Temple. He receiued and magnificently entertained Antiochus Epiphanes with his Army, with Lamps and flaming fires, & songs composed in praise of the King: and this was at such time as the King departing thence, planted Garisons of strength in the Fortresses of Ierusalem, and this was but a beginning to the intolerable seruitude which afterward followed.

Iafon hauing enjoyed the high-Priesthood three yeares, sent his Brother Menelaus with gold and great charge to Antiochus: but now hee prouoed to be payed with coyne of the same stampe, as before he had done to his brother Onias; for by the same crafty contriuing, Menelaus set him quite before the Priesthood. And Iafon standing now in feare of Menelaus, withdrew into the land of the Ammonites, where he closely concealed himselfe, vntill a false rumour ran abroad, that Antiochus entred Egipt, dyed. These newes so cheered vp his drooping spirits, that being accompanied with a thousand men in arms, he intruded vpon the City, where being fauoured by the inhabitants, for the rapines and cruelties committed by Menelaus; he slew many of Antiochus his faction, and compelled Menelaus to saue himselfe in the Syrians Garisons kept in the Forts.

But hearing the returne of Antiochus from the Land of Egipt, and losing all hope of the Priesthood, againe he retired among the Ammonites, of whom he could not now be receiued, standing in feare of Antiochus, who was weere at hand with his army. Expulled also (for the same reason) by Antiochus, King of Archie, out of his marches, and hauing no access into Egipt, & lastly forsaken of all; he passed by Sea to the Lacedemonians, among whom hee was concerned in kindred: and yet, as a iust punishment for his ambition, he dyed very poorly in banishment.

Onias, named Menelaus also, the third Sonne of Simon, according to Iosephus (albeit in the second Booke of the Maschabees, he is not said to be the Sonne of Simon the High-Priest, but brother to one Simon, of the Tribe of Beniamin, who had charge of the Temple, as we slide before in speaking of Onias) being sent to King Antiochus the Noble, by Iafon, Prince of the sacrificing Priests, with money and commission about important affaires, did so cunningly insinuate himselfe, into the good grace of the King and his Courtiers, that by promising three hundred Talents (which is an hundred and fourscore thousand crownes of the Sun) more then all that which Iafon payed, and accusing him of diuers crimes beside: he preuailed so farre, that the Soueraigne Priesthood was taken from Iafon, and conferred on him in his stead.

This dignity thus obtained, he persued the same impieties as Iafon did, in the customes and manners of the Pagans, & farre exceeding him in rapines and cruelties. For at the entring into his gouernment, to make himselfe the surer of so ill gotten honour; he slew Onias, eldest Son to Simon his brother, as Iosephus affirames, who being exiled, kept close in a fringed place neere Daphne, a Towne in Syria; there hee caused him to be murdered by Andronicus (Gouernour of Calassyria) by fraud and treason, and for which offence, Andronicus was sentenced with death by the King.

Afterward, being vnable to furnish the great payment of money hee had promised to the King; he sold many vessels of gold, which he had covertly stolne out of the Temple: which sacriledge comming to be knowen, great mutinies were moued among the people. At length, Menelaus was accused and conuincied by three Ambassadors, sent from Ierusalem to Tyre. But by the meanes of a Courtier, named

The High-Priest Office bought for 500 Talents.

The entrance of King Antiochus into Ierusalem.

Iafon is iustly requiured for treachery to his brother Onias.

Iafon sooner encouraged, and as quickly daunted a gaue.

Ptolomy (soundly corrupted with money) hee was absolved and the King pacified, preuailling withall so farre, that his accusers were executed for calumniators: and he returning backe to Ierusalem, began againe to tyrannize ouer the Citizens.

Much about this time, for the space of forty dayes, there appeared in the Heauens, hostes or bands of men, fighting both on horsebacke and foote: which prodigious signes, prognosticated the horrible calamities which soone after were to follow. For as Antiochus was leading his Army (the second time) into Egipt, purposing to vsurpe the Country by open warre, seeing he could not do it vnder colour of Guardianship, because Ptolomy Philometar (his Nephew) was yet but young: Iafon rushed into the City with his Army, againe to repulse his brother from the Priesthood, ouer-comming a great number of the Inhabitants, that tooke part with Antiochus and Menelaus. Who finding his strength too feeble, fled to the Fortresses and Garisons of the Syrians, dispatching messengers vnto Antiochus for better ayde.

And now Antiochus being vrged thereto by the rigorous command of the Romans, and deliuered by Popilius left Egipt, comming thence in a raging madness, fearing a further reuolt of the Iewish Nation. Hauing brought his Army before the City, hee found the Gates fast shut, and the inhabitants ready to defend themselves. Whereat being vexed, he forced into the City without any great difficulty: because Menelaus with his faction, and the Syrian Garisons ran vp and downe in the City, and put to the Sword many Citizens, and giuing entrance to the enemy at the Gates. Being entred, Antiochus charged his people to kill all that they met with in Armes, and not to spare either age or sexe: so that within three dayes space, fourescore thousand men (or thereabout) were slaine in Ierusalem, beside diuers thousand ledde away captiues, and sold for slaues.

The King, conducted by Menelaus, entred into the most holy part of the Temple, touching with his polluted hands the sacred Vessels, which he caused to be carried thence into Syria, with a thousand, eight hundred talents of treasure. as much to say, as eleuen Tuns of gold of our mo-nie: which treasure had bin partly giuen to the Temple, and partly was put there in trust for the benefite of widowes and orphans, as into the onely surest place both for reuerence and sanctity. So, after Antiochus had restored Menelaus to the high-Priesthood againe, and had planted strong Garisons in the City (whereof Philip of Phrygia was Captaine, a man very bloody and cruell) hee returned backe to Antioche again with his great booty. Two yeares after, fearing a reuolt of the Iewes, he sent the Colonell Appolonius to Ierusalem, with two and twenty thousand men, who expresse no countenance of an enemy, but encamped without the City, attending for the Sabbath day, and then giuing the determined signall, hee slew & massacred the vnarmed multitude, that came forth to behold the Campe of the Syrians. Then entring violently into the City, hee put all to the edge of the sword that withstood him, robbing, spoiling, & burning it in many places, throwing downe the walles and fortifications: yet rampaing the Walles and Bulwarks, in that part called, The City of David, and planting there a potent Garison.

This was a preparatiue, to attaine (in time) to the Kings full ayme, who purposing to turne (perforce) the Iewes from the Law of their fore-fathers (a thing which he knew they would withstand to their vermost power) first of all he gaue order, to dispossesse them of Armes and Weapons, leaving them naked of all munitions, succour and resistance. This discomfiture made by Appolonius in Ierusalem, soone after the King sent thither Athenas, another of his Colonels, with an especial Edict, whereby he commanded all Nations that were in subiection to him, to vse (in euery kingdome) the same Religion which the Greekes did: prohibiting expressly to the Iewes, the vse of circumcision, & other ordinances commanded them by God. He likewise planted Garisons aswell in Ierusalem, as in other Cities and Townes of Iudea, to inflict cruell punishment on all them, that did not obtemperate the Kings Edict. Beside, the Temple was prophaned by the Kings Command, and the Image of Iupiter Olympus worshipped in the Sanctuary, euen in the Sanctum Sanctorum, and many pillarizes and whoredomes committed with-within the circuite of the Temple. Moreover, by the same Edict Royall, the holy Bookes were forbidden ingenerall, and that man iudged worthy of death, with whom the Booke of the Law should be found; yea, and seuerer inquisition made for it every Moneth.

As thus the Cittizens of Ierusalem were disarmed, oppressed, & very strong Garisons planted ouer them: euen so were they destitute of any Captain, not daring to vie force or opposition, against the wicked commands and excecutive tyrannies of Antiochus: considering also, that Menelaus the foueraigne High-Priest, had formerly instituted the behaviourss ved among Pagans in Ierusalem, to keepe himselfe in his dignity, & in the Kings fauour, approving and assisting all his enterprizes; in which respect, many that made veruous profession of the Law given by God, were most inhumanely murdered by the Soldiours of Antiochus, and their goods confiscated. Others (in great numbers) forsaking the City, and leaving all their goods behinde them, went to hide themselves in Caves and desert places, as Mattathias the Asmonean withdrew (accompanied with his children) into the little Village of Modin.

In the second Booke of the Machabees is described the horrible punishing of two women, who were accused to the Lieutenant of Antiochus, that they had circumcised their children, contrary to the Kings Edict. Whereupon, they were condemned, and (for a terror to other) they were led naked through the streetes of the City, their infants strangled, hanging at their breasts, and afterward throwne downe from the top of the City wall. There is also set downe, the seuen Brethren & their Mother, tormented with most exquisite tortures; and yet they helde fast the profession of the Law. By which horrible cruelties, iudgement may be made, aswell of the extreme rigour of Antiochus, as also the miserable estate of Gods people: of whom, some reliques were yet referred, by means of the Asmoneans, raised up by God, to repress the rage of Antiochus, & to maintaine the Law of God by Armes, as hereafter shall be declared.

In the meane time Menelaus, Author, beholder and promoter of these iniquities vpon the people; retayned still the title of Soueraigne high Sacrificer, euen then when Iudas Machabeus took (by power) the City and the Temple: he being then hid in the Fortresse, vnder the protection of the Syrians, vntill that after the death of Antiochus the Noble, his Son Antiochus Eupator, hauing seized on Ierusalem, concluded peace with Iudas Machabeus, and by the perswasion of Lysias, brought him captiue into Syria, as the first brand of all the warre, and of the overthrowing of the Syrian Armies by the Asmoneans; and there he was also slaine, after he had held the high-Priesthood twelue yeares. This was the last Sacrificer of the posterity of Aaron, to whom the diuine right appertained, for administration of the Soueraigne Priesthood. For Antiochus Eupator appointed in the place of Menelaus, a certaine man named Alcimus, who might bee of Aaron posterity; but not of the Family of that Iesus, who with Zorobabel had returned from Babylon into Iudas. This Alcimus presided foure yeares, and then dyed of a sudden sicknesse, two yeares after the death of Iudas Machabeus.

Alcimus being dead, the Temple and the people was leauen yeares without a Soueraigne high-Priest, vntill such time as the power of Jonathan encreased, who was the Brother of Iudas: when the dignity of the Priesthood was transferred (by consent of the people) into the Family of the Asmoneans; where it remained so long, as to the beginning of the Reigne of Herod, about 116 yeares.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the Asmoneans, being the second Family.

As much to say, as them of the posterity of Simon, to whom the principality, as well of the High-Priesthood, as also of the Jewish people being transferred, it continued from the time of Antiochus the Noble, vntill the Reigne of Herod.

Simon. John. Mattathias.

THE Sacrificer of the Family of Iosiah of Ierusalem, dwelling in the Village of of Modin, did first oppose himselfe against Antiochus the Noble; who, by horrible torments constrained the Jews to transgress their Law, and to deale in those behauiours ved among the Pagans; in the hundred, forty and five yeare of the kingdome of Syria, an hundred fifty and nine yeares after the death of Alexander, and an hundred sixty and five yeares before the birth of Christ. For Mattathias seeing a certaine Leu, who (to please the King) sacrificed a forbidden beast vpon a Pagan Altar, it being prohibited by the diuine Law: enflamed with a iust and holy zeale (in the pretence of the Cittizens of his owne Nation, suffering such a wicked acte to be done, as also of the Kings Lieutenant) slew the offender, and then beating downe the Altar, deliuered arms to all them, who (making more account of the word giuen by God, then the threatenings of a Pagan King) had forsaken their goods and liued in the Deserts, from whence many returning daily; hee leuiued a great Army, by whose helpe he deliuered worthily the neighbouring Townes, from the Idolatries of Antiochus, and replanted the feruor and ordinances commanded by the Law diuine.

But this valiant man, deeply slept in age, after hee had (for a yeares space) led this beelied wandring troope, and after he had exhorted his Sonnes to the study of piety, as also the valiant defending of the Law giuen by God, against the wicked Edicts and torments of Antiochus, reconciling them all to concord and mutuall reuerence, dyed peaceably, in the year 146. of the Kingdome of Syria; 160. after the death of Alexander; and 164. before Christ was borne.

Mattathias had five Sonnes. Iudas, Jonathan, Simon, John, and Elezazar.

Elezazar, otherwise called Amran or Amran, a very hardy young man, after hee had performed many valiant deeds; in the first yeare after his Fathers death, going to succour Antiochus Eupator, Sonne to Antiochus the Noble, with his brother Iudas, hee saw (among other) a goodly Elephant, exceeding in greatnesse & rich furniture. Whereby, hee imagining that the King should be vpon him, ran towards him boldly, and slaying many Soldiours euery where about him, got vnder the Elephant, and giuing a deadly stabbe in his belly, the Elephant fell downe vpon him, and thereby was the death of Elezazar.

John, surnamed Gaddis, after the death of his brother Iudas, was sent by Jonathan, and Simon his other brethren into Arabia, with the Jewels & precious things which they had conquered in warre, to place them in the custody and guard of the Arabians; but the Ammonites layed ambushes by the way for him, and hauing slaine him, tooke also the spoyles away from him and his traine.

Iudas was surnamed also Machabeus, which diction in Hebrew is written Machabai, whereof each letter signifieth a word taken from the Song of Moses in Exodus, in these expresse words: MECAMOCHA BAILEM YEHOUA? That is to say: Who is like unto thee (O Lord) among the Gods? Iudas (using this sentence for his Motto or device, and making of a phrase of the first Letters of the foure words, caused himselfe to bee surnamed Machabeus). His father being neere his death, appointed him the cheefe guide & Leader of the poore and miserable multitude: who had rather endure all afflictions whatsoeuer, then renounce the doctrine giuen them by God. Soone after the death of his Father, he ouercame the Army of Apollonius, and made vte of his Sword in all the battles hee fought afterward with a small band of men; hee vanquished the Army of Sidon, Governour of Syria, who was slaine in the field, and with him 8000. men. These victories obtained the first yeare, made Iudas Machabeus highly renowned. The yeare following, which was the 147. of the Greeke reigne, Antiochus went into Persia with his Army, and left in the kingdome of Syria, Lysias, as Regent and Governour to his Son Antiochus Eupator, giuing him expresse charge to destroy the Jews. For the execution of which command, Lysias sent into Palestine, forty thousand foote, and seuen thousand horse, vnder the conduct of Ptolomy, Nicanor and Corgias his Colonels, who entred hostily with their Armies into Iudas, and encamped before the Village of Emmaus; Iudas, perceiving perill, led his Army into Mispas, a place (long agone) built before the Temple of Ierusalem, and very famous for Religion.

There he publicly commanded a fast, giving charge, that by earnest and hearty prayer they should craue of God, that to small a handfull of men (for hee had but three thousand apt for warre with him) might valiantly defend themselves against so great a power of enemies. Which being done, he renoued his Campe, and went directly to confront the hoast of his aduersaries, and setting vpon them in the night season, droue them to flight, & slew three thousand with the Sword. Vpon the successe of this exploite, hee went to seeke the other part of the Army, which was guided by Gorgias, who intended to steele vpon the Jewes in the dead time of night. But Gorgias hearing the former defeature, and perceiuing the smoake of lighted fires in the Campe of the Jewes, fled away in haste with his forces. So Iudas, with so siliy a power of people, enforced the huge hoasts of his enemies vnto flight, and got very great booties from them.

Lyfias hauing intelligence of his mens ill successe, being mad with anger, leuied a farre greater power, to make fresh warre vpon the Maccabees. And the yeare following, which was the 148. of the Greekes reigne, himselfe in person (for hee grew distrustfull of his Captaines) accompanied with threecore thousand foote, all of them pickt and chosen men, & fise thousand horse, invaded Iudas, by passing thorow Thumes. And as he was encamped in Bethsura, on the Frontiers of Iudas, Iudas Maccabeus came to meete him with ten thousand men (so much was the number encreased, of them that detested Ethnick Idolatry) and after hee had inuoked publicly the ayde of God, hee fought with the enemy.

Iudas encountereth the great Army of Lyfias.

Lyfias perceiuing how courageously the Jewes fought, as men that meerey despised death, breaking furiously through his ranks, his men beginning to turne their backs, and fise thousand of them heuen in peeces; rallied together his scattered troopes, and led them backe to Antioche, hoping to speede better at another time with a new expedition. Where in he was preuented, by the death of Antiochus the Noble, who being repulst frō besieging Persepolis, as hee led backe his Army in ill order by Babylon, and being informed (by the way) what bad successe his Armies had sustained in Iudas, he fell first into a greuous vexation of spirit, & afterward of body, so that his intewines were finitied with horrible diseases. Yet being nothing the milder by this visitation, but rather more vehemently pronounced against the Jewes: after his returne, he purposed a speedy iourney to Iudas; there to raze their Cities, especially Ierusalem, and vterly to extirpate the Iewish Nation. But as he proceeded on in this violent resolution, and making too much haste on the way, the Chariot (wherein he lay like) was ouerturned, and his body to bruised against the ground, also the extremity of his impatience so violent, that his blood souer-boyled, his euerailes putrified, and his flesh outwardly rotted, yielding forth a most loathsome and intolerable stinke, so that in wonderfull torments, he gaue vp the ghost, acknowledging the diuine vengeance of Heauen. Thus died this most cruell Tyrant, in the 148. yeare of the Greekes reigne; of his owne 12. and the fourth, after those many robberies, as well of the Temple, as the City of Ierusalem.

The returne of Iudas to Ierusalem, & his purging the Temple.

Iudas Maccabeus, much encouraged by this so notable a victory, conducted his Army to Ierusalem; where hee cleansed the Temple, formerly defiled and profaned by the seruice of Idols, and offered sacrifices according to the Law, in the yeare of the Greekes, 148. before Christs Nativity, 162. the 25. day of the Month of Chisseu, that is to say, November; the very same day, that (three yeares before) it had bene robbed & profaned by Antiochus, placing therein Images and Idols. He builded also Sion, and strongly munited Bethsura, that it might serue as a Fortresse against the Tumans.

Iudas went daily with his Army into the Temple.

Hauing done this, he kept his Armour daily on his backe, because he was still assailed by the Idumeans, Asmonites, and others, who laboured to ouerthrow the power of the Iewish Nation, which began to exalt itselfe in some good measure. But the brethren of the Maccabees, repelled those insulting Nations worthily, diuiding their Armies, & fighting fortunately in many places at a time, yet vning their victories rudely enough. In the 150. yeare of the Greekes, Iudas laid siege before the Forts of Ierusalem, which from the Garrison made many courses; killing such

(such as would sacrifice in the Temple, & very much molested the Citizens. But Antiochus Eupator, being vrged by Menelaus, to lend him aide, for reliefe of them that were besieged in the forts; sent an army into Iudas by Lyfias, consisting of 10000. foote, and 20000. horse; and besieged Bethsura a long time. In the meane while, Iudas being aduertised of the Kings comming in person thither, raised his siege from before the forts, and went to meete the enemy with his Souldiers, of whom he made some slaughters in diuers skirmishes. Yet finding himselfe to be oppressed by so ouer-great a multitude, retired into Ierusalem, where being enclosed within the munitions of the Temple; he endured a long and difficult siege, enforced (vpon the coming thither of Antiochus, who followed after Lyfias) to play vpon aduantages.

Antiochus layeth a very dangerous siege to Ierusalem.

So long lasted this sharpe besieging, vntill the King, being certified of Philips coming, who, vader colour of reducing the Persians vnder the awe of Epiphanes, sought to possesse himselfe (as the same went) of the Kingdomes both of Asia and Syria: offered peace to them that were besieged in the Temple, with libertie of liuing according to the laws of their forefathers. But after that Iudas had brought his garrison out of the Temple, the King being amazed at the fortifications, beat downe their walls, contrary to the accord made at the Temple, and led Menelaus the Soueraigne Sacrificer captiue away with him (according as we haue saide already) instituting Alcimus in his stead, who also was named Ioachim, and so took his way home againe to Syria.

Menelaus led away captiue by King Antiochus into Syria.

CHAP. V.

Antiochus and Lyfias are put to death by Demetrius; the wicked behaviour of Alcimus the high-Priest; the death of Iudas, and the succession of his brother Ionathas.

IN the 151. yeare of the Greekes, Demetrius flying from Rome, where hee had bin detained in hostage, made seizure on the kingdome of Syria: putting to death the sonne of Epiphanes, named Antiochus

Eupator, and his Gouvernour Lyfias. Now Alcimus, coueting to retaine still the dignitie of the High-priesthood, conferred vpon him by Eupator and Lyfias: went to Demetrius, and there accrued all his nation (especially the Asmoneans) as Authors of the tumults, and perturbors of the peace of Iudea, & that they had throwne him out in banishment. Heereupon, the King sent Bacchides with a maine army, to reseat Alcimus in his office. Being entred Ierusalem with his power, by fraude hee slew many innocent Citizens, & leaving strong forces with Alcimus to safe protect him, returned backe into Syria. While thus Alcimus abused the power and fauor of the King, for putting many to death that were contrary to him: Iudas finding these courses to be intolerable, & taking to heart so great cruelty in the soueraigne Sacrificer; vnderooke the defence of innocents, putting all them to death that tooke part with Alcimus. Whereuppon, Alcimus fearing the vertue and power of Iudas, fled the second time to Demetrius at Antioche, and there formed a criminall accusation against Iudas.

The greedie desire of Alcimus for still enjoying the Priesthood.

Bacchides entereth Ierusalem with his Armie.

Iudas vnder-taketh to reuenge the outrages of Alcimus.

Nicanor then was sent with a puissant Army, who thought craftily to surprize Iudas vnder a colour of kind conference, and so leade him along to the King. But this compact being discouered, hee entred into open armes; and being fought with all by Iudas in plaine battell, was constrained to retire to the fort of Sion. Afterward, issuing forth of Ierusalem in great anger, all his forces assembled together; hee threatened all the sacrificing Priests with death and vter destruction of their Temple, if they did not deliuer Iudas a liue to his hands. But Iudas hauing reinforced his Armie, encountred againe with Nicanor at Bethsura; in which battaille he slew the capitaine Nicanor, & discomfited the whole army, being about 9000. men. This hapned the 13. day of the moneth Adar, which is February; and that day was afterward solemnly obserued, in regard of such a notable victorie.

Nicanor slain by Iudas in the second battell.

After these successfull aduentures, Iudas perswading himselfe, that Demetrius would seek reuenge on the Jewes for this his great ouerthrow, deuised to strengthé his power by the assistance of strangers. Heereupon, hee sent Ambassadors to the Romanes, to capitulate vpon confederacy with them, requesting (among other particulars) that the Senate would forbid Demetrius, hereafter to molest and afflict the Jewes. But (as humane succors are deceitfull) so the alliance of the Romanes was more difcommodious to the Jewes, then if they had giuen them no ayde at all: because it made them the more sleepey and negligent, and also was more offensive to the enemy. Whereupon it hapned, that the year following, being the 152. of the Greekes, Demetrius sent Bacchides and Alcimus with a potent army into Judea. There Judas met them with two thousand men onely, and although the most part of the slip away, and forooke his company, eyther thorow wearineffe of so long a war, or fearing the enemies power, or by the practises of Alcimus: yet notwithstanding, he ventred on the Army of Bacchides, with eight hundred braue Soldiers, and fighting valiantly, there he dyed with this al, in the sixt yeare after his fathers death, good old Mattathias, and before the Nativity of Christ, 158. yeares.

The yeare following, which was the 153. of the Grecians Reigne, Alcimus caused the walles of the inner house of the Temple to be destroyed, which the ancient sacrificing Priests had builded: to the ende, that not any munition should remaine, which might serue to retrace the aduersaries to the Kings of Syria. And hardly had they begun to beate it downe, but he was smitten suddenly with a Palsy, and therein surrendered vp his soule: but he had continued dumbe some long time before, and this was in the fourth yeare of his Priesthood.

Jonathas fol-

degree to his brother Judas

Jonathas the second Sonne of Mattathias. Jonathas, or Jonathan, succeeded in the principality to his brother Judas, and by this occasion. After the death of Machabees, while the Jewes (which had embraced the manners and religion of the Pagans) grew to be more emboldened, and fought for all those well disposed people, that had followed Judas & his Brethren, sending them to Bacchides to beee cruelly murdered; adding also the famine, which greatly encreased, because, during the continuall warres, the fields had bene left without any tillage, so that the best persons, and which had most vnderstanding in religion, were extremely anguished: they made their recourse to Jonathas, entreating him to vndertake the defence of the poore afflicted, and to imitate therein the vertue and piety of his brother. Jonathas consenting to the, soone after made head mainly against Bacchides, and hardly escaping, retired his Soldiers into the desert, where Bacchides made no account to pursue them; but fortified some Townes, and planted strong Garisons in them, daily to torment the Jewes by fallies & courtesies. Which being done, he retreated back his Army into Syria, after the death of Alcimus. By which meanes, the Jewes had some relaxation from warre, for about the space of two yeares, to wit, the 154. and 155. of the Grecians reigne.

In the yeare, 156. Bacchides was againe incited by the apostate Jewes, to surprize (by some sudden aduantage) the two brethren of Judas: but the ambushes being reuealed, hee came and openly assaulted them in the Towne of Bethsessa. Neuerthelesse, perceiving the Towne to be well munited, and the Jewes furnished with all fitting matters, as fully resolved to defend themselves valiantly: he made peace with Jonathas, and the captiues being surrendered on eyther side, tooke his way backe to Syria, which was the cause that Judas had sometime of repole and quietnesse.

Jonathas

The yeare 160. Alexander the Noble, who sought to possesse himselfe of the kingdome of Syria, which was then vsurped by Demetrius, Brother to Antiochus the Noble, and vnderstanding the power of Jonathas; sent Ambassadors to him with worthy presents, to practise with him for to ioyne in his intention, offering him (moreouer) the Soueraigne Priesthood, on condition, that he would ayde him against Demetrius. Beside, he solemnly invited him to the marriage, which hee had purposed in the City of Ptolemis, with Cleopatra, daughter to Ptolemy Philometor. Jonathas being allured by these offers, vnder hope of enjoying (by this meanes) two neighbouring Kings to bee his friends; went to be present at the royall wedding, and carryed gifts of great value with him. He was entertained by the two kings, so honorably as possible might be, and afterward sent backe againe, with confirmatio in the high Priesthood, as also to the principality of Judea, for the people (after the decesse of Alcimus) had remained 7. yeares without a Soueraigne Beneficier.

By this meanes, came the dignity first of High Priesthood to the Asmoneans, the ninth yeare of the principality of Jonathas, 3. of the Greekes 160. as hath bene said; and before the birth of Christ, 100. But 5. yeares after, as Ptolemy had caught the kingdome of Syria, with his daughter Cleopatra; so he gaue them both to Demetrius Nicator, Sonne to Demetrius, & then Jonathas had work enough to do, to enter into the good grace & fauour of the new King. Neuerthelesse, by gifts and offerings he prevailed so well at last, as vpon the a- uouching of his grace towards him, hee recovered a great part of Judea, & wenne among his own people, no meane power and credite. In the latter dayes of his principality, he fortified the Temple of Jerusalem, and renewed alliance with the Romaines, contracting kinde friendship also with the Lacedemonians. Soone after, he was surprized in Ptolemis, by the fraud & treason of Triphon, who, although he had promised to release him, if he might haue his two Sonnes sent him as hostages, and an hundred Talents (whereof his brother

Having done this abominable deed, and thinking no way to be resisted in his wicked courtes; by treachery he slew Antiochus, surnamed Sedetes, Sonne to Alexander the Noble, to whom he was Tutor, & for the restoring of him to his Fathers kingdome, hee had enuied Demetrius Nicator out of Syria, but got it into his owne possession. In this manner Jonathas held the principality of the Jewish people eightene yeares, and was the first administratour of the Soueraigne Priesthood of the Asmoneans, which hee held ten yeares.

Simon succeeded his Brother Jonathas, in the yeare of the Greekes, 170. & before the Nativity of Christ, 140. being elected (by common consent of the people) Duke & Soueraigne Sacrificer: because he had valiantly assisted his Brethren Judas and Jonathas, for maintaining the doctrine giue by God, & the repressing of persecutions. At the beginning of his gouernement, he surprized some Forts from the Grecians, among which was that of Jerusalem, which till that time had bene held by the Syrian Garisons, & had wonderfully tormented the Citizens. He furnished them in such sort, that they were constrained to yeelde themselves, and afterward purified prophaned places, the 23. day of the second Moneth, in the yeare, 171. Vnder him, Judas began to respire and breathe a while, which for the space of 25. yeares after Antiochus the Noble, had bin terribly shaken and waisted with continuall warres. The fields began againe to recover their former nature; places burnt and destroyed, to be re-builded; and those prophened with Idols, to be neatly cleared: In briefe, the voyce of heavenly doctrine began againe to bee heard and deliured in the Temple and Synagogues. In the third yeare of his Priesthood, Simon renewed alliance with the Romanes, and by a Decree from their Senate, was confirmed Soueraigne Sacrificer, & to be styled Prince of the people.

Afterward, Antiochus Soter, brother to Demetrius Nicator, preparing war against Triphon, who vsurped the Kingdome of Syria; labored Simon with great promises for alliance, as doubting least hee would giue hinderance to his enterprise. But haueing conquered the Kingdome of Syria, and Triphon chased thence, in the yeare, 174. he falsified the former alliance, & demanded ciuill Townes and Citties in Judea of Simon, as also the Fort of Jerusalem, and a great summe of money beside; or else he would denounce warre against him, if he did not yeeld to what he demanded. Now in regard that Simon refused to grant so vniust a demand, Antiochus was sent into Judea with an Army, whom John Hyrcanus and Judas, Sonne to Simon, discomfited, as he was waisting the champaign Country; and hauing destroyed the Forts built in the Marches of Judea by the enemy, they returned backe with great glory.

Three yeares after, to wit, the 177. of the Greekes, and 133. before the birth of Christ, as Simon (growing now ancient) returned, visiting & ordaining the Churches, and the dissipated pollicies in Judea; he arriued (with his Wife and two of his Sonnes, Judas and Mattathias) neere to his kinselman Ptolemy, the Sonne of Abubur, whom he had constituted Gouernour of the whole Region about Jericho. But he wickedly murdered him, sitting at the Table of a Banquet, whereto (most traitorously) he had invited him, onely for that bloody purpose.

Thus foure Asmoneans, namely, the Father Mattathias, and three of his Sonnes (each after other) fighting valiantly three and thirty yeares, in defence of the Law given by God, against the persecutors of his people, ended their liues. And although they could not so compasse the matter, as to cleanse Judea wholly of Pagan Idolatries, because many among the people were (openly) Epicures, and many mightily delected, by seeing the woful calamities of the people, and others inueigled by the Gentiles prosperities; did willingly renounce the first received doctrine of their Fathers, and embraced the impieties of the Paganes: yet notwithstanding, they prevailed so well by their power, that the writings of the Prophets were preferred, the seruice ordained by God, not abolished, nor the Jewish pollicy any way dissipated. All which ensued by the singular goodnesse of God, to the end, that the pollicy and ministry appointed by him (in some good measure still maintained) should continue to the time of Christ, that men might know, when & how the Messias was to be sent. The prin-

theirs.

Concerning the imprisonment of Simons two Sonnes and their Mother, by their cruell rickie Ptolomie; and lastly, their lamentable death. The valiant actes of John Hyrcanus, Sonne to Simon. The destruction of Samaria, &c.

The Sonnes of Simon, were John Hyrcanus, Judas, Mattathias his successour.

A Daughter, married to Ptolomy, the sonne of Abobus, Gouvernour of Iericho; who murdered his Father, as also his Wife & two of his Children.

Judas and Mattathias.

Having accompanied their Father, going with his Wife to see Ptolomy their Sonne in law, to whom he had formerly spoken, to giue him the gouerne-ment of Iericho: they were imprisoned with their Mother, by their Vnckle Ptolemy, who before had slaine their Father at a Banquet. Now, while Hyrcanus, seeking to reuenge so horrible a deed, had besieged a small Towne, whereto Ptolomy had withdrawne himselfe: the Tyrant caused them there to bee pitifully dismembred, as also their Mother; vntill such time as Hyrcanus, moued with compassion, & not able to endure the torturing of his brethren and Mother, raised the sledge, albeit his captiued Mother, still vrged him earnestly, to maintaine the assault.

John Hyrcanus.

In the life time of his Father, hee discomfited the Army of Antiochus Soter, which was conducted by Condebars. Next after the death of his Father, and the taking of his two Brethren, himselfe hardly escaping from the ambushes of the murderer Ptolomy: hee came to reuenge his Fathers death, and besiedging the Towne whereto Ptolomy was returned, being o-uercome with pity, by seeing the torments which his Mother & Brethren suffered, at every time when hee gaue the assault, considering also, that the seventh yeare of rest was neere at hand; hee retreated his Army. Afterward, Antiochus Soter made warre vpon him, so that he was flurvp within the City of Ierusalem, which Antiochus besiedged in seven places all at one time: being pressed with famine, hee yelded vp the City, vpon condition, that he would beate down the Fortifications of the City, deliuer hostages, & giue hundred Talents, that is to say, three Tunnes of Gold.

But as he was in want of money, or accidentally seeking for some by vrgent necessity, or admonished so to doe by a dream: he opened the Sepulcher of Da-uid, wherein he found three thousand Talents of Gold, which amounteth to 18 Tuns of Gold. Being thus readuanced, he not only made peace with Antiochus, but also entered into amity with him, so that he entertained him into the City with his Army, and being well provided of money, he was the first (of the Iewes) that had strange Soldiours vnder his pay. With whom he accompanied King Antiochus, he going in warre against the Parthians;
and yet his company was but slenderly be-neficiall to the King. For although by the valiancy of Hyrcanus, he overthrew a part of the Parthians Army, yet soone after, when Artabanes, King of the Parthians, came with a new Army, & he should then haue met and ioyned with him: Religion hindered Hyrcanus and the Iewes from going to the fight, because it was then the Feast of Pentecost. By which meanes, Antiochus being destitute of the Iewes helpe, was slaine, with a great number of his people.

After the death of Antiochus Soter, Hyrcanus began to make small account of the Kings of Syria; as being men, that (by ci-uill warres) had broken the forces of their kingdomes. Wherefore, bringing back his host from Asia, he tooke many Cities and Townes in the kingdome of Syria, which had in former times appertained to Ides. He razed also the Temple of Gazizim in Samaria, builded by Sannabalat the Cuthean, (as hath before bin remem-bred) two hundred yeares after it had bin builded in fauour of Manasses, Brother to Iudas, in the time of Alexander the great.
He compelled also the Idumeans (after he had giuen them many chastenings) to receive circumcision, and other ceremonies of the Iewes. And to strengthen himselfe the more against the Kings of Syria, who he thought not fit to make any more surprizing of Cities; hee renewed alliance (by Ambassadors) with the Romanes, in the fourteenth yeare of his principality, and the 191. of the kingdome of Syria:
Cneus Demetrius Barbovoss, and Caius Flaminius being Consuls, an hundred and 17. yeares before the Natiuity of Christ.

Afterward, as Demetrius Nicanor had bene restored to his Kingdome by Artastes, and as quickly againe repulled from it by Alexander Zebnais, when he prepared himselfe to make warre on the Iewes: so Hyrcanus, allying himselfe with Alexander the victorious, had sustained as little ioy thereof, if an admirable accident had not corrected their error. For Antiochus Gryllus, Sonne to Demetrius, seeking to recouer his Fathers kingdome, flew Alexander in bataille, and (after that victory) purposed to invade Hyrcanus, the leagued friend to his enemy. But hearing of another preparation of warre against himselfe, by his brother Antiochus Cyzicus; he was glad to keepe at home still in Syria. So, while the two brethren did wel-faouoredly contend with one another (a long time) for the kingdome of Syria; Hyrcanus and Judas remained in quietnes, during which time, Hyrcanus well fortified himselfe by strong Castles newly builded, re-enforcing al his most commodious munitions, collecting vp great summes of money, & providing other necessary matters, to exploit his warre affaires.

Finally, hee laide sledge to the most strong City of Samaria, and left there his two Sonnes Antigonos and Aristobulus to continue it, while himselfe attended to the administration of more important Oeconomical affaires. Hereupon, the Samaritaines called to succour them Anti-ochus Cyzicus; who repulled the sonnes to Hyrcanus, and chased them so farre as to * Scythopolis. Again, the two brethren brought their Army before Samaria, and again, Antiochus Cyzicus (being requested) entered into Judea, pilling and spoyling where soeuer he came. But being repelled, hee gaue the charge of his Army to two of his Captaines; one of them being slaine by the Iewes, and the other corrupted with money, surrendered (by treason) Scythopolis, and the other neighbouring Cities. So the City of Samaria, hauing endured (in great misery) a whole yeares sledge, was at the last forced and quite destroyed. Such was the ending of this most mighty City, which (for a long time) had paragond it selfe equal with Ie-rusalem; but about an hundred yeares after, it was builded againe by Herod, who named it Sebastea, in the honour of Augustus Caesar.

sanctity, and great swarms of deified traditions, concerning some kindes of bodily exercises: so that (whensoever they pleased) they could cause the common people to mutiny against the Princes and the High-Priest. Hyrcanus had sometime bene a curious favourer of this Sect; in which regard, the Pharisees did beare him great affection: but at the last, he estranged his kindnesse towards them, finding himselfe offended at the punishment of Eleazar the Pharisee, by some outrage offered him. And this was the reason, that hee tooke part with the Sadducees, who sharply reprovod the traditions of the Pharisees, and in hate and spight to the Pharisees sect, hee abolished (by publike Edicts) many of their traditions, which made him and his Sonnes to be mortally hated, atwell of the Pharisees, as of the people. Whereupon ensued great mutinies among the people: which his Sonne Alexander very hardly appeased, but not without great effusion of blood.

warned by this rule, wee may the better judge of these Sects.

But in making this recital, I may not forget that most lamentable complaint, which the so mighty infinity of mankind ought much to bemoane, because even then, when the Church consisted of so small a number, to wit, in few Tribes of Israel, poorly impayed, and shut vp in that narrow country neighbouring to the Pharisees, and that then (with so small policy) discipline could scarcely maintaine it selfe peaceably, or doctrine be kept in good concord: such horrible furries being prepared against it, yea, & they embraced by the greater part of the Governours, publishing them wholly, without dissembling any thing, although they were plainly repugnant vnto the Law of God. The Sadducees acquired themselves of sacrifices, and neuertheless affirmed publicly, that after this present life, there remained no other, nor any iudgement; and that the soule (being separated from the body) should haue no more life, and that men should not rise againe. But the Pharisees were a little more modest, and yet notwithstanding they had as well corrupted the doctrine giuen by God, as we shall haue better occasion to speake of hereafter.

Neuertheless, God had a true Church all this while, which still retayned the light of his doctrine: and yet, was it not greatly to be lamented, that in one & the same company, which bare the name of the Church, among a troope that called vpon God in truth; such errors should not only bee dispersed, but also allowed by the authority of Princes and Doctors? Beside this, the assured and prophaned arrogancy of many (even in our times) ought greatly to be reprehended, who dreaming of no dispersion of errors in the Church, eyther for satisfaction of their owne ambition, vnder colour of religion seeking after kingdomes, or by heaping superstitions one vpon another, thereby to fit and furnish their owne avarice; doe neuer thinke on (in this case) the ancient and old examples of the Pharisees & Sadducees, who declared sufficiently, that every like enils crept into the Church, even as apparently then, as those of other times. It is therefore very necessary, to haue of certaine rule, in listening to the voice of angelically, according as Saint Paul said: If any man preach any other Gospel to you, let him be accursed.

Furthermore, consideration is to be had, of the time of that first Doctrine, agreeing with the voyce of the Prophets, the Sonnes of GOD, and the Apostles: and next, of such persuasions as haue crept into the Church, some whereof haue bene confirmed by the superstition of men vnlearned, others haue bene voluntarily received, as serving the ambition of the mightie, and for benefite to the kitchen. Acknowledging then, and bewayling the harmes of the Church; let vs seeke after the springs or fountaines of true doctrine, to the end wee may truly call vpon God, who hath alwayes preferred some part of mankind, where his true knowledge might shine, to bee the Temple of God, and afterwards partaker of his glorious company, because mankind was not created in vaine. But before I discourse on the original of Sects, and Diuisions of the Church, it is needfull first to say somewhat, concerning the first true Church or Schoole, which from the beginning of mankind, hath bene gardian and keeper of the true doctrine: from whence hath issued many, who (as feditious) haue scattered diuers corruptions among the truth of doctrine.

Mankind was not borne by accidental chance, neither created without cause: but it pleased God, that he should haue a reasonable nature, embellished with a body, wherein the knowledge of him might shine, and to whom he might communicate his wisdom and goodnes, & that hee should enioy his company once and for euer. Now, although God expressed his wisdom and goodnesse, by creating the great workmanship of the world: yet notwithstanding, his goodnes made it selfe much more apparent, in that (after the fall of Adam and Eue) he sent from his secret seate, that infinite mercie for their recovery, by giuing them the promised Seede to come. And to make it the better knowne and vnderstood, hee would haue men to heare the found of that sweete voice: The Seede of the woman shall breake the Serpents head. Such as received graciously this consolation, were received of God, and made members of the eternall Church of God. Thus first of all, the Church was created, and the Schoole instituted, wherein our first Parents taught the doctrine of God to their children: concerning the creation of all things; concerning their owne fall; the paines and punishments to ensue; the treacheries of the diuell; the causes of death and all humane miseries; the promise of the Seede to come, whereby the great and iust anger of God was to be appeased. Also, how sinne was to be detested, eternall life restored, the difference of good and euill works, and that such a difference being imprinted in the soules of men, was truly the Lawe diuine, agreeing with the intelligence and diuine will; so to shine in the spirits of men, that it might bee a testimonie of God to men, that he was one God, and how to be adored: admonishing likewise, that hee would iudge the actions of men, because conscience would elie exercise a burdensome iudgement in vs.

There they were taught the difference betweene this natural knowledge, and the other of higher quality: the pronounced promise of the secret bosome of the eternall Father, touching the Seede: the future iudgement of all mankind: and that such as (by faith in that Seede) attained to beleue therein, were acceptable to God, and in that faith had recourse to him, struing to order their manners by the rule of the diuine Lawe, should liue eternally in the most sweete company of God. Others, who arrogantly contemned God, & the promised Seede to come, running furiously on the bridle of their wicked desires; were like vnto diuels, enemies to God, and after death should liue in horrible torments, whereof they discerned some resemblance in this life, by the terrors of such, whose bodies were adduged to terrible punishments.

Those first Fathers declared, how God had clothed them with the skins of beasts, to signifie, that (after death) they should bee denefited of their corrupted bodies, and put vpon them (as the garment or robe of the Lambe) that is to say, the promised Seede, which was to be sacrificed, that all mankind might be saved by him. They taught the will of God to bee such, that by this means it should bee sought, knowne and called on, as it was made manifest: and that our mindes leaning ning vpon his promise, gaue vs to vnderstand, that then wee are in the grace of God, when (by fayth) wee relie vpon his promise, and that hee would haue no other gods to be receiued, or Sacrifices offered by them that forgot or reiected this doctrine giuen by God. They also manifested, that God would haue one sole and certaine assemblie, which should be consenting in doctrine, gathered together by inuocation and sacrifices: in which sole assembly, should be the future heires of eternall life with God.

As an Interpreter to their Sacrifices, this predication was often repeated; This manner of behaviour, and these publique assemblies are instituted, to the end, that this doctrine should be sent to Posterity. In them the voyce of the diuine Promise, and the doctrine declared by vs, was to be heard: for god would haue his voyce to be heard of all men. In which respect, it was and is requisite, that there should bee honest assemblies; and although the Church will be alwayes tormented with great calamities: yet shall she be exalted as a Castle on a high mountaine. These our Sacrifices which you see, are the chaines and linkes of such assemblies, and no other paintings haue we to admonish vs, then the diuine Promise so graciously giuen vnto vs.

Having entrusted their children in these great matters, they added, concerning the Seede to come, That that Lord, who should breake the head of the Serpent; was already (and euen then) assisting to his Church, although he was not (as yet) reueiled with humane flesh. That he was the Image of the Eternall and onely Father, begotten of him, who prayed to his Father for the Church, and defended it, and (with the Father) comforteth the hearts of Beleueers, euen in their greatest feares, by his Promises, and kindeleth in them the light of the blessed Spirit, for the beginning of eternall life. Which Spirit proceeded from the Father, and from this promised Lord. By this means they taught to know the onely true God, wise, good, iust, true, chaste and pure, Creator of heauen and earth, of Angels, and of mankind; to the end, that all might vnderstand, there was one onely eternall Father, who had created all with this promised Lord, who is his Image, and with the blessed Spirit, so that no other Diuinitie was to be imagined.

Moreouer, in this holy Schoole, the first fathers taught the doctrine concerning the nature of things, giuing to vnderstand; that there were certaine lawes of Celestiall motions, to deliuer testimony, that this world was not made by aduenture, but created by the intelligence of a super-excellent workeman. They taught beside, the course of the yeare to be ordained, because God would haue men to know the order of times; thereby also to vnderstand the order of diuine promises, and how they were to be reuealed, as to know what the first giuen doctrine was, thereby to iudge of the newer afterward. And because men might comprehend, that all things were created by the Diuine Councell and Providence: they shewed diuerse vses of Plants, to what end they were created, and for the vse of man. Heereupon they expressed, how God assisted the nature of man by those remedies; thereby also instructing, that oftentimes Innocents are holpen of God by admirable means, and yet without the ayde of creatures.

That this was the doctrine of the first or Primitive Church, the narration of Moses sufficiently declares, in Genes. And it is not to be doubted, that the wisdom of the golden Age, before the Flood, was much greater then that after the Flood, when nature became more weak & feeble. And though that many, both before and after the Flood, might forget or misprize true doctrine; yet notwithstanding, God would not suffer his true Inuocation to be quenched among men: but euer more reserved from company that kept this doctrine, (from one time to another) renewed & dispersed it further off by nouell testimonies. Again, when after the Flood, the multitude of men began once more to encrease, though the light of true doctrine might be extinct in Babylon: yet notwithstanding the studie of Astrology remayned, touching the motions and effects of the Starres, with the knowledge of things growing in the earth.

And in this meane while, the promise of God was still preferred and kept, renewed and illumined in the posteritie of Nash. Afterward, when this policie became to be so well ordaind among the people

Some remembrance of Gods truth at all times remaining.

Concerning the name of Interpreters.

people of Israel: all the Colledge of the Leuites was as an Academie and place of exercise. There, some Sacrifices and Prophets taught againe the auncient and vncorrupted doctrine.

But afterward, when the tenne Tribes were cut off by the Kings of Iuda: then great confusions (both in Religion and Doctrine) follow'd. And yet neuertheless, God raised in the dismembred part of Iudas Kingdome, Elias, Eliseus, and other Prophets, to draw diuers there to the truth of knowledge: which was the reason that the Prophets had great troups of Auditours, in regarde that Elias, Eliseus, and the rest had deliuered (from hand to hand) their sacred preachings and interpretations. Some did leaue theirs written, as Ezra, and they that followed after. This custome did alwayes continue in this people, and especially in the Temple, where the sacrificing Priests gaue the interpretations, or else where among the Doctours, and such as were interpreters of the Writings of Moses and the Prophets.

But in the latter times, after the returne from Babylon, and after the Prophet Zacharie, when the High-Priests beganne to affect familiarity with the kings of Iuda, and sought to make themselves great and powerfull, the study of true doctrine became contemned, and after that Iuda was spoiled by Antiochus; many places were lost, the companies of Students, and their Maisters scattered, and discipline being thus neglected, it is very likely that the studies became to bee wonderfully changed. Howbeit, that alwayes some of the Colledge of the high-Priests, and of the people, kept some sparks of the true doctrine liuing among them: as Simon, Zacharie, Anne, and other, whose youth neighboured to the warres of Antiochus. Notwithstanding, many audacious Expositions of the Propheticall Bookes, wandred farre off from the auncient doctrine.

It is very likely, that at the beginning, the name of Interpreters was common to some men of the best iudgement, and likewise to other, that transfused the doctrine of the Church into Philosophie. By succession of times, as this new Philosophie was most pleasing, and many earnestly fauouring it: the Schooles began to be so much the more frequented, and a kinde of doctrine was then concluded on. In this manner a profession or Sect (which then was in admiration) was ordained; without changing the name of Pharisee, as much to say as an Expounder, as nowadaies the title of Doctur, is the name of a most honest Office and Profession: for many learned men doe conceiue the Pharisee to be named, rather for Interpretation or Exposition, then by separation or diuision.

Iosephus reporteth some of their opinions, but they are better to bee vnderstood in the Euangelicall Historie, and what their principall errors were. For, although they carried themselves as interpreters of the Prophets: they auouched the Bookes not onely of Moses, but also of the other Prophets, adioyned to the holy Histories by publique authoritie of the Ancients, to remaine in their credite and integritie. Neuertheless, they helde false opinions concerning the vse of the Lawe, and transferred the promises of the Messias Kingdome, to politicall vse. They helde exteriour Discipline, for lustice satisfying to the Lawe, and denyed that wicked affections were sinne, or doubting of God, or courage enkindled by hatefull or lustfull desires: provided that they proceeded not to outward offence. These corruptions are expressly reprooued in Saint Matthew, where it is said; who neuer looketh on a woman, to lust after her, hath already committed adultery with her in his heart. And although that many vnlearned men in the Church, read these Sentences as Paradoxes of the Stoicks, who painted the Ideases of the vertues, to the end that men should strue to come nere to them (which is impossible for any man in this world to do) yet are they propounded to the Church to other ends.

The Sonne of God knew, that in the imbecillitie of this nature, no man can be without bad desires; therefore hee would haue the preaching of repentance to be dayly founded among men, that acknowledging our corruptions in due manner, wee should confesse our owne guiltinesse, and make our recourse to the Sonne of God. The Philosophie of the Pharisees, obscured this auncient Propheticall ticall doctrine, as it had beene in all times after Caine and his Posteritie.

In like manner, the other part of heauenly doctrine, to wit, the promised Messias was also obscured. The Pharisees knew and celebrated the magnificent Promises made to Abraham, recited by Isaac, and often repeated by the Prophets: but they maintained, that they spake only of a politicall kingdom. They dreamed also, that the Messias should come like vnto an other Cyrus or Alexander the great, to vse the whole Empire of the world, the people being subiect vnto him: and yet notwithstanding, that this Empire should be more iust, milde and peacefull, then any of them before. They affirmed, that the Messias should reigne a thousand yeares; that the Israelites should liue three or foure hundred yeeres without feare of wares, feruitude, or famine, or any other great calamities: And that there should bee no other nature in the Messias, but humane.

In these idle imaginations, all the doctrine of the Sonne of God, of anger against sinners, of the sacrifice and death of the Messias was buried. And yet neuertheless, truth was not wholly quenched in the Church, but (as I haue said) some sparkes remayned with Simon, Zacharie, and many such like, who read the Prophets without corruption.

After that the Pharisee had corrupted the words of the Law, and the promises thereto appertaining: they dreamed that sinners were to be pardoned by ceremonies and slaughter of beasts, ordained in the Law. This perwasion brought in great gaine, for the people (being thus perswaded) multiplied the more their sacrifices. These so thicke mists of darknesse had some appearance of wisdom and pietie; which neuertheless are oftentimes reprehended of the Prophets.

Ceremonies growing to great augmentation and encrease, many questions (as in the like cases happeneth) were moued, touching the manner of performing them, & other circumstances, which (indeede) required many declarations. And as Monks heaped vp together great summes of money, by the buying and selling of humane traditions, with their annexed circumstances: euen so the Pharisees would locke vp and let loose the ceremories of Moses, at their pleasure; and adde to them their owne nouell devices, as well for the confirmation of superstition, as their owne gaine. Saint Matthew telleth vs, that the lucrative tradition is reprobated: that it was much better to giue somewhat to the Temple, then to nourish and relieue their owne poore parents: euen as now adays it is maintained, that a number of stouidish idle Monks, should rather enioy great reuenues, then any thing spared for the reliefe of poore Schollers.

The tradition of the Sabbath was also in great vse, as Herone a leecher: for Aziba and Hillel, both Rabins, do lay, a Sabbath dayes journey is but two halfe miles. Beside, in this Sect remained some studies of doctrine, and some care of gouerning the discipline. They could well conclude, that there was an eternall and intelligent God, true, good, iust, chaste, well-doing, and a reuenger of offences: whereby they confessed all things to bee created, the heauens, the earth, Angels, men and other creatures. They affirmed also (by opinion of philosophy) that there was but one person in the diuinitie, boldly reiecting the Primitive and Prophetically doctrine concerning the Sonne of God and the blessed Spirit: although they had apparent testimonies of the Son of God in David, Esay, Michas and Daniel; and of the Holie-ghost, in many Sermons of the Prophets.

Moreover, they confessed, that God the Creator of all things, was manifested by his Promises, and by publishing his Law: surpassing all other in goodnesse, with a most goodly policie, ordainned and warranted by many testimonies of his presence. Wherefore they would not haue any one to call in doubtfull question the prouidence of God, nor to doubt that the posteritie of Abraham (to whom God had giuen this ordainned policie) should bee any other then the people of God, or the Church whereof God had a peculiar care. They taught them that God gouerned the principall mutations which happened in this life, as the encreasings and diminishings of Empires, the ruine and building againe of great Cities: because they knew their euents to agree with the prophecies of empires, which are in Moses, Esay and Daniel; adding ding with all, that they knew that their Citie Ierusalem had beene diuinely builded.

And yet (for all this) they affirmed, that the affaires and liues of all men, were gouerned by humane counsellors; and they magnified the libertie of mans will, as also the faculty of Free-will: yea, and in such sort, that they held a man might falsifie the diuine Lawe, and be iust by his diligence, meriting all goodnesse both present and heauenly. And contrariwise, that such as offended the diuine Lawe by exterior transgressions, should be punished both in this life and the other. For their opinion was (that the soule separated from the bodie) should liue, and that there should bee a resurrection of the dead, wherein God would reward the iust, and send into euertlasting punishments, such as had soiled themselves with execrable vices. And yet they held with all, that he would punish many crimes by present calamities, adding also, that some might be defaced by sacrifices, and the penalties due to them, made more milde or lessened.

Now, although this doctrine was very passable in appearance; yet notwithstanding, they abolished the true vse of the Law, and with the benefices of the Messias, the doctrine of free pardon. Wherefore, eyther they confirmed trust in mens owne iustice, or left their consciences in pitifull doubts: in regarde that mens minds being thus ouerthrowne, fled from God, and trembling against him, neyther durst approach neare him, nor call vpon him truly.

For the more sure maintaining these their disciplines, they had instituted many exercises; the most part whereof serued rather for offention, then any restraint to their owne bad desires. The manner or forme of their garments was notable; for they wore great long cloakes, with fringes about them, interwoven with the words of the Lawe. Oftentimes they vsed to wash themselves, hauing at the entering into their houses holy-water, wherewith they sprinkled themselves. They observed choice of meates in their falls, muttering long prayers to themselves, which Saint Matthew calleth Barthologie, much babbling.

Their sacrifices and apparance of piety, attracted greatly the familiarity of women, which was the cause that adulteries and diuorces grew to be very frequent among them; and to enioy therein the more liberty, they enlarged the law of diuorces. For the ancient custome of diuorces implied, that they were not to be done, but vpon knowledge of the cause, and the instruments to effect them, was, with the knowledge and consent of the magistrate, and separation might not be granted for light causes and disturbances; but by good reasons induced to the Iudges, who were knowne to bee graue men, and of great integritie.

But the Pharisees (vicerily dissannulling this ancient custome) made diuorces vpon their priuate authority, either without cause, or for causes of no moment: so that the lawe of diuorce serued onely as a baited hooke, to allure and betray other mens wiues; as among the Pagans, and as at this instant with the Turkes, it is in vse.

By this kind of proceeding, men might reiect their wiues when they thought fittest, without any reasonable cause, and contrary to the nature of marriage, which God himselfe instituted at the beginning, to the end, that it might be the alliance of an inseparable company when hee saide: They shall be both one flesh; that is to say, a male and female shal be ioyned together inseparably. In like manner, the Lawe of Moses did not permit diuorce without cause; but rendered a reason whereby separation might be allowed, to wit, if any wilkenesse were found in her. And the ancient Atticke custome intended, that no diuorce should be granted, without knowledge of the cause. Since when, by succession of times, the bands of discipline haue been let loose, by the encrease of lewdnes and incontinencie: so that the ancient Atticke custome became quite changed.

And so in the latter times of the Iewes, all grauity for the maintenance of alliance in marriage, grew greatly extenuated. For there could not be faide to be a true wife, whom the husband might cast off at all times, and whensoever such giddines intoxicated his braine, and without any worthy cause. This vniust custome of the Pharisees was the cause of that question in S. Mathew, where mention is made concerning the alliance of marriage, and the first institution thereof repeated: also by a seuer therefore this Sect (how wicked soever it were) wanted not store of followers.

Now although it be true, that God is the gardian of political societie, and that he punisheth vniust murders in this life, lest the companies of men should be consumed, as also to the end, that they may be manifest signes of his diuine Iustice to euery eye: yet notwithstanding, God in meane while (by an admirable counsell best knowne vnto himselfe) suffereth many iust persons to be slaine by the wicked, as Abell, the children of Israel in Egypt, Ionathas, Esay, Jeremy, and innumerable other. These examples doe testifie, that there remaineth another Iudgement, wherein God will declare his iustice, by bringing the iust and vniust into iudgement: and the wicked, being sent into torments, shall shew the iust to be victorious, although it continue some time after death. For seeing that God declared, that he had a care of Abell, Ionathas, Esay, and Jeremy during their liues: if after death he should haue made no account of them, it had much diffented from his praesence; yea, and from his iustice also. It is then most euident, that the Sadduces, who denied any other iudgement to ensue after death.

The sacrificiing Priest of the Sadduces, being at the Altare, conceiued, that the Israelitish Nation was not chosen of God (who onely had the true knowledge of God on earth;) because they had been so often oppressed by Kings of the Egyptians, Chaldeans & Syrians; and, euen when their neighbors (being dispersed thorough Iudea) spoiled many thousands of iust persons, compelling them that suruiued, to feed on the slaughtered bodies of their fellow-Citizens: in this case, shall there bee no attribution of iustice and prouidence to God, if instantly hee shew not himselfe to haue a care of his, and that (therefore) there remaineth no immortality? Thus vnder the shadow of ceremonies, were mens soules abused, by outward and apparant Legier-dumaines, the diuine Prouidence being exactly taken away, euen as the Epicurians did.

Now, considering there were these debates between the Pharises and Sadduces, in such great matters, let such as reade, conceiue, not onely how great and frequent the tumults and perturbations of this people haue beene; but also, how rudely both the Pharises and Sadduces, and diuers other with them (being manifestly Atheists) vsed the true Church, as Simeon, Zachary and their poore flocke. But as then (among so many wolves and lions) some faithfull guardians of the true doctrine were referred; so (no doubt) but God will still continue it to all succeeding times; and as hee did to Simeon and the rest, so he will euermore stand in the iust defence of his Spouse the Church, supporting her, against all miseries whatsoeuer.

CHAP. IX.

Of a third Sect, contrary to the Pharises and Sadduces, who termed themselves by the name of Effæans: their originall Religion and maner of life.

Ordinarly happeneth, that when seditions haue once gotten themselves into actiue motion: many partialities and diuisions will thrust in after them. As Homer feigned, that the Storehouse or Armory (wherein Aeolus had locked vp the winds) being broken open: the Sea became troubled euery where, the windes flew abroad with such extraordinary violence; euen so in kingdoms & Empires, after that political order cometh to bee once troubled and disioyned; many diuisions must needs follow after. Many Sects exalted themselves, during these debates betweene the Pharises and Sadduces. For some, detesting the profane doctrine, and Ethnick licence of the Sadduces, and seeing Religion and piety masked by the Pharises, and that, to disguise great and grosse vices, such as were whoredome, ambition, malice, enuy, cruelty, lying, rapine, and the like, they let before mens eyes (as a cloud of dissimulation) dreadfull feueritie, and some seuerer ceremonies; beganne to

to diuide themselves from both one and other.

And these Séperatists & diuided people, formed a name for themselves, called Effæans, workers; by which title, they gaue me to vnderstand, that which they reproued in others, & wherein they would seem more excellent then they: namely, that they fled from the profane libertie of the Sadduces, & allowed not the hypocrisie of the Pharises, disguised in so many kindes: but that they would doe deeds or workes profitable to other, and commanded by God, hauing alwayes this vsuall sentence in their mouths; Every word without work, is merely vaine and unprofitable.

There is no mention made of them in the Ecclesiasticall history, either because they had not inuited any new kind of doctrine, but retained the doctrine of Moses & the Sacrificers; or in regard they dwelt at the end of Iudea, toward the lake Asphaltuda, as in a retiremēt, & neuer intermeddled with the government of affairs, thunning the contentions of the Pharises and Sadduces. Their maner of life was like to that of the Monkes; for, either they were not married, or if they were, they abstained from their wiuces; hauing their goods in cōmon, doing such businesse as were inioyned thē. They fought not after riches, voluptuous pleasures, or honors; but digged and delued in gardens, as in a life of solitude, seeking carefully for knowledge in the nature of Plants, and their iuyces, stones and animalls, learning their remedies, and exercising Physicke faithfully, which serued more then all other Artes for the life of man.

Moreover, they practised many vertues, as beneficence, patience in visiting sicke persons; such as were not able to helpe themselves, they would feed them, carry them, wash and bathe them, neuer shrinking at grosse fauors, coming either fro wounds, sweats, or other annoyances. Their cunning, faith & diligence was very commendable, in knowing wel how to prepare medicaments; to know the kindes of diseases; what remedies were apt for them; to know also times & seasons, when physicke ought to be ministred. In briefe, the vertues & welldoing of a learned, industrious and faithfull Physitian appeared in the most of them.

And as it is a good thing, that youth should be enstructed in learning, the doctrine of good maners, the Art of physick, and to accustom their tender spiritues to discipline, & the vnderstanding of virtue: euen so in the assembly of the Effæans, the very skillfullest were chosen by a certaine number, who instructed many thoroughout Iudea. For all modest men, & such as shunned the managing of affaires in ciuile dissensions, affected rather to haue their children taught by the doctours of this Sect, then any other, which they held in horror, & would haue no acquaintance with them, seeing them so tempestuous in the Common-wealth, by their owne particular couetous desires, and continually mouing vnecessary contentions.

The Effæans addicted their life and religion principally to two heads or points, to wit: In calling vpon God in a priuate kind of life, and in honest bodily labours, which were the expulsion of vices, and profitable to other men. And for satisfaction both to the one and other, they had partition of times, so that they might attend on busines till the fifth houre of the day, that is to say, to eleuen houres before midday. Their labor ending at that houre, certain numbers of people (round about) met there together, according to the places distributed to euery one. In this assembly, some passage in Moses and the Prophets was read, the Auncients that sate as Presidents, gaue addition of the exposition: which they would not haue to be written, but retained in the minde, and so transferred to the government of manners, admonishing (according to the exigence of time) what they thought profitable for peace and tranquillitie, for they would haue none of their followers to meddle in the Common-wealth.

After this reading & exposition, they inuoked Gods assistance both in publique & particular. They held those times to be most meet for meditation & praier, when the body was not charged with meats & fumes, & that inuention is most sprightly in them, whose mindes were fasting from worldly cogitations. Two or 3. houres being employed in reading and prayer, euery one went to supper, or walked in company, or alone by himselfe, according as it stood with his good liking, or as his heart required. The rest of the day, vntill the Eueneng came, was spent in learned discourse and talking of God, of Plants, of medicaments, and their experience in every thing: or else of the historie of their owne nation, and what miseries had beene common to them. Before the darke houres of night, they met together againe, and went to prayer.

Now, although the order of their behauiour and actions were wisely gouerned, and many (in their Colledges) liued modestly; yet notwithstanding it came to passe, that some of them (wonne by their owne courtoous desires) forgot the Lawes diuine, and (in the neighbouring towns) fell to voluptuous pleasures. But the rigour of each Colledge was such, as if any one had defrauded another, if hee had lied, or had infected himselfe with whoredome: immediately (by common sentence) hee was communicated out of the company. For (among them) was kept the most ancient custome of the Synagogue, whereof is spoken in Saint Matthew, Because there might no question be vrged, for instituting any new forme of Iudicature; but the playne auncient fashion, recited as it was giuen by the Fathers, the traces whereof are remaining in the Church.

This pollicie of the Essæans, comprehended the principall parts of their doctrine, to wit; the study of learning, the exercises of Inuocation, reuerence to their Gouernours, bodily labors, temperance, and modest maners according to the Decalogue, the nourishing of youth; who were instructed in learning, and the Art of Physicke; paines and punishments also appointed for delinquents. Iosephus commended the Colledge of the Essæans, comparing them to the Schoole of Pythagoras. Pliny also makes mention of them in very honorable maner, terming them Essæans, as (since then) diuers other did; for there he speaketh of no other people, but only the Essæans. Hee placeth their dwelling towards the Lake Alphadita, on the west side, not farre from the City of Irrecho, where were the gardens of Balme. It may be, that this place was chosen to study the Art of Physick, as not being the like in all the world, for abounding in all the principall medicines. By this passage of Pliny, and by Iosephus, it appeareth, that the colledge of the Essæans continued to the time of Vespasian; besides, Iosephus re-porteth, that they carried themselves very valiantly in warre.

Now wil we returne to Hyrcanus, who after he had held the gouernement, and the High-priesthood 31 yeares, died, leauing 3. children. Hee was accounted singularly happy in 3. things; to wit, that he had bin so long a time a peaceable prince of the people, and the soueraigne Sacrificer adding thereto, that he was beleueed to haue the spirit of Prophecie. & knowledge in things to come, by the gift of god.

CHAP. X.

Having briefly discoursed on the 7. severall Sects, of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essæans: we goe backe againe where we formerly left, to speake of Hyrcanus and his Sonnes.

Iohn Hyrcanus had five sonnes, Aristobulus the first, Antigonus the second; a graue young man, who in his life time, accompanied with his brother Aristobulus, expelled Antiochus Cyzicenus out of Iudea, and tooke Samaria. The father being dead, his brother also was crowned King. But soone after, when hee had exploited the affaires in Galilee, he went vp to Ierusalem, accompanied with braue Souldiers, to be present at the Feast of Tabernacles. His brother growing suspicious of him, and causing him to be entrapped by his warlike troupes; he was slaine by them neare to the Temple.

Alexander the third called Iamnes also, had two sons, namely, Hyrcanus the first, Aristobulus the second. Abolus the fourth; being of a most milde and peaceable spirit, lued by himselfe priuately. A daughter of his was married to his cousin Aristobulus. The first sonne of Hyrcanus is not named at all, and yet was slayne by his brother Alexander: because that (after the death of Aristobulus) he affected the kingdom.

Aristobulus, after the death of his father Hyrcanus, being the first that changed the Principall into a dignitie Royall; imposed on himselfe the diademe, and sent also for his brother Antigonus, whom he loued. He put his other three brethren in prison, and that which is much more, he starued his owne mother to death in prison; because she deniaded the succession and gouernement of the principalltie, which Hyrcanus had left vpon her on his death-bed.

Afterward, he caused his brother Antigonus to be slaine, he being a braue man, and a bolde warriour, laying diuerse ambushes for him, as hee returned victoriously from Galilee; only because he suspected that he affected the kingdom.

Immediately, beeing highly distastd by this murdering of his brethren, he became seized with a grievous paine in his entrails, and having cast vp a great quantitie of blood by vomiting, the Page that carried the Balon from him, fell (accidentally) in the same place, where the ground remained as yet infected with the blood of murdered Antigonus; and there he spilt the cast blood of Aristobulus: which hee vnderstanding, and falling into acknowledgement of the diuine iust vengeance; in excessive torments both of soule and body, yielded vp the ghost. After he had reigned one whole yeare onely, and during which time, hee had augmented the kingdom of Iudea, and constrained the Iudeans to vndergoe Circumcision, hauing formerly vanquished them. He was called Philellin, because hee vsed greatly the familiarity of Pagans.

Alexander, called also Iamnes.

His father Hyrcanus neuer saw him, for as he was in great care about the succession of his children: it was forcolde him in his sleepe, that his riches and principalltie, should fall into the power of that new borne babe, whereat hee growing greatly offende, commanded, that hee should be nurshed in Galilee, like to a simple priuate person.

After the death of his father Hyrcanus, he was clapt vp in prison (with his two other brethren) by Aristobulus. But Aristobulus dying at his yeares expiration, hee came to the Crowne, by the means of Alexandra, wife to Aristobulus, to whom he had promised marriage.

Soone after he was crowned King, he slew one of his brethren, who practised nouelties; and entertained the other (named Abolus) honorably, because he was of a peacefull spirit. Then taking order for publicke affaires, hee besieged the citie of Polomias round about. The citizens seeing all hope of succour voyde from Syria, in regard of the ciuile ware, which made mighty haucke there; called from Cyprus Ptolomee Lathurus, expelled by his mother Cleopatra. He coming to them with 3000 men, Alexander retired his army into his countrey, and dispatched a messenger secretly into Egypt, desiring ayde of Cleopatra against her son Lathurus. Publickly he capitulated alliance with Lathurus, promising him 24 tunns of gold, if, expelling the tyrant Zolus, who vsurped Doris and Cæsarea, he would render those Seigneuries to the Lewes.

But Ptolomee being aduertised of Alexanders secret machinations, breaking all alliances, invaded Iudea with his Army, where Alexander mette him with his forces well appoynted, and after a rude encounter, Alexander was put to flight, and lost 30000. of his men. Lathurus not a little glorying in this victory, made mightie waite in Iudea, lacking & spoyling all places where he came, killing both women and children in euery village; and after he had sliced them in peeces, he caused their limbes to be boyled and eaten by his souldiers, to make them the more terrible to the Lewes. Very soone after, Cleopatra chased this Tyrant out of Iudea, as doubting lest if he should grow any greater, the he would further insult vpon Egypt. Alexander went to visite her at the siege which she maintained before Polomias, where he gaue her great gifts: and after he had bin royally welcomed by her, and combined alliance with her, he tooke his way homeward againe.

Much about this time, while Lathurus returned to Cyprus, and Cleopatra into Egypt, Alexander tooke Gadera, Anathunta and Anhedon, and hauing held a long siege before Gaza, with losse of a great number of his men: finally, by the treason of Lysimachus, he entred it, & slaying the Citizens most inhumanely, hee rased it to the ground. Nor would he pardon 500. of the principall persons, who labored to yield the city to him. But drew them from forth the Temple of Apollo (whereunto they had fled for freedom) to put them to death. But these iocund prosperities were overtaken with a domesticall sedition: for, in the Feast of Tabernacles, he was iniured by the people, as vnworthy of the Priestthoode, because hee was borne of a slaue: And hardly it happened, that (in his sacrificing) he was not slayne by the multitude then about him, who smote him with the boughes and branches, which the Iewes vsed to carry at that Feast. Not a little enraged at this wrong, he called his souldiers together, and entering vpon the vnarmed people, slew about fixe thousand of them: calling diuers strangers from Perſia and Cilicia, to serue as a Guard about his body. Afterward, marching forth with his Army, he vanquished the Moabites and Galaadites, compelling them to pay him tribute.

Shortly after, to his great misfortune, hee encountered with Oboda, King of the Arabians, fell into his ambushes, and his Army being hewen in pieces, hee escaped with much difficulty. Vpon this bad lucke, the Pharisees (enraged with hatred against him) tooke occasion to raise the most part of the Iewish people likewise in mislike of him, which whom he warred (very hardly) fixe whole yeares. For the Iewes that were his aduersaries, drew Demetrius, the Sonne of Gryphus, to oppose his forces with such troops as hee had called from Damas, where hee engaged: against whom Alexander fought to his great losse, for all his strange Souldiers lay slaine in the field, & he had no means to saue himselfe, but by flight. Yet, notwithstanding his instant calamity, some of the Iewes were hardened to take his part, in turning requitall vpon Demetrius: and being assisted with some fixe thousand men, he made a final recovery of his former losse.

Now, albeit vpon this victory, Demetrius (perceiuing the result of the Iewes) retired his host home into his kingdom: yet notwithstanding, the most part of the Iewes (who were coniuured against Alexander) continued in Armes still, whose power Alexander brake by little and little, as well through industry, as by vertue. And after he had sped well in some skirmishes, hee shutt vp his very mightiest enemies, in the Fort belonging to the Towne of Bethom, which he enforced with great difficulty, & vsed extreme cruelty vpon his captiues. For he tooke eight hundred of the principal Iewes, causing them all to be crucified, while hee banquetted at a Table with his Concubines, and in the presence of all his invited guests, hauing formerly commanded their wiues and children to be miserably murdred. The rest (affrighted by this cruel example) fled out of Ierusalem in the night time, being about eight thousand of his enemies.

By this meanes, that dreadfull ciuill warre was appeased, which had continued more then fixe yeares; and wherein, about fifty thousand Iewes were slaine. After these domesticke troubles, by continuall courses hee reuenged himselfe on strange aduersaries, who had giuen succour and retreat to the seditious Iewes, winning from them many Townes and Cities. Returning home againe, through his intemperance, hee fell into a Feauer quartane, which held him for the space of three yeares. And yet, hating to abstaîne (all this while) from traualle and war, dyed in besiedging a Castle on the Mount of the Gergeſenians, in the nine and fortieth yeare of his age; of his reigne and Priesthood, the seuen and twenty. Before his death, he left his kingdomes government to his wife Alexandra, and gaue her charge to pacifie the Pharisees, whom he and his Father had offended, vnto their great detriment.

He left two Sons: Hyrcanus & Aristobolus.

Of whom we shall haue leysure to speak hereafter; because first of all, we are to say some what concerning Alexandra, the wife of Alexander Iannes.

Alexandra, wife to Alexander Iannes.

After shee had instituted in the High Priesthood her eldest sonne Hyrcanus, who desired nothing more, then to leade a private life: shee succeeded in the kingdom after her husband Alexander, being especially aided by the power of the Pharisees, to whom she gaue authority, to reuocate and erect their ancient traditions, which Hyrcanus (her father in law) had abolished, & granted to them many other fauours beside. So that the Pharisees administered the whole Regiment of the Kingdom at their owne pleasure; onely the bare name of Queene remained to Alexandra. Finally, as they vnderooke the boldnesse, to execute (vnder colour of iustice) the cheefeſt Councellors to the deceased King Alexander, who they suspected to haue incited him against the Pharisees Sect: so they proceeded on in many inhumanities. The friends of Alexander going to Rome with his sonne Aristobolus, obtained (by fauor of the Court)

At this time, Tygranes King of the Parthians, made seizure on the kingdom of Syria; because the Syrian Kings had consumed all their strength and power by domesticke warres. And being entred also into Iudea, planted his Campe before the City of Plolomais: whereof (neuertheless) Queen Alexandra bought the peace by liberrall bounty of gifts. After the taking of Plolomais, Tygranes returning with his Army to his Countrey: heard newes concerning the victory of Lucullus, and the flight of Mithridates.

Within a while after, Alexandra being fallen into an extreme sicknesse, her Son Aristobolus, taking in ill part the dominion of the Pharisees: fled to the friends of his Father, who had the guarding of the castles, by whose assistance, he got possession of the principall Cities in Iudea. In this feare of the Pharisees, and no great assurance of Aristobolus, who (neuertheless) approached neere with his Army; Alexandra was called out of this life, in the ninth yeare of her Reigne, and the Lxxv. of her age, which brought peace to the Land of Iudea. But because she had encreased the power of the Pharisees; it was the reason of many troubles which followed.

The sonnes of Alexander Iannes, and of Alexandra, were (as hath bene said)

Hyrcanus the second.

Aristobolus the second.

Hyrcanus the second, naturally peacefull, and a louer of quietnesse, was installed by his Mother Alexandra Soueraigne Sacrificer, in the place of his deceased Father. And moreover, after the death of his Mother, by hereditary right he obtained the kingdom. But being vanquished by his Brother Aristobolus in battel, he was glad to saue himselfe in the Fortresse of the Temple; commanded there to leade a priuate life, the kingdom and High Priesthood being quitted to his Brother. For some time he endured these conditions, but being afterward moued by some accusations, which Antipater the Idumean (father to Herod) put into his head, as also the frauds and fetches of his brother Aristobolus; hee was induced to flye thence into Arabia, to king Aretas, whom Antipater had won by liberrall promises, to attempt the restitution of Hyrcanus to the kingdom of Iudea.

Aretas invading Iudea with a potent Army, and hauing Aristobolus at the encounter; ouercame him, and taking the City of Ierusalem, held him so long besiedged in the Temple, vntill by the command of Scarnus, Lieutenant to Pompey, he was forced to retire with his Army into Arabia, and so the enterprize for Hyrcanus proved to none effect. After that Pompey had vanquished Tygranes, & was come into Syria, the two brethren, Hyrcanus and Aristobolus, accused each other before him, touching their right to the Kingdom and High Priesthood. But Pompey, more enclining to the part of Hyrcanus, by the providence and seruices of Antipater, released Aristobolus vnder certain conditions. Neuertheless, Aristobolus meaning nothing but meere mockery to all commands, and trusting to the munitions in the City of Ierusalem; Pompey (in reuenge) entred it violently, and won the Temple so strongly defended, where were slaine of the Iewes, about the number of two and twenty thousand, and the City (with the most part of Iudea) rendered tributary to the Romaines. Which tribute they payed for a certaine time, as Iosephus confesseth, amounting to the sum of 10000. Talents, which is 60. Tuns of gold. Pompey hauing walked in the Temple, and entred into the holiest part of all, called Sanctum Sanctorum: at his departing, restored Hyrcanus to the Soueraigne Priesthood, but not the kingdom. Also, he led along with him to Rome, Aristobolus as prisoner, with his two sonnes, Alexander (who neuertheless escaped by the way) and Antigonus, and his two daughters likewise.

Thus Hyrcanus, being possessed of the soueraigne Priesthood, about foure yeares after the death of his Mother Alexandra, succored Scarnus (left in Iudea with two legions) when he besiedged Petra, a City of Arabia. Afterward, hee fell into the fauor of other Romain Lieutenants, sent into Iudea only by the perswasion and friendship of Antipater, as with Gabinus, Craſſus, Cassius and Iulius Caesar himselfe, to who he sent aid, vnder the conduct of Antipater, when he was much hindred in the war of Egypt. And because Antipater had caried himselfe valiantly, Cesar confirmed the high Priesthood to Hyrcanus & appointed Antipater to be prosecuted by

s. i. w.

After that Iulius Cesar was slaine by the conspirators, a powerfull Iew, named Malachus, being offended at the encreasing greatnesse of Antipater the Idumean, and that the whole administration of affaires should be in his hand; surprized his life by poisons. But thereupon, Iudea, being destitute of so wise and valiant a Gouernour, fell to very miserable condition. For Malachus, tempesting his thoughts with mounting hopes, to become sole maister and commander; was slaine euen in the entrance to his enterprises, by Herode sonne to Antipater, to whom (though he was as yet very yong) his father had giuen the charge of Galilee. On the other side, the brother of Malachus, desirous to reuenge the death of his brother, chequed in the manner of an enemy. Also, Antigonus the captiued son to Aristobolus, escaping from the prisons of Rome: leuying men of arms, made him selfe maister of a great part of Iudea.

Antigonus escaped the Roman prisons.

After that Herode had imbarred his proceedings, Antigonus vnder promise of a thousand talents, which value fixe runns of golde, and of five hundred most noble women; procured Pacorus and Barzaphernes, Satrapes in the Kingdome of Persia, to enter with a maine army into Iudea, to ouerthrow Herode and his brother Phaselus, whom Antionne (one of the three Monarches) had before made Tetrarchs of Iudea. Which beeing done, they should perforce render the kingdom of the Iewes, to the sonnes of Aristobolus.

Herode and Pacorus thinking it best, that Herode should be surprized rather by subtiltie, then by violence; sent Antigonus on before with some bands of men, to get possession of Ierusalem; and he (in the meane while) would follow with his Armie by Sea, so farre as to Ptolomis, where he had ordered, that Barzaphernes should meete him with a passable Army. Many gaue kind welcomes to Antigonus, running affectionately to him, and promising their ayde against Herode. Nevertheless, Herode and his brother found themselves the stronger in many encounters, not only within the City, but also without the walls.

Finally, Antigonus distrustful his forces, called Pacorus into the City, vnder pretence, that (as an Arbitrator) hee should compound the difference for the Principalltie, which was betwene him and Herode, vnder conditions more tolerable: but his purpose was indeede, to surprize Herode vnprovidd. Moreouer, hee laboured with his vncle Hyrcanus and Phaselus, worming it to into their heads, to go in embassie to Barzaphernes (remaining in Galilee with his army) and to preuaile to farr with him by rich presents, that he should reitreite his power into Syria. To which counsell Hyrcanus the High-priest, and Phaselus (brother to Herode) yeelding, without suspect of ill, were taken by the Parthians, (euen as the matter was in monopolizing) contrary to the right of Nations, and deliuered as captiues to Antigonus.

Herode being formerly aduertised of these plots and compacts of Antigonus & Pacorus; went forth of the City in the night season, with all his family, some friends, and 800. women, rich and excellent in beautie, and left the persons and their goods in custody of Massada, a well defended City of Idumea: which being done, he went thow Egypt to Rome, euen in the worst time of all the world.

Phaselus, brother to Herode, doubting the cruelty of Antigonus, because he was without armes, and bound; ranne his head (with great violence) diuers times against the wall, and by that meanes slew himselfe.

Antigonus, not contented with the depoyling Hyrcanus of the High-priest-hood, caused him beside to become deformed, by cutting off his eares, fearing lest he should afterward attain to the Priesthood againe. For it was not lawfull, that any gelded man, or defective in any limbe or member of body, should administer in sacrificing. Moreouer, distrustful that he had not sufficiently enough provided for his owne security; hee deliuered Hyrcanus captiue to the Parthians, to carry him out of Iudea, as farre as possibly they could.

And yet not satisfied with this booty, robbed many places about Ierusalem, without leauing any thing behinde them. It was not long after, that Phraates king of the Parthians, beeing informed of the nobilitie whereof he was defended; did set him at libertie, and sent him into Babylon, to be President ouer the Iewes inhabiting there, where, for about five yeares he was in great honor. But hauing heard, that not onely Herode obtained the kingdome of Iudea, by Augustus Cesar; but also, that he was conioined to him in affinity, because hee had taken in marriage his Niece Mariam, the daughter of Alexander: he thought on returning him backe againe, promising him mountaines and meauiles, for the good will of Herode.

About this time it fortun'd, that Herode, desirous to beget vnto him the courage of the Iewes, whom hee knew to beare great affection to Hyrcanus: repealed him backe by Letters and Ambassadors, and forthwith sent great Presents to the king of the Parthians, to pay the ranfome for his captiuitie. Whereupon, Hyrcanus thinking there would not be any further question of deferring; contrary to the counsell of al the Iewes which were in Babylon (who entreated him earnestly to stay there, as fearing that which followed after) returned into Iudea.

Hyrcanus ho-

Herode.

Herode wellcomed him very magnificently, and (for some time) vied him honourably; euen to the appealing of his father, and often conferring with him on the very principall affaires. Notwithstanding, he would not surrender to him the principallty of the high-Priesthood, for the defect of his eares: but, instead of Antigonus (slaine before) substituted a certaine man, named Annelus, come from Babylon, to enjoy the Priesthood. Soone after, he gaue manifest signes of his deadly hatred, against all the posterity of the Asmoneans. As, when (by a close ambush) he slew Aristobolus, nephew to Hyrcanus, and his most dearly affected wife Maria- na, Niece also to the said Hyrcanus.

Finally, after the ouerthrow of Mark Antony, one of the 3 chief rulers, to whom Herode had bene companion, and sent him succors diuers times in war, as some sad thoughts ouertooke him, for feare of Augustus being Conquerours and of his aduersaries thorow the country of Iudea, but especially fearing the people (who loued him not) should mutiny by this occasion, & transferre the kingdom of their Ancestors to Hyrcanus (who only remained of the roiall family of the Asmoneans) began to lay snares and close contriuings against the life of the miserable old man. For, he imposed a false crime vpon him; that hee would haue vsurped the Kingdome: and to make it probable, he composed counterfeited Letters, whereupon he being condemned by sentence of the great Consistory, was executed, albeit he was about 80. yeares olde. All his lifetime was troublesome vnto him, being agitated with infinit accidents of fortune, yet he (naturally) affecting quietnes, and a meane estate. Only herein reprehensible, that he was too facile, in listening to such as prouoked him on to the attempting of fond nouelties.

But at the length, his mother being detayned by a long sicknesse, and very dangerous, and he (not a little offended) that all matters were guided according to the fancie of the Pharisees; by stealth made his recourse into the city, and conferred with the friends to his deceased father, who had the keeping of the Castles. Being ayded by them in bountifull manner, he gathered an army, by whose assistance, hee possessed himselfe of diuers neighboring places about Ierusalem.

The coming of Pompey to Damas.

Pompey entered into Iudea with his Armye.

being the eldest son, made himselfe King by right of inheritance. And to defend his right by Armes, hee went to affront his brother neare to Iericho, with an army or dred in good equipage. But being left of his people, who revolted to Aristobolus, vnder hope and perswasion of better recompence; he had no other helpe, but to shield himselfe in the munition of the Temple, where he was for some time besieged by his brother, and finally deliuered, vpon condition, that he should leaue the Kingdome and High-priest hooide to his brother, and leade a priuate life by himselfe.

Some while after, hee conueyed himselfe covertly into Arabia, by the perswasion of Antipater; as hoping to regaine the Kingdome from his brother, by the meanes of king Aretas. Aristobolus knowing the comming of Aretas, King of the Arabians, with Hyrcanus and Antipater, went forth to meete them: and being vanquished in a day of warre triall, hardly fled backe againe to Ierusalem, where hee was (for a time) besieged by the enemies, that closely followed his footing, vntill such time, as hauing promised 300. talents to Seaurus, Lieutenant to Pompey, he persuailed thereby so well; that Seaurus sending in the name of the Roman people to Aretas, commanded him to auoyd out of Iudea, except hee would be enemy to the Romans. By this meanes the siege was raised; and Aristobolus, desirous to be reuenged, assembled men, and made warre vpon the Arrabes, of whom he slew fixe thousand in one fight.

While these things were thus in working, Pompey, hauing pacified the East parts, came to Damas, where Aristobolus sent him a magnificent Present, accusing his brother Hyrcanus very strongly to be a perturber of the common peace. Pompey heereupon appointed, that at the Spring time, both the brethren should be personally present, before him at Damas. Where Pompey vnderstanding the difference betwene them, was more inclined to the case of Hyrcanus; as well for the equitie of his cause, as for his loue vnto Antipater. Neuerthelesse, he suffered Aristobolus to depart vnder conditions, which he cared not to keep, but (by machinations) made a mockerie at the matters commanded him; and (indeed) did nothing at all. Heereat Pompey being highly offended, entred into Iudea, with the Army, which he had brought against the Arabian Nabathians. And because Aristobolus had againe mocked Gabinus, one of the Lieutenants to Pompey, not furnishing him (according to promise) concerning the deliuering of certaine summes of money: Pompey being much incensed by the disloyalty of Aristobolus, brought his Army and Engins before Ierusalem, and because the Iewes would not yeeld themselves, he tooke the Cittie by force, ayded by the councill of Hyrcanus; on the fasting day of the third month before Pentecost; and in the year when Marcus Tullius Cicero confounded the Conspiracie of Cataline in Rome.

In the surprisall of the Cittie two and twenty thousand Iewes were slaine by the Souldiers, and Pompey (with his friends) entred into the place called Sanctum Sanctorum, and intruded to see such things as were not lawfull, but onely for the Soueraign Sacrificer. And vnderstanding that there were great summes of Golde and gold money in the Treasury, and twelue tunns of siluer coyne; without taking anie thing, he departed thence, and commanded the place to be purified againe. Hee restored Hyrcanus to the high-priesthood, and caused the authors of the warre to be beheaded, who had bene motives to the rebellion of Aristobolus. Afterward, he demolished the walles of Ierusalem, and made all Iudea tributarie to the Romaine people. Also he adiudged to the Empire of Rome, the Citties and Townes of the Asmoneans, which were takē before from the Kings of Syria: restoring also such libertie, as in times past had liued in freedom. By this meanes hee locked vp the nation of the Iewes within narrow limits, that before had extended their dominion very farre.

At his departure, hee left two legions in Iudea, vnder the conduction of Seaurus, taking Aristobolus captiue, with Alexander and Antigonus his two sonnes, to leade them home in triumph: but Alexander (hauing deceived his keepers) escaped by the way. Here was the beginning of the feruente of the Iewish nation, who were thus enthrallē to the power of the Romans. The discord of two brethren gaue the first occasion of this calamitie: three-three score yeares before the natiuitie of Christ; foure yeares before that Aristobolus (his Mother dead, and his Brother Hyrcanus deiected from the seate Royall) had taken the Kingdome of Iudea. Saint Ierome writeth, that Iakin, father to the euer-blessed Virgin Marie, was borne the same year that Ierusalem was surprized.

I thought it fit also, to insert heere the sad issue and successe of Pompey, considering, that it seemed to be done diuinely, that hee should be murdered face to face the place which hee had profaned, alwell by effusion of blood, as by foolish audaciousnesse. For, foureteeen yeares after the taking of Ierusalem, being vanquished by Cesar in the battaile of Pharsalia, and thinking to saue himselfe by flying to the Soone of Ptolomie the Fleutler, whom he had recommended to the Romaine Senate, when he was chased and banished out of his Kingdome neare to * Pelusium, coming forth of a small Barke, and aged about three score yeares; he was slaine by the command of King Ptolomie, in the presence of his wife Cornelia. And, as it is thought, Virgill wrote these verses on his death:

A great Trunk lying vpon the Sea shore,
A bodie without head; a head lying Farre from the shoulders.

Pelusium is distant from Ierusalem, a little more then thirtie Germane miles, but iust confronting it, according to the calculation of Ptolomie. Scauen yeares after the surprizing of Ierusalem, Aristobolus, being escaped from imprisonment at Rome; came into Iudea with his other Sonne Antigonus, where againe he fortified the Fort of Alexandria, which Gabinus had destroyed. Many Iewes (affecting nouelties) ranne to him, so that being accompanied with eight thousand chosen men; hee dared to encounter with the Romans, which Gabinus (then Proconfull for Syria) conducted, who, but a little before, constrained Alexander, the other Sonne of Aristobolus (thinking to possess himselfe of the kingdome) to deliuer him vp those Fortresses, and to craue peace. But Aristobolus, sustaining the worst in a sharpe fight, retred with two bands of men, into the most strong towne of Machabean, situated on the Lake Asphalida, somewhat a little lower then the place where Irdaine enteth into it. In which towne Saint Iohn Baptist, being a long while imprisoned, was finally beheaded. In two dayes the Romans conquered the towne perforce, and Aristobolus taken, was led to Gabinus, wounded as he was; and so the second time sent bound to Rome, with his two children.

Matters thus pacified in Iudea, Gabinus, attended by his Gendarmery, rescaited Ptolomie the Fleutler in his Kingdome, he being expelled thence by them of Alexandria; in which exiloe he was assisted by Hyrcanus the foueraigne Sacrificer, and Antipater the Idumean. At his returne, he found all in Iudea and Syria full of troubles and tempests, for Alexander rauaged againe throughout Iudea; but Gabinus overcame him in a day of battell (where he had worke enough to doe) and chased him quite out of Iudea; hauing massacred ten thousand Iewes.

Afterwards hee continued two yeares in the Prouince, gouerning all matters quietly, according to the testimony of Iosephus. And hauing repayed many Townes, which had bene much spoiled in the precedent warre; he left the Army in the power of Marcus Crassus, a verie greedy and couetous man, who attempting warre against the Parthians, arriued there in Ierusalem, in the year after his second Consulship, one and fiftie yeares before the birth of Christ.

This man hauing intelligence, that there was a great masse of money locked vp in the Temple of the Iewes, went to Ierusalem, and was admitted to the most secret place of the Temple, from whence (contrary to his former faithfull promise) hee carried away more then ten thousand talents, that is to say, three score tunnes of golde; beside a beame of gold, which weighed three hundred Minaes, or (as Iosephus expoundeth it) seven hundred and fifty Romaine pounds weight, amounting to fise Quintalles and more then an halfe of our weight. Elaszar, Guardian of the Temple, deliuered that beame to Crassus very willingly, because he had promised and protested by oathe, that hee would not touch any treasure of the Temple, no more then Pompey had done tenne yeares before.

Now, concerning this auaricious Proconfull, loone after, hee dearly payed for his wilfull periury and sacrilege; being miserably miserably slaine by the Parthians, with his son Publius, an excellent towardly young man, and wel-neare thirty thousand Romaines, that rather would bee slaine, then taken; Crassus was then threecore yeares of age.

Pitholus a Jewraileth runneth on the behalfe of Aristobulus.

In the meane while, one Pitholus, a very powerful Jew, and friend to Aristobulus the captiue; after his second surprisall, beganne to raise tumults in Iudea, and weakened the side of Hyrcanus and Antipater. But after the ouerthrow of the Romaines by the Parthians, when Cassius, Questor to Crassus, re-assembled the rest of the Romaine Armie, who had fled away, and brought them backe into Syria, and as he rancked the Cities of Iudea for want of mony: he was perswaded by Antipater and Hyrcanus the High-priest, to make triall of his forces againt Pitholus, whom he vanquished in the field of battell, and brought him captiue with the Romaine army into Syria, so that thereon ensued peace in Iudea for some time.

Cassius takes Pitholus prisoner.

Five yeares after, the warre was kindled betweene Cesar and Pompey, and Cesar comming to Rome (forsaken of Pompey) tooke Aristobulus out of prison, and sent him into the East with two Legions, to subdue Syria & Iudea. But being poisoned by the way, by them that tooke part with Pompey: hee remayned long time in the Ile of Malta vnburi'd, vntill Marke Anthony, one of the three Monarchs, sent his body into Iudea, and commanded that he should be interred in the Sepulchre of Kings.

Aristobulus poisoned and buried in the Sepulchre of Kings.

Such was the end of Aristobulus, after many mutations of fortune, hauing bene twice taken and sent to Rome, where hee was almost foureteeen yeares prisoner. He was of a factious and feditious spirit, for being moued with ambition, he quarrelled for the kingdome of Iudea with his brother Hyrcanus: vntill such time as hee caused his death, and brought his Countrey into miserable seruitude, which proued the ruine of all his nation.

The feditious spirit of Aristobulus.

He had two sons, and as many daughters; Hyrcanus the second his first sonne, soueraigne Sacrificer, who had a daughter named Alexandra, married to his cousin Alexander: a woman wife, but very vehement, whom Herode afterward put to death. Aristobulus the second had Alexander, Antigonus the second, Alex-

Afterward, Ptolomy (inflamed with the loue of his daughter in lawe) slew his sonne Philippion, and tooke her in marriage. And after succoured and defended his brother Antigonus, againt Herode and the Romaines.

Alexander the second.

Surprized with his father Aristobulus by Pompey; before he arrived at Rome, deceived his guardes, and escaped. Five yeares after, assisted by an Armie, hee invaded Iudea, expelled his vncle Hyrcanus from Jerusalem, repayed the destroyed munitions, and planted there a Garrison. But Gabinus, Proconsull of Syria, being called thereto by Hyrcanus and Antipater, having fought with him in battell; held him a long time besieged in the City of Alexandria, vntill such time as he was constrained to yeeld himselfe, and put downe the chiefest fortifications. Being pacified by the entreaties of Alexander's mother (who alwayes condemned the foolish enterprises of her sonne againt the Romaines) hee obtayned pardon for Alexander. Neuertheless, Gabinus sent him to Rome with his father Aristobulus, and Antigonus his brother captiues: yet writing to the Senate, that it might stand with their good liking, to send backe the children of Aristobulus to their mother, because he had made such a promise in name of the Senate; in regarde that that valiant woman, had euermore take good part with the Romaines.

Alexander escaped from his keepers before hee came to Rome.

The exploits of Gabinus for the sonnes of Aristobulus.

The Senate was willing heerein to gratifie Gabinus, but Alexander, being returned into Iudea; returned bad recompence to Gabinus, and the Senate; for the great grace which they had granted him. For, seeing Gabinus to be hindred in Egypt, by much trouble (as hath already bene said) being fauored with thirty thousand men: againe he strove to subgiuate Iudea, and cruelly murdered all the Romaine Souldiers, that he could finde in the garrisons of the surprized Cities. For which cruelty, hee payed the iust punishment about five yeares after.

The ill-requell of Alexander to Gabinus and the Romaine Senate.

Gabinus being returned into Iudea, laboured first to appease these matters with Antipater: but no way preuayling, hee vnted the forces of the Romaine Armie, giuing uing a violent and dangerous encounter to Alexander, wherein ten thousand Jewes lost their liues, and the rest driuen all in rout. Alexander (striving to saue himselfe, and seeing his attempts so often times frustrated, and his forces broken; lay close hidden for a while, vntill he vnderstoode, that ciuile warre was kindled betweene Pompey and Cesar, and his father Aristobulus (deliuered out of prison) came thither with two legions. Then he bestirred himselfe to leuy Souldiers also; but was taken in Syria, euen vpon the very beginning of his enterprise, and led to Antioche to Scipio. Before him the Romaines accused him of cruelty, which he had vsed againt the Romaine Souldiers in the Garrisons: whereupon, by Commaund receiued from Pompey, hee was beheaded before Scipio, who then helde Syria, some few moneths after the death of his father Aristobulus; forty sixe yeares before the Natiuity of Christ; and the selfe same yeare as Pompey was slaine in Egypt, as hath bin sayd.

Treacherie and dilloyalty lies in wait for his opportunity.

Mariana, whom Herod after espoused

But we shall speake hereafter of Alexander's children, because I am desirous first to relate somewhat, concerning the actions & fortunes of his brother Antigonus. Antigonus, the last sonne to Aristobulus the 2. was twice taken with his father, and sent to Rome: once by Pompey, and another time by Gabinus. But then (by the fauour of the Senate) he was returned into Iudea with his brother Alexander; & spent some time with his Mother in the City of Ascalon. Then hee went to Ptolomy, (Lord of Chalcis) his kinsleman, who refused to assist the fool-hardy and vnhappy attempts of his brother Alexander, for feare of the Romaines. But after the death of his father and brother, when as Julius Cesar had finished the war of Alexandria, & was come into Spain: he presented himselfe before him in al humility, and made a great complaint, as well of the pittifull ouerthrow of his father Aristobulus, as also of his brother ther Alexander, both being cruelly slaine by the partakers with Pompey.

He further proceeded, and taxed Antipater with vniust gouerning, who being but of a meane descent, and a stranger: had neuertheless vsurped the kingdome of the Jewes, and had left nothing to Hyrcanus, but the silly name of Soueraigne Sacrificer, doing all at his owne pleasure, to establish the power of his children, and pretending to take away the principallitie from the Jewish: the people (of the royall family of the Asmoneans) thereby to transfere it to his Sonnes. He said, that himselfe was the only man left, to whom the lawfull succession of the kingdome appertained; who notwithstanding, being spoiled of his hereditarie dignity, was forced to wander as a vagabond, a banished man and left to all distresse. Concluding finally with humble intercessions, hee requested, that the administration of the Jewish principality might be restored to him, and Antipater dismissed.

The allegations interred againt Antipater by Antigonus.

Whereunto Antipater answering, began to accuse Aristobulus and his sonnes before Cesar, because (contrary to all right and equity) he had violently rent the kingdome from Hyrcanus his eldest brother, and alwayes bene disloyall and an enemy to the Romaines: wherein, his sons had well followed his example, filling Iudea and Syria with tumults and blood: that being the maine reason, why Aristobulus was so long detained prisoner, and Alexander had his head smitten from his shoulders, for the cruelties he vsed to the Romaines. Afterward, hee procured faithfull witnesses, how modestly he had carried himselfe in gouerning, and what fauors he had euer extended to the Romaine Captiues. Cesar being thereto moued by these iust causes, licenced Antigonus to depart, and confirmed the High-priest-hood to Hyrcanus; and ennobling Antipater with new titles of Dignity, he constituted him Tutor of all Iudea.

Antipater accuseth Aristobulus and his sonnes before Cesar.

Antigonus dismissed from Cesar without any successe.

Antigonus much displeased with this refusal, returned to his kinsleman the king of Chalcis, where he contayned himselfe almost foure yeares space, vntill Julius Cesar was murdered by the Conspirators. For then, when all the world was vp in mutinie, and that Cassius (who was foraging in Syria, impeaching the warre againt Marke Anthony) had retired the Romaine Armies out of Syria: Antigonus, assisted by his kinsman Ptolomy, and other neighbouring kings, inuaded Iudea with his Army againe; where Herode (his father Antipater being dead) being very powerful and strong, repelled and gaue him sharpe repulse, after the fighting of a battell with him.

Some years after, when Anthony one of the three Monarchs, had encreased the power of Herode, hauing ordained him (with his brother Phaselus) Tetrarches of all Iudea: Antigonus enraged with anger, thought it not tollerable, that the kingdome of Iudea should bee deuolued vnto strangers in this manner. Wherefore, to leuy a new Armie, hee had found out a young man of a fiery temper, named Lysanias, his kinsman and hoste; into whose hand the kingdome of Chalcis was fallen, by the death of his father Ptolomy, vnto whom (as hath afore bene sayd) Alexandra, the Sister of Antigonus, was giuen in marriage. As they were working vpon these conclusions, another occasion (very apt and opportune) offered it selfe, because (as then) the Parthians insulted ouer the Prouince of Syria, vnder the conduct of Pacorus and Birzaphernes. Lysanias hauing sent great presents to them, and a thousand Talents promised by Antigonus, as also five hundred women, excellen in nobility and beauty; they were hereby incited, to reseat Antigonus in possession of his fathers kingdome.

Before, in the life of Hyrcanus, we haue expressed the stratagem of the barbarous people, to surprize Hyrcanus and Phaselus (being Ambassadors) captiues, and how wickedly Antigonus did cut off his vnckles eares, sending him also captiue into Parthia, to the end, that hee might the more safely enioy the High-priesthood and the Kingdome. But this authoritie, gotten by such wicked cunning and practises, could not keepe firme, or last any long while. For soone after, Herode going to Rome, declared there to Marke Anthony, his flight and calamitie, complaining on the outrages and disloyaltie of Antigonus. In briefe, hee posed so well in his purpose, that instead of Tetrarch, he was proclaimed King of all Iudea, by consent of Augustus, Anthony and the Senate, and Antigonus adiudged enemy to the people of Rome. And although some Romane Capitaines, being sent with Legions into Syria, had charge to expulse Antigonus, and put Herod in possession of the lew with kingdome: yet notwithstanding, by bribes and gifts, Antigonus kept them off from coming into Iudea.

At length, Anthony vnder taking warre against the Parthians, Sofius was sent into Iudea with a potent Army, to replant Herode; wherefore he and Herode, their forces being ioyned together, besieged some few monthes the Citie of Ierusalem. Finally, they tooke it by force, the seventh yeare after the death of Cesar, or of the Empire of Octavius Augustus, and the selfe same day that Pompey (seauen yeares before) had taken it.

At that time, as the Souldiers (indifferently on either side) slew and murdered one another, without sparing either age or sexe: Antigonus, not able to endure the sight of such a slaughter among the Cittizens, came willingly forth of the munitions of the Temple, and fell before the feete of Sofius the Romane Capitaine, crauing pardon for his offences, and desiring (about all else) that hee would reuizit the common people, who were no warriours, and to spare the Temple. But the proud Conquerour, making a mockerie of the suppliant King, called him oftentimes (in derision) Antigonus, and after sent him captiue into Syria to Anthony, who was returned from the warre of the Parthians.

Herode being possessed of the whole Kingdome, was aduertised, that Anthony purposed to leade Antigonus with him in triumph to Rome. And fearing withall, that in due consideration of his nobilitie, or in compassion of his miserie, Augustus and the Senate would free him from imprisonment, and send him backe agayne into Iudea: with much ado, he obtained of Anthony, by many reasons alleadged, and great gifts bestowed, that Antigonus was slaine.

The principal argument that made Anthony yeelde thereto, beyond all other, was, that Iudea would neuer be peaceable, so long as Antigonus liued. Considering, that many Iewes were so displeased by being subiects to him; as it was not possible, by horrible and extreamest torments, to force them acknowledge him the name of King. And therefore hee conceiued, that there would neuer want companions in seditions and mutinies, where such a Commaunder as Antigonus should beare rule,

And thus Antigonus the last King of the Asimonians, was slaine by the Romains in Antioche, after that Herode had expul- sed him, and led away his vnckle Hyrcanus hauing obtained about five yeares the kingdome of Iudea, by helpe of the Parthians: twelve yeares after the death of his father Aristobolus, and of his brother Alexander; thirty foure yeares also before the Natiuitie of Iesus Christ our Sauior.

Afterward, the Principalltie of the Iew with people, taken from the Sacerdotal Family of the Asimonians, and especial- ly, from the nation of the Iewes: fell into the hand of Herode the sounne of Antipater the Idumean, and of his sonnes, and sonnes sonnes. So that from the first yeare of Iu- das Maccabaeus, whom his Father Mattathias (dying) appoynted Duke of the war- like troups, vntill this yeare that Herode beganne to reigne, after the taking in of Ierusalem, and death of Antigonus, was an hundred and thirty yeares. Antigonus left not any heire male: but only one daugh- ter, who afterward was wife to Antipater, the sounne of Herode. But his brother Alexander, by Alexandra, the daughter to Hyrcanus, had these children.

S. Aristobolus the the third Mariana.

This Aristobolus, was but foure yeares olde, when his father Alexander was be- headed at Antioche by the Romaines. Af- terward, coming to the age of 17. yeares: hee obtained at the beginning of Neroes reigne, the hie-priesthood by this occasi- on.

Herode being fully confirmed in the kingdome, would not establish in the hie- priesthood, his brother in law Hyrcanus, reuoked from his banishment in Babylon: as fearing to contrary the Lawe of God, that denied imperfect or dismembered people, to minister in the holy Temple, and such a one was the carelesse Hyrcanus; but exalted to the dignitie of Soue- raigne Sacrificer, another Iew of meane condition, named Ananelus, who was late- ly come from Babylon. Alexandra daugh- ter to Hyrcanus, taking it to heart, that He- rode made none account of her father, nor of her sonne Aristobolus, but had con- ferred the high-priesthood vpon a strange man; laboured by letters and gifts, to incite Cleopatra, that by the means of Marke Anthony, the High-priesthood might be conferred vpon her sonne Aristobolus.

Herode hauing intelligence hereof, & receiuing letters from Anthony, where- by he was charged to send him Aristobolu; fearing lest Anthony (although a wicked minded man) would be inuiged with the beautie of the youth, and iudge him, not onely worthy of the Priesthoode, but likewise of some portion in the kingdome; made a modest denyall to Anthony, vnder colour, that if Aristobolus should be sent out of Iudea, it would be the occasion of many mutinies to arise in the kingdome, as in hope to enioy a new King: Neither desle, to pacifie Alexandra and Mari- na, who hee haue travelled so earnestly on the behalfe of Aristobolus, and to the end, they should compassse no more contri- butings, with working new caues to Anthony and Cleopatra: of this owne goodwill, hee depozed Ananelus from the High-priest- hood, and inuelted therein Aristobolus: Notwithstanding, being highly offended against his mother Alexandra, for work- ing such close and vnder-hand practises: he gaue order, that shee should be ar- rested, and more warily attended within the Pallace, because (hereafter) she should not attempt any thing in the like maner.

Shee being a Lady of great resolue, scorned this suspition and distrust in the King, holding it most dishonourable in him, to be so watchfully kept and obser- ued: by a saythfull and secret Messenger, signified all her misfortunes to Cleopatra; who againe commaunded, that Alexandra, accompanied with her sounne Aristobolus, should be sent to her in Egypt.

To compassse her intent the more cunningly, Alexandra had caused two Cof- fins and Beeres to bee prepared, such as the dead are vsed to bee carried vpon in- to buriall: wherein shee and her sounne should bee carried to the Sea side; and there a Shippe attended ready for them, for transporting them thence to Cleopatra.

Alexandra imparted this deuice of her owne wit, to a certayne Courtier, named Sabbion, whom shee knew to bee farre out of fauour with Herode: because hee stood suspected as one consenting to the death of Antipater, father to He- rode, who formerly had bene poysoned; and therefore shee made no doubt, but Sabbion would bee the more sure and fecret, in furthering of her escape from thence.

But hee considering, that now hee had an apt occasion thrust euen into his hand, whereby to treade downe the conceiued suspicion of poysoning, and make good proofe of his loyaltie to the King; declared the whole intent and purpose vnto him; and how it was to be perfourmed.

Especiall Spies and Guardes were appointed, to take knowledge of anie appearing accident, but most of all, when the Coffins and Beeres, should be transported away, and in such artificiall order every thing was carried: that Alexandra and her Sonne were both surprized, euen in the very bearing thence in the Beeres. Sharpe and feuerer threatnings were vttered by the King, to the no small affliction of Alexandra and Arifobulus, to be so treacherously preuented in the verie height of all their hopes: yet pretending pittie and commiseration, hee promised his free and gracious pardon for this offence, provided, that (afterward) they should not practise any such attempt againe.

This clemencie hee then vsed, fearing lest if he should haue inflicted any other execution on them: hee might thereby runne into the displeasure of Cleopatra, who was consenting to the manner of their escape. And yet hee would gladly haue punished this feminine boldnesse in her, but (about all) faine he would haue Arifobulus dispatched out of the way: because hee was the High-priest, and highly affected of the people, in regard of his Royall descent, and many singuler graces in him.

In the proiecting of these his wicked devices, it chaunced to be the Feast of Tabernacles, when Arifobulus, being richly adorned in his Priestly garments, performed the office of Soueraigne Sacrificer, with such extraordinary grauitie and decencie: that both in respect of his age, stature, and beautie of body, he appeared wonderfully pleasing in every eie, so that the people standing about him, shewed out aloude with ioy, applauding every gesture, and any thing that hee did or said, with clapping their hands, expressing the fauour and inclination of all the people to Arifobulus, and what desire they had, to enioy a King of their owne Nation, in regard that their hatred to the present estate of the Kingdome, therein plainly appeared.

Herode ill diggelling this loue to his enemy, which he imagined would increase daily more and more; began to seeke into all contriuings, whereby he might (forthwith) compass the death of Arifobulus. And it came to passe, that the Feast being ended, Alexandra feasted him in the citie of Jericho, as hoping to qualifie all displeasure in the King. Herod there shewed him selfe so chearefull and gracious to the women, as possibly might be, and (about all) to the youthfull Lord, so that the whole day was spent in sports and delights of diuers kindes. At euening, Arifobulus walked with his company in the Kings Garden, where (after he had somewhat extraordinarily heated himselfe with running and leaping) the Guard of Herode, there-to appointed by the King; prouoked Arifobulus, to coole his sweating by swimming in a fith-pond neare adioyning.

Such was his gentle & flexible nature, and no way suspicious of anie intended treacherie, as hee was thereto soone perswaded. And as he came swimming neere to the bankes side: they threw water on him in iesting manner, holding his head diuers times vnder water, vntill at last he was quite stifled thereby, while Herode (walking by himselfe alone) seemed not to thinke on any such matter. But when one of the guard came, and informed him thereof, and in what maner it happened, without any mallice intended towards him: one while he grieved, another while raged, threatening the guard with death, for being so ouerbold with him. Before the Mother and Sister of Arifobulus, he presented himselfe in most woollfull maner, wringing his hands, and tearing the haire from his head, as if he had truly mourned for the Princes death; preparing a most magnificent funeral for him, and whereat there wanted no cost and pompe. By this hellish fraude in Herode, was Arifobulus the third innocently murdered, aged 18. yeares; and after hee had one yeare enioyed the High-priesthood, which Herod restored Ananias againe vnto, Hyrcanus the second, yet liuing, who remayned the onely masse of the Asmonean race, and Herode conspired the death of Arifobulus.

Mariana.

Sister to this Arifobulus, daughter to the second Alexander, the youngest sonne of the second Hyrcanus, was most excellent both for beauty and chastity. Herode espoused her, after he was declared King by the Romans, a little before the surprizing of Jerusalem, and the death of Antigonius: hee hauing repudiated his wife Doris of Idumea, by whom hee had a sonne named Antipater. This diuorce was the cause, that Mariana was continually in the dislike of Ciprius, mother to the King, of his sister Salome, and of some other women beside. Herselfe also (afterward) increased this hatred, because she, standing vpon the Nobilitie of her race, being illused and descended from Kings: despised the Mother and Sister to the King, they being strangers, and deriued but from meane condition.

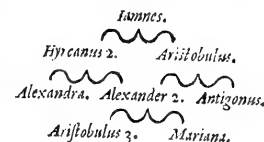

It may be, that shee grew the lesse familiar with the King, acquainting herselfe but seldome in his company; because hee had taken the Kingdome of Iudea from her father Alexander, and put to death her vnckle Antigonius, and had also (by treason) murdered her brother Arifobulus the third, a worthy innocent young Prince: Adding withall, that hee had executed her grandfather Hyrcanus, a good olde man, imposing vpon him, that hee affected the Kingdome. It was no great matter of maruell then, if this noble and high spirited woman, disdaind amiable conuersation with him, who had given her so many occasions of extreame affliction; considering also, that the eares of this young Lady were daily pestered, with shamefull iniuries and complaints, which her Mother Alexandra continually made against the house of Antipater.

Finally, she grew to be suspected by the King, for matter of adultery (as I shall hereafter more at large relate in the life of Herod.) And Salome the Kings sister, confederated with other Ladies of the Court (abounding in hatred more and more against her) maintayned strongly the suspicion; adding moreover, an intent of impoysoning him. Wherein she taking no care to cleare herselfe, relying vpon Herodes intimate loue vnto her, and her owne innocencie: shee was accused by Herode before his friends, and slayne by the sentence of them. Shee left five children liuing, which shee had by Herode, three sonnes, and two daughters, of whom afterward came the two Asiripae, to whom the Royall power in Iudea remayned, vntill the destruction of Jerusalem.

All the other race of Herode, which hee had by nine other wiues, and in great number, slayed, as shall be declared in their due places.

Almost all the whole family of the Asmoneans, being thus expressed, there remaineth now for me, that I should write of the posteritie of Antipater: but Alexandra yet resteth of the Asmoneans, who was daughter to the second Hyrcanus, and wife to the second Alexander. And although we haue already sayd somewhat of her, and are yet to speake of the actions of Herode: yet notwithstanding, I haue thought good to decipher heere summarily, the woollf misaduentures of this Ladie: for, amongst all other miserable women that we reade of, the seemeth to me the most vntfortunate, as well by accident, as thorow her owne defects. And that they may be the better vnderstood, I haue in order here inserted her parentage.

First of all, this Alexandra being but a young maid, saw, after the death of Alexandra her grandmother (who reigned but nine yeares after the deceasse of her husband) the hereditarie Kingdome and High-priesthood, taken perforce from her father Hyrcanus, by his brother Arifobulus, who had long time besieged him in the munition of the Temple.

Afterward, being very young, she was married to his cousin Alexander; and the Citie of Jerusalem being surprized by Pompey: she saw the pittifull fortune of her father, most vnhappy performed, to the great harme of the country and her selfe, being accomplished with horrible maffa-cres, foule prophanation of the Temple, slaughter of infinite Citizens, beside roberies of their goods. Moreover, the destruction of the Cittie walles, insupportable exactions, with a perpetuall yoke of most feuerie dominion of the Romaines:

beside the captiuitie and transport of her vnckle Antiochus, her husband Alexander, and her cousin Antigonus, to be led villainously (in derision) through the Ci-tie of Rome, to grace Pompeys triumph. No doubt but these mighty misfortunes, were causes of no meane griefe to Alexandra.

Shee likewise beheld the escape of her husband Alexander by the way, who came to make newe rumults in Iudea: but being ouerthrowne in many encounters, and beside depoyled of alienabling forces:
the saw him againe sent captiue to Rome
by Gabinus, with his father Antiochus, and his brother Antigonus.

Againe, shee saw him sent into Iudea,
where growing as tempestuous and troublesome as before: he was agayne chased out of the Countries limits, wandering from thence as a poore vagabond and banished man. At length, he heard that (by the commaund of Pompey) he was shamefully executed at Antioche, and that (but a little before) his father Antiochus, after a long detention of his person, being (with great difficulty) deliuered from imprisonment, was poisoned.

Next, shee saw the Cittie of Ierusalem taken by the Parthians treacherie, and her father Hircanus (by fraude and deceite in Antiochus) apprehended, his ears cut off, and led away into the enemies land. Shee, in this perillous surprisall of Ierusalem, got forth by night with her Mother, the wife, the sister of Herode, and many other Ladies, hauing her son with her, aged a dozen yeares, and her daughter little more then he: but both exposed to infinite injuries, as well of Souldiers violence, as of great wrongs to their tender yeares, the barbarous people spoyling and rauishing all wherefoeuer they came.

From thence she was sent (with the other Ladies) to a strong fortresse in the City of Sussas in Iudaea, in great feare and danger of Antigonus, then reigning:
where shee remained about two yeares, vntill such time as Herode (hauing obtained the title of King by the Romaines) returned into Iudea; and finding there his power to be strongest, deliuered her and the rest from imprisonment.

A third time also she saw the City of Ierusalem taken, ransacked, and filled with murders, by the Souldiers of Herode and Sossus: her cousin Antigonus led prisoner to Marke Anthony, and afterward put to execution.

Alexandra sawe and felt all these extremities, before the Kingdome of Herode could be confirmed: which being once effected, she likewise beganne to breathe, seeming fully acquitted from all calamities.
Nay, which is more, she might haue feled her estate in the height of happines, if shee could haue made vse of Fortunes fauours, as they shewed themselves in plentiful manner vpon her.

For Herode being King, had diuorced
his first wife Doris, and deposed his sonne Antipater, from all hope of succeeding after him; hauing married Marians, the daughter of Alexandra, whom hee most singularly affected, as well for her beauteie, as many other graces of spirit wherewith she was plentifully endowd. Hereupon ensued, that her Mother Alexandra, being called to the Court, was worthily respected, and had great credite with the King and all other. Her Father Hircanus also (already returned from exile) was reuoc-ed home into his countrey: to him He-rode, and the rest (by the Kings example) yeilded great honour, as vnto their Father.

But Alexandra overthrew all this hop-pines, by her vehement ambition, fiercenesse and impatience; so that (at length)
she became to be enuelped with mighty calamities, and was the cause of her owne death. For, taking in high displeasure, that Antimelus was authorized with the High-priethood, without any regard of her sonne Antiochus, to whom it appertained by hereditary right: she grew to machinate many dangerous matters, to exalt her sonne to that dignitie of the Priethood, procuring (by the means of Cleopatra) to incense Marke Anthony against Herode. Which being discovered, she yet attained the felicitie, that her son was made soveraigne Sacrificer: but her selfe was not in so noble estate as before, because shee was heedfully guarded, as one dangerously enclined, and much suspect by the King.

Shee, not able to endure this intolla-rable rigor of the King, being shut vp from the vse of her libertie; practised secretly to escape to Cleopatra, as hath already bin said, and being taken with her sonne in the very act, wel vnderstood, that she was then runne into the vnrecoverable hatred of Herode. Shortly after, the extreame sorrow she suffered, to see her sonne Antiochus
so treacherously murdered, might well haue admonished her: that it much better auayled, to conquer Iniurie by Patience, then roughly to wrastle with a Kings courage, naturally addicted to wickednesse.

Then againe, bringing Herode into danger, by accusing him before Anthony, for the murdering of her sonne: shee won nothing thereby, but much more contempt and hatred in the King. Insomuch, that her daughter (otherwise choicely cherished by the King) found his affection to waxe coole; but not without cause and suspition, in regarde of her Mothers cunning contriuings. Adding withall, that her father Hircanus was not so much honoured, neither respected by the king, as he was wont to be. Whereby Alexandra tooke occasion, to incite her father against Herode, aduising him to flee to Malichus, King of the Arabians, euen then, when (after the battaile of Actium) the King was in great danger, standing then in no meane feare, because Augustus was Conquerour. For the wily woman did thinke, that if shee could procure displeasure in Augustus against Herode, for his friendship to Marke Anthony, the Sep-ter would be taken from the Idumeans, and restored to the true heires of the house of the Asmoneans.

This vnhappy counsell being discouered, by the means of intercepted letters; was the cause of putting to death the good olde Hircanus, aged foure score yeares, and bringing Alexandra into the very depth of forrowes. Neuertheless, her stomack stroken with so many wounds;
and, euen hardened (as it were) against all grievances whatsoever, was scarcely sensible of any of these oppressions; after the losse of so many neare kinned, dispatched by diuers kinds of strange and vnworthy deaths. Among whom, her husband A- lexander, and Antigonus his brother were beheaded. Her vnckle Antiochus, who was likewise her father in law, was poisoned: her onely sonne Antiochus trayte-rously drowned, by the procurement of Herode. Her father Hircanus (so neare to his graue) dispatched by an ignominious infliction.

Her onely daughter Marians remayned, who being married to the King, might somewhat comfort her in these extremities. But this violent woman, swelling in hatred against the King, declared herselfe most strangely troublesome vnto her husband, by continuall reproaching
the Idumeans house, and compayning of the Kings horrible cruelties: So that, after the became to be suspected of adul-terie; and a false crime imposed on her, that shee practised to poison her husband: He-rode was the easier wonne to her death, albeit hee loued her intirely, and shee had borne him five children.

Now, notwithstanding so great cala-mitie, in the miserable & vnworthy death of her daughter; Alexandra could not yet be conquered, neyther vnderstand, how many inuinciblenes her attempts turned by misfortunes to her and hers; yet, so many other that truly putted her indig-nition. Nor could shee be admonished, moderately to beare precedent and present mishaps (whereof continually shee gaue the occasion) but rather prouoked nouell extremities, by her impatience and pcevish folly: for, after the execution of Marians, Doris, mother to Antipater, and formerly diuorced: six yeares after was recalled to the Court, and her wonted lodging in the Kings Chamber, and it appeared, that her sonne Antipater was now become accepted, and entertained by the King, in hope of succeeding after him, and the sonnes of Marians: excluded quite.

Alexandra perceiuing, that the onely remained of the Asmonean royall family, and that shee was to take care of hir daughters children: affected rather to tunne into extremity, then after such frequent causes of griefe, to liue in the despite and contempt of Doris, Salome and Antipater, who was to reigne after his father, and to see the same Antipa-ter, borne of Doris the preferred the sons of Mariana, who was a Queene, and they borne in the time of Herodes reigning. Hereupon, she began to confider on some apt opportunitie, to exploit a certaine desseigne, which shee imagined to be diuinely instructed to her foule; in regard that the King (being very greatly perplexed in mind, grieved extraordinarily for his wives execution) was sicke, euen to death, in the city of Samarit: which made her (by faire promises) sollicite the Kings Garrisons to revolt from him, whereof there were two, one in the Cittie, the other in the Temple, and these being reduced to partake with her, it would be a very ealie way for her to enjoy the Kingdome.

Alexandra exhorted those warrelke bands by faithfull messengers (considering the incertitude of the Kings life, or rather the assurance of his death :) to possesse themselves of the Pallace, before that Antipater, or any other should invade the kingdome, and to preferre the succession thereof, for the sonnes of Herode by his Queene Mariana, till they came to lawfull age, because they were the legitimate heires, and the Kingdome (by right) belonged to them. But the Souldiers, hauing duely considered on the matter among themselves: concluded, not to follow the perillous and ill-advised counsell of this audacious woman, whom they knew to be most maliciously inclined to the King. For (indeede) they greatly feared the Kings dangerous nature, most couetous of reigning and commanding, and accustomed to reuenge (very feuerely) any attempts, in such as hee held the least suspicion of, being any way affected to the kingdome: as hee witnessed most euidently, in the punishments inflicted vpon his owne children.

One of the Souldiers thinking, that by revealing the aduice of this woman, hee should winne great grace and fauour of the King: poaited to Samarit, and there disclosed to the sicke King, all the machination of his mother in law: which grew the more tedious to Herode, in regarde of very impatiently enduring the anguish of his discafe: and therefore (wholly overcome with rage and choller) hee sent instant command to Ierusalem, forthwith to put his mother in law Alexandra to death, as a trayterous conspirator against his life; and it was accordingly perforced.

Thus after infinite calamities, Alexandra ended her dayes in this tragick manner; for, being neuer contented with any present fortune, the daily begate nouell miseries, one still in the necke of another, only through distasting any instant condition. Otherwise, she was a woman graue, discret and ingenious, but ouer violently giuen vp to ambition, hatred and anger (very vile and bad counsellors) more then needed. She had out-gone the compass of three score yeares, when she was thus put to death; and so became the family of the Asmoneans quite extinct: but only what remained in the heires of Mariana, deriued from an Idumean father.

Let this Discourse Iustice, concerning the noble house of the Asmoneans, which from a small beginning (in the defence of a most honest and good cause) became exalted to soueraigne glory and dignity, by their owne industry, but (more especially) the helpe of heauen. Afterward, hauing left the principall cause, they began to seeke after power and riches, according to the fashion of Pagan Kings, and to stirre in many vnnecessarie matters: partly trusting to their owne might, and partly relying on the assistance of strangers. Whereon ensued, that, being first distracted by domestick discordes, and next, admitting entrance to strange enemies: they beganne (by little and little) to diminish; and finally, to leaue the whole possession of the Ierusalem kingdome, to the dominion of strangers. Euen after they had held the principality of the people, from Judas Maccabaeus, vnto the beginning of Herodes kingdome, for an hundred and thirty yeares, and had kept the High-priesthoode an hundred and seuenteen yeares.

differently) held the principalltie of Iudea, but not the foueraigne Sacrificers Office (for it was not lawfull, that so sacred a charge should bee administered by strangers) vntill the destruction of the Cittie, and the Temple of Ierusalem.

For the High-priesthoode was in the hands of others, who indeede were Iewes; but yet of diuers and obscure Families, enlaid by Herode and the Romaines, eyther by fauour or rewards.

It is no ealie matter to describe their succession, neither doe I hold it any way necessary for this discourse: considering that afterward, the foueraigne Sacrificers were neuer potent or powerfull; and beside, the foueraigne gouernement remained in the hands of Romaine Captaynes and Princes.

Iosephus also was not very carefull, curiously to number the foueraigne Sacrificers; but rather satisfieth himselfe, with declaring, that in the kingdom of Herode, accounting from his reigne, vntill the destruction of the Iewish nation; there had beene nine and twentie High-priests, which space of time continued little more then an hundred yeares. For, from the beginning of Herodes reigne, vnto the second yeare of the Empire of Vespasian, I finde by computation, an hundred and sixe yeares.

But in the first Familie of Iesus, which held the High-priesthoode, after their returne from Babylon, vntill the time of Antiochus the Noble; there are accounted fiftene foueraigne Sacrificers onely, although the time was thrice as long as the latter. For, as we haue already elsewhere related, that from the first yeare of Cyrus, vntill that of Alcimus, are found three hundred eightie and sixe yeares, or thereabout. The cause of this multiplicitie of High-priests, grew by so often and frequent changes, one still defeating and ouerthrowing another: one while by the power of money, fauour, or both; another while by might, and assistance of enemies.

The third Family.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning the Posteritie of Antipater the Idumean of Ascalon, transferring the High-priesthoode (at their pleasure) to strangers: hauing violently got it from the Asmoneans, and held the principalltie of the Iewish people, vntill the destruction of Ierusalem, vnder the reigne of Vespasian.

Idumea is the vmost part of the Land of Canaan, confining Egypt and Arabia, and closing vp the coast of Iudea towards the South, holding on that part, which the Tribe of Iuda had by lot in their inheritance. In elder times, it was inhabited by the posteritie of Efaun, (brother to Iacob) who was also named Edom, that is to say, Red-hayred. Of him they came to be called Idumeans, and hauing lost the true doctrine, and holy seruices commanded them by God: they fell to the worshipping of Idolles, with their neighbouring nations.

King Dauid first of all brought them into subiection, and made them tributarie to the Kings of Iuda.

About an hundred and fiftie yeares after, they revolted againe vnder Iorim King of Iuda, sonne to Iehosaphat, and rebelled against the Iewes, diuided into two kingdomes. And although the succeeding Kings compelled them diuers times, to vnder-goe againe their former seruilitie: yet notwithstanding, they defended their libertie by armes, vntill such time as Iudas was led captiue into Babylon. And then, they tooke many Citties from the Iewes, which afterward (by the Edict of King Darius) they were enforced to restore vnto them againe, when they were returned from Babylon.

Not long after, Iohn Hyrcanus, sonne to Simon the Asmonean, hauing overcome them in a very difficult warre: constrained them, to make profession of the same doctrine and religion with him, causing them

Succeeded in the government of Idumea, after his deceased father, during which time, he not only wonne the hearts of his owne nation, augmenting and confirming his wealth, by aliance with neighboring Kings and Cities; but also strongly insinuated himselfe into good grace with Hyrcanus the second, by many acceptable seruices. For he being instituted Soueraigne Sacrificer by his mother, who then ruled the kingdome. Antipater had great hope, that the fauour of Hyrcanus would (in time) aduance him to higher degree. Now, he perswaded himselfe, that the mother being dead, hee should come to imoy the kingdome by hereditary right.
Wherefore, Antipater was very diligent towards him in all kinds of courtesies, making no account at all of the younger brother: which made him wonderfully

ter laboured

hated by Aristobulus, as it fell out after in open apparance. For, their mother being dead, Aristobulus hauing fought with his brother Hyrcanus in a field of battell, & afterward held besieged in the temple:
he was at length constrained, to dismishimselfe, both of the kingdome and high-Priesthood. And then (by slowe and politique degrees) he deposed Antipater from the gouernement of Iudaea, for his so many good seruices to Hyrcanus in war.

This iniurie more and more enflamed
the hatred of Aristobulus, and because hee could not reuenge himselfe by power: hee incited the greatest Lords of the Jewes against King Aristobulus by secret accusations. About all, he handled Hyrcanus in diuers kindes (hee being of his owne nature, modest and temperate) one while terrifying him with strange feares, another while chea-ring his hopes, with vndoubted coming to his Crowne againe. He told him that his brother Aristobulus, (a man nicerely vile by complexion) sought all occasions, either by close contriuings, or open violence, to preuaile against his life: for his more secure enioying of the kingdome, whereto hee had aspired by such wickednesse. Hee auouched, to haue certayne knowledge, of diuers enterprises in Aristobulus by euident signes: either because they were truly so indeede, or for the more prouoking Hyrcanus against his brother. Moreover, he shewed the meanes and wayes, whereby Hyrcanus might regayne the Kingdome belonging to him, to wit, if they both fled thence to Aretas, king of Arabia, with whom he had ancient amitie and alliance, and who (he doubted not) could satisfie their desires.

Hyrcanus was at last wonne by these speeches, being formerly wounded with the wrongs which his brother had offered him; so that accompanied with Antipater, and some other, who not a little desired
the dominion of Aristobulus, he secretly went to Aretas in the city of Petra. There humbly himselfe before the King, hee desired assistance of him against his wicked and cruell brother, who not only had deprived him of the High-priesthood, (contrary to all right and equitie) which hee had peaceably enioyed nine yeares in law of Nations belonged to him, as being trappes and traines for his life. Whereupon he promised, that it hee should be restored to his Kingdome; he would surrender to him ten Cities, which his father Alexander Lamnes had taken from the Realme of Arabia, and other honourable recompences beside.

Aretas, more moued by the perswas-ions of Antipater, then all the praier and promises of Hyrcanus, invaded Iudaea with fiftie thousand men. Aristobulus encountering with him, was vanquished, chiefly by the valiance of Antipater: and being abandoned of his fouldiers, the most part yeelded themselves to Hyrcanus. Aristo-bulus got closely into the Citie, and there (with some of the Sacrificers and Citti-zens) kept within the forresse of the temple, being provided of all things necessarie to endure besieging. But yet before this extremite, he had sent an ambassage (in great haste) to Scaurus, Lieutenant, abiding then in Syria, intreating succour him against the Arabes: promising him four hundred Talents, that is, two hundred and fortie thousand crownes of the Sunne.

Aretas pursuing Aristobulus with his Armie, entred into the Citie, to lay his siege before the Temple; the Cittizens yeelding themselves to Hyrcanus, and the Cittie also. But some Jewes forekeing, that this debate betweene the brethren, would cause the ruine of the whole country; left there their goods, and fledde into Egypt.
Other of the Cittizens ioyned with the Arabes, besieging the munition, and pressed the inclosed Sacrificers very narrowly; yea, much more nearly then the ene-mie, vning deceipts and subtilities with their crueltie. For they drew out of the secret Sanctuarie (where this ciuile warre was most vnciuilly maintained) a holy man, named Onias, who in an extreme drought and dread of sterility, made his prayers to God, desiring raine in that needefull season: and would haue compelled him, to curse and damne the besieged to the duell, because they would not yeelde themselves. But hee (on the contrary) made his prayers aloud to God, that he would neyther heare the Sacrificers, or Priests besieged against the people, nor the people besieging against the Priests, for which cause the Jewes stoned him.

And when the feast of Easter was come,
when there was neede of many bealls for Sacrifices; the Priests required, that such store might be deliuered them, as was necessarily to be vsed in such solemne Sacrifices, agreeing to pay a thousand drachmes for each beast; that is to say, an hundred crownes of the Sunne. But after that the Jewes had receiued so great a summe from the Priests: they descended from the walles, and would not performe a iore of that which they had promised, but mocked the sacrificing Priests, who were ouer credulous in beleueing them.

But the Lord God being offended with this wickednes, and taking vengeance for their foule transgressions; sent a sharpe winde on the Corne then almost ripe, which being vterly spoyled, the famine was so great, that a bushell of wheate was solde eleuen times more deare, then vsually it was wont to be; to wit, at cleauen drachmaes, whereas before (in euery yeare) it was sold for a drachma, and lesse.

The besieged beginning to feeble the want of foode, and that nothing hindred them from yeelding, but onely to heare an answer from Scaurus (vnder the hope whereof, Aristobulus encouraged the Priests, to endure all difficulties of the siege) it fortunely (very successfully for them) that Scaurus sent Ambassadors to King Aretas, that he should withdraw his Army out of Iudaea, except hee meant to prouoke the displeasure of the Romaine people. Aretas obeyed this command, and so much the rather, because his army was in great distresse for foode. By which meanes, (without doing anything else)
Hyrcanus and Antipater returned backe to Arabia with the King.

Soone after, Pompey came out of Armenia into Syria, wherupon, Antipater procured many of the most potent Jewes, to accuse Aristobulus before him. Himselfe likewise, as an Ambassador sent from Hyrcanus, went to Pompey, and pleaded the cause of Hyrcanus against Aristobulus, and entred into such respect with Pompey, that after the surprizing of the Citie, Hyrcanus was restored to the High-priesthood, but not to the Kingdome. And from thence forward, Antipater beganne to occasions whatsoever, because Hyrcanus, (being a lover of quietnesse) left all to his rule. And so gracious was he with the Romaine Captaines, in all such services as possibly he could do for them: that he innuinated farre into their friendship, causing Hyrcanus daily to bestow magnificēt gifts, and himselfe receiued all the thanks and profite for them.

First, he was very diligent, to furnish Scarus with all kinde of munition, when he was left in Iudea with two legions, and made warre vpon the Arabes. Next, being sent in embassage by the same Scarus to the King Aretas: hee procured peace, in regarde of his auncient amitie with the King, and perswaded Scarus to bring his Army out of Arabia, after he had receiued of the King three hundred Talents, as much to say, as an hundred and foure-score thousand crowns of the Sunne. Afterward, he assisted Gabinus against Alexander, sonne to Aristobolus, but especially in the restitution of King Ptolomey the Fleustler: where he made passage for Gabinus, to goe from Iudea into Egypt by Iudaea.

By the like subtile and cunning means, he qualified rich Cassius, and his General Cassius, being removed from the Parthians warre; fearing lest any thing should be attempted, that might be hurtfull to Hyrcanus, who (from time to time) was accused to the Romaine Captaines, as well by the sonnes of Aristobolus, as by diuerse powerfull Iewes, that were of the same faction.

But, for the more sure establishing of his power, hee ayded Julius Caesar more then all the rest, to whom he performed faithfull service in the Alexandrian warre, in bringing him three thousand Iewes, & procuring the Arabes, Iudaeans, and Iews dwelling in Egypt, to be his companions in that warre. And when Mithridates of Perseus (who went with a great Armie of Cilicia and Syria against Caesar) was repulled in Egypt: Antipater (Damiata being subdued) brought helpe to Caesar, and saved him by the way; when he was compelled (in an encounter) to giue place to the enemy, his men being ready prepared for fight.

For these desertis (the Alexandrian war being ended) Julius Caesar confirmed the High priesthood vnto Hyrcanus, permitting him to builde vp the City walles a gayne: Moreouer, he appoynted Antipater to be Tutor of all Iudea, and sent him into Iudea, honoured with the title of a Romaine Bourgeisse, and perpetual immunities beside.

Antipater seeing himselfe exalted to such dignitie, deuised also how to aduance his sonnes. Whereupon, Phasaelus (being the eldest) he appointed him to be gouernour of Ierusalem, and the neighbouring places about it: in regarde of the negligence and carelesnesse of Hyrcanus in the gouernement. Next to him was Herode, and he as yet but yong: yet he gaue the charge of Galilee to him. Both of them very commendably performed their seuerall offices, which caused their father to bee much more esteemed generally, and won the fauour of many powerfull persons, by both his owne, and his sonnes liberalitie.

Hereupon it hapned, that some Iews grew iealous and suspicious of Antipater, seeing him (purposely) to maintaine the remission of Hyrcanus, onely for the exaltation of his owne sonnes: abusing also his riches and reuenues, to bestow great fauours and gifts vpon the Romains. In this respect, some of the best aduised Iewes, and of the better sort, feared not to reprehend Hyrcanus publicly, for his neglect and slouthfulness, in referring the totall administration of all things, onely to Antipater and his sonnes, who were scarcely started out of childhood. Having already gathered such heaps of wealth and cheuillance, onely to curry fauour with the Romains, that they were become dreadfull to the whole nation. They bad him to be well aduised, whereto tended this power in the Iudaeans, shewing him withall, that he dealt vnjustly and indifferently, hauing so many Iewes, excelling in valour and expertnesse of armes: to reliefe them from managing publike affaires, reposing his whole trust in the defence of a stranger, who intended no profite to the Iewish nation, but only how to leaue the kingdome of Iudea to his owne sonnes.

Now, albeit these speeches did a little moue Hyrcanus, himselfe also fearing the power of Antipater: yet notwithstanding, he could not forget, what benefites he had receiued by him, and what loyalty he had declared towards him, hauing alwayes kept him in extreame dangers. Beside, he feared Aristobolus, and his sonnes, against whom he thought he stood in need of a powerfull defender, which made him answer; that he could not dismisle Antipater from gouerning the generall affaires, in regard he had receiued his authoritie from the Romains; who he might by no means offend, without both hazarding himselfe, and the whole Country to vnauidable dangers.

When the accusers of Antipater perceived, they could worke nothing on the slow and neglect nature of Hyrcanus, they began to consider on some subtile means, whereby they might put Antipater to death. And one of them being named Malichus, excelling all the rest in wealth, wisdom, and corage, sought how to intrap Antipater, by secret plots and ambuities prepared. But Antipater getting intelligence thereof, withdrew himselfe beyond Jordane, where he leuied an Army, by aide from King Aretas his deare friend, with full deliberation to reuenge this injury. Neuerthelesse, he was appeased by Hyrcanus, because Malichus purged himselfe by oath, that he neuer intended any treason against him.

This hapned immediately after that the Conspirators had slayne Julius Caesar in the Senate house, when Cassius (Author and chiefe in the coniuration) was come into Syria, and from thence into Iudea: where he villainously ransacked the Cities and Townes, onely to get money, so that he sold the Magistrates of some places, with their whole families, and pillaged foure great cities in Iudea, selling all the Citizens for slaues: because they had made refusal, to giue such a large summe as this insatiable beast demanded. As he asked of the Iews seven hundred talents, (which summe amounted to foure tunnes of gold of our coyn, and twenty thousand Crownes of the Sunne): Antipater gaue charge to leuy this money, partly of his Sons, and partly of the most powerfull Iewes; so that the whole summe being suddenly paid in: Antipaters sonnes were the better welcomed among the Romans. And so farre it proceeded, that Cassius (euen then) made promise of the kingdom of Iudea to Herode, who ouer & about the summe whereto the taxation mounted, carryed store of gold to the campe in Syria when he had ended the war against Marke Anthony and Octavius. But for the present he commanded the Province of Syria to Herode, and the Army by Sea.

Malichus well obseruing, that the power of Antipater so mightily encreasing, was not (by any patient means) to be endured; practised & dealt with the Taster or Cup-bearer to Hyrcanus the High-priest, by great gifts and summes of money: so that one night, as Antipater was at Supper with Hyrcanus, the Taster poisoned him; albeit the sayd Taster had twise bin deliuered from death by Antipater, & held his life of him. Thus was Antipater murdered, in the yere following the death of Julius Caesar, he being (vndoubtedly) a man very excellent, wise, and prouident. Some imagined, that Hyrcanus was not ignorant of the deed doing, or (at least) it was not doone in any delpight of him: although Antipater by the means of Pompey, got him restored to the Soueraigne Priesthood, and afterward (for the space of 22. yeares) alwayes kept and defended him against the violence of his enemies.

Perhaps one way he had offended Hyrcanus, that (to satisfie the couetous desires of Cassius, and to forestall perills incident to himselfe) he was somewhat ouer-rude in vrging money from him, he being an old man, sparing by nature, and the more gripple in holding, in regarde of his age. For which fault, Hyrcanus declared no great distaste in the murdering of his Benefactor. Because many times it comes to passe, that some men, hauing receiued good benefites for a large length of time, and yet growing (at length) to be displeased: they forget all good deferences past, and resting not so contented, proceed to diuers dangerous practises against them. Of such ingratefull men, Philip Melancton, my worthy master, & good father, wrote certaine Verses to this effect:

Some men there are, it thou transport their States
With yompe to Rome, and plant'st them in the gates;
Such fauour they require not with due grace,
But (like ingratefull wretches) all deface.

Not long after, Hyrcanus payd dearly for this his foolish ingratitude, because (the yere following) Antigonus compassed the means to bring the Parthians into Iudea; when Hyrcanus being taken, & led into a strange land by the enemyes well found (but ouer-late) what defence he had lost by the death of Antipater, and then in

A further entrance into discourse, concerning the race and Posteritie of Antipater, for the better clearing of some obscure doubts in diuers Authors, and full satisfaction of the Reader.

Of the Sonnes of Antipater.

Phaselus the eldest.

The worthie performance of Phaselus in his charge.

He being constituted by his Father, to be Gouvernor of Ierusalem, and the round neighbouring places, to assist Hyrcanus (carelesse, and very vnapt for administration) in regard of his age; discharged his Commission most commendably for fixe yeares space, during the life time of his father. He being dead, hee appealed (by his vertue) a great trouble arising in Ierusalem, in regard that a certayne man, named Felix, driuen by Cassius into Ierusalem with Souldiours, being corrupted with money from diuerse Iewes; laboured to ouerthrow it. But this Felix was vanquished by Phaselus, and for a while kept in prison; but afterward releas'd vpon certayne conditions.

Next, it was no little ioy to him, to see Malichus (the murderer of his father Antipater) punished for his wickednesse: who labouring to inuade the Principallity of Iudea, was slayne by the Souldiours of Cassius, and by the industrious meanes of Herode.

Cassius being conquer'd, Marke Anthony came into Syria, and made Phaselus & Herode Tetrarches of Iudea: notwithstanding all the criminall accusations, alledged by the Iewes against them. But Phaselus enjoy'd not that dignity any long while; for the year following the death of his father, the City being surpris'd by the Parthians and Antigonus: he was (by subtilty) taken with Hyrcanus, and slew himselfe remaying prisoner, as I haue already related in the life of the second Hyrcanus.

Iosippus the third Sonne of Antipater.

Concerning the brethren of Phaselus.

Herode commeth next after Phaselus, in respect of his age. But I holde it more conuenient to speak first of his brethren, whose actions were of lesse fame and esteeme.

Iosippus (called by some Gisippus) the third sonne of Antipater, was appoynted Gouvernour of Idumea by his father, who had obtained the Principallity of Iudea. After his fathers death, he valiantly defended the family and affaires of his brother Herode, they being driuen into exile by Antigonus and the Parthians: withdrawing them into the City of Messada, against the sayd King Antigonus, enduring there a very difficult siege, vntill that his brother

Iosippus defended his brothers cause and all his friends.

brother Herode (being returned out of Italy) deliuered him and them, and was afterward proclaymed King by Ottavius Augustus, and by Marke Anthony.

Within a while after, when his brother Herode went to Marke Anthony, who besieged the City of Samosata, neare vnto Euphrates; the charge of the Army was giuen to him. But going inconsiderately foraging for Corne, with fixe silly bands of Souldiers: he was taken in the Straits of the mountains neare to Iericho, and there slain with all his men by Antigonus, about foure yeares after the death of his father.

His head being finitten off, was carried vp and downe in a mockery, and finally bought of Antigonus, by his brother Pheroras, for fifty Talents, that is, 30000 Crownes of the Sunne. He had a sonne named Iosippus also, to whom his vncle Herode gave in marriage, Olympia, the Sister of Archelaus, of whom he begat Marians, afterwards marry'd to Herode the lesse, King of Chalcis.

Of them was borne Mariana, wife to Herode, son to Aristobulus, King of Chalcis.

Pheroras, the yongest sonne to Antipater, when his brother Iosippus was slain; being as yet but young, he continued alone, yet ayded his brother Herode valiantly, managing dangerous warres (on his behalfe) against Antigonus. At the request of Herode, Augustus Caesar made him Tetrarche, and vied him very honorably; yet returning but bad recompence therefore to his brother. For, hauing procured him, to put his wife Mariana to death, and his two sonnes Alexander and Aristobulus: he at the length compacted with Antipater, to compasse the death of his brother also. But being preuented by sudden death, hee escaped punishment. He dyed some few yeares before his brother Herode, and left two sonnes, to whom Augustus marry'd two daughters of deceased Herode, Roxana and Salome, endowing each with fife and twentie thousand Crownes of the Sunne. Hee had a daughter also, marry'd to the sonne of Antipater, yongest sonne of King Herode.

Salome, daughter of Antipater, Sister to Herode King of Iudea.

In her first marriage, shee was giuen to one named Iosippus, who being constituted guardian of Mariana, wife to Herode, was slaine by the Kings commaund, because hee would not reueale some matters of secrecie. Afterward shee was married to Costabarus, Gouvernor of Idumea, from whom shee seperated her selfe by diuorce, contrary to the Lawe of Moses: which permitted Husbonds to leave their Wiues for some cause of importance; but not Wiues to leave their Husbonds. Neuerthelesse, Salome vied this licence, confiding in the power of her brother: and afterward was the cause, that the sayd Costabarus dyed miserably. Finally, in despite of her selfe-will, Herode made her marry one Alexis: although shee was almost made in loue with a potent Arabe, named Syleus, an vtter enemy to Herode, and one that would not be circumcised.

This Salome was a meere Fury in the Court of her brother, and a flaming firebrand of domestick discordes, whereon many murders ensued. For, being wholly ouercome with hatred against Marians the Asmonean (who despised her, because she was not nobly borne) shee ceased not to enflame the spleene of her brother: contriuing false crimes of adultery and poisoning against her, vntill Herode had put his dearly affected wife to death. Which being done, and Salome fearing some reuenge to be inflicted on her: be-ganne to prouoke the father against Alexander and Aristobulus, the sonne of Mariana, seruing her turne heerein with Antipater, the sonne of Herode, who stood in feare, that these two yong men should be aduanced and preferred before him to the kingdome.

Shee praye'd so well by her cunning plots and practises, that they both standing accused, for affecting the Kingdome, and preparing of poisonys, they were condemned; and, notwithstanding all their excellent partes and perfections, they were strangled by their fathers command.

Moreover, by her secret and subtle reports, she wrung Antipater into his fathers ill opinion and disgrace, although hee had bene her companion in all her wickednesse; plotting and preparing all the treasons against his father, whereof he had fallily accused his most innocent brethren, the sonnes of Marians, vntill himselfe was caught in the same snare, and (by his fathers command) dispatched also.

Shee, the minister of so many monstrous cruelties, did suruiue her brother Herode; who left her (by his last will and testament) three most opulent Cities, to wit, Lamnia, Azot and Phaselus; beside two millions and an halfe of silver coine, which amounts to fifty thousand crowns of the Sunne.

Moreover, she being familiar (by Letters) with Livia, wife to Augustus (whom Iosephus continually calleth Iulius) the said Augustus gaue her the Castle royall in the City of Afcalon. And she received annually out of the fore-named Cities, three score Talents, which arise to thirtie fixe thousand crownes of the Sunne.

Hauiug liued twelue yeares after the death of her brother Herode; shee dyed a yeare before the departure of Augustus out of this life, and left (by her testament) to Livia, wife to Augustus, those Cities which she formerly held. She left a sonne named Antipater, and a daughter singularly beautifull, called Berenice, of whom came these children following.

Agrippa

The second, succeeded in the Kingdome of Chalcis, after his Vnckle Herode.

Herode, the second sonne of Antipater, whom some doe call the Great, was the first King of Iudea, being of a contrary Nation.

Herode being as yet but young, was ordained President of Galilee, by his father Antipater, soone after Iulius Caesar had finished the warres in Egypt. He gaue immediate probation of his industry and valour, hauing destroyed and slaine Ezechias the Jew, and a troop of theues that wasted Syria: for the which being highly commended by the Syrians, hee found great grace and fauor with Sextus Caesar, who then gouerned the Prouince of Syria. It fortuned, that by the instigation of them that enuyed Antipater, Hyrcanus the Soueraigne Sacrificer (contrary to his will) gaue personall summonses to Herode, in regard of the Jewes by him taken and slaine in Syria: without listening to the sentence of soueraigne Iudgement, which then was tearmed Sanhedrin, of the Greek word Syneon, as I conceiue, and consisted of seauenty and two Iudges, who were called the seuentie Ancients. Philo writeth, that before the kingdome of Herode, the Iudges of that Councell were chosen out of the posteritie of Dauid only. Herode hauing aduertisement (by Letters)

ters from his father, appeared at Ierusalem on the day of Affignation, accompanied with a reasonable guard, and recommended by Sextus Caesar.

Hyrcanus perceiuing, that the Iudges were heauily incensed by the aduerfaries of Antipater, and that they would not faile to giue sentence in sharpe manner: desiring to gratifie his friend Antipater, he secretly admonished Herode, to withdraw himselfe out of the city, before he were condemned by the Jewes sentence, and thereupon conuayed to punishment.

The young man returned backe into Syria, very impatiently bearing the iniurie, which hee conceived to be doone him by the Iudges, declaring to Sextus Caesar the treacherie of the Cittizens, and hauing received from him part of the Romaine Army, and the regiment of the lower Syria: hee resolved to reuenge the wrong which the Councell had offered him: So, going vp to Ierusalem with a maine Army, hee could hardly be withheld by his father, and his brother Phaselus, who met him by the way, and made him to retreat his army into Syria. But yet he could not remoue his mallice, which still he continued against the Conffitorie: and which hee vterly quailed and ouerthrew, after his coming to the Crowne.

Not long after the death of Iulius Caesar, by a close ambush, and ayde of Cassius his Souldiours; he procured Malichus to be slaine, being the murdurer of his father Antipater. Which being done, once more hee expelled out of Iudea Antigonus, the sonne of Aristobulus, whom hee ouercame in warre, albeit hee had recovered part of Iudea.

After that Cassius and Brutus were vanquished neare to Philippi, when Marke Anthony was come into Syria; Ambassadors went from the Jewes to meete him at Bithynia, accusing there Phaselus and Herode to him, because the lawfull heires of the kingdome were expelled, and they (by force) holde the whole gouernement of Iudea. Herode also met them there, well furnished with rich and sumptuous gifts, to bestow on Marke Anthony: of whom hee was entertained most benignely, for the loue hee had borne to his father Antipater, when being Lieutenant to Gabinus, hee was still in warre, during the peace of Syria and Iudea. Wherefore, howsoever hee listened to the Jewes accusations, yet hee ordained Phaselus and his brother Herode Tetrarchs of Iudea. And because the Jewes ceased not to lend Embassie vpon Embassie, and continually in great number, amounting to a thousand men in the end. Marke Anthony punished them with imprisonment. And because they neuer would giue ouer, but daily irritated, that (by no meanes) they might be subiected to Herode; hee caused some of them to be put to death.

Hyrcanus descended to Anthony in Syria (already conioyned with Herode in affinity, to whom hee had giuen his younger sister Marians, daughter of Alexander and Alexandra: who was honourably entertained by Anthony, and confirmed in the possession of the High-priesthood; and obtained those cities and persons (seduced by Cassius into seruitude) to be deliuered and enfranchised; and that the rapined goodes should be restored to their first owners.

The yeare following, Facorus hauing subdued Syria (attracted by great promises) brought Antigonus backe againe to Ierusalem, as hath formerly bene sayde. Where Herode (hearing that his brother Phaselus and Hyrcanus the foueraigne Sacrificer were detained prisoners, contrary to the lawes of Nations, knowing also, that the Jewes were affected to Antigonus, fearing both his enemies and the Cittizens) he departed forth secretly in the dead time of the night, with his Mother Cypria, his wife Doris, his sister Salome, his affianced Marians, his mother in lawe Alexandra, and eight hundred other women, beside a great company of friends, and (with much adoe) got nor safelie into Idumea. For his mother was forewounded by the way, by reason of the Waggon's ouerthrow vpon her: so that Herode (as halfe desperate) thought to haue slaine himselfe, because hee was ouer-closely pursued by the barbarous people, whom (neuerthelesse) hee valiantly droue backe, and quite ouercame.

There he left all his company, and such goodes as they carried with them; in a strong Citie named Masada, vnder the charge and protection of his brother Isidippus: and went very secretly (attended but with a few Souldiours) to king Aretas, relying vpon the loue and friendship which was betweene him and his father Antipater. But being hindered from entering into Arabia, hee passed (with great difficultie) into Egypt to Cleopatra, who furnishing him with needfull things: hee tooke shipping in the worst season of all the year, and shaped his course directly for Rome; where being arrived, hee acquainted Mark Anthony with the fraud of Antigonus, his owne flight, and perill of the people hee had in charge; humbly entreating him, that hee would not suffer him to be thus trampled on by his enemies, to whom hee had expressed kinnesse, and oftentimes exalted them.

Anthony reported the complaint and request of Herode, to his companion Augustus in the Empire, and both they together commended their suppliant friend to the Senate: remembering the perpetual deuotion & loyalty of his father Antipater, towards the Captaines and Souldiours of Rome, and especially to Julius Caesar. In briefe, they preuailed so farre, that (by common voice) Antigonus was iudged enemy to the people of Rome: and the kingdome of Iudea conferred on Herode, the seauenth day after his coming to Rome. He was conducted to the Senate house going in the middle betweene Augustus and Anthony; Domitius Calpurnius, and Asinius Pollus, Consules, going before him, accompanied with other Magistrates and Senatours, euen all the way thence to the Capitole, where the Sacrifices were performed. And this beeing the first day of his reigne, hee was magnificently feasted by Marke Anthony: fourre yeares after the death of Julius Caesar; two yeares after them of Cicero, and thirty seuen before the birth of our Sauour Christ.

Herode being returned into Iudea, had a very difficult warre against King Antigonus, which continued the space of fourre yeares: because that the Romane Captaines (as Ventidius, Sile and some other, who had the charge of placing Herode in full possession of the kingdome) were corrupted by gold sent from Antigonus, desiring nothing more then deserting, and neuer earnestly assisted Herode. Besides, many Iewes (ill affected to the house of Antipater) moued many troubles against him.

The beginning then of Herodes reigne was wonderfully difficulte, and yet (notwithstanding) by his industrie, diligence and vertue, and softly steppe by steppe hee ouercame all hinderances, and possessed himselfe of Galilee, Samaria, and the very greatest part of Iudea.

Afterward, Ventidius sent some bands to succour him, conducted by one named Macherus; but Herode perceiving him to be dull and slowe, and that hee went but coldly about the businesse, as expecting, that Antigonus should still furnish him with fresh handfulls; without expecting any further ayde from such Captaines, hee vndertook great iournies, to encounter with Antigonus, who besieged Samofata. And (by the way) sped very successfully, against diuers theues that hindered his passages.

As thus he drew nearer to his enemy, Marke Anthony came to meete him, and did him such honour as became a King, with the greater part of his Armie. After hee had heard his complaints, concerning the disloyalty of some Captaines, who (corrupted by the gifts of Antigonus) had executed no part of the command from Augustus and the Senate: hee sent two legions of olde Souldiours into Iudea, and commaunded Sofius (one of his faithfull Captaines) to follow them with an other Armie, so soone as the City of Samofata was surrendered.

In the absence of Herode, his brother Iosippus, fighting to his owne disadvantage; was slaine with his Armie, by the Souldiours of Antigonus, neare to Iericho. Also, the Galileans revolted, and many rebelled in Iudea: wherefore Herode returned with those olde bands, and hardly appeased them of Galilee. Afterwards, by many encounters, wherein hee had one while the best, and another while the worst, he so weakened the forces of Antigonus: as (at length) hee withdrew into the fortesse of Ierusalem.

Herode brought his Armie against the Cittie, and after hee had raised his munitions, and builded diuers engines needfull for batterie: hee left the Armie vnder certaine Captaines and iournied in to Samaria, to elpouse Marianna the Assyrian, who (as I haue formerly tolde you) was daughter to Alexander, the youngest sonne of Hyrcanus the second, who (fourre yeares before) was affianced to Herode, that

CHAP. XIII.

How Herode, after all these tumultuous troubles and molestations, attained to the sole Government of the Kingdome of Iudea.

After that the Cittie was taken in this manner, and Antigonus (the last King of the Aymoneans) slaine: Herode enioyed the Kingdome of Iudea, three and thirtie yeares before the Natiuitie of Christ. Having taken order for the Realmes affaires, hee cruelly murdered all those great Lords, that had ioyed themselves with Antigonus against him. And seeing that hee had consumed and wasted all his goods, as also those of his kined and friends, in gifts and charges of the warre, by an especiall Edict, he compelled the Citizens, to bring all their Jewells of gold and silver to the kings castle, and all such money as they had be-
 He appointed likewise Guardes at the gates, to search all such as passed in or out: yea, such as carried the dead to buriall, fearing lest (in any manner) they should conuey thence coine, or any precious thing whatsoeuer.

At this time happened a famine, in regard of the seueneth yeare of rest, wherein it was not lawfull to sowe the grounds. And in the former yeares past, the fields remayned (in many places) vntilled, by reason of the continuall ciuile warres. So that the estate of the Cittie was very miserable, being fallen into wofull stermitude, whereof the better sort of people, as Simeon, Zachary, Ioseph and some such other tooke part: who neuertheless, in these sad spectacles and miserable calamities, cheered vp their drouping spirites, by hope of the Messias his coming, who should saue them. And they perceived it to draw neare, because they obserued, that the Scepter was now wholly taken from the house of Iuda.

Herode standing in feare of the displeased people, by his horrible rapines and cruelties: to appease and quiet them, re-

that is to say, before that the Parthians had invaded the Countrey.

In the meane while, Sofius being sent from Anthony with his Souldiers, marched on diligently, and ioynd his armie with the other belonging to Herode, whose nuptials being ended, and hee returned to Ierusalem: the two Captaines beganne to assaile the Cittie manfull; in diuers places. The besieged Iewes had great want of principall munitions, and yet notwithstanding, they thought, that they should be diuinely deliuered. For they continually vied to say, that they fought for freedom of the people for their lawfull king against strangers, for the Temple and Religion against Pagans; sustaining (for some length of time) a very sharpe besieging, and much molesting the enemy by their sallies. But finally, the City was surprized in the moneth of Maie, the very same day as (seuen and twenty yeares before) Pompey had conquered it, as hath bene said, M. Agrippa and Candius Galles being then Confuls.

The Romane Souldiers being much displeased at so long a siege, and losse of many of their people; made pitifulle slaughter, not onely of the armed Iewes, but also of such as had no defence at all. King Antigonus, throwing himselfe at the feete of Sofius, humbly desired pardon: but hee was iniunctiously reiected, and being strongly bound, sent to Marke Anthony at Antioche, where, at the request of Herod, he was slaine.

In this Militarie furie and combustion, Herod had worke enough to do, to hinder the Romans, from entering into the most secret place of the Temple, to robbe and carry thence the sacred treasures. Moreover, hee was glad to promise an infinite summe of mony, to obtaine such fauour, that the goods of the Citizens might not bee imbezeled, and borne away by the Souldiours. And in this troublefome tempest, we will giue conclusion to this Chapter; because we enter now into the reigne of Herode, and are to speake of matters concerning those times.

repealed (by his letters) from banishment Hyrcanus the second, who lived then in Babylon, because he had married the daughter of his daughter, and sent presents to the king of Parthia, for the ransom of his captivité. When he was come to Jerusalem; hee did not make him foueraigne Sacrificer, because hee was mutilate or imperfect: but in recompence thereof, bestowed great honours vpon him, so that in publique assemblies, he caused him to sit in the highest roome. At the same time he substituted (in stead of Antigenus in the High-priesthood) another Sen come from Babylon, named Ananias, a matter greatly offensive to him and the people. Which Herode perceiuing, hee depouled Ananias, and placed in his stead Aristobolus, brother to his wife Marianna: whom hee caused to die by detestable fraude a yeare after, rendering the High-priest-hood to the layd Ananias againe. Whereupon, Alexandra accused him of this crime to Cleopatra, and he being appealed by Anthony to Laodicea, to render an account for this imputation; rather pacified him by golden giftes, then any vaine and vnaudible excuses.

* Towne and Promontorie of Ephe, where Augustus, after hee had conquered Anthony and Cleopatra built the ciue Nicopolis.

Fortune both fauorable and aduersie to Herode.

An earthquake, which killed many people in Iudea.

The warre at Actium being now on foote, as Augustus and Anthony prepared themselves, to contend who should remaine the master: Herode conueyed himselfe to Anthony, and voluntarily made him offer, of whatsoeuer he could doe against Augustus, hauing forces in readinesse for him. But Anthony made him answer, that he had not any neede of such succour; giuing him charge (by the perswasion of Cleopatra) to make warre on the Arabes, who would not pay the annuall penion of two hundred Talents, whereof, he had made promise to Cleopatra. At the very entrance into this war, he ouerthrew the Arabes in one day: but Fortune afterward changing her fauour, hee lost (well-neare) all his armie, and was taken likewise in the field.

Beside this calamity of the Iewes, a sudden Earthquake happened, which slew aboue ten thousand persons in Iudea: euen when the Armies by Sea of Augustus and Anthony, encountered together at Actium, in the seventh yeare of Herodes reigne. Hee hauing (so well as he could) vniited his forces together againe; repulsed the Arabes, and compelled them to returne home into their countrey: which otherwise had conuerted to the Iewes heavier calamities, because they (encouraged by their wofull miseries) put all to fire and sword throughout Iudea. And this earthquake, as also the inrodes of the enemy were followed by a dreadfull pestilence: which made lamentable spoyle and haucke, both in the fields and cities, and likewise in the Kings campe.

After these apparent and publique calamities, meeting together in such grieuous manner; Herode fell into a great personall danger. For, after the day at Actium, wherein Anthony (the chiefe friend to Herode) was foyled, and dying thereupon: Herode was in no meane dismay, for feare of Augustus the Conquerour; and the people well perceiued his feare, because hee knew not how to determine of himselfe. Whereupon, some of the people (vnable to endure this dominion of a stranger) beganne to exalt their spirits, vnder hope of some sudden noueltie, and ioyed at the danger wherein Herode was. Aboue all the rest, his mother in law Alexandra (imagining the time to be now come, wherein shee might reuenge the death of her sonne, and recreate the kingdom againe to her own family) solicited very strong and firmly her father Hyrcanus (now very aged and decrepitate, and one that alwayes affected quietnesse) in regarde of his many iniuries; to flee into Arabia, to the end, that if Herode were ill entreated by Augustus; he might the easilier inuade the kingdom, being assisted by the Arabes.

Dositheus, a most disloyall seruant, deliuered the Letters (intended for this purpose, and sent by him to the King of Arabia) to King Herode: who desiring to be more fully informed in the fact, sent Dositheus into Arabia with the Letters, and after hee had receyued answer from the King, concerning the Letters sent vnto him: he caused Hyrcanus to be condemned, by the sentence of Iustice as a traitour, and so put to death. Some others write, that Herod, fearing the perill wherein hee sawe himselfe to be fallen, and the multitude of the Iewes (of whom he was deeply hated) might easly be moued by such an occasion, to transierre the Kingdom to Hyrcanus, who onely remayned of the Asmoneans race: imposed a false crime crime vpon him, and preyed so well by counterfeited letters, that the good olde man was condemned to death.

This being done, hee sent his mother, his sister, their other kined, and all their attendants, as also his brother Phorcas, to a strong munit Cittie in Iudea, called Masada. But withdrew his mother in lawe Alexandra, and his wife Marianna (who hee thought could not well agree with the other women) to another Fort, named Alexandria; giuing the charge of them to Isippus, Generall for the finances of the kingdom, and to Soemus his most certaine and singular friends. And this trust also he imposed on them; that if Augustus offered any ill to him: they should kill the two women instantly, and conferre (so much as in them possibly lay) the kingdom for his sonnes, vntill they were come to age, by the assistance of his brother Phorcas.

These matters being thus ordered and appointed, hee trauelled on to Augustus, who then heard all Ambassadors in the Isle of Rhodes, where, leaving off his diadem and kingly robes, keeping all the rest of royall liberty, as trusting in his cause and the Emperours clemencie; he confessed, that hee had bene a friend to Marke Anthony, and would haue sent him succour, if he had required it; but that he was diuinely withdrawne from his company (in how miserable condition soeuer) by the warre which hee then made vpon the Arabes. Wherein he had sustained so many losses and misfortunes, that hee was sufficiently punished for his friendship to Anthony, and for the seruices he had done vnto him. But if now it pleased Augustus to experiment his faithfulness; hee would make it apparent vnto him, by as true seruices.

Augustus tooke such delight in the magnanimous confession of Herode, that hee embraced him amiably, restoring him to his Crowne, and assuring him, to expect as many kinde beneuolences from him, as euer hee had receiued by Marke Anthony.

Herode finding Augustus so gracious, tooke courage from the former despayre wherein hee was, assuring now the possession of his Kingdom the more firmly to him. Wherefore hee exceeded his abilities in gifts to Augustus, as also to his friends and the Army. Hee bare the Emperour company beside, at his sayling into Egypt; and when he came into Syria: hee receyued him with entertainment more then royall, hauing borrowed all necessarie prouision, throughout all the parts of Iudea.

Augustus finding so many great respects, meerey flowing from Herode, restored that part of Iudea to him, which Anthony had giuen to Cleopatra: adding thereto likewise Samaria, and other Cities on the Sea-coastes, whereby the wealth of his kingdom was greatly augmented.

Herode hauing mette with all this happiness and felicitie abroad, at his returne home into Iudea, found all things there very bitter and troublesome, by priuate and domesticke hatreds. For, his wife Marianna had already gotten intelligence (two feuerall times) by the Guardes, that they had charge to kill her and her mother; if eyther Anthony before hand, or Augustus now in this doubtfull time, disclosed otherwife then well of him. Whereupon, at their meeting, Marianna by no means would come neare him, notwithstanding all the flatteries or signes of ardent loue hee shewed to her: reproouing him for such cruell commands; and plainly telling him, that they were no testimonies of a true husband. Herode entred into suspicion, that it was not possible for him to be disclosed, or his secrets knowne to the Guardes: but eyther it must be by Isippus, or lastly, by Soemus, therefore he grew very chollericke, and studied how to taxe and punish her for adultery. And yet such was the power of his loue, that hee could not credite all that he suspected, neyther exercise any crueltye against so faire a woman, of great Nobilitie, endowed with all graces belonging to a body of such singularitye.

At length, his sister Salome remooued all these hinderances in him, and prouoked him on to an execrable execution; for, finding apt occasion to reuenge her owne contempt, she kindled a fierce fire in him of suspection, namely, in the matter of adulterie, adding withall, an intent of poyson prepared for him, which shee approoued to the King, by testimonie of his owne Taster or Cup bearer, whome shee had wonne thereto by liberrall gifts of money.

money. Heereupon, the King grew outrageously incensed against her; and having caused her to be condemned by the sentence of his friends, commanded her to be immediately executed, although she had beene the mother to him of five children. But soone after hee repented his vnauided rashnesse, and so extremely desired his wives company agayne; that he fell into an extraordinary languishing, shunning all societie whatsoever. And, vnder colour of riding on hunting, hee would secretly steale into Caues and Dennes in the Forrest, as hoping there to finde some alluaging of his sorrows; and being vnable to withstand the extremitie of melancholie, hee fell into a deadly disease.

At the same time, there was a great plague or pestilence in Judea, whereby multitudes of people were consumed: so that many men were periwaded verily, that God had sent this punishment for the Kings cruelties. And as the King himselfe lay extremely sick in Samaria, where every one was in mightie despaire of his life: Alexandra (his mother in law) strove by large promises, to winne the Guardes of the Temple and Cittie to partake with her. But the conspiracie being revealed, Herode gaue order for her sudden execution. The King then seemed outwardly to be somewhat recovered, but yet carryed himselfe most cruelly against those friends, that were of greatest familiaritie with him; because his sicknesse (howeuer shadowed) increased daily impatience, which made him the more inclined to all vilenesse and tyrannie.

When he perceived, that there remained not any one of the Asmoneans Family, or of any other side, to interrupt him in his power, only the multitude excepted; hee grew to such assurance of himselfe, that he did many things repugnant to the lawes of God, and the customes received by the Iewes. For, in the Cittie of Jerusalem it selfe, hee builded a Theater and an Amphitheater, wherein were performed foule and dissolute plays, huntings, and combats of Fencers, according to the manner of the Pagans. He instituted also (at every five yeares end) a Ioust and Tournament, in the honour of Augustus, proposing there publickly the Cæsars Images, and the Victories ob-tayned by them. But vnderstanding, that the people were greatly offended with these vnsual things, prohibited by the Lawes of God, and prouoking many to practise his killing, as also conspiring means whereby to effect it: he fortified diuers places very respectiue, against all ambushes and seditions; as Alexandria, Herodium, Hircanian, and others, and planted strong garrisons in the most commodious places.

Hee builded also newly (or else magnificently repayed) diuers Citties and Townes, which hee filled by the names of Emperours, or of his friends: the principall whereof was the Tower of Straton on the Sea side, which hee called Cæsarea; and Samaria, distant a dayes iorney from Jerusalem, which hee called Sebasta, that is to say, Augustus, according to the Emperours name. Also, he repayed Athelion, which hee called Arrippion, of Agrippa, the kinteman to Cæsar. Hee builded Antipatrida, by the name of his father, in the field of Capharsalama. Also Phaselida, by the name of his brother, neare to Ichicha; and Herodium, by his owne name, on the Marches of Arabia.

In the thirteenth yeare of his reigne, there happened a great dearth throughout the Land, by reason of an extraordinary drought; which was the cause, that a great famine did accompany the preceeding mortalitie of men and beasts: during which time, Herod caused diligent search for corne, & brought great quantities out of Egypt, and other neighbouring Regions beside, which hee distributed (by the poule) to the people. But, because money grew short for such a distribution, in regarde that the royall treasure had bene wasted, about those sumptuous and excessive buildings; hee employed all his vessels of golde and silver, and all his Jewells besides, in the buying of corne. By which bounteous liberality, hee not onely redeemed the losse of his credit, by the offences done to his people, but also drew great fauour and affection from them.

In the seventeenth yeare of his reigne, Augustus comming into Syria, gaue the Kingdome of Chaldea to Herode; adding also thereto Drachonitis, and Batanea. Moreover, he gaue him power, in this his long sicknesse, to appoynt and leave which of his sonnes he pleased, to be his heire and successeur. In recompence of which large bountie, Herode dedicated a goodly Temple to Augustus, which hee builded in Pneada, neare to the fountes that feede the riuer Jordane. Which Pagan flattery of his, estranged agayne the multitude of the Iewes from him; and therefore to please them, hee quitted the third part of their taxations. Notwithstanding, as he could not containe some of them, crying out incessantly, that it was intolerable to erect temples to mortal men in Judea, and there to reuerence them as Gods: so he sought to restraine other by violent torments, sending Spies and Pickethankes into publique and private Assemblies, who reported vnto the King whatsoever was spoken of him. It is further reported of him, that himselfe (sickely as hee was) in a common habite or disguise, would often walke abroad in the night time, listening in such companies as conferred together, to know what they said, concerning the present estate of the kingdome.

At length, finding neither loue nor fidelitie in the people, hee strove to binde them fast to him by oath; wherein hee preuayled, attracting some by large and goodly promises, to giue him their oath of Allegiance and Loyaltie: others hee constrained by feare of torments; putting some to death in diuers kindes, that peremptorily refused to sweare. Onelie the Pharisees stood excepted, whom hee pardoned, in loue to a few aged men, that hee reuerenced for their sanctitie of life, and which made them deare to the people. Neuerthelesse, hee condemned them in great fines and amercedments, which were payed by the wife of Pheroxas, to binde that Sect in loue to her. He quitted also the Essenes from taking the Oath, holding them in no meane admiration: as following a manner of living most holily, and farre exceeding humane nature; being singular in fore-telling things to come.

In the eighteenth yeare of his reigne, being desirous to vnitie his subjects to him by farre greater benefites, and to abolish the remembrance of his preceeding excesses: hee vnderooke to builde the Temple of Jerusalem most magnificently, the former building (if heerein wee may beleeue Iosephus) being vtterly beaten downe, which building had continued five hundred yeares, after the returne from Babylon. This worke, admirable in greatnesse, sumptuousnesse and cunning, was finished in eight yeares, and dedicated with great solemnitie: wherein hee gaue three hundred Oxen for the Sacrifices, seauen yeares before the Natinitie of Christ.

Afterward, the Disciples declared the magnificence of the building. And, as Christ fore-tolde, after that the Temple had continued about foure-score yeares; it was vtterly ruined by the Romans, from the top to the bottom.

The building of the Temple being ended, hee would needs be carried to Rome, to salute the Emperour Augustus: From thence hee brought with him his sonnes Alexander and Aristobulus, whom hee had by his murdered Mariana, and had sent them tenne yeares before to Rome, to be brought vp in the house of Asinius Pella. And the reason of his bringing thence into Judea, was, to quicken and cheare their hopes; that they were to succede him in the kingdome. And first of all, he bestowed wises on them; and giuing to Alexander, Glaphira, daughter to Archelaus, King of Cappadocia; and to Aristobulus, Berenice, daughter to his sister Salome.

These young Lords and Ladies, were very gracefull both in minde and bodie, which made them the more choicely affected of the people. But Salome, and some other (who had induced Herode to murder his wife, fearing if they should come to the Crowne, they would reuenge the death of their mother) laboured, by little and little, to kinde hatred in Herode against them, deliuering aspersions abroad; that they disdayned their fathers company, because hee had put their mother to death.

Herode growing into health, by weak degrees, and these wicked deuices proceeding on; newes came, that Agrippa (neare kinsman to Augustus) was arrived in Asia, and Herode journeying to meete him, quickly perswaded him to visite Judea. Having giuen him there most honourable entertainment, and shewne him the munitions and other buildings; he returned to his Campe, making king great haste in going thither. The winter being ouer-past, Herode followed him, when he crossed to Pontus his armie by sea, and kept him company during the time of that expedition. Returning soon after to his owne home, hee found all in disorder, by domestick hatreds purposefully prepared. For his sister Salome, and his brother Pheroras, immediately accused Alexander and Aristobulus (being the sonnes of Marians) affirming, that they had openly complayned on the vnjust death of their mother, and threatened to be reuenged for it. Heereto they added, that winning the Vulgars fauour without any dissimulation; they had prepared a traine for their aunient father: trusting to the power of Archelaus, father in lawe to one of them, and to the friendship of the Romaines on the other side, which they had long both wrought to this intent, with the very mightiest in the Court of Augustus.

False accusations imputed on Alexander and Aristobulus, by Salome and Pheroras.

Herode layes traines to entrap his innocent sonnes vpon the treacherous, free chies of his brother and sister.

Herode enduring continually any thing, much rather then the least suspicion of vndermining his kingdome; became amazed mightily at these allegations, appoynted some of his intimate friends, to be present at banquets, and other familiar conferences with his sonnes, to be the better assured of their words & attempts: When (perchance) the young Lords (neither proiecting or suspecting any ill) might utter some one word more liberally then other (being thereto prouoked by crosse language in the vrgers) purposefully deliuered forth, to draw somewhat from them, in extolling the nobilitie and vertue of their Mother, which is the bounden duty of any childe to doe. But this serued the turne sufficiently, for Herode to credite, that whatsoever his sister had reported, was true. First of all therefore, he reprehended them very severely; next, to induce their better modesty and reuerence to their father, by feare and ialousie; he beganne to countenance, and carefully respect his sonne Antipater, (who was borne of Doris, when she liued a person of priuate condition) that they might thereby gather his intention, for making him to bee his successeur in the kingdome.

This did more vehemently distaste the young Lords, and made them now to complaine more bitterly of their father, as also of their owne unhappinesse and ill vsage; all which behauiour in them, was imparted to their father by the afore-sayd intelligencing spies. Beside, Salome compelled her daughter Berenice (by frequent iniuries incited betweene her and her husband) to disclofe what secrets passed betweene the two brothers, and what priuate conferences they had together. All which she made in much greater manner to the King, then they were indeed, one by hir vile additions, and falsifications, incensing him still so extremely against them, that he tooke them both with him to Rome, and accused them of treason before Augustus.

A mother worketh a daughter against the list of her owne husband.

There, after the infortunate Gentlemen had made satisfaction to Augustus and some other Iudges, by euident purgations, teares and intreaties, they were reconciled again into their fathers grace, and returned home with him to Iudea: where the Multitude beeing met together, he declared before them the cause of his iourney, and to what happie successe it had forced. Adding withall, that (by the liking of Augustus) Antipater was next to succcede after his death, as being his eldest sonne; and then afterward, Alexander and Aristobulus should enioy their right, in reigning each after other; all which hee reported to the people in a long discourse, which we haue formerly related in our Militarie Orations.

Augustus consulted the friends to their father.

From this time forward, Antipater insisted the more audaciously, in whetting the fathers spleene against his brethren, by false, forged and crafty calumniation; beside diuers other reports of nouelties, meereley deuised for the purpose. He being highly displeased, that they should haue any title or claime at all to the kingdome: as fretting extremely, that their credite held more specially with the people then theirs did, for the mothers sake of whom they came. In briefe, he neuer ceased, till (by the helpe of Pheroras and Salome) till he had perswaded his father, that his two sonnes Alexander and Aristobulus, were growne proude vpon their reconciliation, and practised (instantly) to possesse themselues of the Kingdome. Herode beeing further informed of those accusations, by such as were employed for the purpose; by racking, torturing and other cruelties, put to death many of his

his owne friends, and of his Sonnes. And yet no other harme could bee appointed against them, but onely youthfull and vnadvised complaints, of excessive cruelty in their father; and his ouercastie facilitie, in lending eare to false reports, only through the detestable impietie of their brother Antipater, and them of his linage.

Herode impatient at so many suspitions, and fiered hourly with the diuells of his house, Salome, Antipater and their complices: once more, by his letters sent to Augustus, he flatly accused Alexander and Aristobulus of treason. Now, because Augustus had giuen him permission, to punish his sonnes according to the exigence of their crimes: hee accused them before Saturninus and Volumnius, Governours of Syria, and other Romaine Citizens his friends there present, whom he had caused to come from Iudea to Beritha, a Cittie of Syria. After that they were condemned by pluralitie of voyces, he sent them to be strangled in Schists: where likewise were executed three hundred persons more, who were said to giue consent, to an imaginarie flight imposed vpon the two innocent Princes. Aristobulus at his death left three sonnes and two daughters, which hee had by his wife Berenice; and Alexander two sonnes by Glaphyra, besides some daughters, whereof we will speake in their due place and time.

Antipater, conspired the death of his father.

Pheroras poisoned by his wife.

From this time forward, Herode beganne to be very vnfortunate, because all his Court was troubled with bitter hatreds, dissidences, suspitions and treasons: so that Antipater (compacting with Pheroras and some other Courtiers) determined to kill the King his father. And as hee was plotting priuily, how he might be called to Rome by Augustus, for better strengthening himselfe with the Emperours power, and winning friends in his Court by gifts: it came to passe that Pheroras dyed, whose wife was accused before Herode by some of her owne friends, to haue poisoned her husband. Herode making inquisition after this offence by tortures, chaunced (by little and little) to come to the knowledge of farre greater crimes, and the treasons of his sonne Antipater plainly appeared.

Heereupon, the King being extremely enraged, spared not any of his Court from torturing cruelly; no not so much as the women and their daughters, very neare in loue and kinned to him, if hee could suspect them in the very least manner. And as hee stroue to informe himselfe, by all his best and diligent means, so much the more hee grew to be hated of all his followers, so that (consequently) he became worse then miserable.

Onely his Sister Salome, was faithful to him, who compassed the meanes by craftie Spies, to finde out the plots of all the Conspiratours, which shee still revealing to her brother, enflamed his fury extraordinarily: making him to distrust them that were most familiar with him, by forged tales and faithlesse suspitions. So that Herode accused Antipater (who was taken with the poyson readily prepared for his father) before Quintilius Varus (who was slayne by Arminius Cheruschus in Germanie, twelue yeres after with Legions) and beeing convicted of the sinne of parricide, and condemned; hee commaunded him to bee kept prisoner, vntill by Letters and Ambassadors, hee vnderstoode the will and pleasure of Augustus, concerning his punishment.

In the meane while, hee executed many, both men and women, as beeing consenting to Antipaters attempts: amongst whom were diuerse innocents, wrongfully accused by malicious enemies, and meereley swallowed vp in Herodes furie, as in the roaring billowes of the Sea.

Soone after, beeing about the age of seauentie yeares, quaint and confounded with domestick calamities: his former sickenesse grew now to farre greater violence vpon him, which made him ten times more cruell towards his subiects. For now hee was verily perswaded, that the Lewes reioyed as much at his homebred miseries, as they did at the extremitie of his disease. Wherefore hee deuised very cruell punishments, for matters of silly or small offence: for hee burned aliue fortie young Schollers, of the very chiefeest houses in Iudea, with two Maisters that were excellent men: because (being moued with iust griefe, to see the Temple of God prophaned) they had ouerthrowne (somewhat violently) an Eagle of golde, placed in the Portall of the Temple, and in the honor of Cæsars, a thing very costly and magnificent, but contrary to the customes of the Jewish nation. The monstrous crueltie inflicted vpon these young men, was the cause of great troubles in the Cittie, after Herodes death.

Hee exercised also other great cruelties, amongst which, Philo the Jew recorderth, that in the thirtieth year of his tyrannicall reigne, he slew the Sanhedrin: to wit, the ordinary Judges of the house of Dauid, and substituted other (newly conuerted to Iudaisme, or skillfull in the Lawe) in their stead. Moreouer, he slew the husband of his sister Salome, who was of the Tribe or Linage of Juda, and a Sonne, which hee himselfe begate of a woman of the same Tribe; because hee had sayd, that Christ our Saviour was already borne, who was promised in the Lawe, and by the Prophets, to be of the house of Dauid.

Also Saint Matthew the Euangelist, in the second chapter and sixteenth verse, maketh mention of an other notable example of his crueltie, where he writeth, that being aduertised by the wife men of Persia, that the Messias was borne; hee gaue strict commaund, that all the masse Children should be murdered, in the Towne of Bethleem, and all the villages round about.

Macrobius is a witnesse of this most inhumane act, who recounteth (among the witty conceits of Augustus) that hearing report of the Infants slaughter, from two yeares olde and vnder, caused by Herode to be done in Syria, and his owne sonne, being also slayne among them, hee sayd: That he had much rather be Herodes Hogge, then his Sonne.

Moreouer, feeling his entrailes to rot and putrifie, his blood and flesh boyling, and vermine creeping all ouer his bodie, despayring of liuing any longer: by Edict he assembled the chiefeest of the Jews, such as excelled the rest in wisdom, wealth and authoritie; causing them to come from all parts of the Kingdome to Iericho.

Being there arriued vpon his commaund, they were shut vppe in the place appointed for Triumphs, as if hee purposed to conferre with them before his death, of some important matter concerning the State of the Kingdome. But hee gaue charge to his sister Salome, and to her husband Alexas, that so soone as hee had giuen vp the Ghost: they should dispatch the liues of the mightiest Iewes by the Archers of his Guard, conuoying by this meanes, to make a wofull lamentation amongst the Iewes, who else would reioyce at their Kings miserable end.

Besides, that they should thus keepe (without any manner of impeachment) the possession of the Kingdome for his sonnes, when they of greatest power were dead and gone.

Now, albeit Salome, and her husband made promise to the King, for the execution of his bloody will: yet after his death, and before they made any declaration thereof, they let loose all the Iewes, without offering them the least iniury, accounting it to be neyther safe for them, nor the children of Herod, to obey such a barbarous and inhumane injunction.

A little before his death, the Ambassadors which returned from Italy, did bring him Letters from Augustus, whereby hee gaue him power ouer his Sonne Antipater, eyther for life or death. But the rage of the Father was now somewhat cooler, wherefore hee commaunded, that his Sonne should be brought to Iericho; but yet to keepe him still in bands.

It fortuned, that Herod (liuing in such horrible and extreame torments, with stinking putrification of his body:) sodainly caught a knife, and sought for the fittest place to ridde himselfe out of those paines.

But Archelaus, one of his kinsemen, and other seruants (beeing by) hindered his violent intent of murdering himselfe: wherevpon, a great tumult and out-cry ranne throughout the whole Pallace; euen as if the King had bene dead. Antipater being prisoner, and vnderstanding, why these cries came thus from every place: beganne to be very iocund and mirthfull, euen as if his father were dead indeede, and would haue induced the Guardes to let him haue liberty, vpon very liberall promises he made to them.

But he that had the especial charge of him, fearing the crueltie of the King, went to see whether he was dead or no: reporting to him his sonnes merry disposition, and the matter which he had so earnestly moued him vnto.

Herode mightily offended at these tydings, commaunded, that (without any delay) his son Antipater should be slayne in prison. Which being done, himselfe liued but fiae dayes after his sonne. So that, what with the violence of his sickness, encreasing the torments of his soule, he died: hauing reigned foure and thirtie yeares after the surprisall of Ierusalem; and seauen and thirtie yeares after the Romanes had proclaimed him King. A man equally cuell to all men from base and lowe degree, exalted to eminent place of honour, by industrie, bountie and friendship: very happy abroade, vnfortunate amongst his owne, and hated (both of his subiects and domesticks) for his crueltie.

All the time of his gouernement, hee had contention and quarrell principally with three aduersaries. First of all, against the Family of the Asmonians, which hee stroue vtterly to extirpate by all his pollicies. Secondly, against the Iewish people, who could not endure the dominion of a stranger: and although they kicked continually against him, yet finally they were charged with a hard yoke of seruitude. The third aduersarie; more troublesome and difficult then both the rest, was his owne householde people. For, as hee slew one part of them (beeing no way guilty or offensive towards him) by listening to false reportes of the enuious, and according to his owne suspicions, still to support his greedy desire of rule: so did he punish others taken in the fact, who indeede conspired against him, vntill such time, as beeing more broken and battered by his domestick encumbrances, then by extremitie of age; hee payed the tribute due to Nature. Philo the Iew writeth, that hee reigned fixe yeares lawfully, and one and thirtie yeares tyrannically.

In the three and thirtie yeares of his reigne (as it is aouched by Epiphanius) vnder the first description of the World: Iesus Christ, our blessed Saviour and Redeemer, was borne in Bethleem of the Virgine Mary. At the age of two yeares, by the Angells admonition, hee was with-drawne from the crueltie of this wretch, by his father and mother, who fled with him into Egypt. Afterwards, hee was brought backe againe into Iudea, at the beginning of the Primacie of Archelaus.

Herode altered his Will three severall times: The first change was, after hee had put to death his two sonnes by Marina the Asmonian, and then hee sent it by the hands of Antipater (hee going to Rome) to Augustus. That Will confirmed as his heire in the Kingdome, Antipater, his eldest sonne by Doris: but yet with this condition, that if he dyed before the time, his sonne Herode, whom hee had by the daughter of Simon the high-priest, should succede him. To whom (vpon this occasion) according to the opinion of Josephus, hee had giuen in marriage Herodias, the daughter to Archelaus, sonne of Mariam the Asmonian.

After the death of Phororas, brother to Herode, the treasons began to be discovered, and the King beeing informed, that the Mother of Herode, his destined Heire, (and daughter to the Soueraigne Sacrificer) had consented in wicked council with Antipater: hee razed the names both of Antipater and Herode out of his Will, frustrating them from all hope of euer coming to the Crowne.

Beside, hee expelled the two mothers, Doris and Mariam, out of the Pallace, despoyling also his father in lawe Simon, of the High-priesthoode.

In his second Testament, hee left the Kingdome to his last sonne, named Herode Antipus, and hee to succede after his death, beeing borne of Martha a Samaritan. Therein hee made no mention at all of Archelaus, nor of Philip, who were elder in yeares then hee: because, by the suggestion of Antipater, some of his friends had falsely accused them by Letters, in the time of their studying at Rome.

By the same Testament, hee left a thousand Talents to Augustus, which amounteth to three score thousand of Golde. To Livia the wife of Augustus, and to the children and enfranchised friends of Augustus, hee gaue five hundred Talents, that is to say, thirtie thousand of golde.

Last of all, after that (a little before

In stead of King, hee made Antipater Tetrarch of Galilee and Peres, that is to say, of the Region situate beyond Jordane.

Herode Antipas and Philip made both Tetrarches.

In like manner, hee appoynted Philip Tetrarch of Gallanitida, Traconitis, Batanea and Panæda. To his Sister Salome (who amongst all his kintred) he had onely found faithfull to him, and helpfull in all his aduersities, hee left three wealthy Citties, Tumna, Azot and Phaselida, with fiftie thousand Crownes besides.

Hee assigned great reuenues to his other sonnes, and to their children, whom hee left in priuate condition, and augmented the Legacies which he had sent to Augustus and other at Rome. But Augustus (afterwards) distributed all the money to him appoynted to Herodes kintred; retayning nothing to himselfe, but onely certayne costly vessells, as a token of remembrance for the dead.

CHAP. XV.

A briefe Collection, concerning the children of Herode the Great, which hee had by his tenne wiues; as also the order of their severall successions.

Iosephus va-rieth from the Euangelicall historie.

Thought it verie necessarie, heere to set downe the order and succession of Herodes children; because it doth giue great light to the Euangelicall Historie, in regarde that the Description made by Iosephus, is somewhat dissenting. Especially in Herodias, whom Iosephus sayth, to be sometime married, not to Phillip the Tetrarch, as the Euangelist Saint Mark, in the sixteenth chapter and seauenteenth verse of his Gospell auoucheth, but to Herod, sonne to the daughter of Simon the High-priest, who soone after was aduanced, and ioyned with Herode Antipas Tetrarch of Galilee, that slew Saint Iohn Baptist.

He sayth besides, that the dauncing daughter of Herodias, was married to Phillip: But the authoritie of the Euangelists ought to be of greater weight with vs, then to that of Iosephus, who in this Genealogie of Herode, speaketh things very contrary, which is not much to bee marvelled at, in a Familie of so great ex-tendure. For King Herode, according to the ancient manner of the Kings of Iudea, had many wiues together, in all being tenne, two whereof were barren.

Doris his first wife.

Her he married in priuate condition, taking her from a place of slender repute, her father beeing as then liuing. Of her hee begate Antipater, whom hee disinherited, his mother Doris beeing diuorced, after he was married to Mariana the Assmeane: nor would hee permit her to be present in Ierusalem, but onely at three famous solemnities.

But after that Mariana was put to death, hee receiued Doris againe into his Court, and gaue her admittance to his bedde, recalling home the sonne also: beeing fully resolu'd, to haue left him heyre to the Kingdome, if hee had not bene the cause of his owne ruine and death, by wicked machinations, continued against his father and brethren; beside, hee brought his owne mother into the dislike of his father.

Antipater tooke to wife the daughter of Antigonus, the last King of the Assmeane, by whom hee had also Antipater, to whom was married the daughter of Phoror his great vnckle. Afterward hee married Mariana, daughter vnto his brother Aristobulus, whom he caused to be murdered.

Mariana,
Glaphyra, daughter to Archelaus king of Cappadocia; Alexander, slaine by his father.

Herode,

The third dyed immediately.
Salome was married to Phaselus, sonne of Phaselus, brother to Herode, of whose children we haue spoken before.

Cypris was married to Antipater, the sonne of Salome, sister to the King.

Alexander,
Tygranes, who was sent by Nero King into Armenia.

Tygranes was King of Armenia, and afterward accused at Rome, dyed without issue.

Aristobulus, strangled by the command of his father Herode.

Berenice his wife, daughter of Salome, sister to King Herode.

Agrippa the first King of Iudea.

Herode the fourth King of Chalcis.

Aristobulus, to whom was espoused Iotapata, daughter to the king of the Emesians, by whom hee had Iotapata, a deafe daughter.

Herodias, who left her husband, and had a daughter Salome; who for the reward of her goodly dauncing, required, and had the head of Saint Iohn Baptist.

Mariana, affianced first to Antipater the sonne of Antipater; but afterward Antipater, sonne of great Herode, tooke her to wife.

Mariana daughter to Simon the four-raigne Sacrificer, the third wife to Herode, of whom came.

terward to Aristobulus, sonne to Herode king of Chalcis.

Herodias his wife, yongest daughter of great Herode, and also the daughter of Aristobulus, slaine by his father.

Herode affecting this Mariana for her rare beauty, who was the daughter to a filly sacrificing Priell, he perceiving that he could no otherwise enioy her, but by lawfull marriage; made her father Simon (sonne to Boethus) High-priest, by deposing Iesus, the succellour to Annas.

Of her hee begate Herode the second, whom he had instituted (in his first Will) second heire after Antipater his eldest sonne. But growing offended (afterward) for some fault in his mother: hee altered his Will, and deprived him of all hope of succeeding.

Iosephus writeth, that this Herode the second (who alwayes afterward liued privately) tooke to wife Herodias, the daughter of Aristobulus, slaine by his father; who afterward was exalted by his brother Herod Antipas, contrary to all right and reason. But (as I haue already said) this Genealogie of Iosephus agreeth not with Saint Marke, who ruleth it in this manner.

Herode the second, borne of the High-priests daughter, liued without publike charge.

His wife Herodias that left him, married with the brother to her husband.

Herode Antipas, Tetrarch of Galilee.

Phillip the Tetrarch, who died without children.

The daughter Salome was married to both, each after other, and engendred by the last;

Herode, Agrippa, Aristobulus, of whom I finde nothing at all recorded.

The fourth wife of Herode was Martha, or Malthaea, a Samaritane; of whom were borne;

Archelaus, who by the last Testament of his father, was ordaind to be his succellour. But by Augustus he was instituted to be Ethiarche.

Herode the third, called also Antipas, Tetrarch of Galilee; the rauiſher of Herodias, and murderer of Saint Iohn Baptist: he was called also, the Fox for Christ.

daughter to Simon, ad-

The issue of Herode by his fourth wife.

Olympia, married to Iosippus, sonne of Iosippus the brother to King Herode: Of whom came this Posteritie following:

Mariana, espoused to Herod the fourth, King of Chalcis, and had a sonne named Antipater, who (by Nero) was instituted Governor of Armenia the lesser. He had to wife Salome, the daughter of Herodias, as formerly hath bene declared.

The fifth wife of Herode was Cleopatra of Jerusalem, whose children were Phillip, who (by the last Testament of his father) was appointed Tetrarch of Trachonitis.

Herode, of whom I finde nothing recorded in any Historie.

But, considering that Iosephus saith, that this Phillip was brother to the father and mother of Archelaus; I make some doubt of diuers other places before mentioned by him, where (perhaps by want of memory) he wrongeth himselfe in the numbering of Herodes children; as in the second Chapter of the same Booke. And that of the same mother Marthaea, were borne Archelaus, Phillip and Olympia: And that of this Cleopatra, issued only Herode, called Antipas. From whence it proceeded (as I thinke) that Iosephus attributeth two sonnes vnto this Cleopatra, Phillip and Herode: of whom (neuertheless) he maketh not any mention in his Historie.

I thinke then, that Antipas should be placed for Phillip vnder Cleopatra; for, because he nameth Herode also: some (not very skilfull) haue attributed two sonnes to Cleopatra: euen as if I should say, that Julius and Cesar had bene two Consuls. Assuredly, this coniecture seemeth to be confirmed, because Archelaus (being vpon his departure to Rome, after the death of his father) left all the care and managing of the kingdomes affaires to Phillip, as to his nearest and dearest brother; and not to Antipas, whom he ought to haue preferred before Phillip, if hee had bene his germaine brother by the same mother. But this shewes it selfe much more evidently, in regard that Iosephus, in the thirteenth and fourteenth Chapters of the same seventeenth Booke, saith: That Archelaus journeying to Rome, tooke along with him his mother Marthaea, who dyed there, before the suite (concerning the succession) was decided; and that (soone after) Antipas followed him, who likewise was accompanied with his mother. It must needs follow then necessarily, that they had diuersitie of mothers. Wherefore it somewhat amazeth mee, that Iosephus repeateth in the Historie of the Iewes warres, to haue spoken ill in his Antiquities: to wit, that Archelaus and Antipas were brethren by one mother.

The sixth wife of Herode, was Pallas, who had a sonne named Phaselus, of whom Iosephus writeth nothing.

The seauenth wife was Phadra, who had by Herod (being then ancient) a daughter named Roxana.

The eight wife of Herode, was Elpis, by whom hee had a daughter named Salome.

Afterward, Augustus married the two sonnes of Phororax, to these two sisters, Roxana and Salome, being but young when their father died. To whom (beside the Legacies of their father) hee added (of his owne) in their dower, two hundred thousand peeces of silver money: which summe, if Iosephus doe vnderstand Drachmas thereby, as I imagine, it amounteth to five and twentie thousand crownes of the Sunne.

The ninth wife, was the daughter of his brother, whom Iosephus nameth not.

The tenth, was his Cousine germane, ynnamed also.

By these two wiues Herode had not any children.

All this so great lineage of Herode, failed (well-neare vnterly) within the space of seauenty yeares, the most part of them living in priuate manner. Such as attained to gouernment of affaires, and succeeded in some small portions of their fathers dignitie; were only three sonnes of Herode, to wit, Archelaus the Ethnarch, Phillip and Antipas, Tetrarches, and two younger sonnes, the first Agrippa, King of Iudea, and Herod the fourth King of Chalcis; Agrippa the last, in whose reigne was the Iewish warre, and the destruction of Jerusalem. I will speake briefly of them all in order.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Ethnarchie of Archelaus, and the plea of him and his Brother Antipas before Augustus, for the right of Gouernment.

BY the last Testament of the Father (as I haue already sayd) Archelaus was appointed successor with royall power; provided, that Augustus would be so pleased. But scarcely was the fathers body interred, when a great mutiny arose in the City, and he lost his peoples affection by cruelty. For some of the kindred & parents of the young scholars that were burned alive, about beating down the golden Eagle, returning to the Feast at Easter, mouing the people by their teares and complaints to challenge reuenge of certaine slanderous persons, and deposition of the Soueraigne Sacrificer, whom Herode had established in the ending of his dayes: Archelaus sent his Light horsemen against the people, and made a bloody slaughter, to the number of three thousand, beside diuers put to flight. After that, the tumult was for a time appeased, hee left the charge of his kingdomes affaires to his brother Phillip, and tooke his journey to Rome, accompanied with his mother Marthaea, and some other friends, to requite of Augustus the full establishment of his Fathers Will.

By the suggestion of their Aunt Salome, Herode Antipas followed after his Brother, to contend with him for succession in the kingdome before Augustus. There hee accused him of cruelty, approouing, that the Crowne should rather bee his, than any due to Archelaus; because by the second testament, he was onely ordained heire to the Royall dignity; when his father Herode was found both in bodie and memory. And such a Will so made, ought to bee of farre greater respect and weight, then the last to neere his death; when both body and mind were vncapable of sense and reason.

Soone after, fifty Ambassadors were sent from the people of Iudea to Rome, to entreate, that they might no longer be gouerned by a King: but rather that Iudea (being reduced to the form of a Province) might be vnder command of the Romane Captaines (as afterward it was, but to the Iewes no great aduantage.) But if needs they must haue a King, and of Herodes posterity: they openly confessed, that they much rather affected Herode Antipas, then Archelaus, who (at his very entrance) gaue them sufficient vnderstanding, what mildnesse and moderation they should afterwarde expect in him.

While this sute was thus in hearing, and Augustus consulted thereon, with some of his most intimate friends; greivous tumults chanced to be moued, first by Sabinus, Procurator for Cesar in Jerusalem, and afterward in diuers other places of Iudea. For some people (of no worth) emboldned by the Kings absence, hauing gathered together certaine companies of Theeues; durst attribute vnto themselves, both the Royall dignity and Ornaments. During which time, Iudea was wonderfully waisted in manie places with fire and sword; vntill (by the vertue of Quintilius Varus, who scattered the armies of the Theeues, and hanged vpon a tree two thousand, such as were chiefe Leaders in the sedition) the danger was well ouer-blowne.

These troubles being certified by Letters to Rome by Varus, caused Augustus (hauing ended the sute concerning the succession) to send backe the Sonnes of Herode to Iudea againe. But he had diuided the whole kingdome of Herode into two partitions: one whereof hee gaue to Archelaus, whom he named Ethnarche, which dignity hee afforded to be greater then that of Tetrarche, & yet much lesse then Royall power. Promising (neuertheless) that he would make him King, after he had made triall of his industry & moderation in this gouernment. Moreover, hee diuided the other part into two Tetrarchies, which he gaue to the two Brethren to Herode Antipas, Galilee and Perea; the reuennues whereof amounted to two hundred Talents, that is fixe score thousand Crownes of the Sun. But the Ethnarchie of Archelaus, which contained Iudama, Iudea, and Samarria, valowed fixe hundred Talents in reuennues.

to carry himselfe cruelly towards them, and (for small or no causes at all) did put to death such persons, as hee imagined had desired the alteration of the State.
Moreover, he highly soyled his reputation, with marriage prohibited by the laws of God. For at his returne from Rome, as he passed thorow Cappadocia, to visite his kintman king Archelaus; hee found there Glaphyra (widdowed the second time) who had bene first married to Alexander that was put to death by his Father Herod with his brother Aristobulus. After his death, her Father in law Herode, sent her (with her dowry) vnto her owne father, where she was remarried to Iuba King of

she came and lued with hir father againe.

confiscated to the Romaine Emperour, and the Countries of his Ethnarchie were (for a time) ruled by the Romaine

treies (each of them) two yeares, euen vntill
the death of Augustus, whose successor Tiberius, sent Valerius Gracius into Judea. Eleuen yeares after, he sent Pontius Pilate alio, who behaued himselfe cruelly in Iudea: and (amongst other notorious matters) hee condemned our Lord & Sauour Iesus Christ to be hanged vpon a Crosse, in the seauenth yeare of his Go-uernment, and the eighteenth of the Emperor Tyberius.

Of Phillip, sonne to Herod the Great, & how he gouerned in his Tetrarchie.

King Herod, by his last Will and Testament, left his sonne Phillip Tetrarche of Tracopitis, & of the neighbouring Regions beyond Iordane; euen from the Sea of Tyberius or Genesareth, to the springs of Iordane, and the foot of Mount Libanus. He gouerned this his Tetrarchy the space of tenen and thirty yeeres (with great commendation for iustice and modesty) which hee also beautified with many goodly Buildinges:
For in Pancea, neere to the fources of Iordane (where sometime his Father Herod had erected and dedicated a Temple to Augustus) hee builded a Cittie, which he called Cesarea of Philippi; and another vpon the lake of Genesareth, named Beshsaida, which encreasing and growing into great wealth, hee called it Iuliasa, after the name of the wife to Augustus.

Iosephus writeth, that this Phillip tooke in marriage Salome, the daughter of He-rodius, whereas Saint Marke the Euan-gelist, in his sixt chapter and the seauen-teenth verse writeth, That the Mother Herodias was espoused vnto Phillip: and afterward being carried away, was coniointed with his Brother.

He dyed without any heyre, in the 20.
yeare of Tyberius the Emperour, that is to say, two yeeres after Christ was crucified, rose from the dead againe, and the Gos-pell was spread abroad by the Apostles, from forth Iudea to Neighbouring Nations. His Tetrarchie was annexed
(by Tyberius) to the Province of Syria.

Of the life and death of Herod Antipas, brother to Phillip, and Tetrarche of Samaria

His Herode Antipas, by the second Will was instituted successor to his Father. But the Testament being alread,
he was ordained Tetrarche, and had (for his partage) Samaria and Pe-rea, which is a most fertile Region beyond Iordane, betweene the Lakes of Tyberias and Alphaltida. Neuerthelesse, being not contented with his Fathers gift, and trusting to the precedent Will; hee contended at Rome with his Brother before Augustus, touching the possession of the kingdome. All which notwithstanding, hee obtained nothing else but the Tetrarchie left him by his father, & then again confirmed to him. He took first to wife the daughter of Aretas, King of Arabia, liuing with him more then fifteen yeares. But afterward, being called to Rome, passing along by Phillip the Tetrar-che, or (as Iosephus writeth) by Herode the second, borne of the daughter to the high Priest: being enamoured on Herodias, daughter to his brother Aristobulus, hee contracted marriage with her, promising to repudiate his Arabian wife.

smitten off. The same Herode laboured subtly to entrap Christ, as he was teaching in Galilee; and afterward, when Pilate sent him prisoner to him, hee sent him backe againe opprobriously, because (at his request) Christ would not worke any miracle before him.

He likewise embellished his Tetrarchy with faire buildinges; for (to his great charges) hee builded Sephorim, a Cittie of Galilee, which hee caused to bee called Antocratorida. Hee called another Iuliasa, by the name of Augustus wife, which before was named Betharama. After the death of Augustus, because hee had bene a kinde friend to Tyberius; hee builded a new City in honour of him, neere to the Lake of Genesareth, which hee commanded to be called Tyberias. But because the place was prophaned by great heapes of dead bodies there buried, so that (by Moyses Lawe) it was not lawfull to dwell there, hee allured some (by diuers commodities and immunities) to builde there, making habitations for poore people; compelling the rich and mighty, to inhabit (with their families) in this new City.

In the second yeare of the Empire of Caius Caligula, when Agrippa the Brother of Herodias returned from Rome into Judea, adorned (against all attempts) with the royall dignity: Herode, by the continuall injuries of his wife, was enforced to vndertake a iourney to Rome, to entreat the royall dignity of the Emperour. For this woman (burning with ambition) said it was vn-sufferable, that her Brother Agrippa (being but a while before poore & beggery, and so farre indebted, that hee was made seruaile to his Creditors) should now triumph with a Kingly Crowne; surmounting his Vnckle in power and dignity, hee hauing bene to him as a nursing Father, and adiuaged (by the second testament) worthy of the kingdome.

Antipas, prouoked by the incessant instigations of this arrogant woman, went vnto Rome with her; desiring of the Emperor Caius, to enioy the name and dignity Royall: beside, by manie greuous accusations, hee practised to make Agrippa hateful to the Emperour. But Agrippa (advertisd of his Vnckles voyage and intent) preuented him, and sent letters before him by an intimate friend: wherein he informed Caius, that Herode Antipas was consenting in the conspiracie of Sejanus, against Tiberius; and that now (having close intelligence with the King of the Parthians) there was some noultie intended against Caius. A matter easily to be conjectured, by the great preparation for Armes which Antipas made: whereby, in an instant, he could be suddenly furnished with an Army of three-score and tenne thousand able fighting men.

Caligula, incensed by this report from his friends, demanded of Herode, what provision hee had in a readinesse for his Tetrarchie; Whereunto hee answered: That he had all things fitting for a King. Whereupon Caius instantly commaunded, that hee should be carried prisoner to Lions in France, and there kept in perpetual exile. Moreover, by his Letters, hee gaue all his goods, with the Tetrarchie of Galilee and Perea, to Agrippa: except what appertained in propriety to his sister Herodias, whom hee put in innocent, and for her hee would have all to be intirely referred, if it would returne into Judea againe. But Herodias, thanking Caius for his liberallitie, replied: That presently she could not make any use of this great fauour, because she held it vnreasonable, to leaue her husband in this calamitie, whom she had alwayes accompanied in his flowing prosperitie, and tasted thereof verry royally.

Thus spake this subtle woman, as hoping thereby, that the Emperour would alter his rigorous sentence, concerning the condemnation of Herode, and that shee should not vndergoe the selfe same sentence, considering his supportall of her innocencie. But Caius (being highly displeased at her haughtie flatterie) commaunded, that being d' spoiled of all her goods, shee should walke with her husband in the same nature of exile. Thus Herode was the instrument of his owne harme, by listening (ouer-lightly) to the persuasions of this ambitious woman: for, if he could haue contented himselfe with his estate, hee had longer time enjoyed peaceably his dignitie of Tetrarch. But they both deferred lustily this heauie penaltie; because, being ioyned together by incestuous marriage, and charitably aduincelled in the greatnesse of their sinne: they did put to death the most innocent man Saint Iohn Baptist, vnder colour of a rash oath, pretending conscience.

This great downe-fall happened vnto them, about tenne yeares after the beheading of Saint Iohn; eight yeares after Herode had hunted Iesus Christ, and sent him bound (clothed like a foole in white) as vnwilling to endure his prefectie. There is not any thing recorded of his Posteritie, but that the Principallitie of Judea went from the sonnes of Great Herode, to a younger sonne of another sonne Aristobolus and Marianus an Asmonaeus, to wit, to Agrippa and Herode, of whom I haue here left downe the Anceilers and Posteritie.

But he making refusal to be circumcised, her brother Agrippa gaue her to Herod Antipas, King of the Emesians. Afterward Felix, brother to Pallas, Governour of Judea (by power of Promises) made hir to leaue hir husband, and tooke her to wife. By whom shee had a sonne, named Agrippa, who dyed with his wife, at the burning of the Mountaine Sefenus: which made an innumerable spoyle and waste in Terra di Lano, otherwise called the Great Campagna.

CHAP. XIX.

The life of Agrippa, the first man of that name, coming to be King of Judea.

Little before the death of his grand-father Herode, being as then but eight yeares olde, this Agrippa was sent to Rome, and there nourished with Drusus, the sonne of Tiberius. Hee was greatly affected by Anthony mother of Germanicus and Claudius the Emperour, in regarde of his mother Berenice; whom shee loued as if he had bene her sister.

Being come to age, he retired into Judea, after the death of Drusus: because Tiberius expelled from his court, altho that had bene friends to his deceased sonne; as fearing lest the sight of them, should bee the renewing of his sorrow. But Agrippa became charged with great doubts, whereinto he had entred at Rome, after the expence of all his owne meanes. Wherefore he wandred abroad for (some times) with his wife Cypris, beggerly, poore, and vterly abandoned of his friends; so that at length, shame and pinching pouertie would haue prouoked him to shorten his life. But his wife Cypris making humble supplications to Herodias, the sister of her husband: she prevailed so farre, that Herode Antipas the Tetrarche, builded a house for him in the city of Tiberias, and assigned him there a yearly renew. Not long had Agrippa enjoyed this benefite by his brother in law, but Herode growing offended at his table, for some wordes spoken by Agrippa, ouer-boldely reproofed him angrily, terming him a begger, and a vagabond, and that he liued by his bounty.

Agrippa grieved at this reproach, forsooke this fauour afforded by Herode: and borrowing some small store of money, of one that respected him, but at extreame interest; once more hee intended to visite Rome, and there againe to make triall of his fortune. Hee went to salute Tiberius in the Isle of Caprea, where he found gracious entertainment for a few dayes: vntill some Agent for the Emperour, wrote backe from Judea, that Agrippa did owe thirtie thousand Crownes of the Sunne, to the Receiueurs of the Emperour. Beside, that he had formerly made many escapes, euen when the dayes for repayment came, vsing nothing but subtle and colosing shifts.

Tiberius much offended at these rydings, commaunded Agrippa to auoyde his Court, vntill hee had made full satisfaction: which hee did (with great difficulty) by the meane of Madame Anthony. Wherewith Tiberius was so well pleased, that hee appointed him the guardian of his twinne sonne Tiberius. But a little before the death of Tiberius, once againe he fell into his disfaour. For, being at supper one night, with Caius, the young adopted sonne of Tiberius, among other speeches passing at the Table; Agrippa wished, that olde Tiberius might quickly die, to the end that Caius should enioy the Empire.

This with comming to the eares of Tiberius, Agrippa (by the Emperours commaund) was clapt vp in close prison, and there so kept, vntill such time as Tiberius deceased. Caius, well assisted by his warlike troupes, and by his father Germanicus, came to enioy the Empire, and having released Agrippa out of prison; adorned him with the habits bebecoming a King, subiecting also those countreies to him, which Philip the Tetrarch, and Lysanias formerly had commaunded. Moreover, he gaue him a chaine of gold, of equalitie in weight to the yron chaine, wherewith he was bound lying in prison. Hee remained a yeare with the Emperour Caius at Rome; and then tooke leaue of him for his returne to Judea, to take possession of his kingdome.

Thus you see, that hee who (before) was not onely despised, in regard of his necessitie and great debts, but also durst not abide in any place, for the importunite of his creditors; was (to the admiration of all such as sawe him in that wofull miserie) raised to the magnificence royall, which which caused some to tremble, that denied and refused to aide him, or had iniuriously repulsed him, while he liued in priuate estate and extreame pouerty. Soone after, Caius Caligula gaue him Galilee and Berea; with all the cheuifance of Herode Antipas his emulatur, and of his sister Herodias, as in our last Chapter we haue related: wherefore, after he had taken order for his kingdomes affaires, hee tooke his journey towards Rome, with gifts and presents, to declare (on his owne behalfe) what seruices and acknowledgement hee made, for so many gracious fauors done to him by Caius.

During the time that Agrippa was at Rome, there happened a strife betweene the Citizens of Alexandria, and the Jewes dwelling in the same Cittie: so that (by lottes) Ambassadors were sent on eyther part to the Emperour. Amongst whom was Philo the Jew, whose testimony we haue diuers times made vse of, in the course of this present Historie. There the Jewes were sharply accused by a Greeke named Aprian, for many faults, and especially, for oblitaine contempt of the Imperall dignitie: because in all parts of those Citties where the Jewes dwelt, they would not suffer any Statues or Images of the Emperour Caius to be erected; but if any were set vpp, immediately they would throw them downe very opprobriously.

Caligula being very furiously moued with this complaint, repulsed the Jewish Ambassadors, somewhat rudely, and wrote to Petronius, (who from the beginning of his Empire, he had sent Gouvernour into Iudea) that with all the haste he could possibly vse, hee should erect the Emperours Statue, in the most holy place of the Temple of Ierusalem, if not by consent of the Jewes, yet in despite of them, and (by force of Armes) whether they would or no.

Petronius, willing to obey this comānd, yet knowing the execution would not be easie; called the Legions from all parts, & being prouided of sufficient succor, went from Syria to Ptolomaeus, carrying a braue army along with him. But first he made knowne to the Jewes (by Ambassadors and Letters,) wherefore he came in such dreadfull manner, as grounded vpon the Emperours commaunds; desiring the people, that he might rather perforce it by their good liking, then by the course of force & violence. The Jewes, not a litle affrighted at these newes, came from a great number of Townes and Citties, into the fields before Ptolomaeus, bringing no arms or weapons with them: but entreating Petronius, not to fulfill so wicked a commaund, protesting, that they would rather endure a thousand deaths, then suffer the Temple to be prophaned with the Statue of a man.

Contrariwise, Petronius admonished them to take heede, lest this their stiffnecked opiniō, should procure the countries deuastation by fire and sword; alledging fil vnto them, the sterne commaunds of the Emperour, how gracious hee had bene towards him, and (being angrily moued) he did not admit no mercy, to such as disobeyed him in the least manner, approving his speeches by examples, of diuers tormented in strange kinds. He further desired them to pardon him, in not denying to execute the Emperours charge imposed on him: because they knew well enough themselves, that neuer any refused to fulfill his commaund, but was extremely punished for it. Wherefore, hee rather intended to aduenteure his life, in fighting against their whole Nation: then to bee held remisse or negligent, in what the Emperour had enioyned him.

Heereupon the multitude resolved to insist, entreating him to pardon their religion and iust constancie, if (more fearing God, the Creatour of heauen and earth, and hauing often experimented his heauy wrath, by their transgressing his commandements) they did now oppose themselves against the Emperours will, being full of impieci. Considering also, that Petronius himselfe confessed that he stood in such feare of a mortall man (whose life was vncertaine) that he held it no safetie for his person, to transgresse the least of his commaunds.

Petronius, amazed at this obstinacie in the people, and (after that the assembly was dispersed) finding himselfe in great perplexitie, what hee should doe in this dangerous case; paused a while vpon it. For, hee had bene particularly admonished by Aristobolus, brother to King Agrippa, and some other Princes of Iudea, with earnest imprecations, not to foyle himselfe himselfe, with the innocent bloud of so great a multitude, by the wicked commaund of the Emperours; because in so doing, hee should brand the Romaine Empire, with so infamous a note of cruelty, as the like was neuer heard of before, destroying a whole Nation, for refusing to suffer the Image of a sinfull man, to be aduanced in their most holie Temple. Which diuine honour, no man (of vnderstanding or good iudgement) did euer couer before: but contrariwise, many, to whom such an offer had bene made, did holde it in no meane detestation.

They further aduised him, that hee would write to the Emperour, and let him vnderstand the peremptorie resolution of the people, in defence of the doctrine and ceremonies given them by Almighty God, calming his displeasure so well as hee could, from proceeding in so cruell a sentence. But if it should so come to passe, that the humour of the Gouvernour might not bee altered; yet then hee had enough to goe on in, and (when hee did please) to proceede in Armes.

Petronius desiring to consider in these matters more maturely, and to trie the peoples inclination yet a litle further: went with his Army to Tiberias, where an infinite number of Jewes met him, incessantly entreating him, that their fared Temple might not bee prophaned. Why? answered Petronius, Dare you warre with the Emperour? Feare you not the power of the Romaine Empire, knowing how weake your strength is, to contend against so mighty a Monarch? Wee resist not by Armes so great a power (cryed out the Jewes) but humbly lay downe our liues at Caisars foote: rather then, against the Lawe of our God, we will see the Statue of the Emperour, to bee erected in the holiest place of our Temple. Which words were no sooner spoken, but they all fell flat vpon their faces, prostrating their neckes to any that would smite them.

Petronius perceiving them so resolute and inuincible, that they rather would die, then suffer their Temple to be violated; considering also, that already (for the space of fortie dayes) they had not toucht the earth with any labor, although it was the onely apt time to sowe their seede: after he had consulted with some of his friends, hee coucloued, that hee would write to the Emperour. Yet, before he would make any publication thereof, he meant to presse those people somewhat further. So, causing a mighty multitude of the vnarmed Jewes to meete at Tiberias, and to feare them in most dreadfull manner; he engirt them on all sides with warrelike troupes, and his horsemen ready prepared to ouer-runne them. Once more hee declared to them, the rigorous commaund of the Romaine Emperour, the obedience of all the people in the like case; the danger wherein he and al his were, if they did not effect what hee had commaunded. Wherefore hee exhorted them, that the Emperours anger might be endured: because such facylty not to reuenge cruelly, the breach of any thing commaunded by him.

But when the Jewes cryed out all with one voyce, that hee ought to make more account of Gods commaund, then of any mortall mans whatsoeuer, to trample them vnder his horses feete, or slice them in peeces with their Swords, that so all the Jewes being extirpated, he might vse the Temple at his owne pleasure: Petronius, entirely moued to mercy, his heart throbbing, and his eyes ouer-flowing with teares, commaunding silence by a Trumpet, thus he spake.

Seeing you are so resolute, that you desire rather to die, then violate the Law given you by God, I am not the man, that (by a wicked kinde of obedience) will I soyle your Temple; for which I see you endeavour so much. Nor will I doe seruice to the Emperour my Maister, in a matter so monstrous and inhumane: but rather will be a partaker in your perill, then purchase my life, by the innocent bloud of so great a multitude. Be comforted then in this your Religion, and returne to your labour, which (for so many dayes) you haue omitted. For mine owne part, I will labour by my friends and mine owne Letters, to alter this opinion in the Emperour. If hee commaund me to Rome, and condemne mee

The honourable disposition & great piety in Petronius.

A noble resolution in so powerfull a Commander.

to death, I will gladly endure it: knowing, that by my death, a people living in great daunger, may yet preserve their Religion to themselves. For your part, pray to God, that what I enterprize for your safetie, may have a good issue for us all.

When the Jewes had heard this Oration; as people extraordinarily ioyfull, they beganne (with loude voyces) to extoll the pietie of Petronius, wishing to him all felicitie. And sodainly, vpon the Assemblies seperation, there fell a mightie shouere of raine (all the day before, and the whole moneth fore-going, the Heauens were so cleare and bright, that the earth was burnt by extremity of heat) and this the Jewes interpreted to bee a signe of their happinesse.

While matters proceeded thus In Iudea, King Agrippa being at Rome, vnder stood the troubles in his kingdome, and the occasion from whence they proceeded. Whereupon, he made a magnificent feast for the Emperour, consisting of all the delicacies that possibly could be deuised. Caius wel knew, that Agrippa would not launch out in such liberal expences, but that hee intended some especiall suite to him: wherefore, with a gracious countenance and franke spirit, hee bade him boldly ask what he would, protesting, that he should not be denied. In a long & well prepared Oration, Agrippa resolved the Emperour, that he desired not any enriching of his kingdome; but humbly craved pardon for the Jewish people, if, in feare to be punished by God; they had not received his Statue into their Temple of Ierusalem.

Caius accounting it a shame and disgrace to him, if heerein he should refuse his friends request: wrote to Petronius, commending his care for the execution of his command. Adding withall, that if (with the peoples liking) the Image was already placed in the Temple, so to let it rest: but if the people would not voluntarily suffer it to bee doone, by no means to offer them any violence. Soone after came the Letters sent from Petronius, concerning the slowe resolution of the Iewish Nation: which quite altered him from his former minde, and made him highly displeased with his Captaine, for not performing what hee had enjoy-

Wherefore hee wrote againe to him, that if he would not be brought to Rome, and there be massacred with most horrible torments: hee should make choice of what kinde of death himselfe pleased, as a punishment for the contempt of his command.

It came to passe, and (no doubt) diuinely, that the ship which carried these cruell Letters, was greatly tardied by boysterous tempests: so that an other shippe (bringing the newes of Caligulas death) arrived there in Iudea before it. Fearfull indeede was his death, but well worthy such a monster, who shortly after hee had written these terrible menaces to Petronius, was massacred, with his wife and daughter, by Chereas and his confederated conspiratours. Whereupon Petronius, being insourmed of the Emperours death, and thereby exempted from all feares, received the other Letters of his death. Thereby he plainely perceyued, that almighty GOD had miraculously preferred his life, for the good hee had doone to the Iewish Nation.

About the same time, Claudius was saluted Emperour by the Souldiours: who, because hee had bene both counselled and assisted by Agrippa, at such time as hee remayned in Rome: he confirmed vnto him (by publique Edict) the Kingdome of Iudea giuen him by Caligula, adding also Samaria, and all the other parts and portions, which his grandfather Herode the Great formerly possessed.

Moreover, hee gaue him the Tetrarchie of Lysanias, called Abelitis, with a part of Cilicia, and Comagena, which hee had taken from Antiochus. He conferred also on Herode, brother to Agrippa, the Kingdome of Chalcis.

Agrippa being in this manner richly recompenced, returned to Iudea, in the first yeare of the Empire of Claudius, and ascending vp to Ierusalem, gaue thanks to the Lord for his good successe. There hee made a sollemne great feast, hanging vp in the Temple, the Chaine of golde which Caligula had giuen him in memory of his miseries, and diuine deuiance.

Afterward, he beganne to fortifie the Cittie of Ierusalem, and with such sufficient furniture, that Clauasius (feearing a revolt in the Jewes, vnder trust in such a well ordered fortification) forbade Agrippa by his Letters, to finish the work hee had begonne. Hee was also most liberall towards his subiects, and (above all) a superstitious obseruer of the traditions, receued in the forefathers lawe. So that, hearing the Apostles to vaile them of no reckoning, to winne the good liking of the sacrificing Priests, and fauour of the vulgar people: Hee executed some of the Disciples of our Saviour Christ, and namely James the brother to Iohn, they being the sonnes of Zebedee. Hee also caused Saint Peter to bee put in prison, during the dayes of vbleauened Bread, to bring him forth to the people after the Feast. But the Euangelist Saint Luke amply declareth, that Saint Peter was deliuered by the continuall prayers of the Church: where hee also declareth, the miserable end of this Herod Agrippa.

Now, concerning the description of Iosephus, speaking of his death: it agrees with the Historie of Saint Luke in this manner. After hee had reigned ouer all Iudea for the space of three yeares; in the fourth, hee came to Cesarea, where hee celebrated the Feast with a great company of the Jewes; causing Playes to be acted, in honour of the Emperour Claudius, and for his health.

The second day of the Feast, he entred the Theater in the morning, attired in a Roabe of cloth of siluer, tissued, and made most sumptuous and artificiall: where, on when the bright beames of the Sunne did cast their radiance, it caused such a lustre by their reuerberation; that all eies were dazeled with the splendour of the garment. Whereupon it happened, that some of his Flatterers, interrupting him in his Oration; tolde him, that he spake like a god; nay, and (with a loude voice) called him God, craving mercy of him, because (vntill then) they had feared him, but as a man onely; but now they plainely perceiued, that hee farre excelled all humane nature.

As the King gloried in these flattering clamours, no way reproouing them for such impious behaviour: hee was suddenly smitten with a most grievous paine in his entrailes, so that very hardly hee could bee caried to his Pallace. Where, after many horrible torments, his life expired the fifth day: being iustly punished for the crueltie, which hee had exercised against the members of the true Church of Christ, whereas otherwise, he was very benigne and gracious towards all men, especially to strangers and Gentiles. Hee reigned (in all) about seauen yeares; for hee helde the Tetrarchie of Phillip (vnder Caius Caligula) three yeares, and foure other yeares, the whole Kingdome of Iudea. He dyed in the foure and fiftieth yeare of his age; the third of the Empire of Claudius; and the twelfth yeare after the resurrection of our Lord and Saviour Christ Iesus.

His posteritie hath already bene related, whereof Agrippa, being his eldest Sonne, and of the age of seuen yeares when his Father dyed, albeit Claudius the Emperour gladly desired, that hee should haue bene successour in his Fathers kingdome: yet some other preuayled so farre with him, that all the Regions (subiect before to his Father) were againe reduced into the forme of a Province; and the first Governour sent thither to rule in Iudea, was Cuspius Fadus, or Fadus Cuspius.

The death of Herode King

After the death of his brother, Cyprius Fadus being sent into Iudea, stroue to haue the custodie of the Roabes and other ornaments, which belonged to the Soueraigne Sacrificers, and to transerre the Sacrificers to Romaine Gouvernours: whereupon, Herode transported himselfe to Rome, at request made to him by the Jewes, whose cause he maintained there so well; that he obtained, that the garments belonging vnto the High-priest, should be kept in the custody of the High-priest. Moreouer, hee obtained of Claudius, that he should haue the charge and care of the money, consecrated to the Temple of Ierusalem. Hauing power also, to depose the High-priest, for some causes of importance, and to substitute an other more sufficient. A Grant which brought great gaine and profite to the Kings; because the Priests sought by power of money, who should haue that soueraigne dignitie.

Cyprius Fadus gouerned the Countrey of Iudea, when a certaine man, named Thendas, abused in such sort the vulgar people by his enchauntments: that hee brought them to Iordane, promising to make them passe (dry-footed) ouer the diuided riuier. But Fadus following, took him by his horse-men, and hauing put him to death, scattered all the heapes of his followers. Gambrell maketh mention of this Thendas, in the fifth chapter of the Actes of the Apostles.

Tiberius Alexander was sent by Claudius, to succede Fadus in the gouernment; vnder whom happened that terrible famine in Iudea, which Agabus had foretold in the cleauenth chapter of the Actes of the Apostles; and which was about the sixt or seventh yeare of Claudius: which extremitie was somewhat alluaged, by the libellicite of Helena, Queene of the Adiabanes, who caused great plenty of corne to bee brought out of Egypt, and figges from Cyprus. Also the Churches of Greece and Asia, gathered much money, which they sent to succour the brethren, that endured the famine in Iudea.

Herode, King of Chalcis dyed in the eight yeare of the Emperour Claudius. Hee had two wines, each after other; the first was Mariana, daughter to Olympia, the youngest daughter to Great Herode, by whom hee had Aristobolus. Afterward,

CHAP. XXI.

¶ Of Agrippa the last, Sonne to the youngest sonne of Herod the Great, the last King in any part of Iudea.

His Agrippa, being aged seuenteen yeares, was at Rome with Claudius when his father dyed; and succeeded not immediately after his father, because of some enemies about Claudius therein were his hinderance: who alleged; That his youthfull yeares were not apt to gouerne so great a kingdome, neither to bridle a people to rebellious. But in deede, their pretence was, to enrich themselves by gouerning the Countrey.

The issue of Herod the 4.

Agrippa made King of Chalcis, and enabled with his vncles power.

Cumanus sent governor in Iudea to Tiberius Alexander.

The warre sent behauour of an insolent Souldiour to the people.

A most cruell and bloodie act of Cumanus, whereby many Iust died Iewes.

A Booke of Moses and the Prophets writing abused by a wicked Souldiour.

Five yeares after his fathers death, his vncle Herode being dead also: Claudius conferred on him the Kingdome of Chalcis, at the age of 22. yeares. He gaue him also the same power his vncle had, to keepe the treasure of the Temple of Ierusalem, and to create the High-priests. Of which authoritie Agrippa made verie good vse: for (in a short time) he deposed diuers, and substituted other at his pleasure.

At such time as Agrippa beganne his reigne, Cumanus was sent into Iudea, to succede Tiberius Alexander in the gouernment, who greatly tormented the countrey, which already fauored of the succeeding ruine. For, at Easter, the fourth day of vnleauened bread, a Romain Souldiour of the band, which (according to custome) kept a garison about the Temple; vnrerently shewed his base backe-part to the people, they being dutifully busied in the seruice of God.

The Iewes not a little moued at this iniurie, gaue very bitter speeches against the Gouernour Cumanus, because hee did not punish this wicked act of the Souldiour.

Cumanus taking in disdayne their bold words, and fearing some violence by the mutinous multitude: sodainely (but verie secretly) fommoned his armed Legions and horsemen together, who discouering themselves before they could be suspected; made such an affright among the vnarmed popularity, that they fled away so confusedly crowding, that more then twenty thousand men and women, were trodden and crushed to death in the Streetes and other places, to the great and grieuous lamentation of all the people.

Another tumult also followed soone after, the issue whereof was not yet so pittifull. For some threuing Iewes, had (vpon the highway) shrewdly beaten and wounded one Stephen, a seruant to the Emperour Claudius, stripping him out of all that hee had about him.

Cumanus heereat highly offended, and not finding them that had done the deed; tooke all the neighbouring parts, where the fault was committed. Which being done, a Souldiour finding a Booke in his booty, which containd the writings of Moses and the Prophets; made a pub-

like shew thereof in denition; & after toore it peeces, in presence of the chiefest Iewes. Sodainly a great multitude of the Iewes ranne (by troups) to Cesarea (where then was the ordinary abiding of the Romaine Gouvernours) and required, that iustice might be inflicted vpon him for this wicked act: whom if Cumanus (by the perswasion of some) had not beheaded, to satisfie the enraged peoples anger; this tumult could not haue bene appealed, without very great effusion of blood.

Afterward, some of the Gallileans ascending vnto Ierusalem to the Feast, were slaine by the Samaritanes; which was the cause of many murders committed on both sides. For, eyther part being encouraged to reuenge, ranne into fresh iniuries, by way of robberies, putting to fire and sword all they met withall. But, because Cumanus (corrupted with money) did not repress those theueries done by neighbour on neighbour, Quarrens, President of Syria, was called thither by the contrary side; who (having received information of the fact, and executed the authorits of the mutinies) sent Cumanus to Rome, to render a reason for the Procurator committed to his charge. He being conuicted of auarice and cruelty, was sent into exile by Claudius, & in his place, was appointed gouernour of Iudea and Samarita, Claudius Felix, brother to Pallas, who (long time before) was sent into Palestine, to gouerne the Tetrarchy of Philip, as is affirmed by Cornelius Tacitus.

Almost at the same time, that is to say, in the twelfth yeare of his Empire, Claudius gaue to King Agrippa the Tetrarchy of Phillip (being destitute of a Gouvernor) which contained Trachonitis and Batanea; giuing him also Abella, the Tetrarchy of Lysania. Then he gaue to his vncle paternall Aristobolus (brother to the first Agrippa, and Herode of Chalcis) the kingdome of Chalcis.

After these affayres thus passed ouer, the condition and estate of the Iewes grew worse and worse; and now beganne the gouernement of Felix, who being reprooued by Ionathas the High-priest, for his rapines and other wicked actions by him persequed, and yet not daring to depose him from the Sacerdotal dignitie, because hee stood in feare of the people: suborned diuerse Ruffians, who

The libell of the Emperour Claudius to King Agrippa.

Ionathas the High-priest, reuoued the rapines of Felix, and was secretly murdered.

(entring into Ierusalem at the feast with the multitude) flew so secretly the High-Priest Jonathan, and others marked for the same purpose with him; as very easily they were concealed in the troups.

This attempt speeding so well as the Ruffians could desire, fell out to bee the occasion, that (at every feast) they made a market or merchandise, of killing the honestest of the people: sometimes being hired there-to by other, sometimes out of their owne spleene and mallice. So that euery man stood in feare, because no one knew how to secure himselfe; audacious boldnesse dreading no punishment, in regard of the Governours carelessse negligence.

Troups of theues ranne euery where making spoile, though many were apprehended by Felix, and executed: yet wickednesse had taken such deep roote, one-ly through neglect in the precedent Governours, as it could no way be helpe; no, nor by the greatest severity of iustice. And the worst of all was, that these theueries were maintayned by the High-priests authoritie: amongst whom, such as were best stored with money, kept bands of desperate villaines about them, by whose meanes they oppressed such as they pleased, laying close ambushes to kill and murder them.

In the thirteenth yeare of Claudius his Empire, Paul the Apostle was taken in Ierusalem, and being led thence to Casarea: pleaded his cause before Felix and Drusilla, as S. Luke declareth in the foure and twentieth of the Actes. Afterward, Felix called for him diuers times, and heard him answere for himselfe, hoping that Paul would redeeme himselfe by money. But after hee had kept him two whole yeares in prison; at his departing from Iudea, hee left him there, to please the Iewes.

Claudius died in the foureteenth yeare of his Empire, and Nero (at the beginning of his gouernment) encreased the authoritie of Agrippa, adding thereto part of Galilee, with the Cities of Tyberias, Tarichea and Iuliada. Forthwith he sent Porcius Festus into Iudea, calling home Felix, whom they of Casarea followed, and accused him of cruelty, rapines and other vniust dealing; but he escaped by the cunning of his brother Pallas. So soone as Porcius Festus was arrived in Iudea, hee gaue audience (at Casarea) to Paul and the Iewes his accusers: and as he intended to send Paul to Ierusalem, he (hearing the ambushes of the Iewes) appealed to the Emperour Nero.

Some few dayes after, Agrippa went to Casarea with his sister Berenice, onely to salute the new gouernor: which sister (after the death of her husband Herode of Chalcis) liued so familiarly with her brother, that there was great suspition of incestuous acquaintance. Paul was brought before them to pleade his cause, and (in a well couched oration) so approved his innocencie; that, according to the Kings owne opinion, he might haue gone at liberty, if hee had not appealed to Casir. Not long it was, but Paul was sent (with other prisoners) to Rome, in the first yeare of Neroes Empire, as is aouched.

Agrippa returning to Ierusalem, offended the Priests very grievously, by a building erected in the Pallace royall, and somewhat neare to the Temple: for hee could thence discerne, whatsoever the Priests did in the inward parts, and when they loytered in the sacrifices and diuine Service. The Priests holding this action vnlawfull, erected awall (on the Temple side) of the like height; whereby Agrippa was not onely hindered from seeing the Temple, but also a great part of the City. The King insisted, that the wall should be beaten downe; but the Priests so preuailed (by means made to Poppes the Emperours wife) that Nero allowed the wall to remaine as it did.

Heereat Agrippa being exceedingly offended, deposed Ioseph the foueraigne Sacrificer, placing Ananias in his roome, who was of the Saducees Sect, a man very bolde and cruell. He (Festus dying in Iudea, and Albinus his successeur staying somewhat long ere he came) tooke occasion to exercise cruelty against many worthy persons; especially against James the sonne of Ioseph, brother to our Lord Iesus Christ by an other mother, a man (in the iudgement of all them dwelling in Ierusalem) excelling in innocencie of life and piety, who was throwne down headlong from the highest wall of the temple; and by command of the said Ananias overwhelmed with stones, about threecore yeares after the birth of Christ.

For this wicked deed, he was accused before Agrippa, who feared the Romane Gouernour, named Albinus, now neere approaching; and also stood in feare of the peoples fury: wherefore Ananias was dismissed from his Office, exercised by him but three moneths onely. And yet he ceased not to commit great cruelties, against them that were of his owne condition. For, in regard of his great power, hee had many Theues (kept at his charges) of whom he made vse to murder his enemies priuily. Beside, hee made them breake into the Garners of corne, to steal the Tythes therein enclosed: which being often done without any punishment, was the cause of starving to death manie of the poore Priests.

Albinus being ouercome with insatiable couetousnesse, cared for nothing else but onely to get wealth together, by any vile meanes whatsoever: wherefore, such of the Priests as gaue him Gold, hee winked at all their wickednesse, and permitted Theues to doe what they listed, if their kindred or friends would redeeme them with money. By which meanes, in short time, all Iudea was full of Theues, all things turned topsie turvy, no Iustice exercised in any place: and there was no acte so horrid or execrable, but it might quickly be pardoned for money.

Gestius Florus was sent as succesor to this Horle-leech, who farre exceeded the rapines of Albinus, by infinit other wicked courtes; so that the Iews reputed Albinus a Saint vnto this other. For Florus proceeded not couerly; nor after the cunning manner of his predecessour: but by open violence, scorning, stealing, rudely taking, and doing whatsoever he pleased; for will onely was a Law to him. And surely it seemed, that he was meely sent by destiny to the Iewes, so to irritate them by open iniuries, and blinde them from all desire of reuenge, as finally to be their vtter ruine. For, the whole country being ouer-runne with Theues, and the people growne desperately desirous of warre; had a hope of some other Dominion, groaning vnder the tyrannical Romane rule, and (institish zeale) were perswaded to recouer their liberty.

In breefe, the time was come, which Christ and the Prophets had foretold, concerning the destruction of the whole

Priesthood, and policy ordained by Moses and diuine authority: confidering, that the Messias had already bene sent, for the loie of whom, both the Priesthood and policy had bin (till that time) diuinely preferred. Wherefore, vnder Gestius Florus, threescore yeeres after the Natiuity of Christ, five and thirty yeeres after hee was crucified and risen againe, the twelfth of Neroes Empire, the seuenteenth of this Agrippa now in question; and three yeeres before Paul was put to death by Nero: the warre began to waxe tempestuous, because the Iewes revolted from the Romane Empire, and entred into mutiny against Casir.

Florus could easily haue quenched this warre in the beginning; but that hee rather affected, to nourish and feede the flame newly kindled, by prouoking the Iewes dayly more and more, still adding injury vpon injury: vntill the fire flew forth both farre and neere, that finally, it wrought the destruction of all Iudea.

At the beginning of this reuolt, Agrippa labored very seriously, to stay the Iews from this furious desire of warre, and to regaine peace and tranquility, by requiring pardon of the Romanes for their offence, which they might haue obtained on meane conditions, in regard it was very euident, that they had some iust causes of rebelling, by the outrages done vnto them by Florus. But he came so short of their expectation, they hating nothing more, then to heare of peace or equity; as (very hardly) he escaped their violence. Perceiuing then the Nation so enraged for fight, & (like men blindfolded) throwing themselves impetuously into perdition; he retired from their furious enterprize, and sent ayde to Vespasian in Iudea, to tame the head-strong course of those Rebelles, foreseeing already in his soule, the sad ruine of all the Iewish people.

Heere I could weaue vp the sagge-end of this History, with report of the Iewish warre, which Iosephus and other authors haue described; but that my heart will not ferme me, to discourse those strange & miserable ouerthrows, which (in their pitifull events) did exceede humane beleefe. For no History is found of any nation whatsoever, that was so long time

Florus a bloody desirer of the vtter ruin of the Iewish Nation.

Florus a more wicked gouernour then Albinus, sent as a just plague and vtter ruin of the Iewes.

The time fore prophesied for the destruction of Ierusalem, was now fully come to passe.

shut vp from all succour, wofully tormented, and finally (wholly confounded, with numberlesse calamities) almost altogether quite rased out, and destroyed. For after that the Jewes were reuolted in the twelfth year (as is affirmed) of Nero, the army of the Romanes neuer ceased for fix whole yeeres together, cruelly to ravage the countrey of Iudea, because from time to time, the Jewes (by their inuincible obstinacy) provoked the victorious soldiers to such tyrannies, as the like were neuer heard of.

But though I spare to relate the deustation of the whole countrey: who can conceiue (with true iudgement) but the miseries of the City Ierusalem it selfe? Which, before it beheld the Roman enemy, for the space of fixe whole yeeres, felt (within it selfe) farre more cruell domesticke aduersities: as being diuided and torne in peeces, by Sects, Factions, and Seditions of Theeues, fighting amongst themselves (when they had none else to quarrell withall) for rapines, murders, and other mischeefs, every Faction thinking to support it selfe, by dooing iniurie vnto it selfe, and surmounting one another in number, and manner of nouel villanies and extremity.

Purie grew on to such horrid perfection, that if any Man or woman were esteemed holy, religious, and modest: these were arguments sufficient, to yeld a pregnant reason for their death; and the goodes of the richest Citizens, must bee brought forth, and layde before their doores, while the Factions fought who should enioy them. To kill people of meane or simple condition, was but to riddle them out of the turbulent crowdes, for they were esteemed but as a charge to the City, and hindered the way when the siege should beginne: for this they accounted their wisest course, and best meanes, to abide a long lingering siege.

If any man durst but speake a word, or expresse by any apparant signe, that hee disliked the present License vnto all Villanies, it was presently termed Treason, and state conspiracy with the Romanes; yea, it was a sinne deserving terrible punishment. And as great an offence it was, to mourne or lament for Parents or Friends, being slaine or murthered in these vprores.

To prophane the verie holiest part of the Temple, with Rapes, Murthers, and Massacres; they sayde, it was fighting in defence of the Temple, and for the Religion of the countrey. To beare away violently the riches out of the Temples Treasure, and to waste them in all Villanie and abhominable excess: this was tearmed, borrowing money, wherewith to defend the seruice ordayned by GOD. And vpon paine of death, no man durst flye, or get him gone, from these horrible, diuellish, and dangerous courses.

Moreouer, such as dwelt in the Citie, beheld (beside these publike miseries) their owne bodies, their wiues, children, and goods, exposed to the violent & vnbred attempts of those mercilesse Villaines. In breefe, there could not be thought or deuised any iniury or opprobrious behauiour, which the miserable Jewes might feare or expect from the Enemy, but they first made triall thereof vpon themselves, vsing no resistance at all against it. Wherefore, the coming of the enemies army was no way dreadful vnto them, but rather gladly desired; and euen but as a tolleration, or rather a recreation (when the City was sharply assailed) the seditious factions were enforced to ioyne their forces, for repulsing the enemy, and to breath awhile, from their owne domesticke theueries and warres.

The last six moneths of this warre, after that the City was round engirt with enemies, and themselves had pilld, polled, and miserably spoyled all that they could by their intestine robberies: they began to feele a famine in the height of extremity, which was accompanied likewise with so greuous a Pestilence, that in the time of the siege, about eleau hundred thousand men died by the plague and famine. During this war also, great multitudes wer daily murdered within the walls, by the mutinous and rebellious factionists: & in the assaults, surprisals, and sackings of the city, many millions of people lost their liues. Also in the war time, there were taken 97000. persons, who were partly sold as slaves, and partly distributed to rounde neighbouring great Cities, there to bee giuen and deuoured by wilde beasts, in publike Playes, and fantasticke spectacles. Some other were compelled to fight as Fencers in the Theaters, with the like fury as hostile enemies: and some were sent into Morea (by huge troopes) to cut out a Channell betwene the Egyptian and Ionian seas.

By these pittifull examples of Gods heauy wrath, against the contemners of his Sonne Christ, and the doctrine Evangelicall; almost all this nation was utterly exterminated. Happning by the Diuine permission, that at the Feast of vnleavened bread, when the Jewes were wont to meete at Ierusalem, from the farthest parts of all Iudea; the City should be thus besieged, and all the desperate Robbers, Theeues, & Ruffians, dispersed throughout the whole Regions, should (euen then) be retired to Ierusalem to shelter themselves in her fortifications.

After that Vespasian (for about the space of fixe yeeres) had first of all subdued well-neere all Iudea, conquering many strongly munited Citties, yea, destroying and burning them, onely through the wilfull obstinacie of the inhabitants; in the last halfe yeare, Titus brought his Army to the City of Ierusalem, and there planted his siege, in the second year of the Emperor his Father; and the siege continued for the space of fixe moneths, which Iosephus tearmeth by Macedonian names.

CHAP. XXII.

A breefe Collection, of the principall Accidents which happened in the time of the siege.

The beginning of the siege.

The fourth day of the first moneth, Xantiqua (which is Aprill with vs) the Citie of Ierusalem was besieged, neere to the feast of Easter.

The two and twentieth day after, Titus essaying (in vaine) to haue it yielded, raised his Bulwarkes, and prepared his Engines to batter the City.

The seuenth day of Artemision, which is May, Bazetha (that is to say, the new city, the first wall being taken) which was a part of the City beyond the Temple towards Betha, newly annexed, and enuironed with walles by the first Agrippa was seized on by the Romanes.

The twelfth day of the said moneth, the second wall was taken, and yet the same day it was recovered againe.

The sixteenth day, the Romanes hauing taken the other wall againe the second time, enioyed the safe or lower part of the City, which the Jewes called Acra, & was seated beneath on a little hill.

The one and twenty day, two parts of the City were lost, when the Jewes (being graciously entreated by Titus) desired to embrace peace. Then the Souldiers began to mount their scaladoes, neere to the Towre called Antonia, ioyning to the third wall, where their Engines and Bulwarkes being raised in twelue dayes, they were againe as quickly burned by the Jewes.

All the whole moneth of Dention, the which answereth to that of Iune, the Romanes were seriously busied, in engirting the whole City with a Wall, to hinder the bringing of victualles to the Jewes, and also to bereave them from all means of flight.

The first day of Panemon, which refereth it selfe to our Iuly, Titus taking compassion on the people, whom he knew to dye by the extremity of the Famine and Pestilence, onely through the obstinacie of some among them; being desirous to deliuer them without long delay, he created new Terrasses vp aloft, and began to batter the third wall, called Antonia, verie difficult to be surprized. This Antonia, was a most magnificent building, and very strongly munited nere to the Temple, foure square in forme, and carrying the greatnesse of a very large Castle. Herod the Great had builded it, in fauour of the Soueraigne Sacrificers, and gave it the name of Marke Anthony the Triumire. Within that goodly Monument, the Ordinaments belonging to the High-Priests were continually kept.

The first day, the Antonia was wonne, because the walls fell downe of themselves, on that side where the Iewes hadde vndermined, to get forth of the Citie, with intent to burne the enemies rampiers.

The eight day of Loion, which is the moneth of August, after that the Iewes had beene many times exhorted, to desire peace of so gracious a Conquerour, after they had repulled his often Ambassages by base iniuries, and wicked abuses: the Temple was forcibly taken, being a worke well worthy of admiration. And (contrary to the Edict of Titus) it was set on fire by the offended Souldiers. So that it burned the very same day, when as (six hundred, threecore, and nineteen yeares before past) it was burned by Nabuchodonosor, Colonnell of the Chaldeans.

The twentieth day, was the batterie of the high Towne (called the City of David) begonne: after that the Iewes (once more admonished to lay downe Armes) refused peace, being gently offered vnto them.

The seventh day of Garpiaion, which is our September, the high part of the City was taken: the Fortresse whereof was the Temple, as the Antonia was Bulwarke to the Temple.

The eight day, all the City of Ierusalem, (pilled & ranlacked before) was conquered all into alhes.

The foure and twentieth day of October, Titus celebrating the birth-day of his brother Domitian in Cæsarea (a Citie on the Sea-coast) had Playes there of sundry kindes: wherein were brought forth three thousand Iewes captiues; some of them being deuoured by beasts, the rest killing one another, fencing and fighting each against another.

The seuenth day of Nouember, Titus went to Berytha, a City in Syria, where he celebrated the Natiuity of his Father Vespasianus; & where (in sports & pastimes presented before the Romans and Grecians) a great number of captiue Iewes, were some trodden to death, others hacked, hewed, and torne in peeces.

I haue collected this small discourse, concerning the wofull consummation of this Citie, which sometime was the principall feare of Gods people, and of his diuine Doctrines: from the eight yeare of

*King Dauid*s reigne, vntill the finall destruction, being eleuen hundred, thirrie and seuen yeares. The due Obseruation whereof, may serue to testify the mighty anger of God, against the despisers of his Sonne, and of his word in him reuealed; exampling vs, from falling into the like calamities, either by a violent appetite of oppressing the true Doctrines, or to darken & obscure it by false interpretations, or (vnto the contrary) by wandering into euery wickednesse.

Now I returne againe to Agrippa, who (according as hath bene sayde) detestling the furious madnesse of his Nation, and evidently fore-seeing their wofull ruine) sent ayde to Vespasian, making Warre against the Iewes, and by that means partly saved his owne Countreies, from the lamentable spoile happening in this warre.

Nero being dead, and Galba chosen Emperour, he projected a journey to Rome, with Titus the sonne of Vespasian, to entreate the confirmation in his kingdome by the new made Emperour. But contrary winds intercepting them, they could not compasse what was intended: but receyued tydings neere vnto Antonia, of *Galba*s death: which was the reason, that Titus returned towards Syria, Agrippa holding on his course for Rome. But Italy being embraced with ciuill warre, because Otho (successor to Galba) being slaine, and Vitellius presuming to the Empire, Agrippa was very hastily called backe to Iudea by Letters, where he assisted Vespasian to bee saluted Emperour by his soldiers, and safely to conduct a well provided Armie towards Italy, with purpose to encounter the Captaines of Vitellius. So he left his sonne Titus (with some legions) to beate downe the Iewes, especially them of Ierusalem, as hath bin said before.

I finde no other matter of Agrippa, or any other of the posterity of Herode the Great: but onely Philo, writing of Agrippa, saith; That he reigned seuen and twenty yeares. He dyed then (by *Philo*s account) in the threescore and eighteenth yeare of Christ, the seauenth of Vespasian, and the fift yeare after the destruction of Ierusalem.

Philo further saith, that this Agrippa had a sonne, named Agrippine, who reigned thirty yeares after the death of his father: wherefore he attained to the year an hundred

CHAP. XXIII.

Of three great and notable Doubtes, which the ancient Philosophers knew not how to resolue, and for what cause.

HE ancient Philosophers, illumined by the gifte of God, made curious search into all things belonging to nature: and verified all their propositions (without contradiction or repugnancie) by other propositions meely naturall. Notwithstanding, they neuer knew how to resolue three things, verie doubtfull and of importance, neither could yeelde a reason for the causes of their originall.

The first was, that they well knewe a desire giuen to man by nature, that hee would neuer dye, neither feele any paine or greauance whatsoeuer: but to liue happily in the pleasures of this world, without the want or neede of any thing; and yet hee could neuer attaine to the end thereof. On the other side, hauing made this proposition, that God and Nature neuer did any thing in vaine, & that this appetite in man ensued thence, whereof they courted to finde the cause; considering beside, that in all other naturall effects the proposition alwayes did verifie it selfe: they were vtterly confounded in infinite perplexities, being neuer able to compasse the end.

The second was, they said & affirmed naturally in like manner, that euery man felt in himselfe a peruerse carnall inclination, or sensuality, quite contrarie to the former appetite of vnwillingnesse to dye: and yet this carnall lustful desire, causeth a man fall into diuers diseases, which are the abridging of life, yea hasteneth on death, wherto his other appetite is an vtter enemy.

Morcouer, many couet after riches and pompe, seeking to winne them courageously in the field; where soonest of all they meete with death, or else bear away wounds, maiimes, afflictions of mind, & other misfortunes, quite contrary to their desire indeede.

The third doubt proceeded from the order of nature, all interiour things being gouerned by their superiour: as wee see the elements obedient to the celestiall bodies; the Orbes and Spheres to the mooing intelligence, and all the intelligences to the cheefest of all, which is God loued and desired. Onely in man is this order peruerced; for he being composed of a soule and a body, the flesh which is the vilest part of all other, stands repugnant to reason, yea and to the soule, which is the very noblest part of all: and (which is farre worse) draweth it to the bent of his owne wicked will. And therefore the Apollis saide; That hee felt a Lawe in his members, repugnant to the Lawe of his thoughts, and attracted him to sin.

The Philosophers that were before the coming of Christ, neuer knew how to find out the occasion of this disorder: yet making curious search for it, fell into many and lundry errors. Wherefore Antigoras saide: This exorbitant irregularity, happened at the beginning of the world, and when all things were confused in the ancient Chaos. For the intellect being separated by discord, and reioyned by concord, all things were created good, and well ordered in their kinde: onely man excepted, whose flesh hee saw to be ill disposed, and disagreeing with the reasonable soule. And therefore, even as in that Chaos these two things were discordant: so in like manner afterward, they still continued repugnant, contrary to the rule & order of all other things in the world. In this manner, this poore Philosopher imputed the blame of all, to the Diuine intellect, which is God himselfe.

Others saide: That this proceeded from the celestiall constellations, vnder the which man is engendered, and receiueth birth. For Aristotle durst neuer bee so bolde, as (openly) to yeeld a resolution of this doubtfull difficulty; but seemed (as it were) to contradict himselfe sometimes, saying; Sensuality is naturally inclined to euil, howbeit (with great difficulty) it may sometime be ruled or tamed by the moral vertues. And in another place he saith, That the selicity which is atcheued by the vertues morall, is the gift of God. By consequence then those morall vertues, in whose operation the happinesse of man doth consist; must be the gift of GOD, and no way naturall.

Contrarywise, the Manichees, desirous to render a reason for this peruerse disorder, saide: That there were two soules in man, the one good, made of the substance of the Prince of Light; and the other badde, made of the substance of the Prince of darkness, and these do cause this continuall combat in man.

Origen afterward saide; That before the creation of the world, all things were conserved in Heaven which sinned against God: & therefore (as punishments) they were disposed into ill complexioned bodies, and from thence ensued this controuersie in man.

All these detestable opinions were confuted by Saint Augustine, writing against the Manichees; where, by long & pregnant reasons, hee prooueth the occasion of the subuersion of this order; and that because they had no vnderstanding in the sacred Scriptures, they vterly lost that light. For in them is declared vs, the full resolution of these doubts, and there may plainly be discerned, that these two propositions are good and true, and both of them in the order of Nature. To wit, that God and nature neuer did anything voide of purpose, and that it is very conuenable, that a man (by nature) should not desire to dye, but to leade a happy kinde of life, and yet without power of attaining thereto; not because he hath this desire given him in vaine, for it is truly naturall: but to obtaine the end and effect thereof, is a matter accidental to man, and not naturall.

For it is plain and apparant, that God created man immortall, in such sort, as effectually (according to the very soundest opinion of all Diuines) he could not haue dyed, nor be subiect to any miserie, if hee had obserued his commandement. But hauing transgressed, hee ought iustly to suffer death, and the miseries of the world; therefore, because he obeyed not his command, he incurred death and all afflictions. So that by the sinne of disobedience (as the Apostle saide) death came into the world. Hereby it appeareth the, that death was not (at the first) naturall to our prime father, neither successiually ensuing to vs, but accidental; because it was not the intention of God.

Thus come we then to resolve this doubt, that desire not to dye, nor endure any paines; is given to vs by nature, and not in vaine: because the power was giuen vs to obtaine the effect, but in regard of our disobedience, the desire still remaineth, and cannot be taken from vs. By the selfsame reason is the second doubt answered: for of our selues, by carnall obscenity, and glutinous gourmandize, we purchase death, and make way to this disorder.

In like manner, the third is resolved by Adams sinne committed, whereby hee lost the originall righteousness which God had giuen him; which serued him as a bridle to moderate himselfe by iust order, and so this harmony fell into confusion. For the soule, which ought to govern the body, as beeing the thing most noble and excellent; came afterward to bee governed by the sense, and by the bodye. And so wee see evidently, that this subuersion is no way naturall, but accidental.

By this meanes then, the proposition remaineth firme & true, that those things most worthy and most noble, ought to gouerne them of lesse noble and inferior quality: which sayleth nor, neyther can, as well wee may obserue in the celestiall bodies. And if in man it falleth out otherwise, it is by accident of the faulte, deferring this and worse, but not by Nature.

by them obtained, against so many furious people, and most potent nations. On the contrary also, they manuell not at the decadence of that Empire, which began, when they began to contemne those Ceremonies and religion. For we may obserue by infinit histories, full of examples, that so long as they were best obedient to religion; their Common-weales prospered so much the more happily, & the enterprizes of their Captaines fell out then successiually. As was well noted in Pompey, Brennus, and infinite other, who albeit they were idolaters, and neuer knew the true God: yet it seemed (neuertheless) that by certaine meanes of terrestriall retribution, God fauoured them that were religious. And it might be perhaps to this end, that like as the people were then zealous in a religion, whereof they had neither foundation, or any perfect beleefe; they would (by far stronger reason) bee good obseruers of the true faith, if it had bin reuealed to them, as now it is vnto vs. The effects then make it euident, that heauen neuer left them, without some appearance of good prosperity, & fortunate successe in their temporall affaires.

The Ceremonies which the auncient Romaines obserued in times of warre or peace, were many and diuers: wherein I must needs be silent, because the relating of them all, would require more time than I am allowed; and it might offend to speak of some, and not of other. My intent therefore, is to make relation of five only, and especially by them obserued, before war was moued against any Prouince. To the end, that moderne Princes may perceiue, how farre out of the way they wandor, in attempting war inconsiderately, & making no consultation first to GOD: wherein (if they iudge rightly) they may conceiue, that ill successe happeneth to them by no other occasion, they liuing in Religion so farre inferior to Ethnicks and Idolaters.

When newes came to Rome, concerning the rebellion of some Prouince, or of any trouble giuen by some barbarous Prince to their countries, or to any of their confederates: they sent ambassadors to him, by whom the Senate gaue to vnderstand, that they would know, in what manner the wrong receiued should be repaired, with refraining from offering the like afterward, wherein finding obstinacy then war was intimated. The Senate haue created a Captain for this expedition, called the Sacrificers, who were commanded to invoke the Gods with their prayers: for the Romans neuer went forth to shed the blood of their enemies, vntill the Priests had first wept, and made their solemn prayers in the Temples. Afterward, the Senate beeing assembled, went to the temple of Iupiter, where they swore a most solemn oath. That at all times when the enemy (against whom the instant warre was published) would require a new consideration with them, or desire pardon for the offence, pacificemency should neuer be denied him. This being don, the Consul elected for the enterprize, went to the Capitoile, and there made a solemn vow, to such a one of the Gods in whom he reposed confidence, so offer some singular thing vnto him, if he returned home victorious from the war. And were the offering of neuer so great value, yet the people stood obliged to pay it. Then the banner of the Eagle, being the ancient ensigne of the Romaines, was brought forth into Campus Martius; which they did, to let the people vnderstand, that in Rome ther might no feasts be celebrated, so long as their fellow Citizens and kindred were in war: & so bringing out the ensignes, deliuered them to their seuerall Captains. But first, a Prator mounted on the gate called Salutaria, causing a Trumpet there to sound, while the soldiers receiued their pay. Whereby may be gathered, that they liued not their armies at any time, till they had first appeased and honored their Gods, and likewise made their orisons for the prosperitie of their Captains, and virtuous carriage to their enemies in conquering them. For, if their Consuls (appointed for war) in conquering any Prouince or city, made not euident testimony, as well of their vertue as valor, they were grieuously punished by the Senat. Hereof we haue many examples, but two only shall serue my turn: the one for vltimate vertue in his campe; the other, for due punishment inflicted vpon him, who (being victorious) soiled his reputation in base manner. Fabritius, being encamped with his army of Romanes before Fidenas, a schoolmaster of the Citie came forth with the Sonnes of diuers principall Citizens, as intending to grati-

tise the Consull with them, and so presented them vnto him. The Consull (albeit hee might haue detayned them, and thereby haue made himselfe Lord of the Cittie) not onely refused to accept them: but stripping the Schoolemaister naked, and binding his hands, hee gaue a Rod to euery Scholler, and so sent them (whipping him) backe to their fathers. This benignitie tooke such preuailing power in the soules of the Citizens; that they yeelded themselves instantly to the Romanes.

The other was thus. In the yeare of Romes foundation, 318. warre was deliberated by the Senate and Consules, against the Sarmates, and other people inhabiting by the Mountaine Caucasus, which (according to Cosmographers) deuiding Asia in the midst, terminateth Syria on the one side, and finisheth India on the other; where, by extremitie of cold, the Vine hath no ability to grow. Lucius Pius was created Consull, and appointed for this expedition; where, waging cruell warre against them: Fortune was one while fauourable to him, & then againe frowning. But in the time of a truce concluded betweene them, Lucius very friendly entertained the Sarmates Captaines, and hauing diuers times bancketted them, perceiuing that they were lickerously affected to wine, because it was a rarity among them; at last he made them a bountifull feast, wherein he fitted them with great plenty of wine; that they (in drunken loue to him) yeelded the whole Prouince tributary to the Roman people. The warres so concluding, & the Consull being returned to Rome, hee demanded Triumphes; which not only was denied him by the Senate, but also his forme of victory so abhorred by the, that publickely they did put him to death, and for his greater defamation, engraue an Epitaph on his Tombe, speaking in this manner.

Lucius Pius.

Here lyeth the Consull Lucius Pius; who not by Armes in the fildes, but by carrowling at his Table; not by the Lance, but plenty of wine, conquered the Sarmates.

And yet the Senate, not satisfied with this his disgrace, caused publickly to bee proclaimed thoroughout Rome, that all (whatsoeuer) had bene wonne in the Romaine peoples name, by Lucius Pius, should be accounted as nothing. And wrote (moreouer) to the Sarmates, that they denied any Conquest of them; but referred them vnto their former priuiledge and liberty.

CHAP. I.

Of the Gouvernement and Administration of Iustice obserued in the Commonwealth of Luca.

Luca is a noble Cittie (seated in the Country of Tuscany) so called of Lucomenus, King of the Tuscans. Strabo saith, that Luca is a Citie neare to the mountaines of Luna (and nowadayes the Country is called Lunigiana) and that the Region yeeldeth very woorthy men, apt and able in valour for Armes: there being a multitude of knights, from whom the Senate receiued the Military order.

But because we are to discourse of our times, I say, that Luca is now found to be about two miles in circuite, seated singularly, and in a good place. It containeth about foure and thirty thousand persons within the walles; and there are rich families, because the men of this City do trafficke greatly in merchandise, and especially in matters of Silkes: for which (amongest all Christians) they haue no meane name. In the time of Castruccio Castracani (who was of the Interminelli) he became Lord thereof, there beeing a diuision of many families, that would not obey a Tyrant; they vsed the Arte of making silke together, deuining great wealth from diuers parts of Italie. They brought also into Florence, the Artes of making cloths of golde and siluer, whereby they attained to inestimable riches. The men are (naturally) very courteous and modest, not niggardly, but bountifull, and therefore prosperity commeth the more freely vpon them. The Lucan tongue in Tuscany, is held to be very sweete and pure, because they haue no medling with noyous accents, which are common to all other cities of the Prouince. This so small a citie, hath a long time maintained it selfe in freedome, and so still doth, with good and substantiall orders.

The Councell.

HER maine foundation (as it is in all other Common-wealths) consisteth of the Councell; because on them depend, and from them are deriued all the other Magistrates, that are members of a bodie so well ordered. These Councillors do discourse on the State occasions, and are (indeede) Fathers of that Common-wealth. It is compounded of three kindes of persons, because some are ordinarily of the Councell, and they continue a whole yeare. Some others are invited ad bene placitum, and are not ordinary. Some others are subrogated in the place of such as die, and so endure for a full yeare. This Councell consisteth of an hundred and three score Citizens, but ordinarily are in number an hundred and twentie.

The Signoria.

The City of Luca is diuided into three parts, which (there) they vnto tearme Terzari: The one is of S. Saluadore, the second of S. Pauline, and the third of S. Martine. The Councell doe elect the Signorie from the three forenamed Terzari, that is, for euery Terzario they create three men, which are nine in full number. Beside these, they elect the Gonfaloniere, who is the head, or chiefe of the Common-wealth, & (for examples sake) he is first elected from the Terzario of S. Saluadore; next from that of Saint Pauline; and the third time from that of Saint Martine: and the Terzari being once gone ouer, the Gonfaloniere returneth

These, haue the charge of counting the Ballots of them that are elected, culling out such as they think fittest, after that the Councell haue made choise of many men, and then they elect the Gonfaloniere. And in making this election, the Assortitori sit in Councell separtely in a place, and account the Ballots vntill they come to the number: which being not complete, they rebalot them ouer againe, vntill they be an hundred & eighty in number. And neither such as are subrogated, nor the other ballotted, are published to the Councell; but onely are made knowne to the Assortitori. And because no fraud or deceit may ensue by the Assortitori, two principall chosen Fryars are as their Assistants; one of the order of S. Dominicke, and the other of S. Frances.

These Assortitori haue Authority, to bring the men elected to the Magistrates, at such time as they think sitting in several months: and this deputation done by the Assortitori (who are the prime men of Luca:) it is kept by them in secret, & they are sworne not to reueale it. The Assortitori created, then they create the Signiory, who cannot bee vanquished, if they haue two third partes of the Ballots, although the foresaid Ballots are to be seen by none but onely by the Assortitori. The charge of the Signiory is to hear (freely) matters of iustice and punishment, being alwaies present in the Palace, & may not depart thence vnder capital penalty: the publike purse payeth their expences.

By this forenamed body of ten, one officer is chosen, whom they call Comandatore, and this new man they make sweere vnto them, his gouernment lasting no longer then three daies: in which time he hath liberty and authority to commaund all the other, yea, and the Gonfaloniere, & is Patron in euery business. And although the supplications which come to the Signiory, are presented to the Comandatore, & if he wil not present them to the collidge of the Lordes or Signiorys, they remaine with him: yet notwithstanding he cannot dispose of them without the authority of the Signiory. And if the Comandatore propone the supplications to the Signiory, & there they passe two thirds; the Gonfaloniere propones them afterwards in the Councell. The authority of the Signiory extendeth vnto straungers, but not ouer the Citizens: and they propone all things, but conclude nothing.

The Secretaries Office.

The Office of the Secretaries (who are three in number) is very important. These men haue authority, onely in matters of sensueto the maiesty of the Commonwealth, being absolute in that case, & are about the Gonfaloniere. But true it is, that they can do nothing without the Gonfaloniere; and before they conclude any action, they must tender the cause vnto the Councell. Sometime it falleth out, that seeking iudiciously into the matter, they accomplish it, & afterward tender a reason for it to the Councell, when they haue done it: either, because they could not congregate the Councell in the instant, or in regarde the cause necessarily required, to haue such fodaine expedition.

The Councell of Conference.

The Colloquie, or Councell of Conference, is composed of 18. Citizens, and they are elected by the Councell. These men, if the Lordes are doubtfull in any matter, and that the case cannot be easily deliberated: they meet together, and discourse on the cause propounded to the Councell; and after they haue discussed it pregnantly, then they determine together, whether it is to bee granted by the Councell, or no.

The Councell of sixe.

These six men (being of sound reputation) haue charge of the expences & profits for common employment. They provide and command all things, which passe in many accounts, and are as Gouernours of the rents and reuennewes. They haue also a Chamberlaine, who is the executer of their deliberations. And all these are likewise chosen by the greater Councell.

the second is Iudge of malefactours; & the third is Iudge in ciuill causes. By turnes they haue their severall changes, and euery fixe moneths, one of the Centers as Potestade, being first Iudge of malefactours; and his Office of Potestade being past, hee becommeth Iudge in causes ciuill. So that each one of them is Potestade, Iudge for Malefactours, and Iudge in ciuill occasions, as it comes to his turn. If the Potestade haue (perhaps) a Citizen in his power; he doth no more but form the Proceffe, and sets downe (in writing) his owne opinion, what is the merite of the delinquent, and so it passeth vnto the Councell, who either commend, teare, or temper the opinion and sentence of the Potestade; and then in such a case, the Potestade entrench into the Councell. On strangers, the Potestade may absolutely determine, without any other: And in breefe, these three men do also discourse on ciuill matters.

The Marchants Court.

These Officers are nine in number, being elected (by threes) out of the Terzieroes. They haue a forraigne Doctor for their Iudge, being their Assistent. They iudge in causes appertaining to merchandise, their authority stretching (in the said matters) to blood.

The Office for Store.

In like manner there are nine Officers, & so chosen out of the Terzieroes. These men are the prouiders of Corne, that the City may continually be furnished therewith, and they hear all causes concerning the matter. Prouision still being made for euery three yeares, and the Garners diligently respected where the Corne is kept, being still supplied, that there may be no want.

Six Commissaries.

And because throughout the whole Countie, certain assemblies are ordained of such persons as are meete to manage armes: for this especiall businesse, and such occasions as may happen in times of warre; these six Commissaries haue authority to muster and make ready bands of Souldiers, and all such things as are requisite for them. Whatsoeuer belongeth to this businesse, passeth thorough their power, and their sentence in them carieth allowance.

For Health.

There are likewise three especiall Presidents, for matters concerning the countie health. These Officers do regard, that all the food may be found and good; that all filth and vncleanesse may be sent out of the City, and men employing all diligence, to conserue the people from being offended by any pestiferous accident, or whatsoever annoyance may be preiudicial to health.

The Councell for disobedience.

And because in euery City, there are found too many persons, not enclineable to any goodnesse, but practising to liue viciously, adding themselves to lewde courses, and are meerey opposit to all well instituted rules, for liuing ciuilly, & in good order; therefore the men of Luca haue a Councell, which they entitle, for disobedience, and inflicting punishment on such (as by their vile example) may be the ruine of a well-policed Commonwealth. And the forme of their discipline (in this case) carieth some correspondence with the Ostracisme vsed amongst the Athenians; only herein is this difference, that the Athenians banished such, whose granelesse and power grew suspitious to the people, and so sentenced them for ten yeares, whereas here it extended but to rascality onely, and the sentence lasting but three yeares.

The Office for Lodgings.

Eight Gentlemen are appointed to this Office, who haue charge for vnderstanding the affaires of all strangers comming into the City, and what businesse they haue there. All hosts stand bound to giue in writing the names of such Guestes, as come from any part abroad, and are not of the City, and those names they must deliuer to these officers. And if perchance some one tell a lye, reporting one thing for another; he is then examined by the strappado, because the truth of his businesse there, ought to be knowne. Such as approve themselves good and honest, being no spies or teachers to the City, are kindly entertained, their Lodgings orderly appointed, and their expences well respected.

for election to S. SANIORI, and so successively (each after other) according to the foresaid order.

By these men, and by the Gonfaloniere living abroad, other are to be elected, called Antiani, and the election is made in this manner. Three men are chosen, who they terme Affortitori, one for each Terziera. These, haue the charge of counting the Ballots of them that are elected, culling out such as they think fittest, after that the Councell haue made choyle of many men, and then they elect the Gonfaloniere. And in making this election, the Affortitori sit in Councell separately in a place, and account the Ballots vntill they come to the number: which being not compleate, they rebalot them ouer againe, vntill they be an hundred & eighty in number. And neither such as are subrogated, nor the other ballotted, are published to the Councell; but only are made knowne to the Affortitori. CHAP. II.

What benefite and honor it is to a Prince, to haue a comely bodye, a gracious countenance, and venerable aspect.

Beauty of body is no mean blessing in a Prince.

NE of the parts (in mine opinion) which maketh the Maiestie of a Prince to bee most venerable (speaking of exterior graces) is beautie of body: which wee see to be accompanied with singular grauity, and which yeeldeth argument of wisdom and knowledge.

The saying of Pythagoras concerning a crooked body

And although the rule of Pythagoras hath often bene noted to faile, affirming, That in a crooked body, there can neuer dwell a right soule (because we haue seene in an ill shaped body, to reigne diuers choyce vertues) yet that which is most frequent and ordinary, is to see the contrary. And if an honourable aspect and representation, serued to no other end in a Prince, but to increase his authority and reuerence, yet are they much more dignified, if some signes of vertue and bountie doe beare them company. As on the contrary, they are diminished by ill shape and deformity. For Cicero sayeth; The habitude of vertue is of such efficacie, that it maketh vs to loue him that is possessed thereof. Euen so, Maiestie in the person of a Prince, hath a veneration merely in it selfe, which attracteth the heartes of his subiects vnto loue: vrged thereunto (perhappes) by no expresse fantasie, that a Prince ought to bee vertuous, and conforme his actions to the beauty of his body.

This reason (it may be) hath induced many barbarous people to iudge, that there was no man capable of a good spirit, to bring any great attempt to successefull end; but onely such a one, as was endued (by nature) with a goodly proportion of body, and an honorable presence. Macrobius declareth, that in the life of Meroe on Nilus, the inhabitants (who are said to liue halfe againe as long as we do) vnto elect as their Prince, him whom they know to be the strongest, and of far goodlier presence then any other. There is no man, but will repute a deformed Prince, yet vertuous; ought to be preferred before him of goodly person, and vicious: but when wee come to make equality of them, our affection will rather leane to the comely body, then vnto the counterfeite.

Demetrius, the sonne of Antigonus, was off such a goodly and honourable representation, that there was neither Painter or Caruer that durst attempt to portraire him: for there was in him both a sweet complexion, and terror mixed together, yet ioynt with such manitude & grauity, as it plainly appeared, that hee was merely borne, to be affected, feared, and reuerenced altogether. VVee reade of Marius (who had so many Triumphs) that he was of such a venerable aspect, as becoming prisoner to his enemy Silla: a French man was sent by him to murder him. Who entering into the prison, with his weapon ready drawne, and noting in him a verie graue and dreadfull aspect; he became so dismayed and terrified, that hee returned backe, leauing the prison open, and (by that means) was the cause of preserving his life. Alexander the Macedonian (being but of meane stature, and not ouercomely countenanced) walking with his deely affected Friend Ephesion: the Mother of King Darius (being verie desirous to salute Alexander) offered her courtiesies to Ephesion, making him many humble reuerences. For, seeing him to bee so goodly a man of person; hee verily thought, that (of necessity) hee must be Alexander.

The benefite almostly appearance to Countries & Commonwealths.

Example of deformity in Philopomenes Governor of the Achians

A City of Achians on the borders of Africa.

A pleasant history of Philopomenes hunting.

The Citizens who supplied Philopomenes with more sightly persons, then hee appeared in his eye.

Historics make report, that Alcibiades, Scipio, and many other, did highly honor and make great the dignitie of their authority, onely by their sightly appearance: wherewith also their innatred vertues being combin'd, did inestimable benefite to their seuerall Countries and Commonwealths. On the contrary, we finde that many Princes and Captaines, as well auncient as moderne, haue bene defiled for their lowe stature, and other defects of honourable presence, euen to the perill of their liues, whereof I purpose to produce two examples onely.

Philopomenes, Duke of the Achians, and much renowned, was of so lowe stature, misshapen presence, and deformed countenance, that when hee attyred himselfe in mechanike habite (as oftentimes he vsed to doe) he seemed rather to bee of vile and vulgar place, then woorthy to haue gouernement of the people. He was greatly addicted to hunting, and therefore resorted very often to Megara. It so chanced on a certaine day, that this desire of hunting carried him further off, then hee had any willing intent to goe: so that hee arrived at the house of a Citizen neare adioyning, who was a singular friend of his, and had lately before bene married. He had but one seruant in his company; because the rest hee had sent to other places, and being come to his friends house, he knockt at the doore: and the women looking forth at their window, demanded what they would haue; when the seruant replied, That Philopomenes, Duke of the Achians came to haue entertainment there.

The woman being much amazed, that a man of such worth, and so much vnexpected, should come on such a sodaine thither, and (having neuer seene the Duke) reputing thele to be but two of his seruants, which came before to giue knowledge of his coming, because they were thus alone: without returning any other answer, came and opened the doore to them. When they were entred into the house, she sent one of her seruants to aduertise her husband speedily (who was then abroad at the next village:) requiring Philopomenes & the other with him, to sit downe in the meane time, while she bestirred her selfe to prepare supper. About the house trots she and her maid, her thoughts much busied and molested, beginning one thing, and then another, but neuer going thorow or finishing any, though she had but little time of allowance. At last, looking on Philopomenes, who sat muffled in his cloake, and might be more cold then hee would make shew of (whereat (happily) she the more smiled, then at his deformitie) she, somewhat roundly (like a nimble stirring huswife) prayed him to lay by his Cloake, and help her to make a good fire, because her other seruants were else-where employed, and that supper might be made readie in due time, against the coming of his Lord and maiiter.

Heereupon, hee tooke a hatchet which she gaue him, and fell to cleauing wood for the kitchen: hauing formerly giuen order to his man, to take no other knowledge of him, lest the woman should discern any scruple of the deceit. While hee stood stoutly to this employment; home came the matter of the house, who knowing Philopomenes, and wondering to see him so homely busied; did him humble reuerence, saying; My Lord, this is no office for you to vndergoe. VVhereto (smiling) hee replied: Worthy friend, let mee alone, I doe but pay the penaltie due to my deformitie.

In our time, Ferdinand King of Spaine, who had the title of Catholike, a very wife and discreet Prince; but of stature, rather too lowe, then of any mediocritie, and although hee had a royall face, and was a man of great gouernement; yet it appeared plainly in him, that it was not correspondent to his other members. Besides, hee vially wore his garments of cloth, whereby he was rather thought to be a Citizen, then any way taken to be a King.

The King trauiailing (on a time) to Naples, accompanied with Queene Isabel, and being there lovingly expected; by occasion of weather, hee arrived at a hauentowne on the Sea coast (called Patulo) with his onely Gally, the rest being much better prepared, remaining behinde. Landing there, he was honourably received by the Inhabitants, according to the extent of their power in such a place. While the Pallace was furnishing, and prouision for his diet preparing, hee walked alone by himselfe in a Hall, where (very soone after) a poore blunt fisherman came to him, who (by chance) had taken a goodly fish, wherewith he intended to present the King. The Fisherman, not knowing him, desired to understand where the King was: he presently answered him, I am he. The Fisherman brake forth into loud laughter, imagining that hee had merely mocked him; wherefore hee prayed him agayne, to tell him where the King was: and he againe affirmed himselfe to be hee. But the Fisherman, discerning in him no maiestical resemblance, either for his person or habite, and no attendants about him fitting for a King; returned backe, and carryed away the fish with him. Hereat the King could not chafe but smile, and some of his especial Lords and Fauourites immediately entring (after they had saluted him with their wonted reuerence) laughing outright, thus hee spake vnto them. Lords, did yee not meete a Fisherman going forth? If you do not goe and giue him assurance, that I am your King, wee shall loose the best Fish that euer I saw. Instantly the Fisherman returned backe againe, and beholding him (whom he so much neglected) to bee so dutifully reuerenced by such worthy persons; he beganne to conceiue in his soule, that (vndoubtedly) he was the King, and falling vpon his knees before him, he humbly presented the fish vnto him.

Wee may account this for a merry accident, in regarde of another which happened to him, and by the same occasion of mis-censuring his person. For, at another time, the same King being at Barcelona, going in Procession with his courtly attendants, as wayting on the Sacrament, on the day dedicated to that solemnity: hee was sodainely set vpon by a Spaniard, who gaue him so mightie a stroke with a great Dagger on his necke, as had beene sufficient to smite off his head; but that the blow was rebated by a great chaine of golde, being then (accidentally) about his necke. This Spaniard being taken, and suspected that hee had some other complices in the action; was put to the tortures, where he would confesse nothing else, but onely that he was moued out of his owne mind to do it, in mere hatred he bare to the King. Hereupon he was demanded, what occasion should so prouoke him to hate the King? He answered; Truly nothing else, but because his countenance did not please him, for, it appeared so vngracious vnto him, that if they did set him at libertie, yet he would kil him, whatsoeuer came of it. Questionlesse, it was a strange case, that a man should so desperately endanger his owne life, because a King was not formed to his liking.

CHAP. III.

Of the inhumane actions, and monstrous cruelties of Aristotimus the tyrant; a subject well becoming a Tragedy.

Aristotimus, vnder the fauours, and forces of King Antigonus, tyrannically vsurped ouer the * Eleansians, exercising his power so intemperately, that he omitted not any kinde of iniury or crueltie, whereby he might afflict the miserable Citizens; for he was (by nature) more inhumane and cruell, then any man liuing in his time. Hee added to this his cruel disposition, the counsell of barbarous men, to whom hee not only gaue the rule of the kingdome, but also the gardance of his owne person. Among all the extraordinary cruelties, that which he inflicted on Philodamus, a very honourable Cittizen, deserueth to be recorded for a most especiall example.

This Philodamus had a daughter of admirable beauty & singular graces, named Mica, on whom a soldier called Lucius (an especiall fauourite to the Tyrant) became so extremely enamored; that (in a bold & imperious manner) he sent to her father, commanding him to fend him his daughter. Philodamus, much afflicted at so lawcie a commaund, & knowing what power Lucius had with the Tyrant, fearing also what might happen to him and her mother, laboured by perswasions, that his daughter should go to him. But the yong Virgin, who more prized honor then life, by mere instinct of her noble education; fell on her knees before her father, & embracing his knee very strictly, humbly entreated, that hee would not expose her to such monstrous dishonour, but rather to see her dead before his face, then deliuer her to such shame and indignitie.

The lamentable History of Philodamus and his faire daughter Mica.

The vertuous extraction of Mica to her Father.

Lucius desperately killeth faire Mica, which procured death to some, and banishment to others.

The father being moued by her teares to compassion, late downe by his wofull wife, and sorrow now sung grieue in three sad parts, which admitted no leasure for a final resolution. Whereat Lucius growing impatient, through the violence of his hote and fiery lust, seeing the mayd not brought, according to his wicked expectation: he ran himselfe to the house, where finding her on hir knees before hir parents, fall holding her fathers legge in her armes; with heauy threatnings, hee commanded her to arise, and goe thence along with him immediately. Shee continuing her wofull complaints, refusing to rise, or listen to his menaces, the cruell man, tearing off her garments to her naked skinne, did strike and beate her in most vnmanly manner; all which she endured with a most constant courage, not breathing forth so much as a sigh, but as one prepared to suffer his vttermost cruelty.

On their knees fell the mournfull father and mother, before the wretched man, not able to abide so rufull a spectacle, entreating him, to take pity on the Virgin, and their age. But seeing they could not preuaile with this merciless barbarian; they called for helpe to the gods, and men, whereat hee waxed extremely displeased, drew out his sword, and slew the Virgin, as thus she embraced the knee of her father. Although this horrible cruelty moued not the Tyrant a iote, yet the Cittizens so distasted the deede; that some of them hee punished with present death, and banished some other, so that eight hundred fearfully fledde into Aetolia: who afterward writing backe to the Tyrant, desired so much fauour of him, that their wiues and children (with some part of their goodes) might bee sent thither to them, to liue with their husbands.

The women, not a little glad at this good motion, beganne to make vp their fardells, some providing wagons, others horses, for conueying thence their goods and children.

Vpon the day appointed for their departure, all the Gates were set open for them to passe out at; their waggon and horses laden with their children and goodes; and as they offered to issue forth, diuers Sergeants and Catch-poles (standing ready for the purpose) cryed out to them with dreadfull threatnings, to stay and passe no further, ouerthrowing the waggon and horses, laden with their goods and children, so that they were not able to escape out of the crowds: but beheld their yoong children bruised in peeces vnder their heels, they not being any way vnable to helpe them. Afterward, such women and children as were left aliue, the Souldiers assembled them together, driving them on before them, (like herds of cattell) beating them with staves towards the Tyrants Pallace, who (causing all their goods to be taken from them) imprisond them and their children together.

This horrible cruelty did highly displease the Cittizens, who not knowing how they might best incite the Tyrant to pity their wiues: tooke sixteene vestall Virgins, consecrated to Dionysius, and, tying them in their religious habites: they tooke sacred things out of the Temple in their hands; and (in sollemne manner of a Procession) went towards the tyrant, to craue mercie of him for the women and children. The Souldiers, who stood as a garde about the Tyrant, being moued with reuerence to those holy Virgins; made way for them, that they might the easier come into his presence. Aristotimus affoording audience, to vnderstand what these women desired, and gathering by the very entrance into their Oration, to what end the full scope aymed; hee gaue very disdainfull looks vpon his Guard, reprouing them roughly and rigorously, because they suffered them to come so neare him. Whereupon, the rude Souldiers, without any regarde of their Sexe or religious condition; smote them with the staves of their halberds, giuing them many cruell blows and bastinadoes, vntill such time as they went away from him, being each of them condemned in two Talents fine beside, because they had presumed so boldly to enter into his presence.

There was a noble Cittizen in the Citie, named Hellenicus, two of whose children the tyrant had put to death, and yet (in regarde of his age) did not account him any way to be suspected. This worthy Gentleman, being no longer able to dure, the outrage and crueltie inflicted on his Country: determined to finde out some apt occasion, and to reuenge all wrongs by the death of Aristotimus. In the meane while, the other Cittizens, that were fled before into Aetolia, hauing mustred so many men together as they could possibly procure, entred into open armes, and came into the Eleusians confines, where they fortified themselves, and daily drew more and more to their faction, determining present warre vpon the Tyrant, many neighbouring friends assisting them with supplying forces, so that they encreased to an indifferent armie.

Vpon these proceedings, the Tyrant became afflicted with very great feare, so that he went to the women whom he detained prisoners, and being a man of a diuillish spirit, coueting to compasse whatsoever he would haue, rather by rigorous menaces, then any faire or gentle means) commanded them very roughly, to write to their husbands by Ambassadors, that they should desist from their present enterprize: otherwise, hee would instantly massacre all their children, and cause them to be beaten starke naked throughout the Cittie. To these threatnings the women returned not any answer, which incensed him with the greater rage against them; and hee sternely commanded them, to giue him resolution what they would do. Some, not hauing the boldnesse of spirit to reply, stood stedfastly looking vpon the rest, as questioning in their soules, which of them should retorne the answer, yet making no account of all his threatnings.

Among this company of worthy women, was one, named Megestena, wife to Thimoleon, who, as well in regarde of her husbands Nobilitie, as her owne innated singular vertues, was held to be the very chiefe of them, & (with the like esteeme) they honoured her. This Lady, when the Tyrant came in among them, would not stie to giue him any reuerence, neither suffer any of the rest to do otherwise then as she did. She hauing heard the Tyrants menaces, sitting still vpon the ground, and returning no signe at all of reuerence, she spake thus.

The answer of Megestena to the Tyrant Aristotimus.

Aristotimus, if there remained in thee any wisdome, then wouldest thou not make thy recourse to women, to haue them write a direction to their husbands, what they should doe; but rather thou wouldest send their wives to them, with better speeches and more worthy consideration, then thou hast ris'd toward them, making a mockerie of vs, by a most base and dishonourable deceit. And now, when thou seest thy selfe able to doe nothing else; thou presumest (by our meanes) to beguile our husbands by faire wordes, as formerly thou hast abused our credulitie. Thou decewest thine owne iudgement, for, wee will not suffer them to be agayne over-reached by thee; neither doe thou imagine them to bee so foolish, as to shield their children from death, or prevent the losse of their poore wives liues, they will forebare to execute that whereto they stand obliged: I meane the freedome of their Country. For the losse of vs & their children is not so yre some to them, as the glad some satisfaction will be, to deliuer their people and Country from outrage and cruelty.

Longer would Megestena haue continued her discourse, but that the Tyrant (seeing vnable to bridle his rage) commanded the Ladies sonne to be brought thither, that there hee might be slaine in her sight. But whilst the Officers were seeking among the rest of the imprisoned children for her sonne, the mother (with an vndaunted courage) calling him by his name, sayd. Come hither to me, sweete Boy, and rather die by thy mothers hand, then endure the bloody crueltie of a Tyrant. These wordes so amazed Aristotimus, and kindled such outrageous choller in him, that (drawing forth his Sword) hee purposed to haue slaine the Lady. But one of his chiefe familiar friends, named Chilon, standing by, caught her in his armes, and pacified his fury.

This Chilon was one of them, who praed with Hellanicus the Tyrants death, as vnable also to suffer his cruelties. Hee hauing somewhat calmed the extremity of his rage, caused him to put vp his Sword agayns: plainly telling him, that it was a matter monstrous, and ill becoming the dignitie of a Prince, to soile his hand with the blood of a woman.

Within a while after, there happened a strange strange prodigie, as foretelling the death of the Tyrant. For, being in bedde with his wife, whilst the Cooks were making ready his diet, an Eagle was seene to hover ouer the Lant-horne of the Pallace, and letting fall a great stone directly into it (it being ouer the Chamber where hee lay) it made a great noyse in the fall, and giuing a fearefull loud shout, the Eagle vanished from the sight of all that beheld it. The Tyrant awaking, with the confused murmure of such as had seene it, and not a little dismaied when it was reported to him; sent for a cunning Soothsayer, in whome hee reposed no meane confidence, to vnderstand what the meaning hereof might bee. The Wizard bade him be of good courage, for it figured nothing else, but that Iupiter had a speciall care of him, and sent his Eagle so to expresse it. But he told the Cittizens quite contrary, in whom he durst repose his trust, because he knew their hatred to Aristotimus: and bade them be bolde, that some sodayne and strange kinde of death, should (in a short while) happen to the Tyrant.

Heereupon Hellanicus and his Confederates, thought fit to delay the time no longer, but concluded to kill him on the morrow following; because the verie same night, Hellanicus sleeping in his bed, seemed to see one of his sonnes, that before had bene slaine by the Tyrant, who cryed out aloud to him, saying; Deare father, Why doe you sleepe thus? Wherefore doe you trifle away the time? Stand you in doubt, that you shall not be made Prince of the Cittie? Hellanicus confirmed by this Vision, went early the next morning to finde his vowed friends, hastening them to execute the deed determined. At the selfe same time, Aristotimus had receiued tydings, that Craterus was coming to assist him with a great power of Souldiers, and that hee was already set forth from Olympia. Which news were not a little welcome to him, so that seeming now free from all feare; he walked abroad to take the aire, some small distance from the Pallace, accompanied onely with Chilon, not attending for any more, although they came dropping after one by one. Which Hellanicus well obseruing, thought it now a fit time to execute the enterprize, and without giuing any fig-nall to the rest of the confederacie, he lifted vp his hands to Heauen, speaking aloud; What stay yee for, valiant Gentlemen? Why make yee not now the goodliest spectacle that euer yet was seene?

Chilon was the first that drew his weapon, and killing one that came last from the Pallace, who offered to steppe in the tyrants defence; Aristotimus espied Thrasibulus and Lampidius (two whom he most trusted) drawing their weapons likewise vpon him. Whereupon, hoping to escape their violence, hee ranne into the Temple of Iupiter, where he was slaine by his owne followers. Afterward, his bodie being throwne forth into the open street, the people cryed out, Libertie, Libertie. The women were the first, that (making way through the throngs) came thither, who ioyfully embraced them, that by the tyrants death) were the happy deliuerers of their Country. In the meane while, multitudes flockt to the Pallace, where the wife of Aristotimus (hauing heard of the murder of her husband; and doubting how the people would deale with hir) shutting her Chamber doores about her, there with her Chaîne shee strangled her selfe.

The Tyrant had two very goodly and beautiful daughters, of yeares apt and able for marriage, who hauing heard of their futhers death, had lockt themselves vp close in a Chamber; from whence they were drawne by the peoples violence, and in their furie they would haue slaine them. But Megestena, with diuers other of the Ladies, stood in their defence, saying; That it were an euill deed, and iustly deseruing blame, to kill them: considering, they had not leard so much courage of the Tyrant their father, to exercise cruelty vpon themselves. By these speeches the people were appeased, and a decree was set downe, that they should make election of their death, and performe it on themselves with their owne hands, if they had the heart to doe it.

So being sent into their Chamber, Alpasia the eldest sister expressing no appearance, eyther by countenance, or any signe else, that she stood in feare of death; loosed her girdle, and fastening it about a timber-beame, resolved so there to hang her selfe, exhorting her sister (with manly courage) to perforce the like vpon

When shee was dead, Alpasia kneeling by her body; and loosing her girdle from about her necke, turning herselfe to Megestena, & intreating, that their bodies might receiue no shame after death; with the selfe-same constancie of corage, she ended her life likewise.

CHAP. IIII.

The reason why men cannot know and vnderstand the truth of many things, while they remaine in this life.

Five principall causes there are, why a man can not know the truth of diuerse things, during his abiding in this world: which if hee could attaine vnto, he might repute himselfe to be wise indeede.

The first is ignorance of his end, that is, he knows not to what end he was created, for it is a matter most cerryayne, that if he did know that; he would labor no lesse to obtaine it, then he doth to get dignities & riches: wherein (because they best agree with his appetite) they make him to imagine, that all his happines consists in them. But in this case it fareth with him, as with a kings son in his child-hood. For, if he be demaied of him, whether he doth more affect the succession in his Fathers kingdom, then Apples, Cherries, or some other fruites, presented instantly to him: questionlesse, hee will rather accept the Apples or Cherries, then the kingdom, because he finds them suitable to his yong desires, as hauing both sight and knowledge of them in taste and apprehension.

Euen so it happeneth to a man; for if it were demaied of him, whether he best liked to make choice of, Riches or Wisdom: his election would stand on wealth and power, being meere ignorant, that Wisdome onely is the chiefeist wealth, and that the Wife man only ought to ordaine and gouerne. For, without Wisdome and Knowledge, power is not power, but weakenes, and vter deprivation of power indeede: And riches without knowledge, is but a bestiall possession, an abundance of presumption, and a kind of sottish substance. Whereas on the contrary, a wise man hath alwayes sufficient for himselfe, & others beside hauing in him that truly abounding treasure, that can neuer faile or deceiue him. And all this enueth to a man, because he is ignorant in his true end.

The second cause, is the vse of corporall delectations, voluntary and sensible, which ouerwhelme and drowne, not onely the senses of the body, but also those of the spirit and intellect. So that a man, being thus wrapped vpe in the mire of this world, is like the beautifull daughter of a King, to whom appertaineth the inheritance of her fathers Kingdom, but hauing committed adultery with some blacke deformed slave, loseth the right of her succession thereby.

The third cause ensueth by the indisposition of such matter, as many times maketh a man vn capable of learning and knowledge: which commeth often so to passe, in regarde that the region or place of his birth, is vterly disagreeable, and causeth him to receiue a bad complexion. As in some of the Easterne parts, and of Africa, where men are borne so beastly, by reason of the heates extremitie; that they are not capable of any reason. And contrariwise, some places in the northern parts are so colde, that verie furious men are there borne & bred; such as the Goths and Ostrogoths: some whereof feede on humane flesh. And these people may aptly be compared to an Eagle, that hath a stone fastened to her foote, to keepe her from ouer-violent flight, which commonly is naturall vnto this Bird, causing her to soare aboue the cloudes.

The fourth is, difficulty in the Sciences: For, although a man doe plainly discern, that the desire of his soule is to seeke attentiuely, as coueting to know the truth of high and deepe causes: yet notwithstanding, he findes them so hard

There can be no greater treasure or wealth in the world than wisdome.

1. The vse of bodily delectations & pleasures, which are the strongest owners of the body and soule.

3. The indisposition or want of the County where a man is borne; two extremities of heat or cold.

4. Difficulty in truly vnderstanding the Sciences.

Five impediments to a mans knowledge.

1 Ignorance in the cause why he was created.

A Kings Son cares more for an Apple or a Cherry in his child-hood, then his Fathers kingdom.

to be vnderstoode that he retreates, and quite giueh ouer his enterprife. Wherein he resembleth his owne eye, which fixing respectiue to beholde the Sunne: the splendour thereof prouoeth so piercing, that it ecclipseth and troubleth his sight, as he is not able to endure it.

The last and strangest of all, is an affection taken by a man in his youth, vnto things wherein he hath beene instructed, and especially when his desire hath lasted of some long continuance thereto. For then, Custome conuerteth it selfe into Nature, and therefore worketh a setled feare in the mans soule, and a singular loue to those things embraced, hating all other contrary to them, and the whole world (almost) is swallowed vp in this error. Do we not obserue that children among the Turkes, before they can reach to the yeares of reason: doe vterly abhorre our Faith and Religion; and to the Iewes in like manner? Wee see also, that country people, by being inured and accustomed to field-dwelling, do liue grossely, disdainyng conuersation with Courtiers, or such as inhabite ciuile Cities. From whence ensued the Prouerbe; Vn-luckie is the Bird, that is bred in a bad valley. For, by vse and conuersation receiued there, he cannot part thence, though he beholde a much better place for him. And not onely heerein is knowne the power of this habitude: for we our selues do despise them of another country (except fight or frequentation haue begot more familiaritie) and only through some bad and abusive relations of them: This error hath also preuayled with women, with whom, matters of long vse beare so high a priuiledge, that bee they neuer so bad yet they despise the contrary, be they neuer so good.

Finally, this affection to continued vse, and detestation of such things as we know not; extendeth it selfe to all matters in our election. Wherefore, it were good to expell those hinderances out of our hearts, to the end we may (if possible) know the veritie and truth of things indeed. For, in the knowledge of them, consisteth all contentment in this world, and the way to all felicitie in that hereafter: imitating the good husbandman, that intending to prepare his grounds for the best aduantage, doth first roote vp the thornes and weeds, because his graine will bee the better borne. So, when the Physician would cure a sicke man health, he first purgeth his stomacke from all corrupt humors; because in matter ill disposed, the former cannot induit it selfe. Let vs then contend against all these impediments; for the reasonable man, that will not yeelde to reason, but onely leane to his owne appetite: is like to him that will sayle ouer Mountaynes, or builde his dwelling in the Sea: for the effect both of the one and the other, are deprived of their proper ends.

Of diuers Accidens (monstrous in nature) which serued as dimming Auguries, or coniectures of things to come, in olde and ancient times.

In precedent times, whē by permission of the true GOD, sundry Oracles, which were spirits of illusion & falsehood, hidden in Idolles and Images, gaue answer to Idolaters: many prodigious sights were seene in the Ayre and on the earth.

And because that in these latter dayes of ours (we liuing in the light and truth of faith) none such are now to be seene: it is a matter of some difficultie, to credit what learned Authors haue written, concerning those which hapned in their times.

Yet (mee thinketh) there needeth no distrust at all; for they hauing written Histories of warres, and other occasions happening in those dayes: by inserting the memorie of prodigious Accidens, we ought not to make any scrupulous doubt of them; but rather to rest perswaded; that as they dealt faithfully in the one, they vsed the like iustice in the other; especially, when they are likewise confirmed by many and sundry other Authors.

Men metamorphosed into Woolues. Euanthes in lib. 2. cap. 9.

Fabius Pictor in lib. 2. cap. 9. Scipio in O. lym.

Amongst other Prodigies in the Romaine dayes, the most notable was, that of Modena, vnder the Consulship of Lucius Martius, and Iulius Sextius, Consuls: where two mountaines arose out of their proper places, and mette together so impetuously, that hurling a great flame and smoke vp into the ayre, by the violence of their encounter; they returned backe agayne, not onlie destroying villages which were betweene them, but also killing an infinite number of cattell, in the open sight of many traouellers, and likewise of a great company of Romane Knights.

Pliny, in his ninth booke, and in the fifteenth chapter, likewise relateth in the same place, saying, that in his time, and vnder the same Empire of Nero, Vellus Marcellus, a Romaine Knight, whome the Emperour had sent (on his behalfe) into the kingdome of Naples: had (there in the maritime territorie) two fieldes, each distant from the other, the one being a fayre meadow, and the other verie thickly planted with Oliue trees.

By an admirable accident, but how, I know not, these two fieldes chaunged into each others place: for the Oliues field was transported where the meadow stood, and the meadow into the Oliue plottes place; and this was conceyued to be doone by an Earthquake. This is not onely reported by Plinie, but also is auouched in the Chronicles of manie learned men, as also in the Booke of the Mountaines warre.

And although hee cannot be induc'd to credite, that men may be metamorphosed into Woolues; yet neuertheless hee declareth, that Euanthes, an Authour of no meane authoritie among the Grecians, recordeth the Arabians to haue written, that in Arcadia there is a great standing Poole, whereto men are brought at certayne times to passe thorrow it: and as they sincke into the sand, they are instantly transfourmed into the shape of Woolues; and hauing continued so for the space and terme of nine yeares: they doe recouer their former formes agayne, according as Fabius Pictor in his second booke and in the ninth chapter; who addeth also, that Scopas, who wrote the Olympiades, speaketh of one, named Demarchus, had eaten the bowelles of a young Boy, which they of Arabia had sacrificed to Iupiter Lyceus, and presently hee was transfourmed into a Woolfe, in which forme he continued the space of tenne yeares, and afterwards recouering the shape of man agayne, he wonne the victorie for Luce playing at the Mount of Olympus. Saint Augustine in his fourteenth booke De Civitate Dei, and the third chapter faith, that Varro also recordeth the same. In mine opinion these transformations could not thus happen, but rather were performed by diabollicall Artes.

Now, concerning these things of wonder written by Pliny, they are not to be wondered at, because he setteth downe many matters, reputed vterly impossible, as the transformation of a woman into man, and yet himselfe will not credite the like things, or offesse impossibilitie, and which haue bene apparant to his owne iudgement. Notwithstanding, such as consider well the Scriptures, need not murmure at transformations, happening really, and not feigned. For we know what is written in the leuenth chapter of Exodus and twelfth verse, That the Rods of the Nations were (not in apparance, but in effect, by secret charmes) turned into Serpents. Now, which thing is more easie, to change a Rodde into a Serpent, or the true body of a man (I doe not say his spirit) transformed into a beast. The opinion of Saint Augustine is hereinauailable, where hee sayth; A certayne man conceiued in his minde, that his daughter was turned into a young Mare. And bringing her to an holy man, named Hellarion, the graue olde man looking on her, said: I see a young Maid, but no Mare: for it appeared that by his deuoute prayers, she had recouered her former shape againe. Wherefore we may iudge, that some things are shewne to men, which are not indeede; and such a thing may be apparant, and yet not existent.

But returne wee now againe to our Auguries. It hath bene obserued diuers times, that in the opening of a beast, that no heart hath bene found in him: as it happened at the first time, when Cesar the Dictatour sat in his golden Chaire, and then it was disputed among the Auruspices, if a beast were to be found without a heart.

Arilander in lib. Proleg. 2. c. 10. in c. 10. cap. 9.

Plinie in his foureteenth booke and the seauenth chapter reporteth; so doth Cicero in his Diuinations, that Caius Marius, offering Sacrifice at Putea: euen in the same manner, there was not any heart found in the beast. But it might be then well obserued, that it chaunced not thus by nature: but rather was rightly to be presumed, that false spirits did thus delude and abuse the people, taking away the beastes heart in the Sacrifice time, knowing well thereby what was to happen after.

Ofentimes likewise hath bene obserued, that two hearts haue bene found in one beast. For, wee read that in the Sacrifices, which Marcus Marcellus made before hee dyed in the battaile against Hannibal: the first day he found no heart in the beast he sacrificed; and the next day following, hee found two. Pliny writeth in the place before alleged, that in Paphlagonia, the Partridge hath two hearts: so likewise faith Theophrastus, the most expert (among Philosphers) in naturall things, as Aulus Gellius declareth. Theophrastus sayth, that in * Bisaltia, each Hare hath two Liuers. And in some places (as in Emboa) the beastes haue no gaudes.

In Nassa it is quite contrary, for there they are very great, and double in diuers. And Frogs, which are there called Ruttes, haue two liuers, the one venomous, the other medicinable: so that when they are dead, the Antes make search for them, and feede on that which is Physicall.

Wee read, that on the day when Pyrhus dyed, they sacrificed the heads of dead beastes, that licked their owne blood vpon the ground.

The same yeare, when Hannibal was vanquished by the Romaines, vnder Publius Aelius, and Cneus Cornelius, Consuls, Wheate was scene to growe vpon trees.

Arilander (a learned Greeke Author) declareth in his Booke of Prodigies, and in the third chapter (and it is also confirmed by Cneus Epidius, the Romaine, in his Commentaries) that some Trees haue bene changed into another kinde of Trees.

Wee read also, that in the warre of the Cimbrians, a great noyse was heard in the Ayre, like vnto the founding of Trumpets, and clashing of weapons. And in the third yeare of the Consulship of Marius, two Armies were scene in the heauens, that went from the East, to meete in the West: besides many other the like Prodigies, whereof Saint Augustine maketh mention in his Booke of the Cittie of God.

CHAP. VI.

Of a very strange and admirable Accident, which happened on an Arme in the night season.

Hoseouer shall reade ancient Histories, needeth not wonder at some things, happening in those times, or else related by such as haue scene them: for sometimes it hath bene obserued, that either the same accident, or else but little differing, hath chaunced in one place as well as another. Among the adimitable Accidents, which I haue read in auncient or moderne Histories: I finde that to be very singuler, and well deseruing memorie, which happened to Agathocles (the Tyrant of Sicilie) in Africa.

This Agathocles was a man very expert in Armes, whereby (being but of base condition, to wit, the sonne of a poore Potter) hee made himselfe Lord of the whole Isle of Sicilie. Hauing had long warre against the Carthaginians, and seeing himselfe besieged (both by Land and Sea) in Syracusa, by Amilcar, with a powerful Arme of Lybians: hee was of such an vndaunted courage, that, leauing the Cittie to the garde of his brother Antander, and hauing certain shippes readly prepared; by the helpe of a cunning stratageme, hee gotte forth at a narrow port, with about seauen thousand footemen, and a small number of horse, and went to land on the shoares of Africa. Hauing gotte there in pay fixe thousand Greekes, he went and besieged Carthage, bringing the Cittie into such distresse, that the Senators knew not which part to take.

Many battailes were fought betweene them, them, wherein Agathocles proued alwaies victorious; because the time so fauored him, that he had drawn no meane troups of horse to take part with him. The Carthaginians (beside their Citizens, and many mercenary Souldiers (in great number) which they had for defence of the City, being vnable to equall the caualerie of Agathocles) called one of their chiefe Captaines from Lybia, bringing with him a powerfull army into the field, to haue a day of tryall against Agathocles. After diuers skirmishes passing betwene them, vpon a day, Agathocles would needs assault the enemies Campe (for his men wanting victualles, desired nothing more then present fight) but the enemy being very strongly planted, would not issue forth, though they were very hotely set vpon in their Fort; knowing the necessity of Agathocles, and the desperate condition of his men.

Continuing the assault still, to his owne disaduantage, he payed the penaltie due to his boldnesse: for the enemy repulsed him with great losse of his Souldiers; one part of them beeing slayne, and the other within compasse of the enemies power. The night preuenting the battailes conclusion; I am to tell yee an example of wonder, which strangely followed thereupon, in this manner. The Carthaginians, after their victorie, sacrificing vnto their Gods, in signe of their thankfulness (with a cruell superstition) a great number of their prisoners, both Greeks and Italians; brought such a quantitie of wood to burne the bodies, that the fire grew so impetuous: as it not onely consumed the sacrificing Tent, but also the Pavilion of their Captayne and Generall, besides infinite other, being a lamentable spectacle to all that beheld it. For, through the extremitie of this accident, a mighty tumult grew among them, proouing to occasion the death of many; for some labouing to quench the fire, fell into it, and so perished; others strining to escape from it, crowded one another to death in the throngs.

In this night of horrour and confusion, one nouell accident drew on another: for, in the Campe of Agathocles, there was found about five thousand Lybians newly arrived, in whom hee durst repose no trust; for they intending to pasle on, and to ioyne with the Carthaginians forces, were mist-led, onely throw the darkenesse of the night. On still they went from Agathocles Campe, till they came within hearing of the Guards and Centinells of the Carthaginians, who imagining them to be the Armie of Agathocles, re-assembled againe for a fresh assault; and hoping to finde them in disorder (as indeede they were, through the fies violence) rayed sodainly such a strange noyse themselves, that the whole Campe fell to flight, and was vtterly broken, so that few or none remained, but all were disperfed, some running thwart the fieldes, others backe to the City, to saue themselves.

The Citizens hearing this noyse of the people (conceiuing verily, that it was the enemy, who had foiled their Campe, and came now to assault the Citie) were so confounded with feare and amazement, that they left the City without any defence, seeking how they might best secure their owne liues. So that if Agathocles had received but the least intelligence thereof, and had gone immediately to giue the assault: this night had made him Lord of Carthage, and the whole Kingdome thereto belonging. Fortune, not yet satisfied with blinde-folded confusion, caused the five thousand Lybians (perceiuing what had happened) to turne backe vpon the disordered Campe of Agathocles, who fearing a fresh onset of the enemies fled, some one way, some another, and fell into such a madding fury among themselves, that thinking their owne people (still as they mette) to be Carthaginians; they slew one another very cruelly, the obscurity of the night not permitting them to see their owne error. So that, through this inaduertence or inconsideration, five thousand were slaine among the Greeks, and as many of the Carthaginians, dying and fighting in this confused manner. By which meanes, five thousand men (erroniously mis-ledde) against their willes, brake three hostis or Armies, with no meane example, of Fortunes power in actions of Armes.

† CHAP. VII.

How indiscreete a thing it is, and generally to be blamed in Christian Princes, to permit the Duello, or single Combat between man and man.

Like as abuse is growne among all things (well-neare) in the world, by the coldnesse of charitie in men, and their mallice augmented one towards another; Euen so falleth it out in Duells or single fights. For, amongst great Princes, when they lawfully exercised themselves in Armes, it was honourably admitted in certayne cases, and differences of most high importance, which could not otherwise be terminated or decided. But now it is grown to such corruption, as euery silly and priuate Souldiour, for very small or simple occasion, presumeth, that it is lawfull for him to vndertake it. But that which most of all distasteth me, is to see, that Christian Princes onely doe permit it, considering, that in them (more then in any other) the Lawe doth exprefly forbidde it: and it is encreased to such an abuse, that, except God amend it, it is to be feared, that Prelates of the Church will also suffer it.

The Duell or Combate, is denied to a Christian man, to doe it, to graunt it, and to see it, by reason both diuine and humane, as well Canonically as Ciuile. It is prohibited by diuine reason, according to this argument. Euery acte where-by God may be tempted, is prohibited to a Christian by the commaundement of God: For, it is written; Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God. That GOD is tempted by the Duell or Combate, I prouoe it in this manner: To make triall of things, which cannot be reduced to an end by naturall meanes, but onely by the Hand of Heaven: such attempting is to tempt God. As it happeneth in cases of purgation, where it is most notorious and euident, that (by naturall course or disposition) the strongest, actiue, and most powerfull person euer vanquisheth the weaker, and of lesse abilitie. Contrariwise, that the stronger bodie shall be overcome by the weaker, can not happen but miraculously.

Bringing then two such vnequall persons into the field, victorie is desired for him which hath right and reason on his side, to the end, that the truth may be made apparent. But then God is tempted, in seeking, that he should performe a myracle; which must needs bee so, when the weaker man conquereith the stronger, beeing (as it were) directly against nature.

I prouoe it further forbidden by Diuine reason, after this argument: when a Law prohibiteth a thing, it forbiddeth also the dooing of it; and a man performeth an especiall inhibited thing, when hee knoweth (by the Diuine Lawe) that hee is not to kill a man: The Combate then is flatly forbidden, because thereby murder may happen.

I yet prouoe it otherwise thus. The Diuine Lawe forbiddeth euery action, that differeth from the fountaine of charitie, which is the scope and end, of all vertues, and vtterly expelleth vice: The acte of Combate is farre off from charitie, leaning vnto vice; because charitie is nothing else, but to loue God and thy neighbour, and he that enters the Combate to kill his neighbor, is out of all obedience to God.

It is likewise prohibited by the Canonically Lawe, because it euermore followeth the diuine Law: and in plaine reason, what the one inhibiteth, the other neuer alloweth. Combat is also forbidden by the Lawe of men, and the prooffe is, that euery thing which repugneth and contradicth naturall equitie, is likewise prohibited by the reason of man; because reason is grounded vpon naturall equitie. The reason of equitie among men willett, that he which committeth a crime, should be punished, and the innocent cleared: notwithstanding, by Combate it falleth out many times quite contrary.

It is further proued by this argument. Naturall equitie, whereon (as we haue already sayde) all reason in men is grounded; is entirely for the conseruation and encrease of them. That acte then, which turneth vnto the diminution and destruction of men, is quite forbidden: so ought Combate to be, because thereby men kill one another, and men are of greatest price in the world. Moreover, every acte which repugneth the precepts of naturall equitie, is forbidden by mans reason, because it is grounded thereupon. One of the precepts is, that no man shall desire profit or honour, by the prejudice and hinderance of another. The second is, that no man shall wish that to another, which he would not haue done to himselfe. The acte of Combate contradiceth them both, because hee which commeth so prepared into the field, cooeteth his owne glorie, by the shame and harme of him against whom he fighteth, which is his neighbour, and wisheth that to him, which he would not haue executed on himselfe; for, he would vanquish and kill him.

Combate forbidden by the ciuill Law.

It is also forbidden by Ciuile reason, and this is the rule. Ciuile right prohibiteth every acte, whereby Iustice may be denied to men, or iniurie doone them. Now, in the case of Combate, oft times it falleth out quite contrary; for the innocent man dyeth, and the guilty offender remaineth aliue, so that by this meanes, Iustice can not take her due place.

CHAP. VIII.

Of strange and admirable properties in the Asse.

Isidore in lib. A. xiii. c. 3. p. 8.

He taketh his name of seating; for, in elder times, men were sit on such beasts backs, to saue themselves securely. Or else it cometh of the Greeke diction Asinos, composed of A, which is a Greeke diction priuatiue, signifying Sine, Without, and Cinos, which signifieth Sensus, Wit or Senses; so that coupling these two vocables together, signifieth, without Wit or Senses. Hereupon it is said, that hee is fearefull to goe ouer a Bridge, where water runneth vnderneath it: because hauing a weak brayne, hee is (by instinct of nature) fearefull to fall therein. He is timorous also to enter water, how shallow soeuer it be; fearing by the current thereof, his braine may be troubled, and he drowned; which proceedeth from a kinde of knowledge that hee hath of his owne imperfection.

This creature is slouthfull and melancholy, because he is colde, drie, without memory, laborious, and apt to carry burdens. By reason of his great frugallitie, he cannot liue in colde Countreies, and if by aduenture he doe liue there: hee affecteth not the generatiue act, neither can he there ingender. Hee beareth best vpon his reines, rather then on his backe or shoulders: for, being melancholicke, his bones behinde are the more strong and dry, for there is the signe of melancholy, and there is his skinn so thicke and hard, that though he be beaten with great stauies, he cannot be killed without much paines. Also, because he consisteth of an earthie nature, hee is hardly disciplinable, and fawneeth very little. Albertus Magnus sayth, That by the selfe-same reason, hee endureth much paine in his head, and dieth, tumbling his head aside, and in regarde of his heads weightinesse, a thicke and viscusous humour falleth on his lights or lungs, which maketh him to breathe with difficulty, and fall downe swooning. He eateth little, and the more he watcheth, so much the more he drinketh beyond other beasts.

In regarde of his great coldenesse and drienesse, hee can not sturre to ingender, at such times as other beasts doe, to wit, before the Winter Equinoctiall, or else vnder the Equinoctiall; but in the month of May, when the Sunne mounteth, almost to the right angle of the Equinoctiall, and then his grosse humiditie being deprested and diminished; he is prouoked to the acte with such fury, as if hee were a wilde foale, and especially when he is yong. The thicknesse of his skinn, is caused (as we haue sayd) by his grosse humours; and he that menderh his shoes with leather, of that part of the skinn, where the Asse hath longest borne his burdens, can not weare it out at all, but it will long time endure, passing ouer stony or craggy wayes, and will at the last growe to such hardnesse, as the feete can not suffer it: Albertus Magnus speaketh thereof by proofe.

An obseruation for the engendering of a Mule between an Asse and a Mare.

From this drinesse it ensueth, that the milke of the Female Asse is subtiler, that it cannot curdle: and therefore it is Physicall for such as are in a consumption. Moreover, the purity of this milke whitenesse maketh the skin of men or women wonderfully faire, and very cleare. Hereupon Pliny reporteth, that Pappa, a Cnocubine to Nere, often vsed to bathe her bodie in the Milke of a shee-Asse. This beast hath a custome to Vrine in the place, where he smelleth that another Asse hath staled before.

He is very much hated by small Birds, because he bites of the bushes & thornes, where they builde their nests: and with his crying noise, makes them fall onto the ground, or frights them away when they sit in the bushes. The Raven is his naturall enemy, so that when hee hath taken any harme on his skinn; hee mounteth thereon, and pittifully plagues it with his bill. So do the small Birds likewise, onely to be reuenged of him: but the Rauens about all the rest, labours to picke out his eyes with his beake; against which cruelty, the hollow concavity of them, doeth serue him as an especial defence, the hardnesse of his hide, and continuall agitation of his eares; for, by closing his eies, he chafeth them away with his eares stirring. The Bear also is his enemy, wearing him (oftentimes) to kill him, desiring to feede on his raw flesh.

He will not drinke but at such Springs or Welles where he is inured, & where hee may passe without wetting: but that desiring merraille, is, that if the water be troubled, though hee be neuer so thirsty, he cannot be procured to drinke, vntill such be given him as is pure and cleare. Pliny saith besides, that he will hardly be constrained to drinke, vntill his backe bee disburthened of his load. The shee-Asse is intirely affecteth her young Foale, and is so fearefull of it by Nature: as shee dreads it not to passe through fire to find it.

Aristotle saith, that the shee-Asse will remaine so long time from conceyuing, vntill the graines of Barley, sleepe in the blood of a Muler, bee given her to feede on. For the generation of Mules, the Mare must be of no lesse age then foure yeares, and not aboue tenne. Now, in regard that (naturally) no beast will habite with any other then of his owne kinde, such Heardsmen as would haue a Mule engendered by an Asse and a Mare, do vse this kinde of cunning. The young Asse-foale is nourished with Mares milke all his tender time, but in some obscure place, for better taking it. By this meanes, comming to age (as adulterated) he groweth to loue Mares. And in like manner, nourishing the Foales of Mares with milke of a shee-Asse; they habite afterwards willingly with shee-Asse. And if it happen that the Mare be taken, and the Asse hath yett vsd of her immediately, her greatnesse will corrupt, through the extreme coldnesse of the Asse. And so it fareth with the shee-Asse, if the horse haue ioyned with her, and by the same reason.

The Mule that is bred of an Asse and a Mare, cannot engender, the cause (according to Aristotle) is, that the seede of the Asse (as we haue already said) being cold, & that ioyning with the seed of the Mare which (hauing respect to the sexe Feminine) is also of cold complexion; & therefore, that engendered is so cold, as it cannot be proper for generation. And albeit Pliny saith, that diuers times they haue yong ones: yet (for all that) it is not naturall, but rather as a thing prodigious.

Aristotle granteth that they do engender, but the fruite cannot be reared or brought vp. Theophrastus saith, That in Cappadocia they engender and haue yong. Aristotle further saith, that the Asse fawneeth more by drinking troubled Water, then that which is cleare, and best agreeth with Kine. The Foale of the shee-Asse, is of so short memory, that following the damme, if it be but hie paces behind hir, it hath forgot, and followes no further, but stayes and standeth stone still. It is said, that the shee-Asse hath a naturall custome, when he is ready to Foale, shee withdraweth into some obscure place: but the opinion of Albertus Magnus is, shee doth so in regard of the weakenes of the Foales sight.

It is a thing well approued, according to the iudgement of the same author, that the Liuer of an Asse being boyled, and afterward roasted the same day, is verie soueraigne for the falling sicknesse, provided, that it be often vsed: the like power hath his hooves, being burnt, beaten into powder, and drinking the weight of three Ducates

Ducates, and every day an ounce. An emplaister made of the same powder, diffolue the Kings euill, & heals the chaps, which trouble the handes in Winter by cold.

Moreover, the houes so beaten into powder, and applied vnto an Impostume, quickly breaketh it. The Vine of an Asse, is very auailable for the Dis-ease of the Reines, caused by grosse humidities; and his dung, either burnt, or not, made in an emplaister, restraineth the Flux of blood, and smoking any houle with the Lunges of an Asse, it killeth all wormes and mothes.

Againe, his dung steeped in Vinegar, and applied to the nose in a cloth, ceaseth the extreme bleeding making also an emplaister thereof, and binding it to the forehead, it hath the same vertue. Pliny also saith, that both the Milke and bloud of an Asse, are very effectuall against the biting of a Scorpion.

His Urine, applyed with Spickenard, encreaseth and conserueth haire: and his bones being broken, and the powder of them drunke in white Wine, is very foueraigne against poyson. Aristotle, Alber-tus Magnus, and Pliny, reporteth infinite other Vertues, abiding in this much de-spised creature, which would require too long a time to relate.

CHAP. IX.

Of the singular vertue and constancie, of the Noble Lady Aretaphila, the enforced Wife to the Tyrant Nicoreon: And her honest policy, for the deliuerance of her Country.

An honorable Gentleman of Cyprus, and a worthy soldier.

THE vertue and constancie of the Noble Lady Aretaphila the Cyrenean, deserueth to be remembered in all Ages. She was the Daughter of Aglator, and wife to Fedimo, who for Nobility and riches, was one of the worthiest men in the whole country: and in those times she was no lesse endued with singular beauty, then admired wisdome and eloquence in her speaking. It came to pass, that Nicoreon usurping the government by tiranies, condemned many worthy Citizens to death. And among other cruelties by him committed, hee caused Melanpius (the Priest of Apollo) to be slaine, to make usurpation of his Priestly Office.

Afterward, hauing treacherously put to death Fedimo, the husband of Aretaphila, constrainedly, and whether she would or no, he married Aretaphila. Continuing on his pride against his people, & day by day encreasing his cruelty, hee furiously put a great number to death. And because they were to be buried without the City, he was entrusted by some of his pickethanks, that many counterfeited themselves to be dead, for their safer escaping out of the City, onely thereby to auoid his cruelty. Hereupon, guards of fouldiers kept the gates, with long Iron Pikes and Bodkins, made red horte in the fire; wherewith they pierced the bodies carried by, to try whether they were dead or no.

These cruelties, were greatly displeasing to his wife Aretaphila, who grieved to see her Country thus oppressed; and to such a height grew her compassion, that hating Nicoreon for her former Husbands death, she resolved to make adventure of her owne life, to free her country from so bloody a Tyrant. And although Nicoreon affected her extraordinarily, & bestowed infinite fauours on her, onely to please her: yet could shee not quit her thoughts from this magnanimous determination. And, when (through the tyrants power) all hope in the people was viterly lost, for euer freeing themselves from his tyranny: she onely grew the stronger in her confidence, that shee should compasse the meanes of his death.

Heerein she was still the more encouraged, by remembering the vndanted resolution of the Thebanes * Phraa, so much renowned thorough the world, counteing to imitate her example. But because shee had not the benefite of assisting Friends, as Phraa had; she concluded her enterprise alone by her selfe, purposing to kill the Tyrant by poyson. By which meanes she ranne into great dangers (as you shall read hereafter) in regard shee failed many times of her attempting; and being surprized at the last; all dissimulations were not sufficient, but shee was conuincd by most euident arguments.

At this time, Caluia, Mother to the tyrant (being a Woman of fierie temper, and one that heauily hated Aretaphila) laboured him by earnest perswasions, to put her to death with grievous torments: but the feruent loue of Nicoreon towards her, and her owne couragious spirit, in answering the accusations of her enemies; occasioned the delaying of her death. Nevertheless, after much clamor and constraint, she being conuincd by apparant testimonies, and no longer able to denie, but that shee had prepared a breuage for him: In the presence of the Iudges, with an vndanted and cheerefull countenance, thus she spake.

The Speech of Aretaphila,

in the presence of the Tyrant, and all her hatefull enemies.

MY Lord and Husband, I freely confesse, that a drinke was prepared by mee to giue thee 3 yet farre from so much, as thought, that poyson, or any harmful thing should therein be compounded: but onely as a drinke, whereby to incite feruent loue and affection. For, seeing my selfe to be conuincd by so many Ladies, in regarde of the kinde loue by thee extended to me, and exalting me to wealth and honor, farre beyonde any capacity in them of compassing the like; fearing withall (most worthy Lord) that they would not spare their uttermost endeauour, to kill that louing kinde in thee towards me, and quench the inire affection so long continued: I made that Breuage purposely, to preserve the hate of Loue in full power, and rather urge it to a higher reach, then suffer it to qualle in the least degree. If therefore heerein I haue offended, Reason (me thinks) should free mee from punishment; in regard that spotlesse loue to confound that foul fiend hatred thereto procured me. Neuertheless, if I shall bee faine to merite chastisement; it cannot urge death, as to an hatefull impostner: but rather such an amiable and fauouring affliction, as such a wife may be thought worthy of, who will not spare to practise any enchanting Potions on her Husband, to con-

uince his Loue in correspondencie, equally to hers.

Such was her constant carriage in this answer, and appearing of so sound truth in the Tyrants opinion; that by no means he would permit shee should bee put to death. Onely, through their diuelliish & violent urging, he suffered her to be further tryed by Racks and Tortures, as hoping (that way) to extort confession. Caluia causing the extreamest tortures to be prepared, flood by, while they were inflicted on her, euen according to the measure of her monstrous cruelty; and so many violences was done to the poor Lady, that Caluia her selfe, grew wearie with the very sight of them. So that Aretaphila, not confessing any thing more then shee had done, was deliuered from further tormenting, and adiudged innocent by Nicoreon; repenting that shee had permitted her to bee so cruelly misused, and his loue now growing to farre greater extremity towards her, made him labour by all amorous blandishments, and gifts of extraordinary vauelue, to reconcile fauour, & qualifie all conceiued vnkindnesse in her. And she, being a wife and sprightly minded Lady, had her owne discretion so much at command, that shee could seeme as earnest in loue to him as euer: yet carrying an inward vnconquerable remembrance of her Countreys Oppressions, and her owne extreame wrongs, waiting but time and meanes for iust reuendge, which offered it selfe to her in this manner.

She had (by Fedimo her husband) a yong daughter, of admirable beauty and vertuous qualities, named Miraguarda; and Nicoreon had a Brother, named Leander; youthfull, gallant, and somewhat dissolute in affection to women, which made her the more diligent, to procure liking in him towards her daughter, and easily she prevailed therein, by the help of amorous enticing drincks, and other deuices, wherein she wanted no furtherance of her cunning Physitian. Beside, the witty instructions shee had giuen her daughter, for her carriage in the company of Leander; caught fire on the Tinder of his affection, in such violent manner; that (in all hast) he entreated his Brother to grant his his marriage with Miraguarda, wherto he as quickly gaue consent, provided, that he could induce the good liking of Aretaphila thereto, which was not long in obtaining (though excused with some fewe faint and modest doubts) because it was the onely mark she aimed at, to compasse that which the further intended.

Leander, being married to his beloved Miraguarda, their mutuall affections so sweetly sympathized together, as he could neuer be satisfied with her louely embracings, nor shew contented without his company. During the heate of this reciprocal fierie temper on both sides, Miraguarda, ingeniously instructed thereto by her mother (knowing she could craue nothing of her Leander, that eyther hee durst or would deny her) aduised him to the killing of her brother. And so futable were her witty remonstrances to his yielding soule (alledging the acte to be generous, the freeing of his country from tyranny, and a certaine assurance to himself, that in requitall of so blessed a benefit, the people could not chooseth but elect him their King, by whom they enjoyed their long desired deliuerance) that he liked the motion extraordinarily. Nor left shee off so, but plyed him still vnto the same purpose, that if hee did make deniall of the deede, the Cittizens (in their violent hatred to the Tyrant) would acte this Tragedy themselves, as thereto they were all solemnly sworn; and then there could be no security of his own life.

So preuailing were these perswasions with Leander, that instantly he conspired against Nicoreson, perceiving that Aretaphila did not disallowe it; and imparting his intent to Dannilist, his familiar & very faithful friend: by his assistance he slew him, sleeping in an Arbor of his Garden, and thereby became Lorde of the Kingdom. The possession whereof made him so proud and powerfull, that, despising Aretaphila and her worthy counsells, the world might plainly perceiue, that hee was rather a murderer of his Brother, then a conspirator for his countries freedom, because he gouerned by iniustice and improuidence; albeit (afterward) he began to reuerence his mother in Lawe (somewhat more respectfully, though the people were still oppressed, by many extreme violences.

Aretaphila perceiving, that shee had not yet deliuered her country from tyranny; concluded to compasse it by his death likewise. Hereupon, by secret intelligence, she wrought with Anabius, a warlike Prince, and a Native of Lybia, to rise in Armes against Leander, wherto he was very easily induced. Hee being at hand with a potent Army, Aretaphila conuincing with Leander, told him, that his Captaines were not equall in courage and strength, to those braue Warriours that came with Anabius, and therefore it would proue disadvantageous for him, to make hazard of his weake forces against him, being not certaine of his owne subiectes, whom he had too much prouoked by his harsh vllage; and therefore farre vnfit to be trusted in trial of warre. Wherefore she aduised him, to labour by honest & plausible meanes, that a pacification might passe betwene them, promising, to practise such meanes her selfe, that hee should haue a friendly imparlance with Anabius.

Leander liued well the Counsell of his mother in law, and praied her to proceed therein; whereupon, shee dealt for the day of their meeting. Preuailing so well (in the meane time) by faithfull Messengers to Anabius, that when Leander should come forth to confer with him: he either should kill him, or take him prisoner, promising a great sum of money for the performance thereof. Leander being fearful by nature (as commonly all Tyrants are) daily deferred the enterparlance: but his mothers pressing him with shame of base cowardise, and faint-hearted effminacy, (thee promising to goe along with him in company) procured him to issue forth vnarmed. Anabius conning on to meete him with his traine, Leander made a timorous flay, saying; hee would not passe any further, vntill he had his guard about him. But Aretaphila, one while by faire speeches, another while by foule reproaches, calling him nothing but coward at euery word, till made him to walke on alog with her, and taking him by the arme, as to inspire him with courage, brought him forcibly to Anabius, and deliuered him vp as his prisoner, who safely there kept him, vntill the promised summe of money was sent him.

Afterward, she returned backe to the Citie,

Then was Leander deliuered to Aretaphila, who instantly gaue him into the Magistrates power: so that by generall sentence, he was sowed vp in a sacke, and drowned in the Sea, after he had seen his Mother Caluist burned. All the Cittizens flocking before Aretaphila, humbled themselves on their knees, confessing the iust merit of her praise: because (with so great perill of her life) she had saued her Country; enforcing her to vndergoe the Gouernment, which shee did, and ruled graciously vntill she had reduced the Citie to perfect peace. Then, resigning vp her Office into the Senates hands: shee entered a Monasterie of Sacred Virgines, where shee liued priuately, and peaceably passed the remainder and rest of her dayes.

CHAP. X.

Of the Famous Philosopher Euxinus: And of a Letter sent by the Senate of the Athenians, to the Lacedemonians.

Betweene the Athenians and Lacedemonians, a vetie cruell warre was waged, about the difference of certaine Confines, and in the field of battle, the Lacedemonians being foyled and discomfited by the Athenians: the vanquished desired truce with the Victors, and for their easier attaining thereto, they sent (as Ambassador) the renowned Philosopher Euxinus, who spake in so eloquent a style to the Senate, and onely in the praise of peace, deliuering such learned and pleasing allegations, as not only truce was granted to them, but also they freely gaue them those Confines, which they pretended was appertaining to the, and (by the chance of warre) hadde lost. Such power had the Orat[i]on, deliuered by Euxinus; and the Senat of Athens back to the, acquainted them with their minds in this maner.

The Senate and People of Athens, send health and peace to the Lacedemonians.

WE call the Goddes to Witness, that in the late passed battell betwene vs, Wee more grieued to see you so bloodily vanquished, then we ioyed in our owne fortune of victory: because the effects of Warre are such, that damage is certaine to the Conqueror, and benefit to the Conquered is doubtfull. Wee could heartily haue wished, that the demand by you now propounded, had bene before in like manner required: but such is the lot false both on you and vs, that you haue lost very much in this warre, and yet wee can boast of no benefit thereby. For the rule is most certaine, that whatsoever is appointed by the Gods, cannot be comprehended by humane iudgement, nor impeached by the power of man.

You require truce for three moneths, to the end, that in that time, an agreemēt may be concluded betwene vs. Wee returne you answer, that the Senate of Athens neuer vsed to make truce, after they had begun a War: obseruing (as a most ancient Lawe) that either they accept of cruell warre, or else freely confiscond to perpetuall peace.

Wee labour and practise in the times of peace, to allure Wise-men into our Schooles, to helpe vs with their counsell in the times of Warre; and now they aduise vs, not to make a truce on suspected conditions: wherein wee thinke they counsell vs well, because a counterfeyte peace is more dangerous then an open waged warre.

The Philosopher Euxinus your Ambassador, hath spoken so eloquently in the Senate, that we hold it vnreasonable, to deny any thing by him named: and therefore it is a matter more honest, to grant him peace that requires it by kinde words, then him that rudely asks it with the Weapon. Wherefore we tel you, and now giue you to vnderstand, that our Senate (with a franke and free hart) granteth to you Lacedemonians, loyall peace,

The euents of warre are vncertaine to either side.

What heaven hath ordained, is not to bee disappointed.

deliuering you from all suspition of war: And this wee doe, that the world may know, the Athenians are of so great spirit against the audacious, and so woorthie friends to such as are wise, that they both know how to chastise foolish Capitaines, and how to be commanded by discrete Philosophers.

Well wot yee, that all our difference hath growne about possession of Townes seated on the bankes of the River Alina. By this letter we tell ye, and sweare there-to also by the immortall Gods, that we freely renounce all right wee can pretend vnto them, on this condition: that (at our meeting) you shal giue vs your Ambaffador Euxinus: for the happy Athenians do more affect a Philosopher in their school, then a whole Province for their Commonwealth. Yet Lacedemonians account it no acte of leuitie in vs, to change townes and territories, to bee governed by one onely man: because the Philosopher can teach vs how to liue well, whereas such Countreyes may giue vs occasion of dying ill. And in regard, that (of ancient enemies) we now declare our selues your true louing Friends: We not onely deliuer you from Warre, and send you Peace; but likewise will giue you Counsell how to conserue it; for the Physicke that preferueth health, is farre more excellent then that which expelleth diseases. And this is the remedy which wee giue you.

As ye desire, that your yong men shal exercise themselves to Armes, in like manner bee as diligent, that your Children may haue Learning in due time: For, as Warre is made with cruell weapons, so with sweete words is peace softly obtained. And thinke not (Lacedemonians) that wee heere to aduise yee without cause; for, in leauing the counsell of the Wise, and suffering ydellnesse to encrease among the people: it engendred seditions and ciuill Warres, onely to make men murder one another. Nor would we haue ye thinke vs friends to busie prattlers; for our ancient Father Socrates appointed; that the first Lesson read to a Scholler in our Academy; was, that for the space of two yeares, hee should not dare to speake a word; because it is a matter impossible, that any man can be wise in speaking, except he be admirably patient in silence, and knoweth howe to hold his peace.

May it please you then, to permitte Euxinus to remaine with vs, and imagine, that if wee hope for benefite by his presence; you may rest assured, that from such counsell as he giues vs, you cannot receiue any damage. For, it is a very ancient law in Athens, that the Senate may neuer attempt any Warre, vntill our Philosophers haue first made examination, whether the cause bee iust or no. So wee cease, praying both your and our immortall Goddes, to preferue you and vs in perpetuall peace: for that onely is perpetuall, that stands confirmed by the will of the Gods.

CHAP. XL.

The true Module and Patterne of Government, to be obserued in any Commonwealth; deriued from the communitie among Bees, and how many wayes they may be examples to men.

HE forme of a Commonwealth obserued amongst Bees, meethinkes is so proper and answerable vnto that of men: as it may be verily presumed, that GOD gaue them it by a Naturall instinct, and for an instruction vnto our manner of Government. This little Creature, is named by the Latines Apis, a deuiation from the Greeke, which signifieth to bee without feet: not in regard that it hath no feete, but because they do ioyne so closely and aptly with the body, as if indeede it had none at all.

Many haue written of their properties and qualities; as Aristotle, Pliny, and many more: beside, I find in elder times, that Hyliscus Tullius was verie inquisitiue, to vnderstande the properties of these Creatures, and that he might render the founder reasons of his knowledge; hee liued in Forests and solitarie places, where best he might attaine to his owne intent.

And

Aristomachus wrote diuerse bookes of the Bees qualities.

A kinde of religious reuerence obserued in Bees, before coming forth of their hives.

Men are not born for themselves, but for their countrey also.

No more but one King in a very hie order of Government.

Helicon Tullius a diligent teacher into the properties of Bees.

Mutual loue and charity among the people, is no meane happytie.

And Aristomachus likewise, for the space of forty yeeres (without attending to any other exercise) gaue himselfe wholly to the same labour: and both of them wrote diuers Bookes very apt and worthy for all posterity.

The first and most notable thing, obserued in the writings of moderne men, is, that they haue noted an admirable kinde of Religion in these little Creatures: For, before they will yssue forth of their Hives, they bow downe their heads forward in such humble manner, as if they were deuotely at meditation on their knees. Declaring therein (euen by Naturall instinct as it were) to vs, that we should not undertake, or beginne any thing, before wee haue first honoured God, and recommended our endeoures to his gracious goodness, that they be begonne and ended in his name. Very respectiue are they, that by the toothe they gather from sweet Flowers, they may produce hony, beneficiall both for others and themselves; demonstrating thereby, that men should labour (by vertuous meanes) to performe good actions in their life time, auailable both for themselves and others; considering, it is a duty required in men, and for which they are born, not to labor for themselves, but also for their Countrey, and their Friends.

They are content to liue in their owne habitation, without intruding for dwelling in anothers houle. As a notable example to vs, that (for the peace of the Commonwealth) every man should rest contented with his owne, without coueting or vsurping ought from any other.

Every Hie hath his King, and both he and his attendants, doe thus noyses, clamours, and windes. Which teacheth vs, that we ought to haue one chiefe Commander in one Commonwealth, by who all the rest may be well governed: & that we should shunne the sinuake of Ambition, in being greater one then another in the Commonwealth, to the end, that there may be good discipline. Also, we should shunne from all windes of vanities, tumults, partialities, and enmities. Flight, labour, food, and fruite is common alike to euery one; to let vs vnderstand, the mutual loue and charity which ought to be among Citizens, in being helpful one to another: and partaking likewise in others distresses. for by this meanes, mens mindes become linked together in such amity, that the Commonwealth flourisheth in peace and quietnesse, and is a goodly president to other estates.

These creatures liue without lubricities, although they engender more then any other. Which instructeth vs, that for the peace and repose of the people, men should haue care of childrens generation, to perpetuate their owne kind and the Common-wealth, without lusting after adulteries: but to liue chaste and temperate in pleasures carnall, the libertie wherof doth procure contentions, quarrels, and death.

They doe respect their King with such loue and obsequence, that they account it an honourable deede to die for him. And Sain^r Ambrose saith thus: They will not flye abrad, untill they first see, whether he will flye forth, or no: that they may keepe him company, in finding food, and other effects for common benefite. Which may minister example vnto men, for honouring their Prince, to whom GOD hath giuen such Authoritie, to be assisted and inuited in those paines, which he taketh for the good of his people, hee being the principall of the Commonwealth.

They endeavour continually, to elect such a one for their King, as (in appearance) is most Noble, as also the mildest; not vling his sting against anie other, which onely is as a punishment for offenders. Adiuising vs heereby, to elect such for our Governors and Magistrates, as are of generous Nature, discrete, wise, and debonaire. And these small creatures, are of such nature, that they who are of greatest bodie amongst them, are also (commonly) the most humane and gracious. Signifying nothing else to vs, but that he ought to be most milde and courteous, that is exalted vnto the highest dignity, as well in Nobilitie of blood, as in wealth and vertue: which things naturally beget enuy in others, and yet destroy themselves by humanitie, and conuerteth into loue. Most obedient are they to their King; and if any one haue declared disdaigne, or disobedience, & the same bee discerned: hee neuer attendeth for other correction, but instantly slayeth himselfe with his sting. Whereby we are ad-admonished, to be faithfull and loving to our Prince or Magistrate, and fearefull to offend, euen to death it selfe.

No Bee is slothfull or idle in the Hiu; for some flye forth to combat against other in open field: others watch to seeke for food; others contemplate times, to foresee when stormes and raines will enſue; others compoſe the hony Combes; others lay aſide the waxe by it ſelfe, and there of others make little Lodgers, caries and rounds, in very ſtrange and wonderfull order. Neuertheleſſe, in ſo many and ſundry offices, no one intrudes into another's buſineſſe, or dare make any ſtealth or robbery from his companions: but by his owne labor and vertue, hee feedeth abroad on herbes and flowers, and yet brings a part of his pains home, for generall good of the Commonwealth. Herein we haue a notable inſtruction, to abhor & baniſh out of our Cities, ſlothfull rogues and idle vagabonds, that will not liue by their owne labour as they ought to doe. Wherefore through ſuch debſhment & negligence in men, all ſuch vices ariſe in Cities, as doe corrupt good manners, and ouerthrow order: for euery one ſhould liue vpon his owne endeuour, without vſurping ought of others; and what he hath ſuperfluous, is for generall aide of the Common-wealth, and to be miniſtred to others neceſſities.

Nature hath giuen them ſtings to defend themſelves, and offend ſuch as dare aſſaile them, or preſume into their city or hiu: and although they are not of any great corpuſcence, yet notwithstanding they haue vnconquerable corage & prudence. For with the gum of trees, they annoynt the ſuperficies of their hives, to the end, y^e no beaſt or other enemy may enter in at any rift or chinke; and if the paſſage or iſſue be ouer large, they labor diligently to reſtrain and make it leſſe. By which example men are admoniſhed, to be ſtout and courageous for defence of their country, and wiſely to foreſee, that no Vices enter into their Common-wealth, that may infect, corrupt, or poiſon it.

By naturall inſtinct, they are enclined, that each one ſtaies on the firſt flower hee finds, and parts not thence away, vnill he haue taken his reſection and noiſhment: whereof he will diſcharge himſelfe, before he ſeekes out any other. And much they frequent the leaues and flowers of the Olive tree, making there ſom long abiding; ſeruing vs as an example, what ſoberity wee ſhould vie in the courſe of our Life. When they feed on the flowers of the Almond tree, their hony is the more ſauoury and temperate; whereas contrary-wiſe, when they feed on bitter herbes or flowers it is far leſſe ſweet: notwithstanding, it is thinner, very mundificatiue, profitable for the opilations of the Liuer, and good for the dropſie, as alſo to heale the biting of a mad dogge.

Such as haue made triall by experience of theſe creatures, doe iuſtifie, that when their king cannot fly, he is carried abroad by troops of them; and during the time y^e he liueth ſo ſickly, the females are ſeparated from the males. But when he is dead, then they conuerſe together again: which declareth, what pity and piety wee owe to our Prince and countrey, and that men ſhould gladly ſupport and ſuffer for one another. The ſting of the female is ſharper then the males, & there are many males, that haue no ſtings at all. Hereby we may vnderſtand, that the tongues of women are more piercing then mens, & oftentimes cauſe very great inconueniencies in which reſpect, they ſhould be kept ſhort & tempered, that their lawſſy liberty breed no blame and contention among neighbors. The beſt Bee is little, round, cloſely plump benoing in the miſt, and leaſt hairy. Some feed on flowers of the mountaines, others on them of Gardens and huſbanded places: the firſt whereof, are much leſſe then the other, as alſo more ſtrong and robuſt, to endure labor. Beſide, according to Pliny they are of far dreadfuller aſpect, abiding in the rifts of trees, or in ſonic ſmal vaults. And what fairer example can nature afford vs, then of their ſtrength and abilitie? For, ſuch people as are not educated in delicacies, but in continual exerciſes of mind and body, are moſt profitable members for the Common-wealth. Cloſely they ply their worke in their hives, & feed on the ſuperabundance of their Combes, knowing by mere inſtinct of nature, that if they ſhould not do ſo, & giue vigilant attendance: Spiders would get into the hiu, & there kill the. VVhen they haue but ſmal ſtore of hony, the moſt of them keeps the entrance, y^e it may not be taken from them: vnill they are better provided. A worthy preſident to men, to baniſh all ſuperfluous things out of their Common-wealth, leaſt by the meanes of them, the venome of hatred may be bred among the, which may procure the death of one another. And when dearth or ſcarſitie happens in their Cities, vigilancy is needfully required, to preſerue ſuch ſtore as they haue; that it may not bee elſewhere transported, & ſo publike calamity enſue thereon.

There are a kind of Bees which labour not to produce hony, but eate that already made, and they are longer then the other: the good Bees haue continual war with them, to expell them out of their Commonwealth. Signifying to vs, that ſlothfull perſons ſhould be excluded from other mens company: and ſuch as ſeek to feed by others ſweat. Their King neuer flies abroad, but he is attended round with a great company of Bees, and if it ſo happen, that they meet with another flight of Bees, that likewiſe haue their King with them, they leaue their owne, to accompany the new King. And if their owne King contend, to reduce them againe vnder his obedience; they kill him, and follow the other newly made choiſe of, and him they elect as their king. This exceſſe hapneth very ſeldom, & is one of the two imperfections which theſe creatures haue in their government: beſide, it is neceſſarie, that in euery kind there ſhould be ſome vice. If they chance to ſting hard, they put forth the whole length of their ſting; whereon themſelves die withall, becauſe their bowels iſſue out thereby.

Their Kings and Gouvernors ſting but ſildome, although they are thereto provoked; for ſome ſay, that they haue no ſting at all. And Pliny is not certaine, whether they haue any or no: but notwithstanding, he is well aſſured that they ſting not. Neither care they that the king ſhould be ſo armed, provided, that he bee of good government, valiant, & maiſtical: which proueth, that Princes ought to be benign, milde, and patient: neuer to take any delight in cruelty, but rather to be gentle & mercifull. Such is the cleanlines of theſe creatures, that they cannot endure any foule or noiſom ſauour; & therefore when they returne to their Cittie or Caſtle (for ſuch they account their Hiu to be) they diſcharge their bellies in the aire, & many times (through bad ſmelles) they become ſickly, and ſo ſoone as any one of them dyeth, the reſt hurle him out of the Hiu. They grow ſicke alſo thorow idleneſſe, and therefore they will not ſuffer any to bee ſlothfull among them: and the ſnell of boiled fiſh, ſuch as Crewiſes, Lobſters, and Crab-fiſh is deadly to them. An excellent example for men to liue cleane & nearely, free from a vicious life, carefully reſpectiue both their foules and bodies.

The winde is very contrary and hurtfull for them; and therefore when it is great, ſtiſe and boyſterous, the hives ought to be carefully covered. VVhereas they affect in winter, as other creatures do, and in Summer, freſh aires are moſt fitting for them. It is very neceſſary to vie diligence, when the hony is taken from the: becauſe, if ouermuch be taken away, they will labour little; and if more likewiſe be left then is conuenient, they will be the leſſe diligent in making more, & therefore a moderate and reaſonable quantity muſt remain, according to the number whereof they conſiſt. What worthier example to men can there be then this declaring that in the commonwealth, euery thing ought to be moderately meaſured; becauſe ouer-great, pompous, and luxurious dyet, do but deſtroy famous families, abounding in al ſuperfluous things. And yet not to be too niggardly and ſparing in prouiſion needfully required. For as by the firſt children and ſeruaunts may become careleſſe and negligent; ſo by the latter, they may grow wretched and deſperate.

Another diligent care is required in the that make vie of Bees, to witte, that when they heare their great ſwarming noiſe in the hiu, it is a ſignificatio that they would be gone and leaue the hiu: but then if the hiu be gently ſprinkled ouer with ſweete wine, they will not ſtir abroad. Such as keepe them may eaſily take note hereof, becauſe (ordinarily) they make no other noiſe then when they are flying: VVherein we are inſtructed, that by ſweet language and kind behauiour, we may qualify ſterne anger in diſcontented brethren.

Aristotle further ſaith, he did well obſerue it by experience, that their feet before are ſhorter then them behind; which is ſo giuen them by nature, for their eaſier riſing from the ground. He ſaith moreover, that when the hony corrupteth in the hiu, it engendreth certaine wormes, which make webbes like vnto Spiders; whereby they wease sicke, and dye. A very apt example for men, to bee vigilant and respectiue of themselves, that the sweet daies and prosperitie in the world, doe not so corrupt their soules, as to beget the banefull worm of ambition, which is deadly. In moyste times of raines, they multiply greatly, by reason of the humidity: and contrariwise they decrease in the times of drought, thorow want of moisture. Also in Winter, their strength much faileth them, in regard of cold weather, snowes, and windes out of the North; which hindereth their fruitefulness, and therefore they keepe closely hidden. But when the Flowers of Beans begin to sprout, they come abroad to labour: and the first worke they doe at home, is to builde their dwelling houses, next to engender, & then to yeeld honey.

They make three feuerall rampiers before their Combes, as their garde and strength: the first cruft (being vtmost) they make bitter; the second (within) somewhat sweeter; and the third, thickest of al, because it ioyneth next to the Combes; & thus is the foundation of their defence. A good instruction for men, how to shape their building in this worlde, to vse diligence in their prouision, so soone as they can, especially of things necessary; then to marry, for encrease of children, and still to keepe employment in naturall exercises. When they flye forth vpon some vrgent occasions, and are preuented by night, so that they cannot returne home vnto their owne habitation; they sleepe topsie turvy, the vpside downe, because cold mists, fogs and raines should not offend their wings, to hinder their flight home to their owne houses, or execution of their other enterprizes and affaires.

Sentinels they haue of their owne appointment, who make a noise at break of day, by which sound they all awake; and turning themselves on their feete, they make a noise againe to their Sentinels, as a thankfull signe of ioy: but then, vpon another found from the same Sentinels, they are all silent, as attending what instant charge is to be giuen them. Informing our iudgements, in times of warre to bee very vigilant; well prouided, and no way negligent. Excellent experience haue they, when raines and vnseasonable times will ensue, which they foresee by flying abroad in the Euenings, about their owne needfull occasions; and finding it to follow as they feared, they will not by any meanes boudge from home.

They haue (beside) a marvellous order among them; namely, that the youngest Bees flye abroad, and bring home the fooode; the elder sort biding at home, to dresse and prepare it. But that which is yet far more admirable is, that when the young ones arrive, laden with hearbes and flowers laboriously; some of the aged sort do meet them at the entrance, and help to ease them of their burthen. Moreover, such as come to home ouer-charged, seeke the sweetest aires to passe thorow, and where they are calmest: as fearing, least rude winds should make them let fall what they haue carefully gathered, or dry vppe their honey, and therefore they flye lower towards the ground: and such as can bring home no lading, are woont to carrie little stones or grauell, that by the weight of them, they may the better resist impetuous windes.

By this precedent example, yong men are admonished, that they ought to stirre and labour in the Commonwealthe; & the more aged, to preferue the fruits of their paines. Yong men also, that do busie their braines in the blustering of ambition; should take a lower flight, and neerer to the ground, esteeming themselves to bee no more then men: considering vprightly in their soules, that whatsoever benefit ensueth by their paines to the Commonwealthe, they stand bound thereto by obligation. Let no man therefore ouer-ween, or strue to ougo or be aboue other, except his contention be honorable, & that his trauell may most aduance the good of the Commonwealthe.

While thus these poore creatures are laboring abroad, their King abides at home, hauing a strong court of guard about him well armed with their stings, for the defence of his person. He goeth abroad but very sildom, and when it is his pleasure to goe forth, he is (in like manner) royally attended. But whē he wil haue his army abroad to any expedition; three daies before, loud summons is giuen for orderly preparatio. If any troop of them swerue from following him, they find their error, by smelling to the ground where the King hath past, & so pursue in that tract, vntill they ouertake him.

A wonderfull order naturally obserued among them, the young laboring for the elder.

A notable admonition for the better improving of the Commonwealthe.

The absolute foundation of eternall life in the worlde to come.

The chiefest note of incredulity in man.

him. It is to be admired, how highly they are comforted in his presence: for if he be lost by their negligence, the army loofeth it selfe, and then they go to ioyne with another King. Pliny also reporteth, that whē their king dieth, they are so full of anguish and sorrow, that they will neither feed nor flye abroad for any prouision: so that if he be not taken away dead from before thē, they will also dye with greefe and hunger. Tutoring vs heerein, that if strifes & variances happen among vs, they should not last of any continuance: also howe the death of our Prince should be ikefom to vs, because little benefit cometh by changing Gouernours. Thus we perceiue, how many good examples may bee deriued from the Bees Commonwealthe, not vterly vnneccessary for our imitation.

CHAP. XII.

How sinfull and dangerous a thing it is to desire reuelations from the dead, or knowledge of things belonging to future life.

Like as God, who hath created vs without our selues, will not saue vs without our selues: euen so hath he giuen the ground worke of all meanes for our saluation, which is Faith, with hope of all those blessings, which (in the ancient Law) he hath promised, concerning the life to come, which also hee hath reuealed by his owne sonne, and are not to bee obtained without beleefe and hope in him. But humane frailty, or to speake more properly, Faith in man is so weak, that when the glorie which God hath ordained for that life is preached to him, he answeres, he beleeueth it: But yet notwithstanding (faith he) it is a matter of no meane mortuall, that of so many men as haue dyed; not so much as one man is returned back, to tell vs the secrets of that other life.

The very greatest signe of incredulity, that can be in the heart of man (in mine opinion) is this earnest desire, to wish from God a reuelation of the life to come. For seeing that faith consisteth in beleefe, and to hope in such things as are not apparant if they were reuealed to vs: why then faith remaineth no more, and so the singulare meanes of saluation (should be taken from vs I say moreouer, that by such manner of reuelation, not onely should faith bee destroyed, but also it would bee an occasion in vs, whereby to runne into great error against God, as wee may easily prouoe by this argument.

Admit the case, that our father, mother, or brother were raised, and returned again into this world, euen in the same flesh as they parted from vs: and to the end, wee might the more confidently credit them, to be the very same persons, they did eate, drinke, & conuerse with vs (as our blessed Saviour of the world did with his Apostles, to auoid all scruple of doubt, that they were not shadowes or phantasmes) they reuealing to vs, matters belonging to that concealed life: no doubt need to be made but wee would listen, and verily beleue whatsoever they said to bee true. If this were so, all were but man, hauing a bodie and a soul, and we beleue him, whom we credit to be but a man, who is a liar by nature. Hereon then it followeth, that in giuing faith to him, we shal shew our selues rather to beleue a man, naturally a Liar; then God, who is the fouraigene truth indeed, and cannot lie, but hath oftentimes repeated to vs, what rewarde is prepared for the good, and what punishment for the wicked.

I thinke then, there is no man, but he wil confesse it a grieuous sinne, if hee should lend faith to a reuelation, desired by a reched man, to beleue the creature, rather then the Creator. Let no man then couet that which may redound to his own damnation; considering, what God hath bestowed vpon him, and also what is denied for his saluation, when hee may helpe to worke it with feare and trembling. If all are tyed to this conclusion, so much the more it belongeth to a Christian, whom our Saviour hath taught to beleue, whatsoever hee hath reuealed in the Scripture, And faith in the Parable of the Glutton; that to know heavenly things, wee haue the Lawe and the Prophets to instruct vs sufficiently.

An argument to approue the inutilly of the matter alledged of reuelations by the dead.

God onely is true, & all men liars.

The creature ought not to be beleued, but the Creator onely.

CHAP. XIII.

Of a Disputation made in Antioche, in the presence of King Ptolomy, by seuen severall Ambassadors, to know, which of their kingdomes had the best Lawes and Customes.

Ing Ptolomy being at Antioche, Ambassadors from the Romanes, Carthaginians, Sicilians, Rhodians, Athenians, Lacedemonians, & Sicyonians, came thither vpon seuerall occasions to him. And sitting at supper with the King, a disputation chaunced to be moued, concerning the condition of their Countries and Common-weales, which of them was best policied, and provided of good Lawes and commendable Customes. The dispute was long debated & maintained among them, being defended with good and sufficient reasons. Whereuppon, King Ptolomy, being desirous to be resolu'd in the truth, comma'd each man to speake the customes in their kingdomes: whereby might best be discerned, which of the Prouinces merited most to be commended.

The Ambassador for the Romanes first began, and answered in this manner. We hold our Temples in great and reuerent respect; wee are obedient to our Gouvernours; and greuously we punish wicked and lewd liuers.

He for Carthage next spake, saying. In the Common-wealth of Carthage, our Noblemen fight for vs; our Plebeians & Mechanicks labour for vs; and our Philosophers instruct vs.

He for the Sicilians, said. In our Common-wealth, Iustice is intirely kept; our Negotiations are truly managed, and all liue equally together.

Hee for the Rhodians, saide. In our Common-wealth, our olde men are honest; our young men bashfully modest; and our women liue solitarily, vsing but few words.

The Athenian Ambassador saide. In our Common-wealth, we neuer consent, that rich men shall be partiall, poore men idle, nor our Gouvernours ignorant.

He for the Lacedemonians, said. In our Common-wealth, enuy cannot reigne, because we are all equally nor auarice, because all our goods are in common; nor idlenesse, because all labour.

In our common-wealth (saide the Ambassador for the Sicyonians) wee permit none to voyage forth abroad, because at his returning home, hee shal not teach & instruct vs in matters of nouelties; neither do we suffer Phylitians, who may kill our healthfull men; nor do we allow Orators, because we couet not quarrelling causes.

When King Ptolomy had heard all the seuen Ambassadors, he highly commended all their kingdomes; affirming, that they were all well and iustly gouerned. That each of them had good Customes, worthily deseruing commendation: and that it was hard for him to iudge, which of them was best ruled and ordered. So the Ambassadors taking their leaue of the King, returned home vnto their severall countries, very ioyful and contented, that the king had dealt with them so graciously in iudgement.

Of a very proud and sumptuous Temple (dedicated to Venus) in the City of Corinth, in the service whereof, were five hundred Ladies: And of the answer of an Abbessse to a great Lord.

In Corinth, the principall City of Achaia, liued a tyrant, famous for wealth & vicious life, surnamed Hieron, who caused a sumptuous Temple to be built in the midst of the City, in the manner of a Monastery, & dedicated it to the Goddesse Venus. In this abominable Temple, were more then 100. young Ladies & Gentlewomen of Asia, whom their fathers there offred to the Goddesse Venus, and to her service: so that such of them as were most wanton and lasciuious, were held in greatest estimation, and reputed to be most holie and religious. It was not lawfull for any of them to go out of the Temple; but each one might there sinne, and please her selfe with such as shee best liked, and as often as shee would: so that all their Religion consisted not in being honest and virtuous maydens, but they had power to doe what they pleased.

Among them was an other Lawe also, that if any of them had a mind to marrie, shee must gaine or winne her dowrie, by the infamy of her body, which was permitted that she might so doe. Moreover, that beside her husband, she might haue an amorous friend: for, in being dedicated to the goddesse of Loue, they intended, not to loose the name of Wanton and Amorous. And no married wife or widdow, might offer in this Temple, but onely virgines. And such as were so unhappy, or wretched in fortune, to come and offer their Oblations there: before a yeare was expired, became a the duell in this hellish sanctuarie; and, of a chaste virgin, a shamelesse and lasciuious strumpet.

All such as had admittance there, were expert in reading, writing, singing, playing on instruments, and dancing. VVherby men were allured thither extraordinarily, and it was no shame for them to be scene there.

The like Temples are (at this day to be scene) in the Portugall Indies, in the Prouinces of Iappon, where there are aboute eight hundred Monasteries, the least of which hath more then thirtie Nunnes in it, called there Bonzes; whereof there are two sorts: one clothed in blacke, the other in lighter colours.

It is a common fame in those Countries, that these Bonzes doe feede on a certayne hearbe, to auoyde conceiuing with childe: but if conception can not be prevented, then they eate another hearbe, to destroy the infant conceived. They instruct yong maydens in reading, and such is the foolishnesse of the people, to credit verily, that they can deliuer the soules of their deceased parents from Hell; and therefore (in that respect) they are greatly honoured and reuerenced.

We our selues in these dayes (almost monstrous and miserable) neede not trauaile so farre off, to find out Monasteries, where Religious women or Nunnes (if wee may tearme them Religious) lead their liues as lewdly and dissolutely, whereof themselves make no other concealment, but that all commers and goers, finde there exceeding kinde wellcome. Which ensteth by ouer-much libertie & ydlenesse, or else, by being placed there by their parents, contrary to their owne liking. But the good and virtuously disposed (whereof there are many) are not comprehended amongst these deboshed women: And as for the voluptuous and immodest, they regarde not who knows their loosenesse, and may well fay of them selues, as an Abbessse did, of whom Nicholas Boyerius maketh mention in his Decisions. She had fortie Nunnes vnder her charge, and there belonged to that Monastery twenty Priests.

It came to passe, that a Prince, whose predecessours had founded that Monastery, passing that way, and visiting the Religious companies: found all (else where) in good order, except the number of Priests, and these Nunnes, whose number he thought not well ordain'd; whereupon hee sayde to the Abbessse. Truly Madam, me thinkes, that in stead of fourty Nunnes, fortie Priests had bene better appoynted, and twenty Nunnes onlie had bene sufficient. My Lord (quoth she) perhaps the order is not so ill contriued, as you imagine it to be, neither is it to be condemned: for, of the fortie Nuns heere appoynted, twenty are for the twentie Priests; and the other twenty serue for all comers and goers.

CHAP. XV.

Of the Oracle of Apollo in the Isle of Delphos, the Originall thereof, and upon what occasion it came.

AHe most renowned Oracle long since in Asia, was that of Apollo in the Ile of Delphos, whither resorted infinite persons, and from all parts of the world: offering there great gifts, and consulting on especial matters, because because more answers were returned thence, then from all other Oracles. At the first, there was a deepe, crooked, winding caue or ditch, out of which issued a winde, that blew extremely at the mouth or entrance; thereon was seated a young Virgine, dedicated to Apollo, that gave answer to all things demaunded of her. This winde was the diuell, who blew into her eares; and before the Temple was builded in Delphos, a she-Goat descending downe into that caue or ditch, became suddenly filled with a diuine Spirit, daunsing, skipping and leaping for ioy, as the like had neuer bin seene before. Whereat the Goate-heard wondering, followed her downe into the caue, and beggan to fore-tell of things to come. Many more beilde made prooffe in the same maner; so that whosoever would know what was to ensue, must put his head into the entrance of the caue.

But in the end, this could not be doone without danger, and losse of many persons: whereupon a Temple was erected to Apollo the Diuiner, and the Priest named Pythia, who made choice of a Virgine, to be plac'd on the Tripos: whereof Lactantius the Grammarian speaketh thus, interpreting this Verse of Achilles Statius, in his first Booke of his Troicks.

Salve priscas fides Tripodum.

Tripos (saith he) species est lauristribus radicibus, Apollini consecrata, propter vim diuinationis. Lamblichus, in his booke of the Aegyptian Mysteries, saith; Sylla, in Delphis duobus modis suscipiebat Deum, vel per spiritum quandam tamen yncumque, qui erumpebat alicubi ex ore atri cuiusdam, vel sedem in aethra super sedem anciam, habentem tres aut quatuor pedes, & pro dictam. The Virgine that was the Organe of Apollo, sitting on the Tripos, held a Rod in her hand, and was crowned with a greene Chaplet of Laurell.

Many other Oracles there were in diuers other places. Liber was the Oracle of the Sicilians; Ceres, that of the Rhodians; Diana, of the Ephesians; Berecintia, of the Romaines; Belus, of the Ruthinians; Jupiter, of the Numidians; Venus, of the Troicks and Cyprians; and many others; in whom poore abused Idolaters repofed all their confidence, rendering to them the Vowes and Sacrifices, albeit utterly in vaine. For, the answers of these Oracles, were nothing else but ydle imaginations, and mere fables proceeding from the diuell, the father of lies. And by good right were such abuses and superstitions condemned; by them that had knowledge of our true eternall God; as David, Baruch, and other holy men, who detested such Idolls and Images of the Gentiles, made of golde, siluer, stone, wood, and other matter, and by the hand of man.

CHAP. XVI.

What care our Elders had in ancient times, concerning the performance of their Sacrifices.

Ancient custome (good and commendable) hath euer more bene, not onlie on the behaile of Christians, but also amongst the Eshnickes: in acknowledging the benefite they received from God; nor by wordes alone, but also by effects and exterior Sacrifices. So that there is no Nation so barbarous, but hath confessed his God, by some outward signe. And the Roman Senate did alwayes holde Religion in veneration, that so often as they met together (as Parro reporteth.) Although they had affaires of great importance, and which required haste diligence: yet the first thing that they propounded to themselves (before decision of any doubts) was religious humiliation to their gods.

At all times, and whensoever the Romaine Consuls or Emperours should go forth to warre, they neuer would prepare for the field, till they had first sacrificed to their gods, saying; All felicitie and prosperitie proceeded from them. And Marcus Aurelius saith; They helde it for an infallible rule, that there can be nothing perfect among mortall men, except it bee perfected by God. Lycurgus, the auncient Law-maker of the Lacedemonians, among other Lawes, ordaind; That no man should be so bolde to seke for fauor from a Prince, except he were knowne to serue the Gods diligently. Nor do fallacie these examples, as intending to confirme my saying by Pagans and Idolaters: but onely to make vs blush with shame, by seeing how farre they exceeded vs in pietie and religion.

For,

For, if wee would reade Histories, we should finde, that Gentiles and Pagans sought carefully, to recouer all their necessities from the gods.

In the time of Quintus Fabius and Publius Decius, they warring against the Sannites and Hetrurians, the Roman Matrons performed wonderfull things, neuer ceasing day and night, in offering great Sacrifices to the gods, saying: If they were once appeased, they needed not to stand in feare of their enemies.

But leaue we Idolaters, and let vs seeke what the auncient children of God did, who at all times, and whensoever they were afflicted, had their recourse to Sacrifices, when they would expresse their thankfulness to Almighty God, for benefices received. Noah, after hee came forth of the Ark, erected an Altare, sacrificed thereon, and the sacrifice was so acceptable to God, that he promised him, neuer more to drowne the world agayne.

Good Jacob, being gone from the house of Laban, to giue thanks to God, built an Altare, which hee consecrated to God. The children of Israel, being afflicted in the wilderness, sayd; Let vs go on for three dayes, and afterward wee will sacrifice vnto our God.

We reade in Esdas, that after the children of Israel were returned, to re-edifie their Temple, that they might sacrifice to God; they were so carefull, that building with one hand, they helde their weapons in the other, to defend them from their enemies.

In Leuiticus, mention is made of innumerable Sacrifices, whereby God pardoned offences committed. Hereupon Daniel being in the captiuitie of Babylon, and seeing the Sacrifices to be forsaken, sayd; In these times, there is heere neither Prince, Governour, nor Prophet, nor Holocaust, nor Sacrifice, nor Oblation, nor Incense, nor place to offer our First-fruits on before thee: Reueine therefore vs, with our soules broken, and our spirits cast downe. Elias also, lamented grieuouly, because the Altars were ouerthrowne, and in his earnest zeale to God, vnable to suffer such ruine, desired to die. For without all doubt, nothing is more miserable, then when the seruice of Almighty God is despised, and where it faileth, a punishment from God surely followeth.

Aaron sonnes, Nadab and Abihu, were consumed with fire from heauen, before all the people; because they offered not the Lawe ordained for the Sacrifices. King Balthasar, prophaning the vessels of gold and siluer, dedicated to the Temples seruice, to serue his wiues & concubines for drinking therein at his Table: diuinely sawe a Hand writing on the wall, foretelling his neere approaching ruine; so that he was taken by his enemies, and slayne the same instant. Achab, hauing prophaned the holy place, erected a Temple to the Idoll Baal: but afterwards, going against the Syrians, he was slayne with an Arrow shot from a bowe.

The Records of Histories doe also tell vs, that Pompey, hauing made a Stable of Gods Temple, after hee had robbed, ransacked, & spoiled Ierusalem, became thereby so abominable to GOD, that thence forward he was most vnfortunate. And although hee had before vanquished two and twentie Kings, yet at the last, himselfe was miserably overcome. The sonne of Darius was so proude and presumptuous, that hee would not onely abuse men, but euen the gods also, and sent foure thousand men to beate downe the Temple of Apollo: but to great a hayle and tempest fell from Heauen, that destroyed them euery man. For this cause, the good Emperour Marcus Aurelius, writing a Letter to the King of Trinacria, reprooued him greatly, because he had beate downe a moiety of the temple, to enlarge his house. Thou thinkest (quoth he) that the stones and mortar, wherewith the Temple was built, to be of small value: it is very true: but the Gods to whom they are dedicated, are most mightie. I wish therefore if thou wouldst haue peace with the Romaines, (hauing scandalized Rome, and grieved the Senate) that thou shouldst take as much of thy house to enlarge the Temple, as thou hast taken from it, and build it a great deale higher, and wider then it was; and then thou shalt be happy, in taking nothing from the house of the Gods, but rather that they possesse part of thine.

The Athenians, who were alwayes conquered by the Lacedemonians, in many ways which they haue had together: complained to their God, because they had exceeded in their Sacrifices to him, farre beyond those of the Lacedemonians. But the Oracle of Iupiter made them answer thus:

¶ Of diuers and sundry opinions of the Philosophers, concerning the state of the soule in the body of Man; And a contrarie coniecture of the Platonists.

Plato and Democritus say, That the state of the Soule is in the head. Straton the Philosopher limiteth it; Betweene the eyebrows. Erasistratus within the skinnie or filme of the Braine. Heraclitus placeth it, in the outward agitation. Mofchion giues it place, throughout all the bodie. Xenocrates, in the crowne of the head. Parmenides, Epicurus, the Stoicks and Egyptians, lodge it wholly in the heart: as the like doth Orpheus. Xerxes, King of Persia, thought it to be in the eares. Empedocles, in the heape or pile of the blond. Philo the Iew, in his Booke of Allegories of the Lawe, saith thus. The reasonable facultie or part of the soule, is in the head; the irascible, in the heart, and the concupiscible, in the groin, or lower part of the belly.

But we Christians, hold it to be in the heart, whence proceedeth good and euill cogitations. Saint Augustine in his booke concerning the knowledge of true Life, writeth thus; The Soule is dispersed throughout all the body, and keepeth wholly in euery part thereof. Very true it is (sayth he also) that is yeeldeth far greater effects and actions, in some one place, then other: either by the will, which in that place sendeth out his strength; or else by those instruments, proper and commodious for action.

The Platonists say, That the Soule descendeth by Cancer, and mounteth agayne by Capricorne; and I thinke, that from hence they ground this coniecture; Because Cancer is the house of the Moone, the vertue whereof gouerneth ouer the vegetable parts, it viuifieth the body; And Capricorne is the house of Saturne, which preisdeth for contemplation, whereto the Soule being freed from the body it may walke at libertie.

CHAP. XVIII.

¶ How men ought to shunne and auoyde Curiofitie; And what penalties and punishments were appointed by our Auncients, for curious people.

THE Athenians had a Lawe, which was well obserued among them; whereby euery man was forbidden (of what degree or qualitie fouer he were) that hee should not dare, to enquire of any stranger, newly arrived in their Citie: from whence he came, what hee was, nor what he fought for; vnder penaltie for him that demanded such questions, to be well whipt with rodde, and banished his Countrey. The end for which our graue Auncients made such Lawes, was, to keepe men from the vice of curiofitie; which is alwayes ouer-ready, to pricke into other mens affaires, and be regardless of their owne.

Plutarch, Aulus Gellius and Pliny doe thinke, that they can neuer sufficiently commend Marcus Porcius the Romaine, because no man did euer heare him, to enquire what newes were at Rome; nor how the people liued in their houses. His talke alwayes was, of such things as hee knew was profitable for the Common-wealth, or else fitted such demands as required necessary answer. Plato, writing of Dionysius the Syracusan, speaketh thus: The curious man, that would know the life and actions of another man; is more friend to his enemies, then to himselfe. For, hee will quickly bestirre his tongue, in talking of his enemy, and what harme hee knoweth by him; but neuer cares what foule offences himselfe hath committed.

A King of Sparta requested Pindarus to tell him, what was the most difficult thing for a man to doe? Whereunto Pindarus thus replied; Nothing is more easie for a man, then to reprove an other, nor more difficult selfe, then to endure reprehension in himselfe.

Penethes, who among the Thebans was a Philosopher much renowned, could neuer be numbred among the curious, nor condemned with the malicious. He hauing liued as a Philosopher, for the space of thirtie yeares, in the Academies of Thebes; being blamed by some, because hee did not reprehend the finnes which hee sawe committed, answered: When I know that I haue no sinne in my selfe, then will I beginne to reprove sinne in other.

Plato departing from Sicilie, for his returne to Greece, and taking his leaue of Dionysius, the King spake thus vnto him. Alter thou comest among the Philosophers of Greece: O how ill wilt thou speak of me, and of my tyranny? Plato answered; Doubt not (Dionysius) what I shall speake of thee in the hearing of Philosophers: for their manners are so vertuous, and themselves so employed in their studies; that they haue no time to heare idle talke. Moreouer he sayd; Know, O Dionysius, if thou beest ignorant, that such is the height of our Philosophie, as to perswade and counsell men. Then euery one should iudge himselfe, and not to busie his brains, to defame or reprove the liues of other.

Philippides, who was the first inuenter of Comedies, being a great friend to king Lyfimachus; the King conuersing with him vpon a day, sayd; What dost thou desire of me (O Philippides) and I will freely graunt it thee, whatsoeuer thou requirest? The greatest grace (quoth Philippides, that thou canst giue me, is, neuer to acquaint mee with any of thy secrets. O wise and worthy answer! read by many, and vnderstood of few: For, if this Philosopher would not know the secrets of a King, much lesse would hee vnderstand them of his neighbours.

CHAP. XIX.

¶ Of the three Conquests of England, by the Saxons, Danes and Normans; occasioned by the finnes, either of the Princes, or of the People, or of both.

If wee consider the three diuerse Conquests of England, since it receyued the Christian faith, and the state thereof at the same time, together with the iudgement and testimony of the grauest Authors that haue written thereof; we shall easily see, that the same haue proceeded of no other cause, but by the finnes of the Princes, or of the People, or of both. For, although the infirmities of man is such, as there neuer wanteth matter for Gods Iustice to punish in Common-wealths (by reason whereof, we see, that in all Countries, the people are scourged more or lesse from time to time, not onely particularly euery one in his owne person, with misadventures, sicknesse, losse of goods, death of children, and such like, but also generally, with plagues, famine, inundations and warres) yet the subuersion of Common-wealths neuer chaunceth, but for some great excess of sinne, eyther in the Prince, or in the People, or in both: And commonly, after many warnings & admonitions giuen by gentle and sweete corrections. Such being the longanimity and patience of Almighty God, that he layeth the Axe at the foote of the tree, long before he cutteth it downe, and trieth all means to cure the sores of his seruants, by lenities and fomentations, rather then by cauterisings and incisions, or by cutting off the infected member, which hee neuer doth, but when there is no other remedy.

This course (we see) hee helde with his owne people, for, though hee often chastised them with famine, pestilence, inundations of enemies, and ciuile wars: yet (after a while) hee euer restored them to tranquillitie, plentie and peace, vntill they prouoed so incorrigible, that the Prophet Ieremi in the second chapter, and the thirtieth verse, lamented, in the person of God, that all his Fatherly corrections were lost vpon them, saying: Frustra percussisti filios vestros: I haue beaten and chastised your children in vaine. And againe, the foresayd Prophet in the fifth chapter and in the third verse, saith to Almighty God; Percussisti eos, &c. Thou hast beaten them (O Lord) and they haue not bene forie; thou hast consumed them, and they haue refused to receiue correction. As who would say, there is no other remedy left, but reprobation, subuersion, and vtter extirpation of them. And therefore Almighty God

And afterward also, the other two Tribes in Juda, were carried into captiuitie by Nabuchadonisor king of Babylon, where they remained three score and ten yeares. And though they were afterwards restored to their Countrey, and their Temple re-edified; yet at length they were (for their extreme ingratitude, and peruerse obstinacie) vterly ruined.

The like proceeding Almighty God vied with England, in the time of the Brittaines, after they recyued the Christian Faith; for he chastised them, sometimes with dearth and famine, sometimes with pestilence, and other-whiles with incursions of their enemies, and with ciuill warres amongst themselves: so long as the same sufficed to reduce them vnto repentance, and amendment of their sinfull liues, as sometimes it did; which their famous Countrey-man Beda, and ancient Gildas called, the Sage, doe testifie: Declaring, that the Brittaines, being partly driuen by famine, and partly by inuasion of Scottes, and Pictes, eyther to abandon the Countrey, or to hide themselves in the Mountaines, Woods, and Caues; crated helpe and succour of the Romaines; writing vnto them that lamentable Epistle, whereof Gildas maketh mention; in the which they sayd: Our barbarous enemies doe driue vs to the Sea, and the Sea doth driue vs backe to them agayne: so that of two kindes of death we haue our choice; that is to say, Whether we will haue our throates cut, or else be drowned. Thus wrote they to the Romaines.

But being not succoured by them, by reason of their great warres at the same time with Attila, they beganne to haue recourse to the mercie of God, and to relie wholly vpon his helpe (as the foresayd Authors haue reported) and so (with his assistance) assayed their enemies out of the Caues and Woods where they lay hidden, and not onely gaue vnto them great ouerthrowes, but also droue them out of the Countrey; and shortly after had such plenty of corne, fruite, and all kinde of victualles, that the like had neuer beene seene, nor heard of before in many ages. Whereuppon followed the effect, which Moses noted and lamented in the children of Israel, Deuteronomie the one and thirtie chapter and the three and twentieth verse; Incrassatus est dilectus (sayeth hee) & recalcitruuit: The beloued people of God was made fatte, and then they beganne to kicke: that is to say, (as hee expoundeth it euen presently after) Incrassatus, impinguitus, dilatus dereliquit Deum factorem suum. Being become faire and fatte, they forsooke their God and Creator; so fell it out with the Brittaines.

For, they proued so vngratefull for Gods great mercy towards them, that (as the foresaid Authors doe asseme) they fell into the extremities of all mischiefe and wickednesse. Non solum secularis viri, &c. Not onely Secular men, but also the Ecclesiasticall; giuing themselves wholly to drunkennesse, to animosity and contention, enuy, cruelty, hatred of truth, loue of lies, and all vice. Wherevpon our Lord scourged them with such a pestilent mortalitie, that (within but a while) there were not men enow aliue (as these Authors testifie) to burie the dead.

And when that sufficed not to reuoke them from their vicious liues; Non multo post (saith Beda) acrior gentem peccuricem vltio diri sceleris secuta est. Shortly after, a sharper punishment of such detestable wickednesse followed vpon that sinfull people. For the Pictes and Scots beganne againe to make such irruptions vpon them, that (not being able to withstand them) they were forced to call in the Saxons to assist them. Quod Domini nutu (saith Beda) dispositum esse constat, &c. Which it is manifest was done by Gods disposition, to the end that their wickednes might receiue due punishment. For, within a while, the Saxons did confederate themselves with their enemies, and picking quarrells against them, destroyed all the Countrey with fire and sword, burning vp houses, villages, and townes, and killing all sortes of people: insomuch, that many fledde into forraigne Countries, and others hid themselves amongst the hilles, mountaines and wooddes, vntill acknowledging the iust iudgement of Almighty God vpon them, they called to him him for mercie. Vnanimis consensu auxilium celeste precante; Craving helpe from Heauen with vniforme consent, where-with Gods mercie was moued to giue them Ambrosius Aurelianus for their captaine, and diuerse notable victories, by his meanes. And especially at Blackmore in Yorkseshire (for so was called Mons Badonicus, as saith Polydore Virgil in his third booke) where they made such great slaughter of them: as that (for some certayne yeares) they did not further molest them.

For, beeing (as Gildas in his booke De Excidiis Britann. reporteth) vnindful of their former calamities, and of afflictions laid on them for their finnes: all sortes of men spirituall and temporall, as well the Princes as their subiects, did euerie one their dutie in his vocation. At illi (saith Gildas) decidentibus, &c. But they being dead, and another Age succeeding, ignorant of the miseries past, and corrupted with present ease and pleasure; All trueth and iustice was so subuerted: that there appeared not so much as aie light thereof, in all the foresaid states of men; Exceptis paucis, & valde paucis, Excepting a few, and those very few. For, the kings (saith he) were Tyrants, the Iudges most wicked and corrupt; the Priests negligent of their dutie. Raro sacrificantes, & nunquam puro corde inter altaria stantes; Seldome sacrificating, and neuer comming to the Altar with a pure heart. Ignorant, impudent, simoniackall, lasciuious; and all sortes of Lay men loaden with wickednesse, with murder, parricides, pride, adulteries, swearing, periuries, blasphemies, and all kindes of iniquitie.

And now to shew some particularities of this, and how iustly the vengeance of Almighty GOD was powred out vpon the whole Kingdome: The same Authour, in the place before cited, toucheth briefly the liues of some of the Kings and Princes, which liued in his time: as of Constantinus, Aurelius, Conanus, Vortiporius, Cuneglasius and Maglocunus, taxing them with tyrannie, periurie, sacrilegious murders, and parricides (committed euen before holy Altars) adulteries, horrible incests, breach of vowes, of religion and chastitie; yea, and two of them with beastly Sodomic.

For the which enormities, and the generall corruption and wickednesse of the whole Kingdome, hee threatneth, or rather prophesieth vnto them, vnto ruine and destruction; which (shortly after) worthily fell vpon them, as the Brittish Chronicles by Geoffrey of Monmouth in the twelfth booke of his Historie and the fifteenth chapter, also acknowledged: For hee sayth, That King Cadwallader (who was the last of the Brittaines Race) vied these wordes, as hee fledde by Sea into France, with the reliques of the Brittaines nation; Va nobis peccatoribus ob immunia scelera nostra, &c. Voe bee to vs sinners, for our grievous sins, wherewith we neuer ceased to offend God, while we had time of repentance; and therefore now the punishment of God fallles vpon vs, which roots vs out of our native soile. Thus said K. Cadwallader, and more to that purpose.

Afterward hapned the inuasion of the Danes, who first by piracies, & after by open warres, cruelly infested & troubled the realme at sundry times, for the space of almost 200. yeares. But the good king Alured, or Alfred, Founder of the famous Vniuersity of Oxford, recovered all formerly lost, & droue the Danes out of England: except such as were content to become Christians, to whom he gaue the kingdomes of Northumberland, and of the East-Angles, who, during his time, neuer moued warre. And they of the Easterne parts, stirring afterward against his sonne, called Edward, were by him vterly ouerthrowne; as also the other in Northumberland, in like manner, and vpon the like occasion, were subdued by his Grandchilde Aelfsane, who made England a Monarchie, which so remained and flourished without further infestation of the Danes, during the reigne of four kings, the successors of Aelfsane; to wit, his two brethren, Edmond and Eldred (who succeeded one another) and the two sons of Edmond, called Edwin and Edgar, which Edgar was (for his excellent vertues, and prosperous reigne) called Honor & delicia Anglorum. The honour and delight of England: or, as Ingluphus tearmeth him, Honor & Regum: The Honour and Rofe of Kings.

Of whom it is written, that in his time, all Ecclesiasticall Orders flourished, learned and vertuous men were highly esteemed, all ciuill and forraigne warres ceased, and he was called the King of Albion, being no lesse powerfull by Sea, then by Land. No yeare of his reigne passed, wherein hee built not a Monasterie, or else did some great and notable good to his Country: And such were his vertues, and great fame for felicity, that there came principall men from out of all the Countries adioyning, to seee, and be acquainted with him.

Now, whereas the Danes returned againe into England, shortly after Edgar, in the reigne of his sonne Etheldred; and not onely molested it with incursions (as they were wont) but also conquered and possessed it for a time: it may well be presumed, that they were but the instruments of Gods iustice therein; and that this conquest made by the Danes, proceeded of the sinnes, partly of the famous King Edgar (though hee were dead before) and partly of his wife Alfreda; and lastly, of their sonne Etheldred, in whose time the Country was conquered. For, although King Edgar excelled in all pietie and vertue in his latter dayes; yet hee did an acte in his youth, whereof it may be thought, that his children and posteritie payed the penaltie.

This I say, for that after the death of Alfreda his wife (by whom hee had King Edward the Martyr) hee fell in love with Alfreda, wife to a Noble man called Ethelwoolfe, whom (with her consent) hee caused to be killed, to the end he might marry her. How grievous this sinne was in the sight of Almighty GOD, and how iustly punished in his posteritie, wee may well iudge by the like offence of King David, who, to the end he might marry Bathsheba, procured the death of Urias her husband, for the which, the Prophet Nathan, in the second booke of the Kings, chapter twelue, verse ten, told him from Almighty God; that the sword should neuer depart from his house; and that his sonne in the Cradle, should die therefore. Beside, Almighty God permitted (for punishment of that sinne) that all his other children (except Salomon) died most unfortunately. For Amnon, having deflowered his sister Tamar, was killed by his brother Achislon; and Adonias by Salomon; and lastly, Abislon rebelling and fighting against his owne father King David, was miserably slaine, hanging on a tree by the haire of the head. And therefore no maruell, that the like sinne of King Edgar, was also severely punished in his children.

To this purpose, it is to be noted, that his marriage prooued most vnfortunate, not only to the fruit that proceeded thereof, and the whole Realme (as shall be declared hereafter) but also to King Edgar, his sonne by his former wife, who shortly after was killed, by the meanes of Alfreda his stepmother, for the aduancement of her sonne Etheldred. Wherein I cannot but note (by the way) the severity of Gods Iustice in punishing sinne, seeing the sayd young Prince, being very holy and innocent of life, could not escape the temporal punishment, due to his Fathers offence.

But to proceede, such was the common opinion of the innocencie and holynesse of this young King Edward, and enormitie of the sinne committed by Alfreda, in the murder of him: that the conceit of most men at that time was (as William of Malmesburie witnesseth) that the Conquest of England by the Danes, was a punishment of God for the same; which wee may be presumed, especially if we adde thereunto the offence, not onely of his father (whereof I haue already spoken) but also of his brother Etheldred, for whose cause hee was murdered; and in whose time that Conquest hapned. For it may be thought most consonant to the Iustice of Almighty God, that Etheldred (being the sonne of the wicked Alfreda, and fruit of the cursed marriage; yea, and withall, most wicked of himselfe) should beare the penaltie as well of his owne, as of both his parents sinnes: As partly was foretold at his coronation, by Dunstan then Archbishop of Canterbury, saying: That for his Mothers sin in the murder of King Edward, both hee and his children should bee severely punished, and his Kingdome transferred to strangers.

And if wee doe consider the manner of his life, and the nature and qualitie of his offences; we shall find them to be the very same, which the Scriptures ascribe to be the cause of the translation of Kingdoms from one nation to another, whereof Ecclesiasticus saith: Regnum de gente in gentem transfertur, &c. Kingdoms are transferred from one nation to another, because of iniustice, iniuries, calumniationes and diuers deceits. In which kinde of sinnes sinnes King Etheldred greatly exceeded; for hee had his eares so open, and shewed such fauour to all kinde of accusers and calumniators; that (as Polydore Virgil saith) No mans life was in securitie. Besides, on euery light occasion, spoyld & banished the richest and wealthiest of his subiects, becoming also addicted to all kinde of riot and dissolutiō. And therefore William of Malmesburie writeth of him briefly thus: Eius vita cursus sanus in principio, miser in medio, turpis in exitu: The course of his life was cruell in the beginning, miserable in the middle, and shamefull in the end.

Furthermore, he was so cowardly and base minded, that hee was no lesse contemptible to strangers abroad, then hateful to his owne subiects at home. Whereupon, the Danes tooke courage to enter England againe, who made him graunt them a yearly tribute, wherewith they were content for a time; and after turning thither agayne, forced him to flee into Normandie, and to leaue his kingdome to Sveno their King, who exercised all kinde of crueltie vpon the English, and enioyed the Kingdome as long as hee liued. Which was not past five yeares. After whose death, Etheldred recovered it againe, and possessed it two yeares, whilest Canutus sonne to Sveno was held busied at home, with a rebellion of the people of Normandie.

In which meane while, Etheldred returned like the dogge to his olde vomite of cruelty and iniustice, especially against the Danes (who had bene for some yeares planted and marrowed in England) causing many of them to be killed with cruell torments. And amongst others, Sigifredus and Morgandus, two of the noblest of them) were falsly accused of fained crimes, and put to death for the same. Besides, Prince Edmund sonne to Etheldred, rauished the wife of Sigifred, being a woman no lesse admirable for her beautie, then commendable for her chastitie. All which when Canutus vnderstood, being moued with desire, as well to reuenge these iniuries done to his Countrey men, as also to recover the Kingdome of England, conquered by his father: hee passed ouer thither with an Armie, and put all to fire and sword, whereupon Etheldred dyed with sorrow.

And although his sonne, surnamed Ironside (after diuers conflicts, and a combatch fought hand to hand with Canutus) possessed the one half of England by composition: yet within a yeare, Canutus enioyed the whole by the foudaine death of Edmund, slaine vpon a priuy as he was eating himselfe; and so hee remayned absolute King thereof as long as hee did liue, which was about some twentie yeares after.

Herein neuertheless it is to be noted, how the mercie of Almighty God concurred with his Iustice, and moderated the rigour thereof; for that (of his infinite bounty) he determined by this conquest, as it seemed, rather to chastise, correct and redresse England, then to ruine and oppress it. And therefore, after hee had somewhat satisfied the severity of his iustice, not onely vpon the Realme, by the five yeares cruell reigne of Sveno (who ransacked and spoyled all sorts of men, as well Ecclesiasticall as Temporall) but also vpon the persons of Etheldred, and his sonne Edmund: hee gaue them Canutus, sonne to Sveno, for their King, who, although he was a stranger, yet gouerned with all clemencie and good example of life, doing continually actes of pietie, making good Lawes and wholesome, easing the people of taxes and impositions, and deferringe well of all estates, by the meanes whereof England flourished (in his time) in peace and much plentie. Of whom I can not forbear (this occasion being offered) to expresse and declare heere (by the way) a notable acte, which I with all Princes would well weigh and consider, in the height of their prosperity and greatest fortune.

It chanced once, as he was walking at Southampton, by the Sea side, some of his noble men flattered him, and extolled (as a bouen measure) his great power, calling him the most mightie and potent King of all Kings, commanding absolutely ouer men, land & sea. Whereupon, to correct their flatterie, and to shew mans infirmity, he went to the very Sea side, and sitting downe, said to the waues (as the tide was coming in.) I command you, that you touch not my feete. And being presently after well washed with a waue that came in vpon him; hee arose, and turning himselfe to his noblemen, said vnto them

Historie War-
li. 6.

Loe my Lords, you call me King of Kings, and a Lord of Land and Sea; though I cannot command one of these little waues: Therefore know yee, that the King of Kings, and hee that commandeth Land and Sea, is the Father of our Lord Iesus Christ, by whose will and providence all things were governed. And having thus saide, hee returned to Winchester, and tooke the Crowne which he vsed to weare vpon his head, and put it (with his owne hands) vpon an Image of CHRIST crucified, which was in the Church of Saint Peter and Saint Paule, and would neuer after weare any crowne so long as he liued.

Though this may seeme a digression from my matter, yet I thought good to recount it heere, as well for the raritie of the example; as also that it may appeare, how mercifully God dealt with the people of England, to giue them such a King, by whose pietie their Conquest turned to comfort. And this his mercie appeared much more afterward, when it pleased his diuine Maiestie so sweetly to dispose, that after the death of Canutus, and his two sonnes Haraldus and Hardicanutus, or (as Polydore calles him) Canutus, which two reigned but sixe yeares: the Crowne returned agayne to English blood; yea, and to so excellent a Prince, as was King Edward the Confessor, who reigned in all tranquillity, peace and felicitie about three and twenty yeares.

Now, although learning, religion, and vertue had flourished many yeres among the English, yet a little before the coming of the Normans, the same was vtterly destroyed and decayed. For (sayth William of Malmesbury, who liued in the same age) the Priests were so vnlearned, that they could scarce pronounce truly, the very words of the Sacraments and diuine service. And such was the ignorance generally of all men, that a Grammarian was helde for a wonder; Religious men were wholly giuen to delicacie and kept no rules of Religion; the Noblemen and Gentlemen gaue themselves to gluttony and lechituousnesse; there was no respect of Religion, nor care of Iustice: infomuch that the common people serued for no other then as a prey to the Nobility, who spoyled and rancked them at their pleasure. It was a common custome when men had got their maid-seruants with childe, ey-ther to send them to the Stewes, or to sell them for Slaues. Drunkennesse, and all the vices which commonly doe accompany the same, or follow thereon, were generally throughout the whole Realme; This reporteth William of Malmesburie in substance.

Allo holy King Edward himselfe, declaring a Vision which happened to him, sayd, That the Magistrates, as well spiritual as temporal, were no better then ministers of the diuell, that God was euery where dishonoured, Lawes contemned, truth trodden under foote, pity and mercy banished, crueltye hidde for a space time and entertainment. And therefore (sayd he) the wickednesse of the English is now compleate and growne to the height, and the reuenge and punishment thereof is shortly to follow.

This was proued true by the euent, which in a yere after, when William Duke of Normandie, called the Conquerour, came into England, whom God made the instrument and minister of his Iustice, to chastise them. For, being admitted and crowned King (prelently after the bloody battell, wherein king Harald and twentie thousand men were slaine) hee beganne to tyrannize vpon all estates: hee spoyled the Nobilitie of their lands, goods, dignities and offices, to giue the same to the Normans. He oppressed the people with infinite and intollerable taxes and impositions; hee depriued Citties, Bishoppricks and Monasteries of their immunities and priuileges, forcing them to redeeme them of him againe for great summes of money. Hee tooke from Churches and Religious houses, not onely such money as they had in store, but also the holy vessells, dedicated to Gods seruice. He abolished the olde Lawes, and ordayned new, causing them to be written in the Norman tongue, which the English vnderstood not: wherevpon there grew great confusion in the exercise thereof in all sortes of Actions and Pleas, as well criminall as ciuile, and many men wrongfully lost their lands, and goodes, and many their liues, and a gate was (at that time) opened to all iniustice.

Furthermore, he was not content onlie to spoyle the English of their wealth, but also depriued them of their pleasures, taking from very many Noble men and Gentlemen

Gentlemen, their Parkes and Chales for his owne vse; but also ouerthrowing houses, Churches, Villages and whole Parishes, to make Forreits. Infomuch, that (as Polydore Virgil reporteth) to make the Chafe, which now is called New Forreft, hee dispeopled and made desert all the Countrey betwixt Salisbury and the Sea side, for thirtie miles space. And when diuers of his Nobilitie (by reason of his tyrannie) rebelled against him: hee tooke occasion therevpon, to vse all kinde of seueritie and crueltie, not onely vpon their persons, when they fell into his hands; but also vpon whole Countreies and Prouinces, which hee so spoyled and rancked, that they lay waste for some yeares after. Finally, his gouernement, during the time of his reigne, seemed to ayme at nothing else, but to extirpate and extinguish the race and name of the English.

Wherefo if we adde the frequent wars in England in his time, partly by rebellion of his Subjects, and partly by inuasion of Strangers; wee shall finde, that England had not one yere, no, not one day of ease and repose, during the one and twentie yeares of his reigne. Which calamitie also continued, or rather encreased for thirteene yeres after his death, by the succession of his sonne William Rufus, who farre exceeded his father in crueltie, avarice, oppression of his Subjects, and contempt of God and man; by reason whereof, hee was so hated of the people, that when his death was knowne (which was so sodaine, and exemplary, for he was killed by chance with an Arrow, as he was hunting) the people were so transported with ioy, that they went euery where to the Churches, to giue God thanks therefore, as for the happiest newes that euer came to England, in hope, that the last day of his life, would be the first of their libertie. If therefore we consider all this, we shall evidently see, how true the prophecy of holy king Edward proued, when he said; That England should be giuen (for a time) into the hands of euill and wicked spirits, for the sins of the Nobilitie, Clergie and People.

Here then I conclude, that whereas the first Conquest seemes to haue proceeded, of the sins as well of the People, as of the Princes; and the second, of the offences, rather of the Princes, then of the People; the last was (as good King Edward testified) in punishment of the peoples sins, rather then of the Princes. V hereby we may see the sympathy in the body politique, no lesse then in the natural body, betwixt the head and the members in the participation for sinne, or reward for vertue. Which may serue for a motiue to all Princes and Magistrates, to haue especiall care, to auoyde the offence of God, not onely by their owne liues, but also by punishing and reforming their Subjects, lest negligence in eyther may draw GODS wrath vpon both, to the destruction of the whole Common-wealth.

CHAP. XX.

The Battell of Gaza, fought betweene Synanbasha, Generall for Selym the great Turke; And Gaszelles, Lieutenant of Tomybeyo, the Soldane, or Sultane of Egypt. 1516.

After the death of Campion, Selym intending to inuade Egypt, sent before (from Damascus) his Generall Synanbasha into Indea, with fiftene thousand horse, and a very strong power of Harquebutters, selected out of the fanizaries and Asappes, only to suruey that Region, and to open a passage way to Gaza; which indeed was very molestuous & troublesome, in regard of the potent Arabes. The city is leated on the sea-coast, and in the confines of Egypt, neighboring vpon the hote sandy deserts; a very hard and painefull passage, for such as journey to the remotest Egypt, and to the City of Cayro. The people of Gaza, being destitute of warlike garissons of souldiers, to stead them in extremitie of armes, entertained Synanbasha at the very first view, although in craftie and dissembling manner, giuing him many thankfull gratulations, for vouchsafing to free them from the Mamalukes; intollerable flauerie; in requital of which benefite, they promised to continue loyall and seruiceable to Selym and his successors for ever.

Now, while Synanbasha lay encamped, within an Arrow reach from the City, in expectation of Selyms coming, and practising his best meanes of vnderstanding the course of the Region and Countrey, that should allow them passage into Egypt; endeavouring beside, to compass friendship with the Arabian Commanders, and suborning certaine Spies, that went to Cayro, to vndermine the counsels of the Mamlukes and Tumumbezo, whome (vpon Campions death) they hadde made choise of to be their Sultane: the inhabitants of Gaza (being naturally extreme enemies of the present Turkish Armie) gaue Tumumbezo intelligence of Synanbasas coming; aduertising him withall, that this power of Turkes might easily be oppressed and destroyed, before Selim could arrive with his supplies: onely by sending a strong power of Mamlukes, vnder conduct of some skillfull Leaders, to venture vpon them at an expeditious advantage, projected in this manner. A time (in the dead of night) being concluded on, betweene themselves and the Citizens, the Mamlukes should make a souldaine inuasion on the sleeping Turkes, and they likewise (at the same instant) would ysue forth of the City, and ioyning with them, make vnauoidable spoile & hauock of the enemies Campe.

This aduise is allowed and embraced, betweene Tumumbezo and the Mamlukes; and Gazelles sent with six thousand horse or Mamlukes, and a strong Armie of the Arabes. Scarcely was hee departed from Cayro, but (by certaine Syrian Spies) Synanbasas had aduertisement thereof, and that (not staying for any carriages) they would be there within two dayes. Now, as these newes preferred the Turkish Army, so was it of no meane moment, for compassing the intire victory of the whol warres. And although Synanbasas had no intelligence at all of the Gazans fallhood, yet (being a man of great wisdom and providence) suspecting what Treacheries might circument him, and fearing least hee might meddle with two enemies at once: resolved to meet the Mamlukes by the way, and so try the fortune of fight. So, dislodging after the second watch, he silently marched away out of the Cities sight, reaching fiftene miles on the way towards Cayro; arriuing neere to a small village, which had the benefit of a plentiful Spring there arising, and therefore was the reason of Travellers vsual lodging there.

It fortuned, that Synanbasas purposed to stay in that Village, and Gazelles had the like intention of breathing there some few houres, to refresh both his men and horses, that he might the sooner galloppe to Gaza in the night time: when, euen at one instant (as it were) both the Generals received intelligence (on either side) by their vanc-couriers, that a mighty dust was raised, and the enemy neere approached. Gazelles became much perplexed in mind at this strange and vnlookt for accident; perceiuing apparantly, that staying of his purposed intent, hee was also vnable to match the enemy, if he should encounter with him, because his horses were halfe spent and weary. Yet had he no diffinay in courage, although he was compelled (vpon such a sodaine) to deniue what instantly might be done, for general safety of the Army. Whereupon, he aduised euerie man to make ready his weapon; and to consider, that what could not be performed by stealth and ambush, according to a precedent intention, required now courageous resolution, and must be dispatched by manly valour.

On the other side, Synanbasas hauing his men sooner set in order, then Gazelles could doe, hauing formerly aduertised them, what was to be done on the fighes encounter; cheered all the ranks with honourable speeches. And the issue of his Oration, was, That fight must vterly be forgot, because all places round about the would be thus vp, and inuious to them, except they were victors. Moreover, of one thing to perswade themselves especially, that no man should perish that day, but he whom heauen had destinated vnto death, by the most certaine lawes of Fate; and that with equall perill, the Valiant should finde safety in midst of the enemies swords, and also the fearful, death in their very safest flight, through the power of inescutible lot.

The Harquebussiers were in the wings, & were extended forth in length with a single array, and no man standing nere to another, for handling their Harquebusses the more freely, and to compass the enemy: but the Pikes were placed in the very midst, to sustaine the impression of the Mamlukes. But Gazelles approaching, sent the Arabian troopes before, to disturbe the Wings; and he himself (with a square battaile) charged the middle regiment of the Turkes. The fight was very cruel, and long

CHAP. XXI.

Of three severall Battails, fought in the years 1516. and 1517. betweene Selym the Great Turke and Tumumbezo, the great Sultan of Egypt.

Selym hauing received intelligence, that Synanbasas had surprized Gaza, overthrowne Gazelles, and had receiued a fresh supply of men by Sea, from Constantinople, for his owne further seruice he marched with all his Army towards Gaza, and (within eight dayes more) recovered so farre as * Cayro, reputed to be the Sultanes cheefe seat, Synanbasas still marching a daies iourney before him.

About the distance of fixe miles from the City, there was a smal village, named Rhodania, whereto Tumumbezo (the newe made Sultane) had conueyed all his provision and furniture of great Ordnance, hauing made also ditches, crosse thwarting the plaine fieldes, and high wayes: which ditches were covered ouer with light earth, and small stickes, artificially shadowing them. But himselfe, with his Mamlukes (who were about twelue thousand) and a great number of Arabian horsemen, fitted for the intent, kept in a place better beleeming: that when the Turkes Army should drawe neere, they might be there entrapt and beaten downe by the vndiscoverable Ordnance, ere they could come to reach the Egyptians with their Harquebusses; and then this stratagem hauing round engirt them, hee had the advantage of immediate fight, they being vterly disioyned, and fallen into the snare prepared for them.

So cunningly and prouidently were these matters ordered, and perfected with such answerable opportunity, that not a man in the Army could imagine, or vrgue any doubt of the dayes victory. And questionlesse, no meane disaster had mette with the Turkes: but that the giddie headed Goddesse Fortune, ouer-friendly to Selym, and cruelly vnkinde to Tumumbezo, Synanbasas released his army, being on the point of flight.

Victory inclined vnto the Turkes, notwithstanding on Gazelles, and his forces

long time doubtfull, because the Turkes (though superiour in number) were not able to endure the power of the Armed horse. And now being beaten from their ground; and disperfed, some one way, and some another, by the Mamlukes that brake in vpon them, they looked rounde about for flight, fixing their eyes and hearts stedfastly for it. When sodainly, by Synanbasas command, the Harquebussiers, who (with their first storme of shotte) had driuen backe the Arabes: reducing in their wings, enclosed all the whole battaile of the enemy.

Now, both men and horse, were (a far off) beaten down with deadly bullets, storming vpon them in such multitudes, as no place (to expresse valour) was left to the enclosed. For, when any troupe of Mamlukes ranne in violently vpon the Turkes; they, by reason of their nimble lightnesse (being accustomed to giue ground) did swiftly flye backe: and in all places this was their endeavour, not to encounter the with their horses, but onely to play vpon them with their Harquebusses. When Gazelles saw, that his horses were tyred with extreme wearinesse, and that manie of his stoutest men, were now either slain or hurt, and he himselfe grieuouly wounded in the necke; he, with the rest, making themselves way with their weapons, fled vnto Cayro, through those defarts that he came, losing all his Ensignes.

There perished in this batel the Capitaine of Alexandria, and Orcomas the gouernour of Cayro, men of great account; & besides them, a great number of Arabes, and almost a thousand horsemen of marke. Nor did Synanbasas win a ioyfull and vnbloody victory, for hee lost about two thousand horse; and (among them) some of his cheefest Capitaines. But because the fight had continued from noone to Sunset, the Turkes were not able to pursue their enemies, their horses being well-nere dead with thirst, and they themselves fainting through want of meate, and extreme labour: but encamped in the place where the battell was fought, neere to the Spring before remembered.

Intelligence sent by the men of Gaza, to the new Sultane Tumumbezo.

Syrian Spies send aduertisement to Synanbasas, and what he presently did to prevent all danger.

as had not the worthy paines of the Mamlukes, bin treacherously disappointed) onely through the meanes of a few perfidious Varlets, plainly had appeared.

As in all Armies there neuer wantes Villaines, so in the Sultanes were foure Mamlukes, borne Albanijes, who stiffly stomacked, that Tomumbejo (by suffrages of the contrary faction) was advanced to the dignity royall. And they, either impelled by lewd disposition, or adducted by hope of reward, and more bountifull respect, foreseeing their owne side to fall on wracke, and wisdom aduising, to seeke for new and more assured Friends: fled to Synanbasba, as to their chiefe Turkish Capitaine and Countiman. By these horsemen Synanbasba, and (soon after) Selym, understood all the counsels & intents of the enemy, and what an Ambuscado Tomumbejo had prepared for them, with singular subtilty and dexterious Art, vnavoidable from falling into, except they forsooke the high and direct way. Whereupon, being guided by these Fugitiues, they fetched a great compasse about on the left hand, and (before breake of day) recovered their old wonted way, having their battels ranged, their Ordinance ready mounted, to auoyde the least delay of fight, and so shewed themselves at the enemies reeward, and neuer coming neere the front of their Campe.

When Tomumbejo saw this, he coniectured by his enemies march, that (by his owne mens treason) his provided ambush was discouered. And albeit his mind was afflicted with marchesse greefe, to see so painfull an employment of his men, and so full of expectation, to be in a moment vtterly defeated: yet notwithstanding, he being a man of vnconquerable courage, called all his senses and valour to sodaine counsell, and summoning his Capitaines about him, gaue present order for those things which were to be done. And now was Tomumbejo in so narrow a strait and necessity, that all things, and at one instant, must receiue order from him. Hee was to giue the signall to his Soldiers, for mounting on horse-backe, vsing their weapons, turning the course of his camp, ranging his battailes, encouraging his men, and conueying his Ordinance to contrary quarters, as the occasion required. All which things, as one Capitaine could not performe alone, but very hardly and confusedly, so must they neede be effected as rawly, peruerfly, and to halffes, by manie indiscreet vnder takers.

But that which most hindered speedie performance, was the huddling of men together, for removing the Ordinance from place to place, they being ill-fauoured huge pieces, made of Iron, and sette in great stockes of Wood, with Iron ringes, after the rude and nauall forme of Workmanship, vfed in elder times: and so, by reason of their excessiue waight, could not be carried from their places, but by the draught of many beastes; besides, great heauing with iron Crowes and Leauers, requiring greuous labour of men. And the other great Field-peeces, mounted on carriages with wheeles, being drawne by the wiselesse and hasty multitude, with great clamor of such ashaled and shoued them through all parts of the Campe: the tumultuous passage of them, disordered men mounted on their horses, and the Souldiers repairing to their ensignes: yet two maine helps equalled these hindring difficulties; namely, the chearefulness of the soldiers, and the singular constancy of them all, almost beyond the compasse of mans beleefe: because they had not conceiued so much as a thought of feare, nor failed in their hopefull hearts, as it commonly happeneth in sodain aduerse chances, whereby old tryed soldiers do manie times forget their ancient valour. For, being twice before vanquished in battel, yet they refused the greater confidence and courage: perswading themselves, that not valour or skill in fight, but onely fortune fayled them.

Nowe, when Tomumbejo had set his men in good order, and the soldiers (with earnest desire of fight) requested the signall: he commanded the multitude of the Arabians, to bring their winges about on the reere of the enemy, and to beginne the fight first, that the Turkish horsemen might be troubled and disordered with a doubtfull danger of fight, before himselfe would issue forth with his selected troops. Strait way he commanded the great Ordinance (which by this time was brought about, and directed against the enemies) to bee shot off. And immediately the Turkes did the like; who had once discharged their smaller and greater peeces, when they

they were a iust distance off, and quickly re-charging them, had brought the within an Arrowes shoote of the Egyptians Ordinance, fighting a long time on either side, onely with discharging their Ordinance, while the Armies approached neerer. In which contention, almost all the Egyptians Gunners were slain, and most of their Artillery dismounted from their wheeles, being broken in peeces by violence of the enemies bullets.

The Turke had very skilfull Gunners in his Campe, whom he had allured (by his great rewardes, and rich entertainment) out of Italy and Germany, and especially many out of the Jewes rable, who being expelled by the piety of King Ferdinand out of the Spaines; brought afterwarde such rare and vnused deadly Artes into all the East, to spi: our men withall. The Capitaine or cheefe man of all these Gunners, was one James, borne at Reggio in Lombardie, a man of extraordinary skill in those Artes, who being enticed by Turkish giftes: had (a little before) forsaken the seruice of Christ, and reuoluted vnto Mahomets superstition. The fight being brought (on both sides) to handy strokes, the Mamlukes raised a cruel and horrible cry, and in three quarters, charged the Turkes with great valour: For Selym (keeping his old order) so marched, that hee approached in the forme of a Crescent. The Capitaine of the Asians in the right Wing, was Mustapha, and Innubasba of the Europeans in the left: but himselfe gouerned the middle battell, wherein was the Squadron of the Ianizaries, with a great multitude of Ordinance.

But Synanbasba being made General of the ficke, had chosen for himselfe a band of the valiantest men, taken and pickt out of all the companies, to serue for all vncertaine euent of the battaile. Where hee added (our of Selyms Squadron) fute hundred foote of extraordinary valor and swiftnesse, that hee being ready in all places of the battaile, and for all chaunces (were they neuer so sodaine) might succour that part of his fellowes, which was most pressed by the enemy. So that almost at one time, when Tomumbejo stood in the middle battaile against Selym, and the wings of the Mamlukes, had encountered the Turkish with equall Front, and the Arabians had fought valiantly at their backs, as they had beene commanded; foure fights were very furiously and hotly attached at one time, and in diuerse distinct places.

They that were present at this battell, do report, that thorough the cries of the Soldiers, the noise of Drums and Trumpets, the thundering of the Artillery, the clouds of dust, and clashing of Weapons, all mens minds were so amazed and confounded, that they being all on both sides alike blinded with furie, rushed on with such desperate madnesse, that neyther could the voices and watch wordes bee heard or knowne one from another, nor the Ensignes scene, nor commandes of Capitaines be regarded; but euen (by mutual error) they flew a great number both of their owne fellowes, and also of their enemies, without any respect at all. For neuer before that day, had any armies encountered together, enflamed with greater spleene and hatred; nor euer had two such mighty Emperors, more constantly and feruently declared their valour both of body and minde; nor with lesse care of life and safety. For, when both of them plainly perceived, that with like daunger of themselves and their Armies, they had set their liues and Empires vpon present ruine: they also well understood, that there would be no other hope lesse to eyther of them, but that which victorie it selfe should bring with it.

Now Gazeller enflamed with desire of honor and reuenge, to returne the Europeans a foile equal to that which hee had receiued at Gaza, charging Innubasba with great violence, had ouer-run the foremost and resisting troopes; had beaten downe the Guidons: and the Arabes pursuing on hard at his heeles, had made the vanquishing companies (euen those of the Thracians, Thessalians, and Macedons) to turne their backs, which neuer any enemy had done before.

Then Synanbasba, being readie for all occasions of victorie, flew vpon the side of the enemy, with a fresh and powerfull company of his men, re-enforcing the battell, which was much declined & foully scattered. But anon after, Synanbasba, who had discontinued the manifest victory of the enemy, by exercising a supreme acte of prowesse, was slain, fighting verie valiantly before his men, after that the Synanbasba General of the ficke, and his bande of men.

Tomumbejo prepared his troops to give the ground battaile.

Mamlukes (vnder their fierce Captayne Ido) had turned themselves proudly on their new enemy. And his horsemen striving to take vp their dead captaines body from the ground, were (a great number of them) slaine and put to flight by Gazelles, who had spread abroad his troupes, that hauing the more spacious roome, they might the more freely vse their swords; in which kinde of fight the Mamlukes doe most excell. And also that noble band of Ianzaries, being enclosed, were ouer-runne & slaine; after that they (being for saken of the horsemen) had long time resisted very valiantly.

In another quarter, Mustapha giuing a vehement charge with all his horse, vpon the left wing of the Egyptians (wherin commaunded the most renowned captaines Hylus Diadarius and Giapall Orcomas) veyr sharply vtged them. A litle before they had receiued a notable detriment, by the Ordinance, which (by chaunce) was shot frō Selyms middle battell thwart the field; which Mustapha perceiving, and being desirous to trample on olde ignominy, they being once disordered, constrained them fiercely, & bringing in his troupes freshly vpon them, brake thorow ouer-ranne and beat them downe. And being remarkable all the battell ouer, both by his Armes and voyce: adhornt the Asians to consider, that their ancient martiall honor, they lately lost at the battell of Alepo, must be recovered now by height of manhood, or (at vitermost) by an honourable death.

At the same time also, Tomunbeyo, hauing broken through the middle regiment of horse, was come to the foot, and being a mighty man both in body and strength, performed infinite actions of worth with his Cemitarie: the Arabians likewise enclosed the outer-wings of the Turkes, forcing them (in many places) to fight with double front. And Selym aduanced forward his foote-squadron, which was his onely and assured helpe in this extremitie, whose charge, neither the fierce barded horse, nor the victors men could abide: because most part of his Souldiers being harquebussiers, and being impaled with pikes, did much mischiefe, for their immoueable force, being closed into the array of one body, bare downe all that they encountered. Yet they fought with variable euē on both sides, from the fourth houre of the day, till Sun-set, neither was there any part of eyther Armie, but suffered sundry alterations, Fortune being some while prosperous, and then againe aduersē. For, both the vanquished and victors, becoming madd with mutuall & implacable rage, fought with obdurate & indurate hearts; the Mamlukes disdainig, that victorie should be taken from them, by men (of whom) they had slaine so many: and the Turkes chafing, that they whom they had before foiled in two seuerall battells, should make so long resistance against them. In somuch, that their bodies, wearied and tired with wounds, and their armes faintly languishing, yet supported onely by furie & pertinacy of heart, seemed able to haue maintained another daies murdering, but that dark snut vp the violence of so great a slaughter.

Tomunbeyo, who (no doubt) was vanquished, distrustig the entire losse of the field, first commanded retreat to be sounded, that his men, who now could not match the other Squadron, might seeme not to haue bin beaten backe, but onely to be led backe: which he conceived to be of no meane moment, both for the establishing of his souldiers, & maintenance of his owne authority. As one that being deceived in his first hope, might promise himselfe (as men in misery commonly do) more prosperous successe afterward, provided, that he fainted not in corage. Whereupon, preserving those few powers left him, he intended a fresh reparation of warre. The battell being broken off by the nights countermad, the Turkes being victors, won the enemies tents and Ordinance, pursued the Mamlukes still very late in the night, albeit (almost in manner of flight) they marched towards Cayro.

In the flight were taken Diadarius, who could make no speed, by reason of his grievous wounds, and with him Idon, hauing one of his knees broke with a falcon-shot, which also slue his horse. But the next day, Selym caused them both to be slaine, either in regard they could not be healed, or as thinking them to be acceptable sacrifices for appeasing Synanbasia; for whose losse hee greatly lamented. Now albeit the Turkes had nobly vanquished, yet was their strength mightily empayed, and by the means of these fortunate battells, wherein the 4. part of them was spent with sicknesse sicknesse and wounds, and a great number of their Horses vtterly foyled, especially through the tediousnesse of this daies seruice.

These were maine motives, to hinder Selym in his wonted course of expedition, because (as yet) he was ignorant, what deuotion the Egyptian inhabitants of Cayro bare towards him; neither did rumour afford him any intelligence, where Tomunbeyo had bestowed himselfe, or what hee further intended. For, till he had deliberately considered on all these occasions, he would not adventure the safety of his owne person, and perill of his whole Armie, to the mercy of innumerable Citizens, and in the greatest Cittie of the world. Wherefore, abiding foure dayes space in his old Campe at Rhodania, causing the wounded to be cured, and his slaine souldiers to be buried: but the bodies of his enemies, he left to be deuoured by Birds and Beasts. And then dislodging thence, and marching towards Cayro; he encamped on a plain, between old Cayro and Bulach: for the City of Cayro is diuided into three Townes; old Cayro, new Cayro, and Bulach, for their more commodious seruice of warre.

The valiant courage of Tomunbeyo, notwithstanding all his grievous miseries and losses.

Omumbeyo, being all this while nothing bruised, notwithstanding so many lamentable losses and disasters; still assembled together the Mamlukes from all parts, and pitched his Campe in a most commodious place, betweene new Cayro and the riuer Niles, wherein he had eight thousand Ethyopian slaues or bondmen, which kinde of men he had not (till then) made any vse of, in regard of an ancient Rebellion by them committed. Beside, setting open the old Armory, he gaue armor and weapons to the Mamlukes sonnes, and to Moors which were their retainers, as also to the Iewes and Arabians, preparing for farre sharper warre against the Turkes, then formerly had bene. But afterward, hauing intended a foadaine camifado vpon the Turkish Campe, and the same againe vnicely discovered to the Turkes (who being readily prepared for it, repelled (though with some losse) his foremost ranks; he by the aduice of all his Captaines, entred the City of Cayro.

The motive heere to was, because the Mamlukes (hauing bene foyled in all precedent battailes) considered with themselves, that they must now make warre after some other manner of way: & in that regard, aduised him to fortifie the Cittie, placing strong Courts of guard in the most conuenient parts thereof, to hinder euery way their enemies entrance. And being in this lamentable condition, that they must needs fight for their houses, wiues, and children; they helde it highly honourable, and answerable to the glorie of their ancient valour, to dye fighting in their fight, and euen before their owne doores.

Heereupon, each Mamluke going to his own house, furnished all his household, and the very toppe of his house with all kinde of weapons: instantly also entreating the Egyptians in each ward & streete to take Armes against the common cruell enemy, not suffering themselves to be slaine, and their wiues and children carried away as slaues. For (quoth they) if the sauage and insatiate enemy do winne the victory, as accidents of warre are alwayes doubtfull: no spare will be made, no not of such as beare themselves but indifferently leaning in help to neither side; because victory swellets with such insolent licence, as he respects not any man. But such as (without doubtful staggering) run desperately to assist his fortune, when war stands vpon vncertaine successe.

Most of the Egyptians that were rich and wealthy, as they did well foresee, that alteration in the State and Empire would be very hurtfull, and bring great losse and hinderance to their wealth and Traffike: so, in deuotion and helpe, they vvere not failing to the Mamlukes. As on the contrary, most of the poorer Citizens, and no meane multitude of the worse sort (who, being voide of danger, do euermore gaine by others losses) remembering all the villanies and extreme oppressions, which they had had suffered (for the space almost of three hundred yeares) vnder the Mamlukes, in very wofull and wretched slavery, they kept themselves within doores, awayting for the fights successe: iocondly hoping, that the time was now come, for punishing their proud oppressors, and that reuenge would be sought by the bloud of strangers; the issue sorting so, that they eyes should be satisfied, with a pleasing & long expected spectacle.

Tomumbeyo fortified the gates & waies belonging to the City.

In the meane time, Tomumbeyo with most indulgent care and labour, fortified the gates, and all the waies of the Cities entrance, appointing Captaines for euery street. In euery market place, Court, and assembly of people, he made very witty and perswasive Orationes, permitting no idle loytering in the workes; and finally (which is saide to be the hardest matter in distresse and danger) he carried an vnappalled countenance, deliuering signes of extraordinary hope and valour no way to be daunted. But the Mamlukes, ouer and aboue necessity (which in extremities makes men mad and desperate; yea, kindleth courage in errant Cowards) being stirred vp by emulation: did speedily and courageously execute the duties and offices of worthy Captaines; for euerie one of them, as his wit and inuention best instructed him, made trenches thwart the most passable streetes, laying also great Logges of Timber crosse vpon them. Others, made priuy pits and holes, with sharpe-pointed stakes surely fastened in them, whereon the enemies vnwarly falling, might gore and split themselves. Others likewise fitted the houses and Windows of euery turning streete, with such plenty of shot as their store and ability afforded; and all these things were performed with such expedition, as no man (not the very Mamlukes) made it nice, or strained courtisie, to take the pickaxe & spade, or to do any seruile seruicable Worke: whereby it appeared, that nothing could be thought deuised, but it was as expeditiously effected.

Now, although the City (being verie great and old) had no wals to enclose it; yet there were Gates, and but certayne wayes for entering into it, one whereof was a direct and very broad street, leading from the East gate to the Caffe, and into the midst of the City. The rest of the wayes wer but very narrow streets or passages, somewhat vnshightly and disgracefull, where no Ordnance could be drawn, nor an aranged battell meete with his opposite. Into this maine way or streete had Tomumbeyo especially brought a power, because he well perceiued, that their enemy would couet entrance, in regarde of the spacious admittance. But the other quarters of the City further off, hee kept with small guards: yet the inner & middle part, where the Caffe stood, was guarded with a sufficient power, for the better supply of all other places, where the enemies cry, or their owne fellows perill might call their assistance. For the Citie, being the greatest of all other, with so final a power, could not be defended round about, namely, wayes lying open into it in euery place.

When Selym had received certaine intelligence, that Tomumbeyo was entered Cayro, and all the Mamlukes (gathering their strength into one maine head) would try the utmost fortune of warre: hee marched with his Army neerer to the Citie. All the way he encouraged his troopes, to confider with themselves aduicely, that now they must intend an entire conquest of those Enemies, whom they had already so often vanquished; and to take a little the more paines, that their victorious rewards, might be answerable vnto their braue endeavour, for which they had formerly coueted with immoderate desires. So pausing a while, and commanding a Trumpet to summon general silence, thus againe he proceeded.

Friends, and Fellowes in Armes, let me intreat you to remember, that there remaineth now but a few wretched men, with a forsaken naked King, who, being lately spent with wounds and feare, were not able to endure the field, but flying thence cowardly, haue verily determined, to expect at home (in the sight of their wiues and children) the supreme and last cast of a miserable life.

ting the Mamlukes very name: doe with greedy desire expect their destruction, and promise to fight from their owne houses, vnto the destruction of the race of those wicked savage men. Neuertheless, the absolute victory of the whole war, consisteth in vnter vanquishing the remnants of the defeated, & thoroughly affrighted Army; because they cannot be accounted as overcome, that are yet hopefull in Armes, and possesse the seat of the Empire, euen the greatest Citie thereof.

The entrance of Selym into Cayro at Bassel gate, and manner of his further proceeding.

The souldiers foules were on fire with desire of spoile, and being all readily ranked, wanted but the signall for irruption. Whē Selym entering at Bassel gate, sent in his horse troopes at many places at once: but the Ianizaries entered at the broader passage, where the horse (on eyther side) meeting together, a cruell & bloody fight began in the turning streets, and narrow lanes. The foar, haling out their Falcons and Culuerings before them in the front; flanked all the streetes with them as they went along, making them naked of anie defendants. But when they came to the munitions and trenches, labouring to remove the logges and beames, which were great hinderances vnto their passage: the Mamlukes gaue them very valiant resistance, and either side shewed such rare courage and valour: as neuer (in our memory) did men encounter more fiercely & bloodily. For both the Mamlukes and Turkes stode on their highest tearmes of manhood, vying all their cunning flights & policies of war, in this one deadly dangerous fight; neither part being ignorant, that this was the last hope of life and Empryre, Fortune equally and indifferently presenting them with honorable rewards for the Conqueror, and shamefull disgrace for the vanquished.

The great harm done by the ambushed trenches and downfalls.

Mighty slaughter was made at the munitions, by reason that the Turkes rashly turning vpon the couered trenches, pits, and downfalls, were ouerthrown on heaps one vpon another, the hindmost thrusting them on that were before; others, being gored & spited on sharpe pointed stakes: vpon which aduantage, the Mamlukes wiues and children (with man-like hardi-ness) hurled and tumbled down tiles and great stones on them thus ouerthrowne beneath, beating out the braines of verie many. On the contrary side, the Turkes with their Harquebusses, fetcht off such as they saw in the windowes, & on the houses, breaking open the doores where any harmful thing was throwne downe, and fighting in those houses with diuerse euent. Also the Egyptians, beholding fortune now on the one side, and then againe turned to the other; assayed both sides alike as equal enemies, leaning where the lot of victory was likeliest to happen, that they might appeare onely to haue assisted that part, and thought vnto enemy to the other.

A cunning crafty manner of fighting in the Egyptians

Many encounters happened in diuers quarters at once, and according to they: confused running in the streets, now this company, then that, lighting vpon fresh and new troopes of enemies: & they that constrained the victors in the Front, were often intercluded by the aduerser part, and beaten downe in the Rere. It was a wofull sight to beholde, the distances betweene house and house, ouer-flowing with reeking blood, which ranne out of the slain mens bodies, as there they lay mangled & dismembred on heapes: that the Dust, which rose like a thicke mist or dark cloud before, was now laide therewith, and not to be seene at all. Notwithstanding, the ayre was meely darkened with the smoake of the Ordnance and lesser Artillerie, as also clouds of Arrowes shot from their bowes: and so great was the cry and clamour among the soldiers, the clattering of weapons, and thundering of the Cannons, that the very earth seemed to groan and tremble, and the houses were rent & torne in peeces. They fought continually two dayes and two nights, with doubtfull fortune, and slender apparence of aduantage on either side: but only that the Mamlukes (being few in number, and not able to endure labour and watching) had retreated themselves by little and litle, into the inner parts of the City, vnterly forsaking the foremost munitions.

The extremity of a thicke rising dust layd by the blood of slain mens bodies.

They fought two dayes and two nights continually.

The third day, when the Mamlukes were in the very pitch of perill of losing their whole estate, and all that they had, (which case vually augmenteth supreme enterprizes) chearing vp the hearts and endeouours of all men, they renewed the fight with such surpassing valor, that they droue the Turkes a great way backe, and intercepted certaine of their Faulcons. Which accident, made Selym to despair of victory, so that hee commanded to set the houses on fire in all places: iust wrath against the Egyptians, compelling him to that cruell proclamation, because (in his very sight, and but a little before) Innubysa was greuously wounded in the head, by a great stone thrown down from a window.

Now were the houses on a flaming fire, now was nothing heard but wayling and weeping of the suppliant entreating Egyptians: and now the Turkes fighting somewhat faintly, expected that retreat should be founded: when sodainly newes was brought by many men together, that in another quarter, the Mamlukes being beaten from their stand, and defeated by enforcing Mustapha, repoled theyr latest refuge in flight. For Mustapha thorough the intimation of certaine Egyptians, and fugitive Mamlukes, came to a very large streete, where the Mamlukes had placed their horses ready bridled and suled; intending, that if any ill hap befell the, their recourse might bee thither, where taking their horses, they might escape to places of further determination. He got all those horses, and led them away, hauing chased their guides within a part of the citie, nothing suspected, which was very weak, & defended by none but boyes and horse-keepers.

Which accident (as commonly it happeneth in serious and vnexpected chances) did wonderfully weaken their valour and resolution, wherefore when they wer thus defeated in their hope of flight, and they so roundly about, that the fight could be maintained by no other helpe or comfort, but only meere manhood: being as men vanquished by their own confession, they turnd their backs. Many making hast to Nilus with Tomumbeyo (who had in vaine tried all Art of valiancie, wisdom, and policy, to auoide the foile in this battaile) passing ouer the river by boats, went into the Region of Seietica. Another multitude hid themselves in the Egyptians houses, and in most shamefull lurking denes. But about 1500. of the valiantest Mamlukes, fled vnto the greatest Temple of the City; where after they had long time defended themselves, as out of a castle, because they would not yeeld but vpon honorable termes: at length, being confounded with thirst, wearines, wounds and the Ordnance violently playing still vpon them, they submitted themselves to the will and pleasure of the Conquerour. Part of them were presently slaine before the Temple, by the angry souldiers of Selym, he politickly winking thereat; & another part (some few dayes after) were carried downe the riuer to Alexandria.

The victory thus standing for Selym, he sent two bands to quench the fires, and proclamations were made thorough all parts of the City, that all the Mamlukes which would come in and yeelde themselves, and within the limitation of twelve houres space, should be secured from any further harme. But all such as were found after that time, should dye for their refusal, and large rewards were promised to all the Egyptians, that could disclose the lurking Mamlukes. Contrarywise, such as hid or concealed any of them, were presently put in yrons, & afterwards all most cruellly slaine in prison; because they were said to haue practised an escape. But diuers, who would not violate the rites of faith and friendship by betraying their friends, being accused by their neighbors, suffered losse of life, dying very constantly for their friends.

After this, the soldiers encreasing their fury, vpon the pride of this victory, searching all places; drew violently out all such as were hidden, and presently slewe them, spoiling also the Egyptians houses where they were found, leauing no place shut or concealed from them. And the very same day it hapned, that Gazelles came to Cayro, who had bene sent (a little before) into Thebus, to leuy Arabians, & to hire aides. But seeing the case to bee quite changed, and that he was able to do no good either by his person or aduice; hee came with three Arabian Captaines, and many horse with them, and yeelded himselfe to Selym; who entertained him and all his traine very honourably, euery man according to his degree and merit.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the third and last Battell fought at Nilus, betweene Tomumbeyo and Selym, with the ill successe and disgracefull death of Tomumbeyo, and hard fate of his Mamlukes.

Called also Pentapolis, of the five Cities, Bero-nice, Arsinoe, Ptolemis, Apollonia, & Cyrene.

BUT Tomumbeyo, being fled (as ye haue heard) ouer the Riuer of Nilus, into that region which is called Seietica, lying towards Cyrenai-cz, although with so many disastrous mishaps he had formerly bin vanquished, yet still hee made a couragious reparation of the war. For, there was come to him a potent supply of Mamlukes fro Alexandria, being sent for by letters out of the Cittie Garrisons, and many more also followed him in flight. Beside, the Arabians of Africa repaired to him, and the Moores likewise which were inhabitants of that country, promising him their vttermost fauour and helpe. Nay more, diuers Egyptians of Cayro, whose houses and people had bin spoiled and dishonested, by the couetous and luxurious Turks, gaue faith also, that they would raise a tumult and insurrection, if he would speedily come thither in the dead of night; whereby might be compassed, that such Turkes as were lodged in the City houses, might sodainly be destroyed by inuasion of all the people together. For the Citizens, hauing suffered by them all abhominable and enemy-like parts, could no longer endure the iniuries of such proude and malapart oppressors. Further they alledged, that the Turkes, being (before) a potent army, were now reduced to a contemptible number: for, a great part of them were slaine in the batels at Rhodania and Cayro, and well-neere all the rest were spent with woundes and sickness.

While Tomumbeyo was thus busied about his needfull preparations, Albuchomar the very greatest mar (for authority, lands, & riches) in all Seietica, came to Selym: eyther to prevent the mischief of imminent warre, to the no meane peril of his coun-treys, or else to win the victors fauour by Treason: and acquainted him not only with the new collected powers of Tomumbeyo, but also with the practises concluded among the Citizens of Cayro. Which when Selym vnderstood, he caused strite and strong watch and ward, to bee planted in all parts of the City; commanding also, that the suspected Citizens should be kept in the Castle, which (vpon the Garrisons forsaking it) very easily hee surprized. Furthermore, in diuers places along the riuer of Nilus, he ordered a great number of vesselles, well furnished with Ordnance and soldiers, to defend the further banke of the riuer.

Neuertheless, considering aduisedly with himselfe, how perillously he had often fought with most valiant enemies, and how difficult it would be for him to intercept Tomumbeyo, who (by sight) still into walle and vknown Regions prolonged the Warre, still getting fresh and new supplies. Considering also, that his owne power was so small, and so far from succour, as it might easily bee oppressed in that mighty Citie, by huge multitudes of men of vncertaine Faith. Vpon these discrete considerations, hee desired rather to conclude the Warre by some honest composition, then by forcible further contending, to entangle himselfe in new dangers.

And so much the rather, because hee had intelligence by them of Seietica, that fresh Companies of Horse were leuyed from all partes by the Mamlukes, which had fledde into diuers Regions: and the Nauie likewise, which was sent into the streights of the Red Sea, in the Arabian Gulfe against the Portugals, floodde now vpon the hopefull expectation at Porte Suezia.

In the Nauy were about three thousand Mamlukes, and Amyrasser, and Ray Salomon, all very expert Captaines: and a great number of brasse Peeces: whereby it appeared, that Tomumbeyo might gather ability, to repaire his former received iniuries, and fo returne againe to the Citie, being sent for thither by his friends.

But the maine motiue of all, was his care of the Persian affairs, lest Hunabrago (whom he had sent before to the mountaine Taurus) should not prouue able to match the Persian power, whereby hee should be excluded out of the lesser Asia and Syria, before the Fleet from Constantinople could come to Alexandria, with new supply of Victuals and souldiers. Hereupon, he sent very honorable men of the Clergy, and likewise certaine Egyptians of great estimation amongst them, as Ambassadors from him vnto Tomumbeyo. The effect of their Commission was briefly thus. To counsell him for a cessation from Armes, and now (at length) to acknowledge the Victors great fortune, engaging their faith to him, that if (in suppliant manner) he would come to Selym; by humanity and fauour of the Conqueror, he should quietly enioy the kingdom, which he was not able to hold by power. But if hee would proceede and continue Warre, carelessly forgetting his owne weakenesse: then, when warres fortune was thoroughly found and determined; according to his iust desert, he should expect no condition of dignity or life, at displeased Selyms hands. These Ambassadors being come into Seiectica, were (with frantick and barbarous cruelty) all slaine by certaine Mamelukes, before they had any audience.

Which proud and cruell deede, brake off all further patience in Selym, who was a man by nature (though not otherwise moued) extraordinarily vehement and fierce. Immediately he proclaimed a voyage into Seiectica against Tomumbeyo, commanding victuals and other prouision for it. Moreouer, he gathered Boats from all parts, causing a sure and a very broad bridge to be built ouer Nilus river: as allowing it neyther answerable vnto his dignitie, nor fitting with the vrgent occasion, to make his passage ouer with Boats.

When Tomumbeyo had intelligence by his Spies, as also from the Citizens of Cayro, that such an intention was prepared against him, and so strong a Bridge made ouer Nilus; hee (doubting the vnfaitfulness of the Prouincialles, whose hearts he feared to be revolted from him, by the treacherous departure of Albuchemar) determined to try the selfe-same fortune of battell, which had so oftentimes deceiued his hopes. For, he being inferior in all things, could not now lengthen out the war, nor make expectation of his enemy: neither did he hold it good for him,

Wherefore, consulting with his Captaines & Commanders, concerning this last attempt, which he and his Mamelukes were to make; by breake of day he departed fro Seiectica, accompanied with 4000. horse, and twice so many Moores and Arabes foot, continuing trauel night & day till they came to Nilus, that (by a bolde and sodain aduenture) he might deceiue the Turkes, who (as he vnderstood) suspected no such forwardnes, in weake, vanquished, & more then halfe dismayed men, whereas celerity would forfall any fame of his vnluck for comming; so to destroy part of the Turkish power, which first had aduentured ouer the river, before they could receive succour by their following Fellowes. Nor did the space of time beguile his opinion, because the hours (being truly accounted) made iust agreement with his speedy march thither; and even as hee formerly coniectured so fel it out, that the vaw-ward of the Asians had alreadye past the River. But the Muleters and boyes of Selyms Camp, seeking for the pleasantest places for pitching their Tents, rauaging ouer faire, were the first that descried the dust of the approaching enemy: whereof Mustapha being certified, the alarm was presently giuen.

This rumour so danted all hearts with feare, both of them that had alreadye passed the river, and theirs also which stood ready to follow after them: that Tomumbeyo charging the Asians with incomparable valour, while they were making themselves ready, and resorting vnto their Enginies, slew them in the Front, that durst endure the shoocke of the assailants, dispersed the rest, and forced them to flight; and all the vanguard was wel-neere ouer-run, and trodden downe, beside the disorder of the rest: before Mustapha (albeit hee fought fearlesse in the van, & very cheerfully encouraged his souldiers) was able to retaine them that hedde, or to repayre the other in array. For, in this sodaine and vnexpected chance, euery place was full of the peoples confused huddlings together, slaughter, flight, and feare: and all along the river-banke both aboue and below the newe made Bridge, were diuers companies of men discerned, looking ru-fully behind them, and crying out to their fellowes for succour. Many also being enforced (by the vrging troope of the Enemy) to the very brink of the banke, fell headlong downe into the river; and many also perished at the end or heade of the bridge, by reason they could not passe ouer it, being hindered by them that were continually sent from the further side; beside, many that would haue ascended the bridge, being impeached by fear, & thrust backe by their owne fellowes, were drowned in the river.

The bridge was so broad, that 4. horse in rank might well passe ouer together, & a great number sent ouer in an houres space. But because the Ordinance was to be drawne ouer, fewer horse were sent, then either the greatnesse of the danger, or sodainnesse of such a chance did vrgently require. Nor was there any helpe in the Ordinance, which could not speedily be drawne ouer, or shot off from the higher banke to the other against the Enemy, without great danger to themselves, by reason that their owne men stood in the way. In the meane time, Selym who ranne downe to the riuers side, at the beginning of this hurly burly, filled small boates with Janizaries Harquebusers, & sent them ouer to succour their distressed fellowes; commending the horse also to make what hast they could ouer the bridge, the nimble Marriners vsing their best pains, in often passing and returning with fresh supplies; so that within a short space they had conveyed ouer many bands of Janizaries, whose comming confirmed the disorder of Asians, and now boldly they endured the enemies violence.

Also Canagles son to a Tartar king, encouraging his troopes of Tartares to take the river with their horses; attained to the further bank of the river, to the admiration of all men, and losing but fewe of his men: for the Tartares hauing learned to swim ouer the violent and mightie River of Tanaïs and Volga with their horses, were the more apt for passage heere. At the same instant also, Tomumbeyo foreseeing, that the speedy victory consisted therein, endeouored with his thickest troopes, to win the head of the bridge, that pulling away the forme of boats, and cutting in sunder the cables, which fastened the rest together, & to the banke: the whole bridge being so let loose at liberty, might be carried away with the streames violence, & all the Turkes that were vpon it. This caused a very dangerous conflict, for the chosen and best armed Mamelukes constraining the front, fought with singular valor. And on the other side, Mustapha perceiving the present perill, brought vp the colours, and all the valiantest of his souldiers, to make good that place: so that both sides contended with such surpassing manhood as the weightinesse of the case required. For, the Mamelukes saw manifestly, that if they could winne that place, they should (with very short worke) ouerthrow all the enemies former victories: and the Turkes as plainly perceived, that except they kept and preserved the bridge, the safety of themselves, the whole estate of the army, yea & the ruine of their Emperor, lay now at the stake, and all brought to vtter despair.

Hereupon, Mustapha so preuailed by his Harquebusers, & troopes of Greek horse, which in sundry companies had passed the bridge: that the enemies were repulsed & forced to retire a great way backe. Now Tomumbeyo that he might giue some respite to his Mamelukes to breathe themselves a while, being not able to fight fiercely, because their horse were spent and tired, & that after a fresh repaire of their strength he might aduenture the extreme & latest fortune of the battell, encouraged the Moores and Arabians to maintaine the fight, vntill the Mamelukes had breathed a little. Which when they had valiantly performed, and the Mamelukes (hauing somewhat comforted their own bodies & horses) making good their place, the battell was againe renewed with such rigour on their behalfe, that Selym (distrusting the victory) doubted not to ascend the bridge, and runne to succour his men, although his friends earnestly labored him to the contrary.

His coming (which brought fresh hope into his Souldiers hearts, they coueting to win reward and praise, by doing some seruicable action in their Emperours fight) repressed all the enemies best endeavour, and were forced vnto flight, only through the valiancie of the Janizaries. Pursued were they ouer all the Fieldes, by those Horse which had bene at the fight, & likewise by the Tartares, who gaunted them very greedously with their Arrowes. But afterward, Muflapha, Cayerbey, and Gazelles, were sent with a company of fresh and swift horse, to follow them that fled, and not to suffer Tomumbeys to escape: who the third day after, was found by certaine Peazants, standing in a Marshy vppre to the waste in Water, among Bull-rushes and Reedes; and they (for feare of death) deliuered him to the Captaines, who brought him to Selym, who would not vouchsafe to see him.

After he had caused him to bee a long time in vaine tormented, to disclose the treasures of Campfen; at last he gaue command, that he should be carried about all the famous streets of the City, riding on a vile Camels backe, and in poore ragged Garments, with his hands bound behind him; and then to bee hanged vp with an halter, for the murdering (as hee pretended) of his Ambassadors, although the Noble Prince was altogether guiltlesse thereof. The like fate also befell to all the Mamlukes that were in prison, or could be taken. After the shamefull death of Tomumbeys, who was executed the thirteenth day of Aprill, Anno 1517. all the whole Empire of the Soldan yielded, and likewise all the Princes that had bene tributaries to the Soldan, euen vnto the dominions of Presire Iohn.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the first inuention of wearing Ringes: to what end it was. And of many ancient and admirable things, tending vnto the same purpose.

Mong all other Jewels and Ornaments, inuentioned by the spirite and industry, or rather by the vanity of man, to embellish & beautify himselfe withall: there is not any comparable to that of Ringes. bee it for riches, or curiosity in workmanship. For, ouer and beside that they are made in a round and circular figure, which is the most perfect of all other: they are beside so subiect and light, that they may be worne on the least finger of the hand. Neuerthelesse, they are alwayes made of the very richest metall of all, and accompanied with stones, the most precious and exquisite that are to be had, and valewed to bee the onely esteemed things in the world. Be-hold then, what means the ambition of men found out, to weare a ring vpon one finger, valewing in price the worth of a City: for, it is not vnknowne, there are some such precious stones, that are esteemed as a world of Gold, and yet notwithstanding, they hinder not the hand from the vse of any exercise whatsoever. And albeit that Ringes haue serued, and yet do, to some other more necessary ends & effects, then those before related: yet the very principall point which brought them into vse, was to glad and delight the eye, and to deliuer an outward testimonie of Nobility, and shew the persons estimation. But because they are now grown very common, and yet much esteemed, I will set downe certaine ancient Histories, incident to our present purpose, not greatly irksome to read or heare.

In the first place, it is not resolutely determined, who was the prime inuenter of Ringes: and yet some do say, that the first Ringes knowne to be worne, was in the remembrance of Prometheus, who (as the Poets faigned) being chained to a rocke by the appointment of Iupiter, was deliuered by Hercules, with the permission of Iupiter; with this condition neuerthelesse, that in perpetual memory of his imprisonment, the saide Prometheus stood obliged, to weare incessantly a ring of gold, enchaufed with a stone of the rocke whereto hee was prisoner; and thereby forme hold, that the vse of rings tooke thence the first beginning. Pliny and many other authors reputed this discourse for a fable, as all Christians ought to do: and because it is a leasing, and frivoulously feigned, I meane to insist thereon no further.

Concerning mine owne opinion, I am of the mind, that the inuention of Ringes came not by one man only, but from many, and in diuers times; considering, it neuer was any note of great cunning, to take the fingers bignesse by a thred, and with that measure to make a Ring of Golde or Iron: such as anciently were worne by the very cheefe Lords of Lacedemon and Ringes made of the purest and richest metall of all other.

The principall end that did bring Ringes into vse.

Ringes were outward notes of riches and Nobility.

Concerning the inuention of Rings.

Ringes neuer the inuention of one man only.

and Roms, before they gaue themselves ouer to the superfluities and dissolutions, which afterwards reigned in all things. And vndoubtedly, the custome and ceremony continued long time amongst the Romaines, that the Ring of Honour, which the husband sent to his spouse on the marriage day, was made of yron. Plinie discoursing on the antiquitie of Rings, saith, That they were not in vse in the war time betweene the Greekes and Troians: considering that Homer (who wrote thereof very amply) maketh no mention at all of Rings, much lesse, that they sealed then with Rings. And yet notwithstanding, he speaketh sufficiently of Chains and Bracelets, which were at that time worne, and of the manner of clofing and sealing Letters: so that if Rings had then bin in vse, Homer would neuer haue let it sleepe in silence.

But the good olde man Plinie, cannot over-reach vs with his idle arguments and coniectures; for we read in Genesis, that Ioseph (who liued aboute five hundred and fifty yeares before the warres of Troy) hauing expounded the dreame of Pharaoh, King of Aegypt, was by the layde Prince made Superintendent ouer his kingdom, and for his safer possession in that estate, he tooke off his Ring from his hand, and put it vpon Iosephs hand. And surely, kings did not onely weare Rings in those times, because we read that Thamar, desiring to haue issue by the race of Iudah her father in lawe (who was brother to Ioseph) had his company, vnder colour of being a common whoore, and receiued as presents from him, his Staffe and his Ring. In Moses time, which was more then foure hundred yeares before Troy warres, we find Rings to be then in vse; for we read that they were comprehended in the ornaments, which Aaron the High-Priest should weare, and they of his posteritie afterward, as also it was auouched by Iosephus.

Wherby appeareth plainly, that the vse of Rings was much more ancient, then Plinie reporteth them in his Coniectures: but as he was a Pagan, and ignorant in sacred writings, so it is no maruell, if these things went beyond his knowledge. According as himselfe apparently manifesteth, speaking of them of his owne Countrey: for hee saith, the vse of Rings were anciently so rare in Rome, & specially such as were of gold; that there was no ancient Statue to be seen ringed, except those of the Kings, Numa, and Seruius Tullius, for all other Statues were without Rings. Hee saith moreover, that (ordinarily) no other Rings were worne in Rome, but of yron, and that the custome of the Romaines was, to giue Rings of gold (by way of prerogative) to Ambassadors, which they sent to any King, or to some strange Nation. And yet notwithstanding, they that entred Rome triumphantly, wore no other Rings then of yron, although crownes of gold were allowed for their heads, & long time did this custome continue.

Afterward, when the Romaines became more braue and sumptuous, yet did they expressly prohibit in Rome, to all mechanick persons, and men of meane condition, to weare Rings of golde: except they were ranked with the Souldiers, or Romain Cauallerie, which was a third estate, betweene the Order of the Senators, and the common popularitie; as now adayes is our Nobilitie. Whereuppon, Rings were so priuileged, that in giuing licence to any one to weare a ring of gold, it was as much as to enoble him, and to passe him for a Gentleman. For, as Plinie, Dion, and many other haue left in their writings, the Roman Knights were known, and those of the Military Order, amongst the common people, and distinguished from them by Rings, which they wore on their fingers: euen as euidently as Senators were knowne by their long Purple Roabes, embroidered with large headed nailes. For this cause, the Poet Horace attributed Rings to the Cauallerie, bestowing on them the name of Knights, or Gentlemen.

This priuilege then of wearing Rings of golde, might not be granted, but to such as had accomplished some high enterprise, or that were men of power, and worthily deferred. And assuredly, this prerogative was so affected generally, that Iulius Caesar, coueting to embolden his Souldiours by remunerations and promises: after a long Oration made to them, hee would lift vp his finger, in signe, that they should enioy whatsoever he promised. And all his Army conceiuing, that by this signe, hee would permit them to weare Rings of golde, which intimated asmuch, as that they should all be knights, were the more sprightly encouraged, and serued him with most chearful dispositiō.

Very true it is, that in the time of the Emperours, this prehemine was giuen to many that deserued it not, as wee may see in Iuuenall and Suetonius, as also in the Commentaries or Chronicles of Iulius Caesar, and of Pitellius. Neuertheless, the Edict, whereby it was inhibited to Mechanickes to weare Rings of golde, was not in force at the second warre against the Carthaginians, and the ouerthrow of the Romaines which happened at Cannas: for, according as Pliny and Titus Linius doe report, three bushells of Ringd (belonging to the Romaine slaine in the battell of Cannas) were found among the slaughtered bodies. In like manner, as Cicero alleaded in his fift pleading against Verris, he vsed these very words; When a Generallof the Romaine Army, obtained any victorie, hee ordinarily gaue a Ring to his Secretarie, as a reward for his faithfulness. Many other things were also in custome then, which wee will heereafter more at large discusse: after we haue proceeded by Examples and Histories, to what end Rings were worne in elder times, and in what manner.

First then, our reuerend predeceffours vsed to weare their Rings, on the next finger to the least vpon the left hand, according as it was obserued by the Statues of Numa, and Seruius Tullius, Romain kings; because that finger was called Digitus Anularis, The Ring finger. And certainly (as Plinie saith in his seauenth Booke and eighteenth chapter) the Ring worne vpon the left hand, was a meere expression of modesty: the Romaines imagining, that it was a matter ouer-curious and superfluous, to weare any Rings at all: and therefore, to make the lesfer shew of them, they did euer weare them on the left hand. Nor can we say (according to Plinie) that this was done to any other end, but because the left hand was more at liberty then the right in the manning of Armes, it seruing then, but as a defence to the bodie, in carrying onely Shields and Targets, as Souldiers vsed then to doe, the right hand hauing no such ease.

Neuertheless, some do say, that Rings were worne on the left hand, for the more safetie and assurance, considering that it is the hand least employed; and that the Ring-finger was elected for the same respect: For it is least set to labour of all the fingers, as Macrobius saith. Pursuing the same case, and alleging Pliny for the point, he addeth these words; There is a veine or nerue, coming from the heart, which taketh his ending in the Ring-finger for which cause and reason, that finger deserueth to be crowned with golde. Aulus Gellius also is of the same opinion. Others affirme, that Rings are worne vpon that finger, for physicke, or physically: and that the vertue of precious stones enchafted in them, doe penetrate to the heart, by means of the fore-named veine. Macrobius, grounding his conceit vpon the Pythagorian numbers, whereof the Egyptians made vse; allegeth many other reasons concerning Rings, which I passe the lightlier ouer, as seeming to bee matters of small importance. We will resolute then on the last opinion, appearing to bee the most receivable: although we see rings to be worne indifferently, vpon all the fingers that are on the hand.

Macrobius doth auouch, that the most principall cause of inuenting or finding rings, was to serue as Seales: for in former times, euerie man caused to be engrauen in Stones so enchafted in Rings, what did best please his owne minde and affection, and wherewith to seale vp his Letters.

This was then the reason of bringing Rings in vse, although now-aadays they are that way least employed: and assuredly, men (in elder dayes) were so curious for well keeping their Rings and Signers, that they would seale with them verie seldom. Which I thinke not to be so vsed amongst the Romaines, because they were so heare-handed, as not onely they sealed their Letters with their Signers, but also sealed therewith their Chests, Coffers, Ambries, Cub-boords and purses, that kept the houtholde keyes; yea, and sealed their Cellers, wherein were their stored wines, for feare lest they should be stolen away from them; and Marcus Tullius Cicero himselfe saith, that his mother did the same.

Now concerning the vse of sealling with Rings, it is very ancient, according as we may reade in many Examples and Histories, especially in the sacred Scriptures, where

The famous Seale-ring of Polyocrates, Crowned with finis, and a miler. Plin. lib. 4. c. 9. Strabo in lib. 4. Herodotus in 1.

The history of Polyocrates and his voluntary falling into misfortune.

where it is said, That Queene Isebel, wife to Achab King of Samaria, sealed with the Kings Ring, the Command whereby the sent to haue Naboth put to death: and yet notwithstanding, this was fiftene hundred yeares before the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

Moreouer, when the Prophet Daniel (by the Kings commaundement) was put into the Denne of Lions; the stone which closed the mouth of the sayde denne, was sealed with the Kings Ring, and the rings of all the Princes in the kingdome: where by appeareth, that Rings serued them to seale withall; as now they are vsed in any Kingdome, when the King confirmeth any especiall priuilege.

And in these venerable elder times, Stones were enchafted and fixed in Rings, vpon which stones were cut and engrauen diuers formes and figures, deuised onely to seale withall. Heereupon did the Poet write:

I knew the Letter, and the faithfull stone.

Asmuch to say, as hee knew the partie from whence the Letter came, by the figure engrauen vpon the stone in the ring, implying, that he knew the Seale. In regard whereof, when men made their rings, they studied to exceede one another in riches and costlinesse, especially Kings and other great Lords; witness the so much renowned Seale-ring of Polyocrates a Tyrant in the Isle of Samos. And although many did suspect the narration of that Seale, as a matter meereley fabulous: yet notwithstanding, Cicero, Plinie, Strabo and Herodotus, doe holde it for a true historie, affirming it to be an Emerald engrauen, wherewith this Prince vsed to seale his Mistresses and Patents, as briefly wee will say somewhat of the discourse.

This Prince, hauing long time liued in great prosperitie, neuer finding Fortune any way contrary to him, knowing also in others her instabilitie to be such, as it was impossible for a man to passe through the courtes of this life, without experimenting her variable traueses; was willing to fall into a voluntary misfortune, as hoping (by that means) to satisfie whatsoever Fortune could inflict vpon him. Heereupon, taking the Ring which he so highly esteemed, he threw it into the very deepest place of the Sea, to haue the lesse hope for euer finding it againe; which yet he did, as Herodotus maintaineth, by the aduice of Amasis King of Aegypt, and his confederate. It hapned, that within some few dayes after, a Fisher-man presented him with a fish caught in the Sea, which was very great, and much remarkable. As the Cooke belonging to Polyocrates was in dressing the same fish, he found in the bowels thereof, the Ring which his Lord had throwne into the Sea; an accident very admirable, and fortunate to Polyocrates. When King Amasis heard thereof, hee departed from the league of friendship which hee had long continued with Polyocrates, sending him expresse word by his Ambassadors; that it was impossible for a man to be so fortunate, but ere long he must fall into farre greater misfortune, euen to the pitying of his best friends. As it hapned to him in short time after: For, King Darius making war against him, was taken in the said war by Orandus, Lieutenant generall to Darius, who caused him to be hanged and strangled. This came thus to passe, two hundred & thirty yeeres before the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

Plinie sayth, that the Stone enchafted in this costly Ring, was a Cornalline: yet Herodotus affirmeth it to be an Emerald; but there appeareth some defect heerein, because Plinie sayth, How was it possible in those times, that an Emerald could be engrauen? In brieft, it was an ordinarie matter among Princes, to seale Letters with their Rings. As we may obserue by Alexander the Great, who (according as Quintus Curtius, and many more belide doe auouch) being willing to acquaint Hephestion, his choice favourite, with a secret which he had set downe in a Letter, shewing it to him, he tooke the Ring from his finger, and ser it to Hephestion lippes, as a signe of sealing them vp with silence.

Suetonius sayth, that Octavianus the Emperour vsed the forme of a * Sphinx in his Seale; whereupon the Poets fained, that the Sphinx was a monster like to a * Harpyia, which demanded many doubtfull questions of passengers, ouerthrowing and also killing such, as could not resolute their Riddles. Whereupon the Romaines emblazoning the Seale of Octavianus, vsed as a commō saying; that his Sphinx might raise some such doubtfull cause, as would be very difficult to resolute. And this made

Mecenas, a great fauourite of the sayde Offianus, had a Frogge engrauen in his Seale; and although that creature is naturally very timorous: yet notwithstanding, the Romaines greatly feared the Frog of Mecenas, because by vertue of the Mandations sent vnder that Seale, they payed great subsidies and tributes. Pompey the Great had a Lion in his Signet.

In briefe, Signets were so much respected, as it is well remembered, that the Signet Ring of Silla, moued that most cruell warre, which happened betweene him and Marius. In that Ring was engrauen the Image of Bacchus, King of Carthay or Mauritania, whom Silla tooke with king Jugurthe; which was so highly displeasing to Marius, to whom Silla was Lieutenant; as hee tooke occasion thereby, to enter open Armes against him. Plinie also saith, that the Sociall warre, which the Romaines waged against their confederates, was moued by the meanes of a Signet, which procured the enmitie betweene * Drusus and Scipio.

But passing from these particular Signets of diuers Princes, we are to obserue, that the Romaines caused their owne proper figures to be engrauen in their Rings. As is well deliuered by Plautus, who introduceth a Bowde in one of his Comedies, that by the impression of a Ring, knew the iests and countenance of a souldier her friend. Neuerthelesse, when the Emperours reigned in Rome, such as then were pleasing to them, carried their Images engrauen in their Signets. It may then be helde for certaine, that (almost) from the beginning of the world (by that which hath already bene said) Rings were in vse to be worne, euen as now adayes they are in many Countreies, where Armes and other deuices, are ordinarily carried in Rings.

We may conclude then, that Rings were made (at the first) for brauerie. and onely to giue delight to the eye; as also for some other reasons, whereof wee shall speake hereafter. And vndoubtedly, the custome of wearing Rings hath bene of long continuance; for, beSIDE the Histories and Examples before related, wee reade of that courageous woman Judith, who hauing sworne the death of Holo- phernes, shee put off her mourning garments, and to execute her intention, shee clothed herselfe with goodly habites, enriching hir comely person with Bracelets, Rings and eare-rings. The Romaines likewise wore Iewelles, and Rings on all fingers of the hand, except on the middle finger, which is the greatest about all the other, and which they holde to bee infamous; for a reason, whereof I purpose not now to speake.

Plinie saith, that after the victory which Pompey obtrayned in Asia, the Romaines greatly inured themselues to wear rings; and brauerie grew then into such request, that in Winter they vsed to wear bigger rings: but those appointed for Summer, were much more light, subtiler and ingeniously made. Also, they named their Rings according to the fingers whereon they wore them, as is affirmed by Iulius Pelagius. Plinie saith, that the second finger, or that whereon the Romaines beganne to wear their rings, next vnto the Ring-finger, was the first finger, which is nearest to the pulle; and then afterwards they wore them on the little finger. Moreover he saith, that many (in his time) wore three Rings on each finger: neuerthelesse, such as were most dainty and curious, would wear but one Ring onely vpon the whole hand.

From hence it ensued, that euery Nation beganne to seeke very diligently for stones that were of greatest price and value; onely to serue in Rings as Signets, and thereon to engraue their deuices. Notwithstanding, among the stones of choicest esteeme, that of Pyrrhus (who waged warre against the Romaines) in ancient times was accounted to be most excellent. For, in that precious stone, (without any helpe, inuention or arte of man) was naturally discerned, the figures of nine goddesses, and a yong naked child standing by them: so that they were censured, by graue opinion, to bee the portraits of the nine Muses, and of Apollo. A matter very strange, and somewhat difficult to be credited: neuerthelesse, many Authors (worthy belife) doe auaunt it for a true historie, especially Plinie. And questionles, according to the iudgement of Philosophers, this might happen thus naturally, by the great and immeasurable heate of matter consiting in the sayde stone;

stone; or else by some correspondencie, or celestiall influence, with the Stars and Planets, euen as a woman may produce a monster, wholly different from humane kind, and by the selfe same influences.

Albertus Magnus saith, that he sawe at Colleen, in the chappell of the three Kings, a Stone, wherein was naturally figured and discerned two mens heads, placed vpon a Serpent. Leonardus Camillus, in his Mirrour of precious Stones sayth, that this may be so, naturally; affirming moreover, to haue seene seauen trees, all of one forme, naturally portrayed in a Stone. And not to tie my selfe to other mens testimonies, I haue obserued in Columns of Marble and Jasper, men naturally figured, and many other shapcs beside, very remarkable, both for the diuersitie of colours, and singulartie of shadows naturally thereto belonging. And therefore, seeing so manie credible persons haue written, concerning the precious Ring-stone of King Pyrrhus: it might very well be, that the Nine Muses were therein naturally figured, and appearing to the life.

Now, for that which is reported, as touching the Ring of Gyges, King of Lydia, (which Plinie attributeth to King Midax) it seemes a matter strange and incredible. This Ring had such a property, that being on the finger, and turned to the in-side of the hand, the wearer went inuisible; but turning it to the out-side, then he was visible againe, and to be seene of all men as before; all which was made so publickely knowne, that men tooke it offensively, when they were demanded, if they had seene Gyges Ring, or no. Plato the diuine Philosopher sayth in his Booke of Commonwealth, that by reason of a certaine tempest and earthquake, the ground opened, and a great deepe gulfe was publickely discerned. Gyges, being then a Sheepeheard, but a man of bolde spirit, descended downe into the gulfe, and found there a great horselfe, which was of Brasse, and hollow; within which horselfe was a dead body, of a Giant-like and prodigious stature. He looking considerably on the huge body, espied a Ring vpon his finger, which he tooke off, and hauing put it vpon his owne, found himselfe suddenly returned to his fellowes: where they (as then) were keeping Cattell.

It came to passe, that Gyges (accidentally) turned the stone in the Ring toward the palme of his hand; and then heard his companions talking of him, as if hee was absent from their company: whereupon, being wife and ingenious, hee presently conceived, that this proceeded from some hidden vertue in the Ring. So, finding it to be true; and trusting to the secret vertue thereof, he went to the Court of Candaules King of Lydia, where hee preyaued so fortunately, that he obtained the loue of the Queene. Afterward, hauing slaine the King, by meanes of his wife, he possessed himselfe of the kingdome, and so became King of Lydia. Cicero taketh this narration of Plato, no otherwise then as a morall Fable, applied by him to colour what he sayd. Philostratus, discoursing of Serpents and dragons in the Indians saith, That in certaine Stones, the heads of Serpents and Dragons are to be seene, naturally figured; and that this may be proued by the Ring of Gyges. Seeing then, that so many famous Writers make mention of Gyges Ring, we may well allow it to be a true Historie, and no Fable.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the properties and vertues, secretly concealed in precious Stones: And whence the vertue proceedeth, which is sayd to be in Magick Rings.

S touching the before mentioned Ring of Gyges, albeit I will not resolutely affirme, that it had (indeede) any such propertie (as easily) in other places, according as hath bene obserued by experience, and as may be gathered by the writings of diuers credible authors, concerning precious stones, hauing wonderfull and vnpeakeable qualities and vertues; yet notwithstanding, making no such strange reckoning of that ring, Magicians haue promised to execute far greater matters, then the ring of Gyges was able to do. Therefore, if that which is written of Gyges be true, I am of the mind, that he did it by the Art of Magicke, rather then any other vertue else: as all they doe, that that compasse all their intentions, by the power of Astrologie, obseruing times, as also the aspects and influences of Starres and Planets, whereunto they ascribe peculiar rules, whereof we purpose to speake somewhat.

But, returning to the vertues and properties of precious stones; It is very certayne, that our graue Ancients did place such stones in their Rings, and wore them vpon their fingers, onely to be sensible of their properties. Neuerthelesse, although they should be indued with great vertues, yet I am perswaded, that their qualities are not so precious, as proclamation is made of them. Wherefore, not to stand on deciphering their vertues particularly, I will direct my Readers to such Bookes, where their natures are at large described, contenting my selfe, to speake of some few, as they haue beene (in some measure) related to me.

First then, it is saide of the Diamond, that it is very singular against forerie, charmes and enchantments, naturally strengthening the heart by his vertues: but especially against illusions of phantasies and spirites, which terrifie by sodaine affrightings. Also I reade, that it is exceeding good for women with child, for the conseruation of their fruit. The Amethyst serueth as a counter-poyson, and likewise is a defensatiue against drunkenesse. The Balais or Ruby, restraineth the inordinate appetites of the flesh, and is a soueraigne help to the health of any body. The Carbuncle is very preseruatiue against pestilentiall and infecting ayres, and allwaging luxurious or carnall desires, doth greatly comfort and delight the heart. The Corall containeth in it diuers especiall properties; for it stencheth or stayeth bleeding; it is a preseruatiue against gally visions, and dreadfull dreames; it is likewise very chearefull to the heart and vitall spirits. As concerning the Cryfall, it is soueraigne against such persons or things, as can enchaunt or charme by their looks or sight: and it also is a restriction and defence, from dreaming of offensive matters. The Iacinth, is cordiall and comfortable to the heart, in like manner as the Corall is; and is also a soueraigne preseruatiue against the pestilence.

It is credibly reported and written, that wearing an Emeraude on the finger, it maketh the partie chaste and continent, as hating and despising the lusts of the flesh. And some holde it for certaine, that it be worn on the finger of a Maide, that hath lost her virgin honour, it will break immediately. It is also greatly auailable against euill spirits, against tempests, and against the falling sickenes. The Cornaline moderateth all wanton appetites, and glads the heart wonderfully: this stone is the best of all other to seale withall, because waxe will neuer cleaue vnto it. The Topaze doth appease the passions of the mind, allwaging the imperious tempests of chollier and phrensies, quite ouerthroweth the melancholy humour; and finally, it purifieth the blood. Behold what leuerall vertues remayne in the fore-remembered Stones.

Many other there are, of great and extraordinary vertue, which I let passe the lightier, referring the Reader to Aristotle (although the booke of Stones, and bearing his name, was none of his worke, by plaine appearance) and to Albertus Magnus, in his Treatise of Minerall matters; to the Poet Marbodius, in his Booke of precious Stones; to Serapion, in his Booke of Simples; to Isidorus, in his sixt Booke of Etymologies; to Bartholomew the Englishman, in his Tract of the Properties of naturall things; and (about all) to Leonardus Camillus, in his Mirrour or Glasse of precious Stones. Plinie also hath written of them in many places; likewise Vincencius, and many other, whom I spare to name for breuities sake.

But I pray you, let vs bestow a little consideration, on the perspicacitie and ready apprehension of mans spirit, in finding out the manner and meanes to set and enchaune precious Stones in Rings, thereby to enioy their properties and vertues. Nay, there were some that conueighed poison into their rings, to compasse their owne speedy death, if any misfortune did throw them into any dangerous disaster: notwithstanding it ensued from the infection of the duell, inducing diuers ancient Pagans to despair, as may be obserued in sundry olde Histories. Especially renowned Hanniball, who vially carried poyson in his Ring, whereof he dyed in Bythinia, because he would not fall into the hands of Titus Flaminius (Ambassador from the Romaines) his capitall enemy;

he hauing slaine (before) the father of Flaminius in Italy: to whom Prusias King of Bythinia, would haue deliuered Hanniball, thereby to winne grace with the Romans. Plinie sayth, that the great Athenian Orator Demosthenes, imitated the very same example.

Heliogabalus, a very vile conditioned prince, ordinarily carried poyson in his Ring, and to the same end: albeit as Lampridius sayth, in reporting his life, he deserved not so honourable a death, as impoysoning. Plinie speaks of this matter, and manner of carrying poysons in rings, to bee an ordinary obseruation, and very common in his time.

Moreover, those ancient fore-goers did singularly observe the aspects, & influences of Starres, as well by forging them into their rings, as also by engraving them in stones, when they were to be enchained, by those meanes to giue them vertue: a most wicked, vile & vnworthy action, not meet to be remembered among Christians. And assuredly there are many Authours, which discourse on those Images & Characters, made by obseruation of Astronomical Constellations, and which made promise of mountaines and meruailes by those meanes. Affirming, that ouer and beside the naturall vertue of the stone; it attained to a new strength and quality, by the Image engrauen thereon, as also by the alliance and propinquity, which it had with the metall wherein it was placed. And they would maintayne, that those Planets and Starres gaue influence, and communicated their vertue to those rings, forged in that ceremonious manner; euen as to the things subiect to their influences; and so by this meane, the naturall vertue of those stones, was fortified by the Magicall vertue thus attained vnto.

In this manner, they baptized (by the name of naturall Magicke) this colligation or connexion, which they performed by hearbs, metalls, perfumes and characters, and which they vnited or combined together in one ring, saying: That rings composed in that manner, were soueraigne against the Apoplexie or dead palie, and anguish in the sides. Some there were made proper to reioyce the heart, to heale and mitigate the rage and fury of a madman, and also that they serued as preseruatiues against poyson, and for many other diseases; as to conferre a man, euen for the encreasing of his naturall strength. In briefe, they attributed many admirable proprieties to these Rings, wherein breuitie constraineth me to be silent. Norwithstanding, whoeuer desireth to be better informed, may make his recourse to the Mirrour of precious Stones, set downe by Leonardus Camillus, and to Cornelius Agrippa, in his Booke of Secret Philosophie; to Albertus Magnus; and Tabithus, a Philosopher highly renowned, discoursing on this Argument; as the like doth Iustinus, Seuerinus and diuers others. Neuerthelesse, I doe not greatly rely on what they haue sayd; because I neuer expetimented the vertue of Magicall Rings.

True it is, that such a make profession hereof, do say and vouch, That by obseruing the Constellations, requisite as well for forging the metall, as for engraving the stone enchained in the Ring, and vnder the Planet named Mars; that ring doth fortifie the heart, and hath the reuerent vertue, working many other great effects, almost incredible. Likewise, such Rings as are made vnder the influence of Mercurie, doe adorne the speaking of a man; and maketh him a singular Orator, as also apt to deale in merchandise. And so the like may bee sayde of such, as are made vnder the obseruation of other Planets.

Others engrave in their Rings, the characters belonging to the signes of the Zodiacke, and according to their triplicities, saying: that they of the first triplicity, are namely, Aries, Leo and Sagittarius, doe serue for colic diseases, for Feauers occasioned by phlegme, and for dead Palles. Also the characters appertaining to the second and ayrie triplicity, as Geminis, Libra and Aquarius, are singular against corruption and putrifaction of the blood. And so doe they say of other triplicities of the signes, according to their Elementarie qualitie. And indeed, this obseruation is very ancient, and was practised a long time amongst the oldest Philosophers, as well Chaldeans, and Aegyptians, as the Iewes.

Some also affirme, that the seauen fortunate Rings, which King Zircas gaue to Appolonius Thymanus (according as Philostatus sayth) were of the same temper.

Farther affirming, that the sayd Prince did daily wear a Ring, answerable to the Planet that day reigning: by the which meanes, he preferred himselfe for an hundred yeares, being alwayes as in the floure of his age. The grand-father to this King Iarchas, liued an hundred and thirty yerres, by vertue of the afore-sayd Rings, being continually in manly verdure. And hereupon, the Greekes made great vse of these Magicall and sophisticated Rings, as may be seene in the Comedies of Aristophanes, where hee bringeth in a man-Bawde, peremptorily contesting against Dicem, who had threatened him, and these are his words: I care not for all the threatenings that can be used against me, hauing this Ring upon my finger, which his Mistress sold for a Drachma. And shewing the Ring, he proceeded thus: With this Ring I will keep my selfe from his teeth, and from his barking.

Erasmus, speaking of these Magical Rings, hath these words: *Some daily vse to wear Rings, wherein are certayne characters engrauen, vnder obseruation of constellations and aspects of Starres, and firmly holde, that they serue for diseases in the sides, and are proper (also) for diuerse infirmities. Others, imagining this to be true, do counterfeite these Rings, but all is merely abuse. For, to giue them such vertue; the course of the Starres must be diligently obserued, and the constellations when they are made. Notwithstanding, many regard not the influences of the Starres at all; but onely respect the nature of the stone enchaisted in the Ring, and the character there engrauen. This may be seene in the Bookes of the wings of Rogierius, and in the writings of Leonardus Camillus, as also of Tetellus and Caclus, in those bookes which are attributed to Salomon for their credite, and which amply doe discourse thereon. For, according as Tetellus sayth, a Iaspur stone enchaisted in a Ring, hauing the Image of a Maiden engrauen thereon: preferueth the wearer from ill spirits, and from water. If a Lambe be engrauen thereon, the Ring defendeth from the Apoplexie, and cureth also the seauer quartane. A Cornaline also, hauing the shape of a man figured thereon, holding in his hand some goodly and respectable thing; doth stench the fluxe of blood. In brieue, they speake of so manie matters, pleasant to heare, and very hard to be credited: as I can say nothing in the* case; but let such as please, make their own experience of them.

But returning againe to Rings & Signets, in Spaine they serue in all contracts, instead of full determination: also in matter of marriage, the two parties giue rings to ech other, as a signall and confirmation of the mutuall promise, which they haue made one to an other. In like manner, when religious women doe vndertake the veile; in signe of their profession, Rings are giuen them, as well from the religious house, as from their Parents, in testimony of this true and chaste marriage. There is yet another poynt, concerning this case in question, and though of small importance, yet it doth diuers needfull seruices. Many will change their Rings from one finger to another, for better remembering some occasion to be performed, which otherwise might remayne forgotten. Wherefore, if we consider well the vse of rings, they are not so much to be blamed as Pliny and some others doe: For, (in all times) men of vertue and honour haue vsed them. Hereto we may add, that God created golde and precious stones, for the seruice of man, and to maintaine him in health; enduing them with such sundrie properties, to the end they might be the more commodious for men. Finally, Rings are particularly attributed vnto Bishops, in signe of dignitie.

When e is came at the first, that the name of Gentleman was giuen, as wel to Knights, as to the sonnes of Presidents & Counsellors. What Armes the ancient Romans carried: And whence came the inuention of emblazoning Armes first in Escutcheons.

HE custome ordinarily obserued in France, Italy and Spain, is to call him a Gentleman, that is a Knight extracted of a noble house; especially such a one, as is a Gentleman by name and Arms. Also, when a King sends a man of noble house in Embassie, he stileth him so in his Patent, by these words: I send you a Gentleman of my house. Kings and Princes, as well in these dayes, as in times past, vsed to haue (ordinarily) in their Courts, men of learning, and Knights, who who were named Gentlemen of the Kings house, or Gentlemen seruants. And these Gentlemen were descended of great houses in the Kingdome, as well Schollers as Soulieders, and they remained continually in the Court, attending on the King in times of peace and warre. Wherefore, the name of Gentleman, signifies as much as Nobleman, and extracted of a noble lineage. Neuertheless, it appeareth not much differing from our purpose, to say somewhat, concerning whence came the name of Gentleman, or of Gentilitie, together, with the custome of bearing Arms in Escutcheons.

As touching the first point, the name of Gentle came from the Latines, who called such men Gentles or Gentiles, as were of one and the same race, and of one selfe same name; being at libertie, and of free condition from all Antiquitie: and those houses also were tearmed Ancient Gentiles, euen as now adayes we call them houses of Noble race, houses of Gentlemen. Which Cicero well witnesseth, in his Topickes, speaking thus: We call these Gentiles, that are of one name, and who from all times haue bene of free condition: so that no part or parcell of their race, was euer seruant or slave, and much lesse, degraded from honour, and of the Romaine Burgeship. And Batius also sayth in his Topickes, we call ancient Gentiles, all such as are issued of one ancient house and race, franke and free: as were the Scipioes, the family of Brutus, & other noble houses of Rome. Cicero likewise taketh this name of Gentle, for one that is of our race, and that beareth the same name and Armes as we doe.

The learned Budeus, speaking of deuoirs or duties of parentage, obserued among the Romaines, sayth: They were three in number: Dutie of consanguinitie, Dutie of blood and lineage direct line. And duty of Gentilitie, as much to say, as when a man is descended of the same name & Armes. The title then of Gentle or Gentility was and should be attributed onely to Noble houses. And therefore the name of Gentleman among the Romaines, valued as much as a Nobleman among the Castilians and French. And assuredly, the Romaine Gentlemen did (ordinarily) shew the Images and Deuices of their predecessors, that had illustrated their memorie by their worthy deedes: and this representation of Nobility, was highly esteemed among the Romaines, euen as yet to this day, are ancient Armes, and Penons and Standards, belonging to the predecessors of Gentlemen, who would not forget any thing of Antiquitie (concerning their Image) in funeral orations, made at the obsequies of their parents, thereby to haue the man accounted so much the more Noble.

In this respect Cicero reprooued Piso, in the change and pleading he made against him, saying: The honours and estates which thou hast obtained, were giuen thee, only for respect of the Image of thy predecessor, of whom thou carriest the colour onely; so that thou canst not be deemed to be a Gentleman. And in another place, speaking of himselfe, he confesseth: To haue no Images of his race; for by his excellent knowledge, admirable wisdom and highly esteemed eloquence, he so much ennobled himselfe; that he came to be Consul of Rome, enjoying other degrees and prerogatiues, euen as if hee had bene a Gentleman of race, and issued from the house of a Senator. Which himselfe also further confesseth in his last pleading against Verres, saying: Thou being great Surueyours of Rome, for some especiall seruices done by thee to the Common-wealth, hast a place appointed for thine Image, and enjoyed the priuileges of a Gentleman.

I reade, that the Romaines were verie careful of those Images, which were called Stemmata: for commonly they were made of waxe, and placed ouer the portallies of their houses; or else proudly kept in aptly contriued boxes, and so preferred in places appointed for their standing, as witnesseth Iuuenal, Martial, Seneca, Plinie, and many more.

And when there was question of some publicke ceremony or of funerall pompe, the people of the houses would make a goodly shew of the Images belonging to their Ancestours, with their names fixed vpon them, according as Plinie reporteth. He also declareth in his ninth booke and fifth chapter, that the Romaines would place before their houses, the Ensignes, Penons and other Coates of Armes and spoiles, which they had wonne from their enemies in war, and remained there to perpetuities: so that if the house were sold, it was not lawfull for the buyer to take them away, because they serued for an honour and prehemine vnto their houses.

From hence came the custome of bearing Armes in a Escutchian, as now adates Gentlemen vse to do. Notwithstanding, it seemes that the emblazoning of Armes, receiued their originall from those deuices, which were on the Banners and Ensignes, as well of the Romaines, as other strange Nations, and carried by them in warre. As at this very day, the Emperours beare an Eagle in their Armes; because Julius Cesar, the first Emperour of Rome, carried an Eagle in his Ensignes. As much may be said concerning the Flowers de Luces, which the Kings of France carrie, and of diuers other.

Now, concerning mine owne opinion, I finde, that long time before the Romaines were, the Armes of Gentlemen were in vse. For, it is said, in the first Booke of the Macchabees, that Simon, Captaine general of the Jews armie, made a very sumptuous sepulcher for his father, mother and brethren, which was enriched with Pyramids and Pillars, whereon was engrauen Ships, in manner of a Deuice; and thereon were fixed coats of Armes, wherewith he had vanquished his brethren. Messala Corvinus, in the Oration which he made, to honour the lineage of the Emperour Octavius (although the Oration deserued not the title of Messala, alleading Virgil, vpon that he wrote; affirming Antenor the Trojan, to be the founder of Padua) sayth; The Troians Armes were placed by Antenor, on the Temple of new Padua; and that the emblazon of the Armes, was a Swine in a field golde. So that, if Messala do speake truly, the vse of Armes is very auncient. Heereupon I conceiue, that the emblazons of Gentlemen, took name of Armes or Armories, because they were continually engrauen neare to their Armes. For, as Messala saith; Our Auncients, after they had obtained any victorie, ordinarily placed in their Temples, the Armes and Ensignes, wherewith they wonne the victorie from the enemy.

Wherefore we may well say, that the name of Gentleman, and the manner of bearing Armes in Escutchions, is no moderne matter, but very auncient; and that the name of Gentle or Gentile, came from those ordained and appointed for horsemen in the Romaine Caualerie:

who were of the third estate or degree amongst the common people. And they that wore the long robe or Gowne, were the Order of Senators, and their sonnes aunciently called Patricians; as much to say, as issued from fathers. For, in the time of Romulus, according as Titus Livius auoucheth: The Senatours were called Fathers, and their sonnes Patricians, and this degree was the most noble and chiefe in Rome. Other Gentlemen, that were not of this rancke, were stiled Knights: from whence issued, that Gentlemen in Spaine are called Cheualiers. The like we say of the long gownned men, who commaund ouer the people, as Senatours; and yet notwithstanding, they come after the other. Briefly, the name of Knight is come to such credite, as the very greatest do holde themselves honoured to be called Knight; albeit the name of Knight was but the proper title of a Souldier of the ordnances, or of the light horse.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Septuagint, or Seauentie Translations of the olde Testament, out of the hebreue into Greeke: At what time it was done, and for what occasion.

Every man is very briefe, concerning the traduction of the Seauentie persons, who translated the Olde Testament out of Hebrew into Greeke; but yet very few do know, whence it came, and wherefore that translation was so appointed: wherein assuredly, many Diuines, in their publique preaching, haue declared ouer-much sloath & negligence. First then it is to be obserued, that this Translation of the Seauentie men, hath bene only in the Church holily and religiously respected: but in the time of Pope Damasus, Saint Hierome conuerted it into Latine. And to speak seriously, the traduction of the Septuagint hath bene of such authoritie, that it is alleaged for diuine: for so it appeareth by our blessed Saviour and his Apostles, in often alleading Scriptures, according to the saide Translation.

And

And because the historie of that Translation is very worthy and famous, I will set downe that which is sayd by Saint Augustine, in his Booke of the Citie of God, Iosephus the Jew, Eusebius, Irenaeus, Iustinus, Ruffinus, and many other.

Here is to be noted, that the five bookes of Moses, the Prophets, and other Histories of the holy Bible, were first of all written in the Hebrew tongue, which was the first viual tongue among men; before the confusion of Tongues, which happened at the building of the Tower of Babylon. In that tongue and language God spake first to his Prophets; as the like our blessed Lord and Saviour did, when he was conuersant among men. This language then being particular to the Iewes, and the mysteries and prophecies (as also the coming of Christ) being concealed therein: it was very requisite, that such mysteries should be written in a tongue more common then the Hebrew: as that was then among the Greekes, who were sole Gouvernours of the wide Vniuerse, by the fresh and recent victories of Alexander the Great. So that, by the frequentation and traffique of men, the Greeke tongue had courie generally, and was esteemed the most common of all other Languages whatsoever.

To the end then, that the mysteries of sacred Scripture, might bee vnderstood of euery one, before the coming of Iesus Christ; it was requisite of necessity, that the Scriptures should be traduced into a common and vulgar tongue, for feare lest the Iewes at the Messias his coming, should suppress them, or else falsifie them (for that race of people was of bolde and most wicked inclination) because it might, and not be sayd, that the Christians had added or diminished any thing from the Scriptures, according to their owne humour and phantasie. And therefore, about two hundred and seauentie yeares before the Incarnation of Iesus Christ, it pleased the goodnesse of Almighty God, to inspire Ptolomie Philadelphus King of Egypt, to procure the translation of the holie Bible. But seeing we are fallen into discourse of that Prince; we will reach into his Historie somewhat higher.

After that Alexander the great had subdued Asia (which he performed in small compasse of time) and that he had ranged a great part of Europe and Africa: he died without any lawfull heire, that might succeede him in such great Empires. He being dead, the Princes and Captains of his Court, who were all most valiant and famous men: laboured by force of Armes to possesse themselves of what they possibly could: So that the kingdomes appertaining to Alexander onely, became diuided into many parts: for Antigonus possessed himselfe of Asia, Seleucus of Chaldea, and of many other Provinces. By the same meanes also Ptolomie, the sonne of Lagus made himselfe King of Egypt, of Phoenicia, of Cyprus, and diuerse other Countreies, among which Iudea then was one. Being Lord of Iudea, he made there many great booties, leading away store of Iewes captiues into Egypt, where hee had ordeined the chiefe seate of his Kingdome. So that he was the first King of Egypt, that called himselfe Ptolomie: which name remained hereditary to the successours in the sayd Kingdome; for, before that Cambyses, sonne to Cyrus, King of Persia, had conquered Egypt, all the Egyptian Kings called themselves Pharaohs.

But returning againe to our Ptolomie, after he had reigned a long time, he dyed, and then succeeded him Ptolomie Philadelphus, who likewise reigned peaceably in Egypt.

This Prince gaue leaue, and set at libertie all the Iewes, which his father led prisoners into Egypt. And then it came to passe, according to the pleasure of Almighty GOD, that this King erected a goodly Librarie, in Alexandria the capital Citie of Egypt, by the meanes of Demetrius Phalarus the Alenian, a man much renowned for his knowledge, and to whom hee gaue full power and commission. So that, by the diligence of Phalarus, hee compassed the finishing of the fairest and most compleate Librarie, that euer was scene in the world; as well for number of Bookes, as the qualitie of Authors, and diuinitie of disciplines.

This King, vnderstanding that the Bookes of the Iewes, contained admirable and vnespressible mysteries, resolved to haue them reduced into the Greeke language. And to effect this his purpose, he dispatched an Embassie to Elexazar, Prince of the Iewish Synagogue, with great presents; intreating him, in memory of fauours by him to those of his Nation, and for the good neighbourhood betweene them, to send him a Bible in Hebrue, as also such learned and skilfull men, as could translate it into the Greeke tongue. Iosephus and Eusebius haue set downe the forme of the Letter, which was as followeth:

The Tenour of the Letter, sent by King Ptolomy Philadelphus, to Eleazar the High-Priest.

Ptolomy a King, to the High-Priest Eleazar, health.

NO man can be ignorant, that manie Jewes haue dwelt in this kingdome of Egypt, being brought thither prisoners by the Persians, at such time as they subuigated Iudea. And againe, when the late deceased king my father brought diuers hither also, to whom (neuertheless) my said Lord & Father trusted so much, that they did him seruice in his warres: yea, he planted them in strong forts, by way of Garrisons, to keep the Egyptians in awe & feare. As for my selfe, from such time as I came to the Crowne, I haue alwaies vsed humanity towards your Nation, and haue sent home more then 200000 that were detained here as slaues, paying their ranfome & charges to them that held them prisoners. Such as desired to follow the wars, to them I haue giuen wages, euery one answerable to his worth and merit. Many of them I haue lodged in mine owne house ordinarily, as hoping by this means, to do somewhat acceptable to God; who deliuered this Kingdome into my hands.

And the better to declare the affection I beare in doing all pleasures that I can to you, and all the rest of your nation, as well for the time present as to come: I haue determined, to cause your Bookes in the Hebrew language, to be translated into the Greek tongue, because I would not haue my newly erected Library, to remaine vnfurnisht any way. And therefore you shall chuse a great number, to chuse fiftie auncient men out of each Tribe, that are expert in your Lawe; and well versed in the Greek tongue, for this intended translation. Not doubting, but that it will redound to our great honour, and ample contentment of mind. For this purpose, I haue sent vnto you Am- dress and Aristeus, who more at large will informe you of mine intention: to them haue I deliuered large summes of gold and silver, to fulfill the Sacrifices as I haue appointed them, desiring you to send mee by them, such as may further this negotiation. Assuring you, that you cannot doe me a greater pleasure, nor more, to maintaine the friendship begun betweene vs: if (as I intreat you) this may be done with some expedition. Ptolomie.

After that the High-Priest Eleazar had received the Kings Letters, and understood the further trust referred to the Ambassadors; he entertained them very honorably, receiuing (with chearefull looks) the golde and silver sent by king Ptolomie, which (according to Iosephus) was a mightie quantitie. And hauing assembled the principall men of the twelue Tribes of Israel, hee acquainted them with the Kings intention, and to what end he had sent the Ambassadors. Wherein, to satisfie his desire, they elected out of each Tribe fix aged men, well experimented in the Lawe, and expert in the Greek language. For the Jewes had a custome to send their people into Asia, to learne the Greek and Latine tongues, as also the Artes and Sciences comprised vnder those languages, euen as yet to this day they obserue the same; so that all the men made choice of, were seuentie two. After they were thus chosen, they were sent with the Ambassadors to king Ptolomie, and the Bookes of the Old Testament with them, written (as Iosephus sayth) in most places all in golden Letters, and vpon such parchment, the most ingeniously made that euer was seene. Moreouer, he sent diuers great gifts to the said Prince, returning him answer in maner following.

The Answer of the High-Priest Eleazar, to great king Ptolomy Philadelphus, Eleazar, to his friend King Ptolomie, health.

I Am very glad of your present welfare, and the health of Queene Arctinoe your wife, with the young Lords your Sonnes, or any thing you can wish to your contentment: certifying you likewise of my instant healthfull condition. By the Misfortune you sent vnto mee, I vnderstand the faire loue and affection, which you beare to our Nation, and haue caused your letters to bee publicly read before all the people, and to let them fully vnderstand, what holy deuotion you declare towards God; I haue exposed to open view, the twenty Vessels of gold, and thirty of silver, together with fifty Cups, and a Table of silver for the sacrifices, beside forty Talents of gold, and as many of silver, sent by you to furnish the Ornaments of our Temple. All which I haue received from the hands of the Noble Lords Andreas and Aristeus, your faithfull Counsellors and Ambassadors, who haue amply entrusted vs in the cause by you required. And therefore, we haue sent them backe againe vnto yee, offering our selues by them, to accomplish your good pleasure.

And because the extraordinary great fauours which you haue done to them of our Nation, are such, as it is impossible for vs to vie or return any condigne requital: wee must make our recourse to solemne prayers and sacrifices, for the prosperity of you, of your Queene, and of the Noble Lords your sonnes. In which holy action, all our people very voluntarily desire to employ their vtmost paines, in crauing of God, to further and finish your desires, as may best stand with the conseruation of your Estate, and maintenance of your Kingdome in glory and honour.

Now concerning the Translation of the Bookes of our Law, by you so greatly and earnestly desired; we haue elected fix Auncients out of our severall Tribes, who we send vnto you, with the Bookes of our Bible. But when the Translation shall be perfected; according to the office of a iust and louing king, wee desire that they may be sent backe againe to their native Country.

Eleazar, and the people of the Jewes.

When King Ptolomy had receiued the Letters of Eleazar, with the Bookes of the Bible, and such Presents as were sent by Eleazar; he most royally welcomed the seuentie two aged men, and (as Iosephus sayth) ioyed not a litle for their arrival. Their lodgings being prepared, & all things necessary for their employment, they setled themselves to the Bibles translation: wherein happened an admirable and miraculose case; for the seuentie two men being placed seaparately, according to the kings Commission, without any meanes or power of conferring one with another: after they had thus diuidedly finished their Translation, they all appeared before the King with their severall labours, and were found therein all so conforme and agreeing, that one man had not a fillable more then another; which doubtlesse could not bee done, without the power and especiall grace of the holy Ghost, according to the saying of S. Augustine, Irenaeus and Tertullian, who auoucheth in his time, to haue seene at Alexandria in Egypt, the written Bookes of the seuentie two Translators, vnder their own hands, which were in Hebrew and in Greece.

As much is said and maintained by Iustinus the Philosopher, in the booke of Advertisements, which he wrote to the Gentiles and Pagans, where he speaketh thus. King Ptolomy caused to bee builded without the City of Alexandria, seuentie two Houses, to lodge therein seaparately, the seuentie two Translators, and there provided for them all things necessary, in most honourable manner. In which places the Translators remained, without seeing one another, until the translation was perfected. Nay more, he affirmed to haue seene the ruines and old walls of those buildings, which were esteemed as reliques and sacred things. And although S. Hierome and Ruffinus do disagree concerning the number of those Houses or Chambers; yet notwithstanding, that is no matter of any moment, considering (according to S. Augustine, and many other Authors) each Translator wrote his bookes alone by himselfe, notwithstanding conferring one with another, and yet neuertheless, all the Translations were found conformable.

And assuredly, when I consider aduisedly on this mystery, I hold it for a mighty miracle, that they should agree in such a conformity of stile, order and method, traducing matter so long and diuers, although they had bene admitted altogether, and had begun the worke with their owne agreement, because we see it a matter of no meane moment, to finde two men agreeing vpon one and the same point, when when they are to intermeddle with one argument together. But, after the translation was finished, the Lewes which dwell in Egypt, and were very learnedly skillfull in their Law, commended these Sacred writings to the King, wherewith hee was most highly pleased. And according as Iosephus and Eusebius do maintaine, King Ptolomy, being amazed at those Scriptures, and the holy mysteries in them comprized, demanded of Demetrius Phalaris, who had the charge of his Library, how it hapned, that Lycurgus, Solon, and other Law-makers, were silent in this law of the Lewes? Whereunto Demetrius thus answered.

Sir, this Law, as your selfe haue sufficiently seene, came from God; and no Lawyer euer durst be so bold, to meddle with it vnderenly, or misuse any text therein contained. Theopompus was smitten with the hand of heauen, with an extraordinary perturbation in his senses, and mighty paine at his hart: because he medled with the holy Histories of the Hebrews among his owne, beautifying the with borrowed words, and rhetoricall phrases. But upon his true repentance and humiliation to God, committing himselfe wholly to his mercy, it was revealed to him in his sleep: that this disaster happened to him, because he durst be so bolde, to embelish and enrich the sincerity of holy Scripture, with curious and adorning words; and thereby to impart them to Pagan and Infidell Nations.

I remember also to haue read, that Theodorus a Tragical Poet, lost his sight sodainly for taking a place of Scripture to maintaine an argument in his Tragedy: and yet upon his vnfeigned repentance, his sight was restored to him againe.

King Ptolomy wondering at this discourse of Demetrius, placed the translated Bible in his Library, and hauing thankfully respected the ancient Lewes, he licensed their departure, giuing to each man sumptuous gifts; thanking likewise (by his Letters) the Prince Eleszar, to whom he sent Kingly presents. Thus you see, how the translation of the Septuagint was performed, they being men (as S. Augustine and Saint Hierom saide) that then had the spirit of Prophesie: which appeared plainly, in that our blessed Lord and his Euangelists, alledged Scriptures according to their translation. And if perchappes any thing is found in the Hebrew Bible, which is not in the translation of the Septuagint, wee may well say, that the holy Ghost would not reueale it by their means. And contrarywise, if some thing bee in their translation & is not in the Hebrew text: we must verily beleue, that the blessed Spirit reuealed the passage by their meanes. For the selfsame Spirit that directed the Prophets, when they set down their Prophecies in writing, governed the seauenty two Translators in translating the holy Bible; so faith S. Augustine, concerning the version of the Old Testament.

This was the first, before the coming of Iesus Christ; for, after our Saviours Passion, Aquila the Lew wrote another. Two other translations were afterwards performed, but by whom it was not known: notwithstanding, they came to the hands of Saint Hierom, as Eusebius maketh mention in the first booke of his Ecclesiastical history. By these translations the Bible was reduced out of Greeke into Latine: but Saint Hierom did his out of Hebrew into Latine, without staying on the Septuagints labour, nor the other Greeke translations. Beside, Palmes and other things are sung and sayde in the Church, whereof no disputation neede to be made, whether they were of S. Hieroms writing or no.

Of the admirable vertues and proprietie, which God and Nature hath giuen vnto the Ant, Emmet, or Pisse-mire: And what worthy examples haue from it bin deriued.

You may well say, that it is no difficult matter for mee, to speake of the Nature and properties of Creatures, hauing for my Patroness, Masters, and Guides, Aristotle, Pliny, Alianus, and many other, writing on that argument: but because my desire extendeth selfe beyonde ordinary compasse, courting things curious, and knowne to few people; I purpose to say something of the Ant, Emmet, or Pisse-mire; albeit in regard of the creatures smallnesse, some may thereby take occasion to condemne my discourse. Neuerthelesse, let their humors serue them howsoeuer, I cannot exclude this creature out of our rich & spacious Forrest: for there is not any garden how warily or closely soeuer it bee kept; but the Ant will make his entrance, euen in despite of the Master and Owner. And how little in our iudgement and subltie of the creature, it seemeth to vs; yet many renowned Authors haue written wonderful things thereof.

Very true it is, that Pliny sayeth; This creature is vnprofitable, and of no worth at all, but onely for it selfe: when contrariwise, the Bee, as little as it is, doeth (neuerthelesse) giue a pleasing taste to our food, by the sweet sauer of his honey, whereas the Ant doeth gnaw and eate them. But yet in another place, he speaketh wonders of the Ant, & extollet it extraordinarily. For, concerning the blamefull imputation hee imposeth on this little creature, it proceedeth from a certaine kinde of Couetousnesse, whereunto man is so inclined for his own particular profit, that he would deriue benefit from all creatures, how small soeuer they be, being greatly offended, that our Ant should prouide it selfe of one poore graine of Corne. But if we would consider things, in such kinde as duly appertaineth to them, we should finde more profit from the Ant, then from the Bee. For the Ant serueth vs as an example of industry, prouidence and friendship, and of many other vertues beside, related at large by Salomon in his Proverbs, who sendeth the sluggard to the Ant, to consider what paine and sollicitude hee taketh, and to learne discipline and direction of her. For, hauing neither guide or Captaine, or way to command and direct her: shee prepareth her food in the Summer for Winter.

From hence it ensued, that Saint Ambrose (speaking of this silly little creature) vseth these words: The designes and enterprises of the Ant, being iustly considered, do farre exceede her power and strength. And although she haue none to incite her to labor: yet notwithstanding, by a certaine kind of dominion or authority, she prouideth for after-claps and future necessities. Behold what

Saint Ambrose hath saide, who speaketh much more amply concerning the proprieties of this little Ant; whereon Cicero likewise discoursing, sayeth: That the Ants Commonwealt is to be aduised to every City. For, not onely they haue vnderstanding like other Animales: but also they haue sense, reason, and memory.

Pliny, Aristotle, and Alianus, are verie stayed in iudgement, for their consideration of the Ant, and not without great reason: for in duly observing her forme, her dreadfull aspect, her hardnesse, her lively colour, and her piercing knowe; there is not any Lion so fierce as this creature, were it but as great as it is little; it is so strong, bold, and dreadfull.

First, there is not any animall, that can carry the weight of himselfe: but the Ant carrieth and draweth ten times a heauier load then it selfe, so that if this final creature were as great as a horse, it would easily beare the burthen of foure Waggon. Other beasts can hardly defend themselves against her assaults; for, although shee is so small a worme, yet notwithstanding, her teeth are so strong, as the very hardest graine of Corne is not able to withstand them. Nay, she will carry hard stones in her teeth, and howsoeuer she fasteneth vpon them, shee will squash and bruisse them, holding them so forcibly: that no pincers are able to open her mouth. And so opiniuitie is she is of her power, as shee will rather suffer her selfe to be rent in peeces, then to forsake whatsoever shee holdeth: which strength would be farre greater, if her body were equiualent thereto.

But leauing her strength (whereof so small account is made, in regard of her littlenesse) let vs somewhat consider the natural instinct, together with the vertue & wisdom abiding in her. For nature (throughout the whole wide world) hath not produced any other creature, making more demonstration of vertue, then the Ant: nor fith profession of amity, industry, prouidence, and diuers other singular vertues, as wee shall haue occasion to speake of hereafter, in theyr apte places.

In the prime place, Ants haue the form of a Commonwealt among themselues, according as Pliny saith; for they haue neither King, Lord, nor any Commander; as much is affirmed by Aristotle and Salomon:

and the people feare them as they do Lyons, according to the testimony of diuers Authors. And some say, that in digging and turning vp the earth, they throwe vp great quantities of gold; which the country people go to gather, when these dreadful Ants are retired; which they dare not do, if they but sent them in the fields. For sometimes, these Ants hauing winded those seekers for Gold, rush forth vpon them, and kill as many as they can meete withall.

And they haue no other means to seek for gold with safety, but by comming thither mounted vpon light Camels, for their better expedition in flight. And if (by mischance) these Ants do winde those Gold-finders; they haue some peece of flesh hanging about them, which sodainly they let fall, and so escape away. Finally, it seemeth a thing monstrous, that our Ants should be charged with wings: Neuertheless, there is a common Prouerbe, saying: To the damme of the Ant, wings are proper. Whereby it appeareth, that some further meaning is hid therein: because such creatures as haue Wings, the winds will carrie them whether they please.

CHAP. XXVIII.

From whence it proceedeth, that some men live long, and others farre lesse while. And what complexion is the best for liuing long. Also how we are to vnderstand the place, where it is said, that The dayes of a man are numbred.

THE Apostle S. Paul sayeth, That all men are subiect once to dye, and therein all men are equall and alike. Notwithstanding, there is a difference in the tearmes of life; because some live long, and other lesse space. Neuertheless (as Job saith) The time of our life is compassed, and no man can passe the boundes which God hath limited and determined to our life. These things then standing thus (as in truth they do) it is not ill or amisse, to vnderstand that which causeth the life of man; wherefore one liueth longer then another; what complexion is most proper for long life: and lastly, how it ought to be vnderstood, when it is said, that our dayes are counted and determined, being no way able to passe on further, which are points sufficiently obscure, and comprehended by few people.

To vnderstand therefore the cause of long life, it behooueth vs to presuppose in the first place, that the life of man, and maintenance of this his humane bodie, consisteth in the concord and harmony of the foure Elementary qualities whereof it is composed, as namely heate, colde, moysture, and drinesse. But expressly in the proportionable harmony of heate and moiture, which Aristotle well declareth: who onely maketh mention of the conueniency of these two qualities, for the support and continuance of man. In like manner, we perceiue by experience, that man hath little care of his owne failing, so long as he keepeth his naturall heate: for that heate is the principall instrument, to conserue the vegetatiue soule.

Now, to speake vprightly, the life of man consisteth in nothing else, then in maintaining the instruments and organes of the soule; among which, naturall heat (by right) holdeth the prime place: for this heate is so necessary to support mans body, as whensoever it is failing, the soul is constrained to forsake the body, & giue a period to the life of man. And because this naturall heate holdeth of fire, which (of his owne nature) consumeth whatsoever it meeteth withall: it was truly conuenient, that another contrarie qualitie should be opposed against it, for conseruation of the inferiour bodies. Vpon which occasion, God placed the radicall or naturall humor, with this naturall heate, onely to nourish and maintaine it, euen as fire feedeth it selfe by Oyle. And, in regard that this radicall humor consumeth and diminisheth it selfe daily; to supply & defend it, it was necessary, that all Creatures should browse and feede, and that by means thereof, the humor (being the cause of digestion) should supply the naturall defect.

But seeing that (according to Aristotle) the humor which is cause of digestion, is neuer so perfect as the radicall and naturall, although it serueth much for maintenance: of necessity the radicall humor decayeth

The harmony of the foure elementary qualities gouerneth the body of man.

The humor which is cause of digestion, is neuer so perfect as the radicall humor.

caueth it selfe daily (for the accidental humor, cause of digestion, is neuer so perfect as the radicall, which vaniseth away) and by this meanes of intirely vanishing, naturall heate loseth it selfe, and the body takes ending. For, if the humor radicall, and cause of digestion, were so perfect as the naturall humor vanished away, a man should liue infinitely, according to Diuines say. Who maintain, that the propriety of the Tree of life, which God placed in the terrestriall Paradise, consisted in this principally: that eating the fruite thereof, it should re-establish the radicall humor, that else would vanish & be lost. From hence it ensued, that this tree was prohibited to Adam and Eue, after they were excluded out of terrestriall Paradise. For, if our first Parents had kept themselves in their original righteousness; they and their successors, feeding on the fruite of that tree, had liued eternally in the flower of their time, without euer tasting corruption, or old age: vntill such time as God had glorified their bodies, without enduring the passage of death. But seeing that humane Linage hath lost this prerogative by sinne, which brought death into the world; it is no wonder, if this defect sheweth it selfe in vs all.

Proceeding now to our former purpose, I say, that life endureth more or lesse, according as the radicall humor is concordant and proportionable: for they in whom these qualities are most temperate and best proportioned, liue longest, and not such as abound in those qualities. From thence it cometh, that wee see many small animals, who haue least heat and humidity, to liue (neuertheless) longer then they that are of bigger and greater bulke, and abound more in the said qualities; which likewise cometh so to passe in trees, as well as in men. So that we may say, and say truly, that long life consisteth in the temperature and iust proportion of heate and moiture: which wanting their kind companion life, dissolueth it selfe. For when heate ouer aboundeth humidity, it consumeth the body in little time, as may be discerned in chollericke men. Where contrariwise, by excessiue humidity, heat feeleth it selfe to be quenched, as in Fleumaticke persons it happeneth in the same manner. Neuertheless, we do not by these examples vnderstand, that hee must also faile, who hath as much of the moyt humor as of heat, because it is necessary, that a proportion should be obserued therein: that is to say, heate to exceed humidity proportionably. For, one thing being agent, hath no great vertue in working on the other, if it surmount not the part patient. And this did Aristotle couertly declare, when he said; Among those two qualities before remembered, there ought to be a little coldnes mingled, to moderate the heat of the radicall fire, so the end, it may not wholly consume the humor naturall. And drinesse also is as requisite, to dry up the radicall humor, so that it may not extinguish the naturall fire. As we often see to happen in young children, that dy by ouermuch humidity; notwithstanding, among these foure qualities, heate and moiture are held for the principall, as being vitall complexions, & causing life. As for the humors cold and dry, although they serue greatly to the conseruation of life: yet neuertheless these two qualities are held for the doore & entrance to death. Because cold is enemy to heate, wherein principally consisteth the point of life: and drinesse is opposite and contrary to moiture, which yet is the nourisher of naturall heat. According as wee see in aged people, who grow to be colde and dry, when they draw nere to death; as chiefly in dead bodies, which ordinarily are dry and colde. A man then (according to the good temperature of heate) ought also to temper his complexion by these foure qualities, and that in such sort: as, to maintaine his heate in the first place, and humidity next after, causing cold and dry to do seruice, according to their offices & quarters. By which means, they that finde not themselves thus proportionably tempered, are naturally off short life: thus then you see the causes of long life.

Now remaineth that somewhat should be saide, concerning the best complexion of all other, for the maintenance of long life. First of all then is to be noted, that of the foure complexions, as Choler, flegme, Blood, & Melancholy, blood is the best, to help him in the length of life: for blood is hot & moist, which qualities are the aptest to prolong life. But the humidity must not be watry, but airy, being hot & moist, and so the sanguine complexion, participating of some temperate heat and moiture sufficient to nourish the heat, it is most proper of all the complexions to make long life. As for the Choleric complexion, it is of lesse continuance, because the vivacity and force of his fire, and also of the heate, cannot long endure with his drynesse. The Phlegmaticke & watric complexion, cannot bee digested by heate, in regard of his excessive humidity: & therefore falleth easily into corruption, which (in the end) procureth death.

The melancholy complexion, being earthie, abridgeth life by his coldnesse & drought, which are qualities contrary to heate and moisture: and therefore it is not to bee wondered at, though they shorten life, by over-abounding in some bodies. Notwithstanding, if Choller mingle it self with Phlegme, and that it surmounteth proportionably the Phlegme; that Complexion also is very apt to maintaine long life. When likewise blood surpasseth Melancholy in a good proportion, that complexion is good: for the heate and humidity of the blood do beguile themselves, with the cold and driness of melancholy. Whereby we may gather, that there are compounded Complexions, which are much better then the Sanguine simple, to preserve and prosper the length of life.

By that which formerly hath bene said, we may perceiue, that the life of man is limited by power and vertue of his Complexion, and by the proportion of Elementary qualities: so that the diuersitie of proportions doe cause the diuersity of termes of life in man. And some hold, that a man may liue so long as naturall heate lasteth, and the radicall humor giueth maintenance. Also, whereas some say, that the life of man hath his limit, beyond which, it is impossible for him to passe; it is to be noted, that although the complexion and naturall vertue of man, may supply and maintaine vnto the latest point; yet notwithstanding, of a thousand men, hardly one attaineth to that point, because there are so many disasters which happen accidentally, or else by some disorder: that the most part die, before nature failes in them, either by hunger, pestilence, poison, goutmandize, whoredome, bad victuals, or by diseases, caused throw inhuir excesses in me, by them daily committed, and so the true naturall terme of mans life is, when nature faileth, being the viterly impossible for them to passe that point.

Thus are we to vnderstand that place in Iob, where it is sayde: Lord, thou hast established the bounds of mans life, which is impossible for him to go beyond. Whereby may clearly be discerned, that a man may very easily shorten his life, but not lengthen it. So that we see many of good complexion, and likely to liue a World of yeares: who neuertheless are of short life, by some exterior cause, which hastens on the expiration of their daies. Notwithstanding, that passage in Iob may bee otherwise vnderstood, in regard of Gods preference or foreknowledge, who giueth to euery one his terme of life; be it by his naturall complexion, or by some other meanes, which he hath assigned to the life of man. And because there is nothing hidden from the wisdom of God (for, hee knoweth all the causes and accidents that can happen to man) it is impossible for man, to haue any power of lengthening his life, beyond the ordination of God, although there were contingent causes.

In this respect it may be said, that there are two termes in the life of man, one whereof, dependeth vpon the harmony & proportion of the Elementary qualities; and the other is according to the preordination and preference of God. Between which termes, there is onely this difference, that a man may come or proceede so farre as the first, and yet without passing it; but all men attaine to the second. And although that (by course of nature) some one may passe on to his second terme; yet notwithstanding, there is not any that can go beyond it; as the like may bee sayde of other creatures and plants.

peare good to vnderstand, at what times the naturall harmonie of the Elementary qualities (which support the body of man) began to grow into decadence; which, from the beginning of the world, euen to this instant day, hath kept alwayes in diminution, concerning the temperature of Complexions, with the quality of fooles, which do conferre and establish life, and yet mans life daily waxing to be lesse and lesse in continuance.

In the first world, men liued eight hundred and nine hundred yeares, according as we haue already declared in our former volume, and the eighth Chapter, where is amply related the yeares of our ancient forefathers, farre differing from ours. Our present intention and purpose, is to speake concerning the decadence of the age of man; a matter very remarkable, & whereof the sacred Scripture doth make mention. For it is written, that the first declining of mans yeares or age, was ruled and limited to an 120. yeares, immediately after the flood, according as we read in Genesis, where the Lord God himselfe said, The life of man shall be an hundred and twentie yeares. Not that hee saith, that a man cannot out-liue six score yeares; but as if that the rest or over-plus of his life, will be but wearisome and insupportable old age.

Abraham, who was long time after the deluge, liued an hundred seuentie and five yeares. Iacob was an hundred and thirty yeares olde, when he went down into Egypt, where hee yet liued ten yeares longer. And so of many other to bee alleged, that liued many happy yeares. Since then, the life of man became shortned againe, euen in the time of Dauid, who speaketh thus in one of his Psalmes. The dayes of our age is threescore yeares and ten, & though men be so strong, that they attaine to foure score yeares; yet is their strength then, but labour and sorrow, so soone it passeth away, and we are gone. Now a dayes we see, that such as are of feeble Complexion, passe not about fiftie and fifty yeares, and (very strong men) but three score & fiftie (I meane in lusty disposition, for operatiue actions to be in men) & therefore the life of man in these our daies, lasteth not the twentieth part, of those men liuing in the worlds first Age, and howe much shorter they will be, God only knoweth.

The ancient Philosophers labored verily, in seeking a reason for this difference and decadence in mens yeares. Some attributed it to the celestiall influences. Others alleged farre contrarie reasons, as Plinie, and many more beside, that limit the life of man to fixe score yeares. Berossus alloweth no more then 20 hundred and seauenteene; Petofiris, an hundred twenty six: but Censorinus (following the opinion of the Philosopher Effratius) assigneth a man to liue but foure score yeares. Dioscorides, imitating the Egyptians, and speaking of the life of man, saith: It is long or short, according vnto the poise or weight of his heart. Euen as we haue more at large deliuered, in the precedent part to this Volume, where manie reasons are alleged, making to this purpose, without presuming into any secret, concerning the will and providence of God.

In the first place, God ordaind a creature to eate and drinke, for maintenance of the naturall and radicall humor, granting them means also, to perpetuate their severall kindes, by the acte of generation. But, as eating & drinking is not sufficient enough, to re-establish the radicall humor, which diminisheth and vanisheth away of it selfe daily, so that life may likewise be lost as soone as it is; so is it not possible also, to yeeld a body by the acte of generation, of such compleat perfection, as others were, that liued in the first age of the world. For the vertue and power of the radicall complexion (which is called the principal complexion) is mightily decayed: & from hence it enlieth, that the life of man became abridged and shortned dayly more and more.

Another reason, which neuertheless dependeth vpon the former, is this; that the food wherewith man sustaineth himselfe, hath lost, and cometh far short of such vertue, as it had at the beginning of the world. So that it is viterly impossible, to haue mankind in such bodily perfection, as the men of the first world had. And therefore the vertue of complexion failing in man, and the harmonie of the Elementary qualities being adulterated and bastardized, and fooles likewise decayed in goodness; it is no marvel, if our present life be become so much shortned. And though those times then obserued, euen as an ordinarie limitation to the life of man: yet notwithstanding, diuers persones (among them) haue bene noted to liue longer then some other, by being of a strong and good complexion; and in regard it pleased God that it should be so, whose hand is neuer tied, much lesse subiect to any law or limit. Neuertheless, because we may not complaine, concerning our little time of life, and also to comfort vs in the breuitie thereof: I will set downe certaine examples of some men, that haue exceeded others in length of life, though not speaking of any in the first age, because such as I purpose to discouerie on, liued long since that large extent of life came to be thorned.

Arpachshad, sonne of Sem, and Nephew to Noah, liued two hundred yeeres after the flood; and yet notwithstanding, he attained to foure hundred and thirty yeeres before he dyed. Shelah also his sonne, liued foure hundred and three yeeres. Heber, the son of Shelah, (of whom the Hebrewes took their name) liued foure hundred sixty and seuen yeeres. In his time happened the confusion of tongues: but he lately preferred the Hebrew, which was the first language of the worlde) because he consented not to the proud building of Babel's Tower.

Terah, the Father of Abraham, liued two hundred and fife yeeres, and Abraham liued an hundred, seauentie and fife yeeres; as also Isaac an hundred seauenty fife yeeres, after which time, the life time of men beganne greatly to diminish. Neuertheless, Moses liued six score yeeres, and Aaron six score and thre yeeres: Sara, that ancient matrone (so much renowned) liued six score and seuen yeeres, and that valiant woman Judith who smote off the head of Holofernes, liued an hundred and fife yeeres, as we may reade in the sacred Scriptures, which render true testimony of all that hath hitherto bin said.

Now, as concerning prophane Histories, many are recorded to liue long time: as Neistor, who liued so faire and large an extent of life, that our reuerend predecessors, when they desired the long life of any man; they wished, that hee might liue Neistor's yeeres, hee being three hundred yeeres old, when he went with the Greekes to Troy. For Homer sayeth: Prince Neistor being about three hundred yeeres of age, went to succour the Greekes against the Troyans, with a potent army by sea.

The same is also auouched by Ouid, Iuuenall, and Tibullus, with many other Authors besides. Arganthonius, King of Andalouzia (anciently called Turdissima) liued an hundred and fiftie yeeres, according as Strabo affirmeth, from the Poet Aschreom: Neuertheless Heraclutus, and Silius Italicus, a Spanish Poet do auouch, that this Prince liued the space of three hundred yeeres.

Valerius Maximus, and Pliny also say, that he reigned fourescore yeeres, and liued six score yeeres. Pliny likewise maketh a large Narration, of certaine Kings in Arabia, and many other (as well men as women) that liued multitudes of yeeres: but because matters fecht so farre off, may raise doubt and suspicion, I will insert other histories, which are maintained to be true and certaine.

Valerius Maximus Corvinus, did liue an hundred yeeres, at it is auouched by Valerius Maximus, hauing bene six times Consul of Rome: and further saith, That there were sixe and forty yeeres betweene his first Consulship, and the last yeere of his honor in the same dignity, and that he liued the rest of his age in abledisposition, so that hee could make good vse of all the dignities and Offices imposed vpon him.

Stephanus the Romane, being farre entered into yeeres, serued as dancer before the Emperour Octauius, in those Secular pastimes which he ordained in Rome: and seueny three yeeres after, hee danced againe in the sports of the Emperour Claudius, and yet liued long time afterwarde. Titus Fulinius, borne in Bologna, liued an hundred and fiftie yeeres, as appeared by the numbering and accounts, made from fife yeeres to fife yeeres in elder times, & wherein the Emperour Claudius tooke great paines to be informed in the truth, for he was very curious in such matters.

And, not to estrange or barre women, from the benefite of our instant discourse, but to blesse them also with hope of long life; it is obserued that Terentia, the wife of Cicero, liued an hundred and seuenteen yeeres. Claudia, the Wife of Offellus, attained to an hundred and fiftie yeeres of age, hauing had fifteen male children.

Pliny reporteth a matter very admirable, and yet true, that in the accounts and numberings made by Titus and Vespasian, then Censors, there liued three men at Parma, each of them being aged six score yeeres, and two that were six score and ten yeeres old; beside a woman, that was aged six score and twelue yeeres. He saith moreover, that in Romania, there were foure and fifty men, each of them being an hundred yeeres olde: fifty seauen men being aged an hundred and tenne yeeres: foure men, aged an hundred and thirtie yeeres: and other foure men, who were feuerally aged six score & fifteen yeeres: beside foure men more, each of them being seauen score yeeres old, a thing not vsuall, and hardly to be seene in these daies of ours.

Hee hauing attained to an hundred and seuen yeeres, was demanded, why heooke so great delight to abide in the world; whereunto he thus replied, I thanke God, I neuer did any thing, whereby I deserued to be blamed in mine Age. An answer very excellent and singular, for such as are able to make or speake it truly.

Seneca the Philosopher, borne at Carduba, liued an hundred & fourteen yeeres. The famous Apollonius Thyaneus hadde passed an hundred yeeres before he dyed. Democritus, by the testimony of Diogenes, liued an hundred and nine yeeres; and dyed, hauing neuer felt Feauer, nor any other disease. Galen, the Prince of Phylitians, liued (in absolute and able disposition) an hundred and forty yeeres: and dyed by defect of Nature, without the lesse of any sickness.

* Attyla, King of the Goshes, who (in his time) was most cruell, and of great power liued an hundred and foure yeeres, seruing as a scourge to mankinde, and making lamentable waste and spoile by his warres, and infinite cruelties. Masimista, King of Ginner, liued fourescore and seauenteene yeeres, hauing reigned threescore. This Prince neuer had his head covered, neyther from the Sun, windes, or raines, or greatest Tempests, but continued so (bare-headed) to his very latest dayes: marching alwayes on foote in his Armour, and as lightly as the youngest fouldier in his Armie. When hee was fourescore yeeres of age, he begate a Son, and left (after his death) foure and forty sonnes, by him begotten.

As for Hermites and ancient Fathers, many are recorded to liue long, onely by their abstinence; as Saint Paule, the first Hermit, who liued sixe score yeeres; Saint Anthony the Egyptian Hermit, who liued an hundred and fifty yeeres; and Crenius (his Companion) an hundred. Now a dayes, wee finde few, or none at all, to liue so long, for (day by day) the life time of man groweth shorter and shorter; whereby it appeareth, that the end of the world approacheth neere. Neuertheless God hath declared his wonderful workes in all times; for in the life of the Emperour Conrade, which was in the yeere one thousand, one hundred, and forty, or nere thereabout, a man dyed, who had serued the Emperour Charlemagne in his warres, so large a time, that this man was founde to haue liued three hundred and threescore yeeres, and was called Iohn of Time. Which name was giuen him (as I thinke) in regard of his great age; and I am halfe perswaded also, that of him was raised the old Prouerbe, when men commonly saide, Iohn, Iohn, thou art thou in God.

Galen, Prince of all other Phylitians.

* A valiant Scythian Prince, who subdued Parmania, &c.

He was also King of Nauidia.

The long life of Hermits & holy Fathers.

Iohn of Time hadde liued 360 yeeres.

CHAP. XXX.

A briefe Chronologicall Survey, concerning the Netherlands, divided into feventeene Prouinces: with a breuiate of the Earles and Princes there reigning, from Thierry (who was the first Earle of Holland and Zeland) to this instant time.

Concerning the Originall of the people inhabiting these countries, wee finde, that two Brethren, sonnes to the king of Cathes, the one being named Battus, or Batton; and the other Zelandus, were the first Fathers of them, and that (from them) they deriued their Names. For these two Princes, being too extreame ly pursued by the hatred of a Stepmother, and no way pittied or supported by the King their father (escaping many traines and machinations, of poysoning, murdering, and diuers other dangers by her daily deuised and put in practise against them) were forced to forsake their native abiding, & fly to an Island within the Rhine: where Battus determining to make his stay, called it Battania, after his owne Name; and that is (in plainer vnderstanding) Holland.

Zelandus, not liking to liue so neere, or with his brother (least pursuit should surprize them both, and reuenge there fasten which in more desperate place they had auoyded) he trauelled on to the vtermost confines of the Rhine, and liking there to set downe his rest, imitated his Brothers example (in styling the country) and called it Zeland.

Concerning their building of Cities, Townes, Castles, and Forts, which afterward came to be ruined & defaced againe by warres with the Romans, Saxons, Gauls, Danes, &c. or to what order of life the people disposed themselves, and through how many and infinite encumbrances (from their originall) they passed, for no meane store of yeares together: these are matters meereley exempt from our intended breuities, and may more amply be seen in the history at large, whereunto I refer any such desirous Reader, and borrowing fauour for so large a leap, I instantly proceeded to the yeare, 863. when Holland first became to be an Earledome.

In the yeare before mentioned, Charles the Bald, King of France, at Bladell in the Prouince of Campaigne, hauing there (in his company) a generall assembly of his Princes and Barons, for consultation of many important matters; pleased to aduance the two sonnes of Count Haghen (who was Vnckle to the King) for their great deseruings, and for the farther encouragement of the like vertuous minded Gentlemen. Walger, who was the eldest sonne, he made Earle of Theyssebrandt; and Thierry the yongest son, or Theodor, as some tearme him, being formerly called Thierry of Aquitaine, he made earle of Holland.

This gift of the kings, especially that to Thierry, was much with flood by the Friselanders, as (coming to be commanded by any new Lord or Ruler: wherefore they consulted with the Hollanders, and a plot was laid to expell this new Earle. But it proued to no effect, for the king comming thither (in person) with a powerful army, made such an example on the Ring-leaders in this rebellion, that the rest (in very great humility) submitted themselves, casting their Weapons not onely at the Kings feete, but likewise at the Earles, and (vpon pardon) they vowed their continuall bounden duty to Thierry. His authority was then further strengthened, in the yeare eight hundred sixty eight, by the letters Patents of King Charles, as also by them of Lewes King of Germany, confirming him to bee Earle of Holland, Zeland, and Lord of Friseland.

This Thierry married Genna, or Ienna, daughter to Pepin the Bald, king of Italy, sonne to the Emperour Charlemagne. Hee worthly foyled the Danes, that then possessed the Towne of Prichit, the Wiltes and the Slaues, disabling them from any further footing in Holland, which made them presume to meddle in Zeland, but thence they were repulsed likewise. By which meanes, he remained afterward in peace, beautifying his Countries both with faire buildings and good Lawes. He dyed very old, hauing reigned 40. yeares, and after him succeeded

2 Thierry his son, second of that name, Earle of Holland, Zeland, and Lord of Friseland, who married with Hildegarde, daughter vnto King Lewes of France, the Stammerer, and Sister to King Charles the Simple. The Friselanders did twice revolt from their obedience, and would not allow Earl Thierry to be their Lord, slaying very many of them that obeyed the Earl, waisting, spoiling, and burning all the way as they went. But at length they were iustly repayed for their insolencie, and such a slaughter was made of the Frisons (without any mercy) that few or none of them returned home to their dwellings. Afterward, he forced them to make the doores of entrance into their houses, so lowe and narrow, that they must koope verie lowe before they could get in; and this he did, to make them the more humble and seruile, receiuing a new Oath of allegiance of them. And hauing reigned about fiftie yeares, being then aged 88. yeares old, he dyed, leauing two sonnes behind him, the eldest whereof (being named Egbert) became Archbishop of Treues, and Arnold his yongest son succeeded him.

A dreadfull Comet, eclipses and earthquakes

3 Arnold, (or as others will haue it) Arnulph, yongest son to Earle Thierry, followed in rule as his fathers successor: but he held the Earledomes of Holland, Zeland, and Lordship of Friseland, no longer of the crown of France, but of Otho the third, Emperour; and so became in see to the Empire. A very fearefull Comet appeared in his time, with straunge Eccipses both of the Sunne and Moone, being as red as blood, and terrible Earthquakes: a fire also fell from heauen, in similitude like an huge Tower, burning for a long time: after which ensued so violent a pestilence, that the liuing died burying the dead. The Frisons reuolting again from obedience, made all his reigne a continuall warfare, and the Armies (on either side) meeting neere vnto Winckell, so dreadfull a battaile was fought betwene them: that the Hollanders sustained the worst, Count Arnold being there slaine, and a great number of his cheefest Nobility. This battaile was fought the eighteenth of October, the morrow after S. Lamberts day, in the yeare 993. So this Earle Arnold, hauing reigned fye yeares, and being thus vnfortunatly slaine, was buried by his Father and Grandfather, in the Abbey of Egmont.

4 Thierry, third of that name, and son to Count Arnold, succeeded as fourth Earle of Holland, Zeland, and Lord of Friseland. Being desirous to reuenge his Fathers death vpon the Frisons: hee was much impeached therein by Adelbold, Bishop of Prichit, against whom (neuertheless) hee preuailed in two foughten battailes, in the yeare 1018. and (with great slaughter of the Frisons) brought them vnder obedience to his youngest son Floris, whom he made Lord of them. This Earle Thierry, liuing afterward in verie peacefull dayes, vnderooke a Pilgrimage to Ierusalem, with the Lord of Arckell, his loyall subiect; who died at Ierusalem, & was there very honourably buried by Thierry. After whose return home, and some yeares passed in peace with his Wife and Children, hauing reigned 46. yeares, hee died in Anno 1039. and was buried by his father in the Abbey of Egmont.

Adelbold Bishop of Prichit.

5 Thierry, fourth of that Name, was the fifth Earle of Holland, Zeland, & Lord of Friseland, after the decease of Thierry his Father. In a Tourney of Princes and Lords, performed (for pleasure) in the Citie of Liege, it was this Earles hard happe, to kill a Brother of the Bishops of Cullen and Liege: whereby ensued such discord and molestation, that, after many aduentures of reuenge, vndertaken by the German Gentlemen, albeit therein they sustained much losse of men, the Earle was shot into the thigh with a poisoned dart, of which wound hee dyed the fifteenth of May, one thousand foure hundred and eight, after he had gouerned nine yeares, and was buried by his father, in the Abbey of Egmont. He was neuer married, and therefore left not any childe to succcede him.

The Bishops of Cullen and Liege.

6 Floris, who (as you haue heard before) was Earle of Friseland, now after his brothers death, became the sixth Earle of Holland and Zeland. The former mishap at Liege, could not as yet be forgotten by the Bishops of Cullen and Liege, but they wold needs prosecute fresh reuenge on Count Floris, who being a man of vndated spirit, defeated his enemies in two attemptes. Once by a cunning stratagem, causing ditches and pitfalls to be made in south Holland, couering them with straw and graffe, so that they could not be easily discerned. At this time a bloody battell being fought betweene betweene them, there was forty thousand of the Earles enemies slaine, beside twenty six thousand more, who were drowned and smothered in those ditches, Anno Domini 1058. The second foyle of his adversaries, happened foure yeares after this, when the Hollanders (putting the Germans to flight) returned with rich spoiles, and great store of prisoners; this was in the yeare of our Lord 1062. Yet was it this Earles ill fortune, to be afterward slayne vnarmed, as he sate vnder an Elme, taking the ayre, his enemies preuailing by this aduantage. He had ruled in Holland foureteeen yeares, and in Friseland 21. yeares, and lyeth buried at Egmont.

7. Gertrude, widow to Earle Floris, in regarde that Thierrie her sonne was in his nonage, gouerned those Countries in his right. And in the yeare of our Lord, 1063, she re-married with Count the Friszon (sonne to Baldwine of Lisse de Bucke, Earle of Flanders) with the good liking of all the States and Nobilitie. Hee also was made Guardian of young Earle Thierrie, and (had by this Gertrude) three sonnes, Robert, surnamed the Yong (who went with Godfrey of Bullen to the holie Land, and was (after his fathers decease) Earle of Flanders); Philip, father to William of Ist, and Baldwin Bishop of Teroanne; beside three daughters also, which he had by the said Gertrude. This Robert was called the Friszon, not in regarde of his birth, but of his bigge stature, strength and courage. For, hauing preuailed against the Frisons, and hearing of his Brothers death, Baldwine de Mons, Earle of Flanders; hee layd clayme to the sayde Earldome, and (notwithstanding the opposition of Vichid, widow to Earle Baldwine: by meanes of the Flemings, he ouerthrew the King of France in battell, and the with her sonne Baldwine, remayning satisfied with the Countie of Hennault, Robert became quickly Earle of Flanders. For eight yeares space, hee carried himselfe with great wisdom and valour, and dying in the yeare of our Lord 1077, was buried in the Cannons Church, founded by himselfe at Cassell. *Gertrude*s time of rule by her selfe, and Roberts after, are reckoned as two seuerall gouernements.

9. Godfrey, surnamed the crooke-backed Duke of Lorraine, in this time of young Earle Thierries minority, was made an instrument (in regard of the former quarrell of Count Floris, and the Bishops of Cullen and Liege, as yet not reuenged to their mindes) to suggest a false information to Henry the fourth, Emperour, whereby the sayde Godfrey became an vniuerser of the young Earles right, for the space of foure years. But as he was sitting on the draught to ease his body, a seruant of young Count Thierries, did thrust a launc vp into his fundament, whereof he died (not long after) at Maestricht.

10. Thierrie, the fift of that name, who (by crooke-backed Godfrey, and other strange oppositions) had long time bene debarred from quiet possession of his right; at length, by an absolute conquest of the Frisons, in two seuerall great battells, recovered all, and returned home as a Conqueror. Afterward, he married Whitilde, daughter to Fredericke, Duke of Saxony, by whom he had a sonne and daughter: Floris that succeeded him, and Mathilde, married to the Duke of Orleans. Earle Thierrie hauing gouerned fifteene yeares, dyed, and was buried in the Abbey of Egmont.

11. Floris, the second of that name, & surnamed the Fat or Grosse, succeeded next after his father Thierrie: he greatly fauoured Church-men, whereby the Abbey of *Egmont*s reuenews were largely increased. He being a man of very peacefull inclination, little or no disturbances happened in his time: but onely by the Frisons, who, for their rebelling, were seuerely punished, and forced to submit themselves to his mercy. This Floris married Petronilla, or Parnell, daughter to Didier, Duke of Saxony, and sister to Lotharius the Emperour: By her he had three sons, Thierrie, Floris, called the Blacke Prince of Kemerland; and Symon, also one daughter named Hadewicke, who was Countesse of Guedres. Hauing gouerned his Countries very honourably, for the space of one and thirty yeares; he dyed in the yeare of our Lord, one thousand one hundred thirty and three, and lyeth buried in the Abbey of Egmont.

12. Thierrie, sixt of that name, succeeded his father Floris, and was much molested by the Frisons, in regard that his brother Floris the Blacke Prince, enuying the happines and quiet of Thierrie, went and tooke part with them against him; vntill such (such time as the Emperour Lotharius (being theyr vnckle) had reconciled them, and made them friends. Conrade beeing ioynd as competitor in the Empire with Lotharius, caused a fresh quarrell between Thierrie and the Bishop of Vtrecht, he ratifying the former graunt of Henry, which caused very long contention, and much blood to be shed on either side. Thierrie hauing gouerned his Countries of Holland, Zeland, and Friseland fortie yeares, died in the yeare 1163, and lieth buried in the Abbey of Egmont.

13. Floris the third, eldest sonne of Thierrie, as heyre to his father, inherited his right in Holland, Zeland, and Friseland. The Frisons (pretending their former freedoms and imperiall liberties) made still their reuoltes from time to time, imboldned thereto by the often suggestions of Godfrey of Rhemen, Bishop of Vtrecht, who (as his predecessors had done before him) still questioned the Earldomes of Ostergo and Westergo: but the Emperour Fredericke, went himselfe in person, and made an agreement between them. All which notwithstanding, much hurt was done on eyther side, as time and treachery fitted them with apt opportunity. A great controuersie happened betweene the Earles of Holland and Flanders, for the Isle of Walchren, and Count Floris (in triall of fight) became prisoner to the Earle of Flanders, who neuertheless vsed him princely, and they being accorded by the Archbishop of Cullen, and the Bishoppes of Liege; the great hole neare to the damme or sluce; was recovered with much adoe, by casting a dogfish therinto, and speedily filling it vp with earth, whereon they named it Hondidam, that is, Dogs-slucce. This Earle Floris, assisting the Emperour Fredericke, Philip King of France, Richard King of England, with many other Dukes, Christian Princes and Earles, at the siege of Damieta in Soria: fell there sicke in the Army, and died 1208. hauing gouerned his prouinces twenty seuen yeares.

14. Thierrie the seuenth, hearing of his fathers death in Palestine; succeeded as his heire in all his Earldomes. The whole time of his regiment, was in war and continuall combutions. First by his brother Lord William of Holland (who was with his father Floris in Palestine, and performed there many honourable seruices) thorow diuers disagreements that happened betweene them; notwithstanding, as many laboured reconcilings, and pacifications. Next, Baldwine Earle of Flanders, he was as molefuous to him likewise, for the Isle of Walchren: besides the Frisons rebellions, and his trouble with the Bishops of Cologne and Liege, as also his imprisonment to the Duke of Brabant, and then the intrusion of the Bishop of Vtrecht, after which, ensued a peace and vnited amity on all sides. This Count Thierrie had no heires male, but two beautifull daughters; Adella, married to Henry of Guedres, who dyed without anie Children, and Ada, meanly married by her mother (after her fathers death) to Count Lewes of Loos, that so the gouernement might be disposed at her pleasure. In the yeare of our Lord, 1203, Earle Thierrie dyed, hauing gouerned his Countries thirteene yeares, and lyeth buried in the Abbey of Egmont.

15. Ada, daughter to Earle Thierrie, was Countesse of Holland and Zeland, after her fathers death; which moued a great heart-burning in the Lordes and Gentlemen, that they should liue vnder a Woman, and a poore Earles command. Therefore, they sent into Friseland for Count William, protesting to assist him in attaining the gouernement of Holland. The young Countesse Ada was surprized in their first attempt, and her husband the Earle of Loos driuen to flight; who yet wunne the Bishop of Vtrecht (by money and other promises) to ayde him, and by this means he had some small successe for a while. But the Countesse Ada dying without any children, Earle William was then the true and onely heyre to Holland and Zeland. In which right of his, hee went with his power against the Earle of Loos, and such was his successe, that the Women did beate his enemies with Distaves and Stones, they beeing glad to cast away their Armour for lightnesse, to saue themselves by flight; yet many were drowned in the Ditches, and a great number taken prisoners, with all the Earle of Loos Tents, Paviillions, Plate, Iewelles, and Munition, which Count William royally diuided amongst his Hollanders, remayning absolute Prince of Holland, Zeland, and Friseland.

ded rightfully in all his Earledoms, by the death of his Neece the yong Countesse Adas. He had some strife with Didier Bishop of Trecht, and Gerard Vander Are his brother: but (vpon certayne Articles) all displeasures were qualified. By his first wife Alix, daughter to the Earle of Guelders, he had Floris, that next succeeded him, Otho Bishop of Trecht, William Lieutenant of Holland, and two daughters, the one was Abbess at Rhynsborg, and the other at Delfe. His second wife was named Mary, daughter to Edmond of Lancaster, son to Henry the third, King of England, by whom he had no issue. He gouerned 19. years, and dying, lies buried at Rhynsborg.

17 Floris the fourth, succeeded his father Count William in his Earledomes. He took great delight in lusts & Turnaments, and the Earle of Clermont proclayming a publike Triumph for all commers, at the Countesse his wives request (who greatly desired to see this Floris, of whom he had heard much commendation) this honorable Earle of Holland, Zeland, &c. was there treacherously slaine, onely through iealous suspition of the old Earle of Clermont, who was there likewise presently slaine himselfe, and the Countesse (griuing for this great mishap) died soon after. This Count Floris had a daughter named Mathilde, or Margaret, as some call her, who was married to Count Herman of Henneberg. She despising a poore widow, that desired her almes vpon vrgent necessitie, holding in either arme a sweet yong child, both which, God had sent hir at one birth, gaue hir very reprochful words beside, as, that she could not be honest of her bodie; and (by her husband) haue two children lawfully begotten. The poore woman, griuing to be reiected in such extreame want and need, but much more, to heare her reputation so nearely rouched, knowing her soule cleare from all dishonest detraction: made no further suite to the Lady, but (falling vpon her knees) appealed to God for defence of her Innocencie, and earnestly desired, that as she had coueied and borne those two infants lawfully by her husband; euen so, if euer that Ladie should be subiect to the custome of Women, that it would please him, to send her as many children at one birth, as there are daies in the year. Not long after, the Lady conceiued with childe by her husband,

& (for her deliuerance) went into Holland, to visite the Earle her brother, taking vp lodging in the Abbey of religious women at Losdunen, and grew so exceeding great, as the like had neuer before bene seene. When her time came, on the Friday before Palme-sunday, in the year of our Lord God 1276. shee was deliuered of 365. children, the one halfe being sonnes, and the other daughters; but the odder childe was an Hermaphrodite, and they were all well shaped and proportioned in their litle members. These children were layd in two balins, and were all baptized by Guydon, Suffragan to the Bishop of Trecht, who named all the sonnes Iohn, and the daughters Elizabeth, but what name hee gaue the Hermaphrodite, it is not recorded. They were no sooner baptized, but they all died, and the mother also. The two Balins are yet to be seene in the sayde Church of Losdunen, and a memorie of them, both in Latine and Dutch. The Latine beginning thus: Margareta, Comitiss Hennebergie uxor, & Florentij Hollandia & Zelandia filia, &c. Underneath are these verses:

*En tibi manifestum & memorabile factum,
Quale nec a mundi condicione datum.*

This Count Floris, being so treacherously slaine, as yee haue heard before, had his body brought backe into Holland, by the Earle of Cleues, and other noble Lords, who buried it in the Abby of Rhynsborg; he hauing honourably and vertuously gouerned his Countreies twelue yeares. He left but one son named William, six yeares old, who was in the tutelage of his vnckle Otho, Bishop of Trecht, during his minority.

18 William, second of that name, succeeded his father Floris in all his dominions, being all the time of his vnder yeares, in the gouernement of Otho Bishop of Trecht his vnckle, who was a very worthy & carefull Guardian to him. The Pope hauing deposed Fredericke the second, and Comrade his sonne from the Empire: the Princes Electors (in despite of the Pope) made this Earle William King of the Romans, and crowned him at Aix la Chapelle, he hauing then attained to the age of 20. yeares. woman, for the country of Walchren, wherein, after a great foile and slaughter of the Flemings, (taking part with her) and imprisonment of her two sonnes (Guy and Iohn) she implored the aid of Charles duke of Aniou, against king William, & sped thereby no better then she had done before, but was glad in the end to seek reconciliation. This King William built the Pallace of the Earles of Holland, in the vilage of La Hage, or the Hague, where it is at this day, and a goodly Cloister at Harlem. At his warres in west Friseland, where he preuailed very fruissefully, he would needs (without any other assistance then himselfe) follow the rebels ouer the Ice, where his horse slipping in, himselfe almost drowned, and none near to helpe him (but enemies of the Frizons, that lay secretly in ambush) they beate him downe with clubbes and stauces, not knowing that it was the King, and so they slew him. But when afterward they tooke better notice of him, by his Target and Armes thereon emblazoned: in very hearty sorrow for their foule deed, they buried him secretly, in a poore house in the vilage of Hookswond, thinking to wipe out all remembrance of him. But his body was after found, and buried in the Abbey of Middlebourg, in the Isle of Walchren.

19 Floris the fift, son to King William, who was slaine so inhumanely, albeit hee was but fixe months old, yet he succeeded his father, his vnckle Floris being his Gouernor and Tutor. At 17. yeares of age, he went with an army against the euer-reuolting Frizons, and ouercame them at a vilage called Schellinghout, very severely reuenging his fathers death on them, and (by building foure Castles in Friseland) brought them wholly vnder his obediēce. Afterward, Count Floris made a voyage into England, where a marriage was contracted, betwene Iohn, eldest son to Earle Floris, and Elizabeth, daughter to king Edward the first: Iohn being (not long after) sent into England, to accomplish the sayd marriage, where he remained in the Court of England, vntill his fathers vnfortunate death, which briefly was thus:

A knight liued in the Earles Court, named Gerard van Velsen, who had bene a whole yeares space detayned in prison, & his brother beheaded, through certaine false suggestions whispered to the Earle, which (afterward) appearing to be a meere iniury: the Earle sought to repayre this wrong, with very especiall fauours done to the knight, great aduancements, & would haue bestowed also his concubine in marriage on him. Which Gerard disdaind & replying, that he would not weare his cast shoes: the Earle rashly answerd, that he should take his leauings, in despite of his hart. To preuent marriage with the Earles minion, the knight bestowed his affections else-where, and wedded a Ladie of great honour and beauty. Which when the Earle vnderstood, he pursued his former rash folly, to the price of his own life: Sending Gerard on an employment of much credit & respect, and wherewith he was not a little pleased, not doubting anie such wicked intention. The Earle came to Gerard's house, vnder color of hospitality, and there (winning her to priuate conference in her bed chamber) forcibly detoured her, to performe his rash promise to her husband. At Gerard's returne, and this foule wrong discovered, it was pursued with very bloody reuenge, by a resolved conspiracy sworne against his life: which albeit he had some warning of (by a paper deliuered him by a poore woman), yet his disaster being inevitable, a traine was laid for him as he rode a hawking, and twentie one wounds he receiued on his body, by the hand of the sayd Gerard. But hee and the rest of the conspirators escaped not unpunished, for they had their heads smitten off, and were then laid vpon wheelles; but Gerard was put (stark naked) into a Pipe sticke full of sharp nailes, and was so rowled vp and downe through all the streetes of Leyden. Then was he beheaded, & layd on a wheele, and all his kindred (to the ninth degree) put to death, and laid on wheelles.

20 After the wicked murder of Earle Floris the fift, committed by the Frizons, as hath bene declared: Iohn his only son (being then in England with King Edward his father in law) was next to succeed him as his rightfull heire. But before he could leaue England, some partialities and factions happened in Holland for the gouernement, which soone were qualified at Earle Iohns being there present, notwithstanding the subtle policie of Wolfart of Borfelle, seizing the person of Earle Iohn, and Lady Elizabeth his wife, thinking to haue the gouernement of the sayd Earle, because, as yet, yet, he was but young. Earle Iohn prevailed against the Frizons, and the Bishop of Vtrecht, and having governed his Countries about foure yeares, hee fell sicke at Harlem, and there dyed. He was the first of all the Earles of Holland, that died without children: wherefore in him failed the line masculine of the Earls from the dukes of Aquitaine, which Thierry, or Theodor, the first Earle of Holland, had continued 47 yeares. He was buried in the Abbey of Rhinibourg, his widow Lady Elizabeth being caried back into England, where she was afterward married to the Earle of Oxford: So that by the death of Earle Iohn in this manner, those Countries were deuolued to the Earles of Hennault, issuing by the mothers side frō the earles of Holland.

21 Iohn, the second of that name, called Iohn of Hennault (claiming his right from Alix, Sister to William king of the Romans) succeeded after Iohn, as Earle of Holland, Zeland, and Frizeland, &c. He had a long and tedious trouble with Iohn de Renesse, who perswaded the Emperour, that Iohn Earle of Holland dying without issue, his Earledome ought (in right) to returne to the Empire; according as Charls the bad, Emperour of the Romans, had at first giuen them in fee and homage to Thierry of Aquitaine. This suggestion raised the Emperour Albert in Armes against Iohn of Hennault, but the Bishop of Cullen compounded the matter betweene them; and Iohn de Renesse was afterward drowned, by which means, Iohn of Hennault, having gouerned Hennault thirty yeres, and his countreies of Holland, Zeland, and Frizeland five yeares, died, & was buried at Valenciennes.

22 William the third, sonne and heire to count Iohn of Hennault, succeeded his fathers Earledome: he was commonly called, The good Earle William, for his vertues, iustice, good life, and honourable actions. In his time hapned so great a dearth and famine in Holland, that poore people dyed with hunger, even in the streets as they went: seeking also for hearbs and rootes in the fields and woods, there they were likewise found dead, and in the common high wayes: little children dyed sucking at their mothers breasts, and some were enforced to feede on their dead children. In this time of famine, a poore woman in the Towne of Leyden, bring extremely ouercharged with hunger, entreated her owne sister, (being a woman of better abilitye) to lend her some bread, which she would thankfully repay againe, when God should enable her. She, very vnkindly, and without any pity of her extremity, denyed her oftentimes, notwithstanding the others often vrgings; that shee was assured, that shee could not be without bread. Heereupon the vnmerrifull sister (lying, both to God and to her owne poore sister) sayde: If I haue any bread, I with that it may instantly be turned into a stone: wherewith the heauy displeasure of almighty God laid hold vpon her words, and going afterward to hir Cupboard (to relieue her selfe) she found all her loaves of bread conuerted into apparant stones, and died herselfe with extremity of hunger. It is credibly said, that one or two of those stones, are yet to be seene in Saint Peters Church at Leyden, as a memorie of this iust iudgement of God.

There is also recorded another memorable Historie, of vpright Iustice done by this good Earle William, to a poore country-man, against a Bayliffe of South Holland, who had taken a goodly faire Cowe from him, that was the reliefe of himselfe, his poore wife and children; as there are some Kine in that Countrey, which doe giue twenty portles of milke and more, in a day. The Bayliffe at the poore mans complaint to this good earle William, who lay then sicke in his Bed at Valenciennes (yet neuer debarred any suiters from audience, were he sicke or well) was adiuaged to giue the poore man an hundred crownes of good gold, for the wrong he had done to him, which was accordingly performed. But for his iniurie to publike Iustice (being himselfe an Officer) and abusing the authority committed in trust to him; the Earle sent for an Executioner, and caused his head to be smitten off by his beds side. This good Count William, being a vertuous Prince, victorious in warre, a man learned, wife, well spoken, and iudicious, a great friend to peace, gracious to all men, and beloued in all courts, hauing gouerned his Prouinces 32 yeares, dyed the ninth day of Iune 1337. and was buried with great pomp at Valenciennes.

23 William the fourth, son to the good Earle William came to his fathers Earledome by lawfull succession. He was a man of high merit, & a most famous Souldier, whereof whereof he made good proofe; first against the Sarazins and Moors, in the kingdome of Granada: Next, with the Emperour Lewis, and many noble Earles, ayding his brother in lawe Edward the third King of England, against the king of France; thirdly, in ouer-running Lithuania, Liuonia, and warring against the Russian Infidels, lading home his men with victory & wealth; spoiles: And lastly, in preuailing against the Frizons, and Robert of Arckell gouernour of Vtrecht: Yet it was his hard hap to be slaine knowne (amongst the Frizons) before any could haue power to helpe him: so that he left no lawfull child to succcede him, and therefore his sister, (being Emperesse) remayned his onelic heire.

24 Margaret, wife to Lewis of Bauaria, (then Emperour) and the eldest sister to Earle William, slayne (as you haue heard) by the Frizons, by the Emperours interposition of his authority, and her owne native right, went downe by the Rhine into Holland, accompanied with a most princely and well-beseeming traine, and was acknowledged to be Ladie and Princeesse of Holland, Zeland, and Frizeland. But before her returne back to the Emperour againe, shee constituted both his and her eldest sonne (named William of Bauaria) to bee her Regent there in those Countries, for a summe of money yearlye payed to her: but remayning vnpayd, she might refuse all her rights to herselfe againe. The Emperour deceasing, the Emperesse Margaret came thither againe, and had resignation (from her sonne William) of all the aforesaid Countries, retrying himselfe into Hennault, as being well contented there to liue: vntill by intestine discord, and dangerous practices of two intruded factions, called Cabillaux and Hoeks (wherein both nobles and gentlemen did too far enter) the mothers gouernment did grow vn sufferable, and Duke William was recovered from Hennault, to vnder-goe the sole authority. Two very bloody battells were fought betweene the Emperesse and her sonne; and in the first, Earle William escaped with great difficultie, and fledde into Holland, for this battell was fought at La Vere in Zeland. But in the second, there was so much blood spilt, that (for three dayes after) the old Riuer of Menfe (at full Sea) was (all ouer) red in that place. The Emperesse (by helpe of a small Barke) escaped into England, and vpon an agreement afterwards made betweene them: Duke William had the quiet possession of Holland, Zeland, and Frizeland assigned him, and the Emperesse Margaret had the countie of Hennault, where (five yeares after) she ended her dayes, and lyeth buried at Valenciennes.

25 Duke William being peaceably possessed of his Seigneuries, according to the former compulsion, being also Duke of Bauaria, Palatine of Rhine, and Earle of Hennault by his mothers death, tooke to wife the Lady Mauda, daughter to Henry duke of Lancaster in England, by whom hee had no children. Much strife, warre, and bloody bickering, hapned betweene him and the Bishop of Vtrecht, with shrewd disaduantages on eyther side; till, by the means of some Noblemen, they were reduced to amitie.

This Duke William (vpon what occasion it could neuer be knowne) fell distracted of his senses, and slew a Knight with a blow of his fist: so that hee was shut vp (vnder good Guard) for nineteene yeares space, euen till he dyed. Hauing gouerned his prouinces of Holland, Zeland, and Frizeland (before his madnesse) seauen yeares, and Hennault two.

26 Albert of Bauaria, brother to Duke William, in the time of his distraction, was sent for from Bauaria, and made Gouernor of his brothers Countries, in hope of his recovery, which by no meanes could be compassed. Hee vanquished the Frizons in many rebellions, tooke the towne of Deijst, and beleached the Baron of Eughien, vpon sinister reformations, which caused great trouble betweene him, and sixe brethren of the said Baron: but, vpon their reconciliation, Count Albert builded the Chanoury of the Chappell, at the Court of the Hague.

In his time, a Sea-woman (by reason of great tempests at Sea, and extraordinary high Tides) was seene swimming in the Zuyderzee, betweene the Townes of Campen and Edam; which being brought to Edam, and cleane from the Sea-moss growne about her, by her long abiding there: she was like to another woman, endured to be apparelled, and would feede on meats as others did, yet fought the all meanes to escape, and get into the water againe, agayne, had she not very carefully been tended. Since did learne to spinne, and exercise other womanly qualities, being daily scene of infinite persons, who haue made perfect testimoniall of this rare accident, and signified it for an vndoubted truth, auouching, that she liued fifteene yeares, and lyeth there buried in the Church-yard. In the yeare of our Lord, one thousand foure hundred and foure, this famous Prince Albert dyed, after hee had gouerned his Countries fixe and fortie yeares: nineteene as he was Tutor to his distracted brother, and twenty seauen as Prince, heire and Lord of those Countries, being buried at the Hague in Holland.

Philip the bold Duke of Burgundy.

27 William, sixt of that name, after the death of Duke Albert of Bavaria his father, succeeded as his immediate heire. His first wife was daughter to Charles the first, King of France, and she dyed yong, without any issue. He secondly married the daughter of John, sonne to Philip the bold Duke of Burgundy, by whom he had one onely daughter, named Iaqueline or Jacoba, as the Dutch vse to call her. This Count William wasted Friseland, spoyled Liege, and preyed against the Guelphes, and also the Lordes (father and sonne) of Arckell at Gorrichem, and reconciled the Duke of Burgundy to the French King. The Dolphin of France, sonne to King Charles the sixt, married Iaqueline, Count Williams daughter; but hee being poysoned, by putting on a shirt of maile, dyed without issue. As Earle William himselfe did not long after, being bitten in the leg by a mad Dogge, which hurt could neuer be cured. So that the Lady Iaqueline (his daughter, and widow to the Dolphin of France) was his true heire in all his Seigneuries: Hee gouerned thirtene yeares, and lieth buried at Valenciennes in Hennault.

28 Iaqueline, or Jacoba, daughter and sole heire to William of Bavaria, succeeded her father in all his Earldomes and Seigneuries, being then widow to the Dolphin of France, and yet but nineteene yeares of age. In regard of her youth and widowhood, she endured much molestation in her gouernement, chiefly in Holland: for the two factions rooke head agayne, and banded their boldnes on both sides, the Hoerckins fauouring the Countesses faction, and the Cabillants her eemies, by which meanes her rule was greatly disturbed. For John of Bavaria (foraking his Bishoppricke of Liege) sought to make himselfe an Earle, and marrie his Niece Iaqueline (vterly against her will) and yet to dispossesse her of her rightfull inheritance, for which purpose he leagued himselfe with the Cabillants, and other powerfull friends, who neuertheless were flaine in their bolde aduicature at Gorrichome. And, to frustrate the Bishops vaine hope, the Pope dispensed her marriage with John Duke of Brabant, albeit he was her neare kinsman, whereby their patrimoniall inheritances were the more strengthened, and hee acknowledged as their Prince, in Hennault, Holland, Zeland, Friseland, &c. It were needlesse heere, to relate the following molestations of John of Bavaria the Bishop, to his Niece Iaqueline, taking on himselfe the title of Earle, and therefore, (by some) ranked among the Earles of Holland, or the after-marriages of Lady Iaqueline; to the Duke of Gloucester, winkle to Henry the sixt, King of England, the fourth and last time (in great privacy) to Franke of Borselle, Lieutenant of Zeland, or her (no meane troubles) by the Duke of Burgundy, to whom hee resigned vnto all her Countries. Let it suffice, that hee liued in continuall vexations nineteene yeares, and dying at the Hague, was buried in the Chappell of the Court of Holland.

30 Philip Duke of Burgundie, being (both by father & mother) rightfull heire and successeur to the aforementioned Countesse Iaqueline; was thus entitled: Philip Duke of Bourgogne, Brabant, and Lembourge; Earle of Flanders, Artois, Burgogne, Hennault, Holland, Zeland, and Namure; Marquesse of the hoke Empire; and Lord of Friseland, Salins and Macklyn. Hee had three wiues; by the two first hee had no children; but by the last, named Isabell (daughter to John King of Portugal) hee had three sonnes; Anthony and Joffe, who dyed yong, and Charles Martin, Earle of Charolais, and successeur vnto his father. This Philip of Bourgogne instituted the order of Knighthood of the golden Fleece, and had much discontent with his sonne Charles, whom (at length) he married to the Lady Margaret, sister to Edward the fourth, King of England. The rebels of Ganin and Bruges dearly felt the valour of of this Philip; hee besieged Callis, surprized Luxembourg, subdued Liege, and ouercame the Hunecoms. Hee exceeded all his predecessors (dukes of Burgogne) in riches, Seigneuries, height of Pompe and State. He dyed the fift day of Iune 1467, hauing gouerned about fortie yeares. In his time was the famous Arte of Printing first inuented; the men of Harlem in Holland do challenge the first honour thereof, but it was reduced to perfection at Mentz, by one John Fawstus, who had bene seruant to Laurence Janfon of Harlem, as they constantly affirme.

31 Charles, surnamed the Warlike Duke of Bourgogne, succeeded in all his fathers Titles and Dignities. The Inhabitants of Gant resisting him, he brought them vnder obedience, and defeated the Liegeois in battell, which enforced Liege to yeelde to him. He made peace with the French King, who doubted to be detained at Peronne by Duke Charles. Vpon a fresh rebellion of the Liegeois, the duke forced King Lewes to go with him to the siege of their town; which he ruined, and practised the like to the house of Braderode. He warred against the Frisonis; and carried many Princes in hope of his daughters marriage. The French King, and the Duke, sought to deceiue each other, and the Constable of Saint Paul (waxing hatefull to them both) they resolved his ruine, and (on a Truce taken for nine yeares, betwene the King and Duke) the Constable was beheaded at Paris. The Duke warred against the Swissers, and was defeated by them, both at Granfon and Morat, wherewith the Swissers were enriched. The Duke besieged Nancie, and was there flaine in battell, by the treason of the Earle of Campobachio, an Italian; where being engirt with a great troupe of Lancers, he receiued wounds, one in the head, the second in the thigh, and the third in the fundament. Hee left one onely daughter and heire.

32 Mary, daughter and heire to Duke Charles, the warlike Duke of Bourgogne, succeeded her father in all his Countries: being but eightene yeares old when hee was flaine before Nancy, wherefore she remained vnder the charge of the Duke of Cleues, and his brother the Lord of Rauesmeine. The French King seized Piccardie & Arthois: and the hapning into the Ganthois power, endured much trouble, by putting her chiefeft seruants and counsellors to death. The Flemings were delected, and the yong Duke of Guelphes flaine. Afterward, a marriage was concluded betwene Maximilian Arch-duke of Austria, sonne to the Emperor Fredericke, and the Lady Mary of Bourgogne, albeit the would more gladly haue matched with the house of France.

33 Maximilian, Arch-duke of Austria, and sonne to the Emperour Fredericke, marrying the Princess Mary of Bourgogne, was thereby wedded to much warre and trouble. For, first the Guldres revolted from the house of Bourgogne. Next hapned the battell of Guinegate, wherein the Arch-duke was Conqueror: Then, Turnay yeilded to him; truce was taken betwene him and the French King, and the new tumults of the Cabillaux and Hoeks, were also by him pacified. Dordrecht was surprized by the yong lord of Egmont, also, many Townes in Guldres yeilded to the Arch-duke; and (not long after) followed the death of the Arch-duchesse Mary, who had (the first yeare of her marriage, a sonne named Philip, father to Charles the fift) the second yeare a daughter, called Margaret, betroathed in her infancie, to Charles the Dolphin of France, sonne to Lewes 11. and the third yeare, a sonne named Frances, according to the name of Frances Duke of Brittaine his godfather. Maximilian being chosen King of the Romans, he made Engelbert Earle of Nassau, Gouernour of the Netherlands in his absence: and afterward, vpon the bold insolency of the Ganthois and Brugois (keeping the K. of Romans prisoner) Albert duke of Saxony, was made second gouernour of the Netherlands, & General for the Emperor Fredericke against the Flemings. But Fredericke dying, his son Maximilian succeeded him in the Empire, by which means Philip of Austria, sonne to Maximilian, inherited his right in Holland, Zeland, Friseland, &c.

34 Philip, second of that name, being 16. yeares olde, and succeeding his father Maximilian, Emperour in the Netherlands, had these Titles: Philippe Arch-duke of Austria, Duke of Bourgogne, Lotier, Brabant, Segria, Carinthia, Lembourge, Luxembourg, and Guldres; Earle of Hapsbourg, Flanders, Arthois, Bourgogne, Ferretis and Kiburch; Palatine of Hennault, Holland, Zeland, Namure and Zulphen:

1497. Marquess of the holy Emperie, and of Bourgoyn; Landgrauve of Elfsaten, Lord of Windimarke, Portmeau, Salynes, & Atacklyn. Vpon his full possession of the Netherlands, peace was made between him, and Charles the eight, King of France; war hapned he wixt the Arch-duke and the Duke of Guelldres, great inconueniences followed thereon: but Duke Albert being slaine before Groningen, the Arch-Duke inherited the Realme of Spain by his wife, being made King of Castile, & George duke of Sassony (being then made Governor of the Netherlands, for the Arch-duke Philip) continued the Warres in Friseland. For, vpon the death of Isabell, Queene of Castile, lane her daughter being the onely heyre, and married to the Arch duke Philip; she hereby inuited him in the realms of Spain, Leon, Granada, &c. as absolute King. But he enjoyed that Dignitie not long: for in the year 1506, the 27. day of September, he dyed (sodainly) in the City of Bourgoyn, suspected to be poisoned. After the death of Philip King of Castile, the Emperour Maximilian took vpon him the government of the Netherlands, as Guardian vnto Charles and Ferdinand, his Grand children, being the sons of Philip and Jane, King and Queene of Castile.

1508. 35 Charles of Austria, second of that name, succeeded rightfully in all his fathers Lands and Seigneuries, and by the Emperours appointment, his daughter the Lady Margaret (Dowager of Sauoy, and Aunt to the Princes Charles and Ferdinand) was Regent of the Low countries. Afterward, Prince Charles took possession of the Netherlands, and being crowned K. of spaine and Aragon, soone after followed the death of the Emperour Maximilian, and in an assembly at Frankfort, for choyse of a new Emperour, Charles king of Spain had free election, by the name of Charles the 5. Then was Lady Margaret (widow both of Castile and Sauoy, and Aunt to the Emperour Charles) accepted as sole gouernesse of the Netherlands, in her Nephewes absence. Troubles hapned in Spain, by reason of the Kings departure thence, & not onely warre in Friseland, but likewise betweene the French and Bourguignons, as also the warres of Boores or Peazants in Germany; and the Groningens reiecting the Duke of Guelldres, did yield themselves to the Emperour: then hapned the second bloody edit from the Emperour, against the Nederland protestants, and then was the imperial diet at Ausbourg, where the protestant Princes presented the confession of their faith. After followed the deuouring inundation in the Netherlands, and the death of the Lady dowager Margaret, whereby Mary of Austria, second daughter to King Phillip, and Queen Jane of Castile, succeeded in the government of the Netherlands. War hapned betweene the Emperour and the French king, but vpon the coming of queene Elenor of France to the Emperour her brother, peace was concluded betwixt them.

1536. While Mary of Austria gouerned the Netherlands, for the Emperour Charles her brother, great troubles hapned vnto the Protestants, by opposition of the Pope & Emperour against them. The Emperour affected the Empire for Prince Phillip his sonne, which bred a quarrell betwixt the Emperour, and his brother Ferdinand king of Hungary, to whom the Princes of the Empire were more enclined, then to Phillip; and then the Protestants denied their comming to the Councel of Trent. Phillip King of Spain married Mary queene of England: And not long after, the Emperour reigned the Netherlands to his sonne King Phillip (whereby he was reckned the 36. Earle of Holland, Zeland, &c.) and the Empire to his brother Ferdinand, King of the Romans and Hungary, departing out of the Netherlands, to end his dayes quietly in a Monastery, not far from Placentia. Reseruing an hundred thousand crowns yeerely to himselfe, employing four thousand for his dyet and maintenance, appointing the rest vnto young Maydens marriages, and the reliefe of Widowes and Orphanes, hee not liuing aboue two yeares after. When not onely happened his death, but likewise the deathes of the Queenes Dowagers of France and Hungary, as also of Mary Queen of England; after whome, succeeded her Sister Elizabeth. In which time, Emanuel Philiberts, Duke of Sauoy, and Prince of Piemont, was Gouernour, and Lieutenant General of the Netherlands, for King Phillip; till the King of Spaines marriage (being turned into teares, by the most vntimely death of the French King) caused Margaret of Austria, Bastarde to the Emperour Charles the first, and Dutchesse of 1539. of Parma, to succede the Duke of Sauoy in the Netherlands regiment. King Phillip returned then home into Spain, it being his last departure out of those countries: whereon (not long after) ensued the subtile bringing of the Spanish Inquisition into the Netherlands, by creation of new Bishops; and such was the power and privilege of the Inquisitors, as none were able to withstand them, in confiscation both of their body and goods at their owne pleasure.

1568. Now, albeit the tyranny of the Dutchesse government in the Low-countries, was more then the people could well endure, yet (to put a sharpe inaffe in their mouths) K. Phillip removed his Bastard sister Margaret, & sent Don Ferdinand Aluarez, Duke of Alua, who quickly brought the Netherlands into a most pittifull estate: making himselfe sure of Gauant, and Count Horne and count Egmont (abusiuely) made prisoners: he built the Castle of Antwerp, where he erected his own proud statue, & proceeded to apprehend the prince of Orange by Commission, setting down Articles by the Spanish Inquisition (which were confirmed by the king) to ruinate the Netherlands, vpon which soone followed the execution of the sonnes of Batembourg at Brussels, as also the Earles of Egmont and Horne. William of Nassau prince of Orange, was made gouernor of Holland, Zeland & Vtrecht for the States, & proued very fortunate in many attempts against the D. of Alua, which made him labour his repeale home into Spain, with Don Fredericke his sonne. Don Lewes de Requesens, the great Commander of Castile, was sent to spoyle the dukes place in the Netherlands, for the K. of Spain, to whom Aluarez former behaviour serued for an example in his proceeding; and notwithstanding, his besieging of Maddebourg (near hand to famishment) yet was his fleet defeated before his face, and the town yielded vp by Collenell Mondragon, to the Prince of Orange. After many dangerous turmoiles on both sides, the States sent to require succour of Elizabeth Q. of England, and soone after dyed Don Lewes de Requesens at Brussels; in whose roome succeeded Don Iohn of Austria (bastard sonneto to the Emperour Charles the first) as gouernor for K. Philip in the Netherlands, all the Prouinces whereof were vaited at the pacification of Gand; whereupon, the Castle was yielded to the States, and all the Spaniards departed out of Antwerp castle, which was also delivered into the States hands. Don Iohn being received as Gouernor, he sought occasions how to renew warre against the prince of Orange, and diuers discontentments, as also treacherous practises, being noted in D. Iohn, the States grew iealous of him, & he was proclaimed the Countries enemy. Then was the Arch-duke Mathias called to be Gouernour, and while the heart-burnings held betwene Don Iohn and the States, the Duke of Amou, and Duke Casimire also were required to succour them, but to little effect: for Arthois and Hansult, fell from the Netherlands general vniou, and then followed the death of Don Iohn of the plague, in the Campe neare vnto Namure.

1578. Then Alexander Farnase, Duke of Parma and Placentia, bastard Nephew to the King of Spain, succeeded Don Iohn in the Netherlands government: Whereupon, a stricter vniou (then before) was made betwene the Prouinces at Vtrecht. The D. of Amou was called to be Protector, and partly Lord of the Countries in the Vniou, which made the King of Spain prescribe the Prince of Orange, and set his life at sale, to which proscriptioun the Prince (in euery poynt) made his iust answere. Then were valiant an! worthie seruices performed by sir Iohn Norris, and Capitaine (afterwards) sir Roger Williams. In the yeare following, the generall Estates of the Prouinces, having declared Phillip K. of Spain, second of that name, to be fallen from the Seigneury of the sayd Prouinces, in regard of his extraordinary and too violent government, against their priuiledges and freedoms (solemnely sworn by himselfe) In way of right and Armes, tooke vpon them all the government of the politike Estate, & of the religion in those Prouinces, breaking the Kings Seales, abolishing the subiects of their oath to him, and causing them to take a new oath, for preferuation of their country, and obedience to the said States. Vpon a bargain made by the K. of Spain, to kill the prince of Orange, the said prince was shot by one Iohn Luuoreguy, a bakerup-merchants servant, who was instantly slain, but the prince escaped that attempt with life. Afterward he was traiterously murdered by Balthazar Gerard

Then followed the siege of Antuerpe, in which time, the States once more, re-commended their cause to the Queene of England: eyther to giue her the full Soueraignty of the Netherlands, or else to succour and releue them with her forces, vpon good conditions offered. Her Maiesty graunted to send them assistance, but no soueraignty or protection of them, would she take vpon her: whereupon, certaine cautionarie Townes and Skonces were deliuered vp to her, for repayment of such summes of money, as should be disbursed by hir, and Articles of covenant set downe betwene them. Also, Robert Lord Dudley, Baron of Denbigh, and Earle of Leicester, was appointed by the Q. of England, to be her Gouverneur generall, ouer the English powers in the Netherlands.

The Earle of Leicester.

In the time of the earle of Leicesters gouernement for the Queene, were sundrie worthy seruices performed by the Earle of Essex, sir John Norris, the Lord Willoughby, sir Philip Sidney, sir William Russell &c. besides the subtile pretences of sir William Stanley, Rowland Torke, Patton, and others, who held faire weather with the Earle of Leicester, and had the gouernment of Zutphen skonce, and the strong towne of Deuenter (to the great dislike of the States) yet performed no such matter, as the Earles hope was perwaded of them: for, after the death of that matchles noble Gentleman sir Philip Sidney, he being shot before Zutphen, & therof dying, the Earle of Leicester (being gone for England) both Deuenter & Zutphen skonce were deliuered vp to the Spaniards, by base corruption of money. And (not long after) the Prince of Parma beleagring Seiuice, by composition it was also yielded vp, after it had endured 17000 cannon shot & more. Beside, vpon some discontentment, betwene the Earle of Leicester, and the States; the Queene called home the sayd Earle into England, and the Lord Willoughby remained there Generall of the English forces. The sundry worthy seruices, both by him, and the English performed, with the Spanish vndoubted hopes of Englands Conquest, in the dreadfull year, one thousand five hundred eightie and eight, Prince Maurice his entrance into the Netherlands regiment, and the Dukes of Parmas warres in France; all these do I passe ouer, referring such as desire farther satisfaction therein, to the large Historie of the Netherlands.

The Prince of Parma dying at Arras (after his retreat from Rouen) the second of September, one thousand five hundred ninety and two: Maurice of Nassau, borne Prince of Orange, Marquesse of La Vere, and of Flushing, &c. was made great Capitaine and Admirall generall of the vnitied Prouinces in the Low-countries, by the Estates: and Ernestus, Archduke of Austria, was also made Lieutenant Gouverneur, and Capitaine generall for Philip of Spaine.

Prince Maurice prouing very successefull in his warlike attempts, a Renegade or Apostate Priest (in the habite of Souldier) was corrupted (by the Arch-duke Ernestus) to murder the Prince Maurice at Breda; and, vpon his owne confession thereof, he was executed at the Hage. Afterward, vpon Prince Maurice his valiant surprizall of Gronning, Ernestus had dealt in like maner with a Souldier, named Peter de Four (who had sometime serued in the companie of the Guard to Prince Maurice) to vndertake the murdering of him at Lillo: the which treason being confessed by the man himselfe, he was executed in the towne of Berghen-up-zoom. Here might be much said of the honorable seruices of sir Frances Vere, and others, but our purposed breuitie is the onely imbarment; and the Netherlands Historie (at large) may thereof discharge me. The Arch-duke Ernestus dyed the twenty one day of February, one thousand five hundred ninety and five; Monardrons forces defeated by Prince Maurice, and La Motte slain before Doullus: the Estates (vnder the king of Spaine) gladly fought peace with the vnitied Prouinces, and sent Articles in writing to Prince Maurice, for consideration of their motion. This was not done, but vpon good aduice in the King of Spaine, perceiuing the Netherlands, and Prince Maurice his great fortunes against him, adding euery day, (more and more) to his veter abolition thence. Hereupon, Albertus the Cardinall, brother to deceased Ernestus, and Arch duke of Austria, was sent (by the King) to gouerne there for him; many Easterlings and Netherlands therland shippes, which had bene stayed in Spaine to meeete the Indian fleet, were suddenly released; and Phillip of Nassau (who is now Prince of Orange and Earle of Buren, that had long time bene restrained of his liberty in Spaine) for the better countenancing of his intended busines, he likewise went along with the Cardinall Albertus.

The Cardinall being made Gouverneur for the King of Spaine, tooke Callee from the French King, as his first peece of seruice: but for losse thereof, he recouered La-fere from the Spaniards. Whereupon, the Cardinall besieged Hilt in Flanders, which yielded in the end: but it was a deare purchase to the Cardinall, for this siege, (continuing some two moneths) cost him the liues of about three-score valiant Captaines, besides other Commanders, Collonels, and men of marke, and about five thousand well approoued souldiers.

Then did the King of Spaine dispense with himselfe for payment of his debts, which made many Merchants in Spaine, Italy, Antwerpe, Amsterdam, and Middlebourg, to become Bankerouts. A league was made betwene the French King, the Queene of England and the States, against the Spaniards; and then did Prince Maurice go to Tournhout, where the Earle of Varax was slain. Amiens also was surprized by the Spaniards; but soone besieged and recouered by the French King, albeit the Cardinall did offer succour, which proued in vain. Prince Maurice besieged, and tooke the Townes of Apen, Meurs, Rhinberg, Groll, Brestort, Enscheyde, Oldenzeel, Otmarfom, Goot, and Lingenzall which seruices he performed in three moneths. Then happened another treacherous plot, against the life of Prince Maurice, by perwasion of the Iesuites of Damay, and vnderaken by Peter Panne, a Cowper by trade; but being then a Broker or Bankerout Merchant, who hauing received the Sacrament to performe the deece, eyther with knife, ponyard, or pistol: the Prouinciall of the Iesuites made a long Sermon, to encourage him in the action, and assuring him of Paradise, if he performed it, vfed these words to him besides: Goe in peace, for thou shalt goe like an Angell, in the garde of God. But the man (being terrified in conscience) discouered

the whole treason, without any compulsion, and was therefore executed at Leyden in Holland. The King of Spaine growing weak and sickely, gaue his Daughter the Infanta, named Isabella Clara Eugenia, in marriage to the Arch duke and Cardinall Albertus, with transfaction of the Netherlands and Bourgogne: whereupon he left his Cardinales habite, and went to fetch the Infanta. Soone after dyed the King of Spaine, on the thirteenth day of September, in the year of our Lord God 1598. being seauentie one yeares olde, and four moneths.

The Arch-duke and the Infanta being come into the Netherlands, had their intallment at Brussels, Louaine, Antwerpe, &c. The Emperour sent to the States, concerning a peace, but their relolution helde to make warre in Flanders. Then happened the siege and memorable battail of Nieuport, where Prince Maurice tooke diuers Fortes from the Spaniards, and ouerthrew the Arch-dukes Armie, he being there in person: but gladly fled away, leaving his Armes, Horfile of Combate, all his Houhold, Artillery, and baggage behinde him, and lost fixe thousand men, besides eight hundred taken prisoners, among whom was Don Francisco de Mendoza, Admirall of Arragen, Marquesse of Guadaleste, and Lieutenant generall of the Arch-dukes Army, who was ledde to Ostend; Don Baptista de Villanona, led to Horne in Holland; Don Alonso Ricquell, to Delft; Don Gonzalo Hernandez de Spinola, to Vtrecht; Don Pedro de Montenegro, to the Hague; Don Pedro de Valasco, to Berghen, with Don Francisco de Tarres, and Don Antonio de Mendoza, and Don Pedro de Leusina, to Enchuisen: besides the Arch-dukes three Pages, Count Carlo Rezi, Don Diego de Guzman, and Mortier: Don Pedro de Monte-maior, his chiefe Taster; also his Philition, Barber, Harbinger, Rider, Cook, Porter, Grooms of his Chamber, most of the Archers, Halberdiers of his Guard, and (in a maner) all his houhold; with three Priests or Monks; forty Aunients, and thirty seauen Pensioners, reamed (by them) Ancients and Sergeants reformed. Hee lost also fixe peeces of Ordinance, one hundred thirty and fixe Ensignes of foote taken, and five Cornets of horfile, comprehending the Motines Standard, and the recouered lost Colours.

Moreover, on the Archdukes side were slain, the Earle of Saume, the Earle of La Fere, the Seneshall of Montlimar, the Baron of Pimeruill, Chaffy Otingny, son to the President Richardot; Don Gaspar de Sapeas, Colonell, who died at Oastend, Don Diego de Torres, Don Gaspar de Loyazo, Don Gonzalo d'Espinala, Don Iohn de Pardo, Don Garcia de Toledo, Don Lopo de Capeta, Don Alonso Carcano, Don Louis Faccardo, Sebastian Velasco, Sebastian Doteiza, Christianall Verdagues, Muttheo d'Osteuille, Joanmettin de casa nueva, the Paymaster Aimes, and many other newen known.

Prince Maurice and the States, at the first encounter in the mornings, and lastly in the battel, lost about 2000. men, among whom were Bernard, Coweler, & Hamelton, Captaines of horle, and some twentie Capitaines of foot, but no man of marke or speciall note. In this braue exploitte at Nieuport, the vertue and valor of Sir Frances Vere Generall, and Sir Horatio Vere his Brother, Colonell, will for euer bee remembered.

The occurrences in the following years as the besiedging of Oastend, the enterprize on Flejsigne, the practise to sacke Antwerpe againe, Grane yielded vp vnto Prince Maurice; also his honorable offers to the towne of Sluice, and it being yielded to him vpon composition, euen in the view of the Archdukes army: they require a larger field of discourse, then by this breuety can be admitted. Proceed we then to speake of the long continued sledge at Oastend, which lasting three whol yeares and eleuen weekes, was at last compounded withall, and on the twentie two day of September, 1604. yielded to the Archduke.

What numbers were slain in this long continued siege of Oast-end, can hardly be gathered, albeit, a note was found in a Commisaries Pocket (who had bin slain the seuenth of August, 1604. before Oastend) wherein were diuers good obseruations; especially concerning the Archdukes Campe, and also what number (of each degree) dyed and were slaine therein, during this sledge, vntill the yeilding vp thereof, viz) Masters of the camp seuen; Colonels fifteene; Sergeant Majors twenty nine, Captaines 505. Lieutenants 1116. Ensigns 322. Sergeants 1911. Corporals 1166. Lanfrizadoes 600. Soldiers, 54663. Mariners 611. women and Children, 119. all amounting to 72124. persons.

To continue the memory of this long sledge, as also the winning of Sluice; counters (of Silver and Copper) were made in the vnited Prouinces, bearing (on the one side) the figure of Oastend, and on the other, the Towns of Rhinberke, Grane, Sluice, Ardenbourg, with the Forts of Ipsendyke & Cadfant, with this inscription round about: Plus triennio obsessa, posttrudera Patria quatuor ex me urbes dedit. Oastend being more then three years besiedged, gaue the enemy an heape of stones, and so her Native Country foure Townes. Another Counter, concerning Sluice, had these wordes on the one side, Traxis, duxit, dedit, Anno 1604. And with the Armes of Zeland on the other side, were these words: Beatus populus cuius adiutor Deus. For the following yeares, from 1604. to 1608. I find no especiall or memorable accidents; but an enterprize by Prince Maurice, on the river of Scheld and Antwerp, with the taking of the Castele of Wouwre, neere vnto Berghen & Spaine; Spinalas taking of Linghen, with an attempt on Berghen & Groll, taken by composition, &c. For a treaty of peace happening betweene England and Spaine, the like also chanced to be talked on concerning the Netherlands, and many other meetings were made to bring it to effect. At length it was brought to passe, by the labour and endeour of a Friar (as it was reported) who made manie errands between Spaine and the Netherlands, vntill it was accomplished. Since when, nothing hath hapned of any consequence, but the taking of the Towne of Guliche in Germany, where the Prince Maurice did behaue himselfe very honorably.

CHAP. I.

Containing, a breefe discourse of the Originall of the Venetians; the foundation of Venice, and how it hath bene governed, from the yeare of our Lord, 421. to this instant.

Historiographers who have written of the Venetians, doe not agree together in their true Originall. For some doe write, that they are descended of the Venetian Gaules, inhabiting along the Ocean sea in little Britaigne, called Armorica, whereof one of the principall Citties (beeing a Byshops See) was called Vennes. Others, and (among them) Titus Livius, born in Padua, assures vs, that they came forth of Paphlagonia, and that Philemon their Captaine (being slayne at Troy the great) they went with Antenor into Italy. Others write, that this Nation, hauing bene neighbours to the Cappadocians, and venturing fight with the Cimmerians, they hazarded farre further vpon the Adriaticke Sea in their Fortune. The most common opinion, is of them, who say, that the Thinitians or Heneles came with Antenor; and, in sometime after (by changing of a Letter) were called Venitians, or Venetes.

First of all, they expelled the Engameans who inhabited this country, between the Adriaticke sea and the Alpes, and builded the City of Padua. Afterward, by successe of time, they increased in such sort, as they would not be satisfied to be Masters (only) of that which had appertained to the Engameans (consisting of thirty foure fayre Citties and Townes;) but intruded farther, to teize on Bressano and Forli. Some report this Country to be bounded with the Rivers of Pau, and that of Adde, as also the Lake of Guard, anciently called the Benacke, the alpes, and the Adriaticke sea.

And so the ancient Venetians in this manner, extended their Dominion, both in longitude and latitude, in the most pleasant Countrey of Italy: but the seating of the places did daily beget the elder citare of the Venetians haured. For on the one side, the ordinary robberies of the Liburnians, and on the other side, the frequent and frightfull courses of the Barbarians, did hinder them from any long time of continuing in quiet. For, without these impeachments, this Nation had bin most fortunate, in conquering (by the right of Ware) one of the most goodly & beautiful regions in all Italy.

Now ouer & beside, that on the south-side, it is enuironed with a most calme circuite of the sea, and in regard thereof, is the most capable of receiuing all strange Merchandizes: so it is likewise Watered with very delectable rivers, whereby whatsoeuer commeth from the Sea, is easilie transported to the very Nauel of the Prouince. It aboundeth in Pooles, Ponds, Forrests, and vnder-woods, & the whole Land is choicely fertile in Corne, Wine, Oyle,

Oyle, and all kindes of fruites. It is also plentifully stored with Countrey houses, Townes, Citties, and Villages, Castles, Fortes, and such like, verie commendable for the situation & enclosure of their Walles.

Their new inhabitants, when their weeke estate beganne to grow in sayter forme: they were seldom exempted from the VVaires and incursions of strangers. For, after many bolde insolencies of the Barbarians, with continued Warres against each other, euen from their verie beginning, vntill the time of Attila: they were yet much more dreadfully encumbered, with the furious assault of the Goths, a Tempest farr exceeding in turbulency, all other former disasters happening vnto them whatsoeuer. For first, the Hunnes

(a people of Scythia, dwelling neere to the Riparian Mountaines) conducted by Attila, the Sonne of Mandluke, disperied themselves puer Italy, and making horrible spoile wheresoeuer they went, fell into the Prouince belonging to the Venitians. After a long siege, they tooke the City of Aquileia, and spoyle and burnt it wholly. In like manner did they also ruinate the two Citties of Concordia and Adina, and almost all the Venitian region.

At the fearefull newes of this Warre, the Venitians were more amazed then any other, and so much the rather, because they had bene formerly inured, to sustaine their cheefest mishappes amongst the Barbarians. V hereupon it is said, that (euen then) a great number of persons withdrew themselves from the firme Land, to the Isles where Venice at this instant is builded: hasting thither from all other parts, especially vpon the arrivall of this cruell enemy Attila.

Some (of the better sort of Padua) first beganne the retreat, and being come to the entrance or issue of the Riuer, which was then very deepe (whence the name of Rialto hath remaind to the same place, as deriued of the word Rinculo) they there laide the first foundation of the Cittie of Venice.

The meaner people of Padua, enforced by the selfe-same feare; fled thence, and beganne to people themselves in Chioggia, Malamocco, and Albiola. Som of them of Aquileia (at the same time) betooke themselves to the Marshes or Fennes of Grada; and vpon the fresh returne of Attila, the people ran (in mighty affluence) along the Coastes to the Neighbouring Isles. They of Aquileia bestowed themselves in Grada, a place neereft vnto firme land, yet engirt with Waters. They that fledde from Concordia, made vse of Coarls and the Atimis, fixe little Islands neere to one another, which they gaue names vnto, according to the names of the gates of their former lost and ruined Citties: to wit, Torcello, Atmorbo, Buriana, Muriano, Anuana, and Giustianica.

These severall places, where at this present the City of Venice is seated, were (in elder times) very straight or narrowe Islands, and neere vnto each other: sauing onely that they were separated by the pleasing course of Riuers, which ranne into, and returned againe from the Sea, according to the changes of his fluxe and reflux. Nor in these straights were then any dwellings to bee discerned, but onely of Sea-Fowles, that flew thither from the Seas, to disport themselves vpon the Sunny banks; and Fisher-men likewise, would sometimes there put in for harbour.

The Paduans, that tooke vp the Rialto, were the first that beganne to build, and it was in the very same place, where the first foundation of the City was layde: Namely, the five and twentieth day of March, in the yeare of our Lord, 421. and second yeare of the reigne of Pharamond, first King of the Gauls or French-men, in the time also of Pope Boniface the first, and of the Emperour Honorius. Whereby it plainly appeareth, that at one and the selfe-same time, began both the kingdom of France and the Commonwealt of Venice. And that both the one and the other haue continued to this present, for twelue hundred yeares, very little, either more or lesse.

This City so newly begun, encreased dayly both in people and buildings. But feare what happened vpon a sodaine, a Greeke Carpenters house (or rather here was one of the Shipwrights, named Emetopus) falling on fire, consumed in a moment (with a violent & continuall embracing) 24. faire new built houses. Which when the new come inhabitants perceived, & fearing that heauen was offended with with this their manner of beginning, forgetting God, and serving their owne appetites. They fell all to prayer, and made a solemne vow, to build a Church in the honour of God, and in memory of the Apostle Saint James; at which verie instant time, a mighty tempest of rain (as sodainly fell) whereby the rest of the new begun City was happily preferred.

That Church is yet at this day plainly to be discerned, with the markes and appearances of great antiquity, euen in the very midst of the Rialto: And it was then consecrated by foure Bishops, to wit; Seruanus byshop of Padua; Ambrose, Byshop of Adina; Iscundus, byshop of Trevisa; and Epodius, byshop of Verdza, and a Priest was there appointed, to performe diuine Service.

The first foundations of this Famous City, were men of honest repute, Noble, and rich. For the ancient Venitians, at the change of their abiding, brought with them thither their wiues and childre, with the very wealthieft moueables which they had, and so (at leisure) withdrew themselves, to places of a more secure dwelling. But being impeached (by incursions of the Hunnes) to Till the groundes vpon the sea Coasts; such as had any meanes or apt commodity: gaue themselves to fighting, and to make salt, or to transport the goods of their neighbors; esteeming the benefit thereby gotten, to be no more dishonest or vnbecomming, then to plough and husband the groundes of others.

As for the wealthier sort, they addicted themselves to traffick Merchandizes with strangers, and by their frequent aduenturing into diuers Countries, some of them being very skillfull Miners, and well experienced in the triall of severall Oares or Mettals hidden in the ground, which by industry and endeavour they found in the earth, became Finers or Tryers of those Mettals, and extracted (from the grosse substances) the purer perfektions of Gold and Silver, whereby, in their owne Language, they were termed Orifici, deriued of the Latine word Aurifex, Gold-Smithes, or Hammer men, that (of those refined Mettals) could frame Cups, Pots, Rings, Balons, Ewres, or any other needfull matter whatsoeuer, both for the seruice of God in Churches and Temples, and for the royalty of Emperors, Kings, & Princes. So that, by the consent of diuers good Authors, as Linie, Florus, Cassiodorus, Trogus Pompeius, and others, the first Gold-Smiths, workers in Gold and Silver, and framers of those excellent mettalles into such orderly meanes for vse (within the parts of Europe) lived in Venice, whereas yet (to this day) do remaine the very best ingenious, and perfect workmen for such matters (according to the iudgement of many) that are to be found in any part of the world. Concerning such as remained more ordinarily at home, for care & safety of the City; they applied their spirits, to deuise good lawes and custums for general benefit. During which time, such was their due respect of iustice, & so precise care of equity and right to all men; as among so great a number of people, there could not bee any disorderly differences noted.

Catholike religion they so singularly commended, and the dayly presence of some reuerend Prelates, who had faued themselves with their Compatriots; that it augmented (among them) a common affection to piety. And their assistance appeared verie requisite, not onely for the ministry of holie Offices; but also for retention of the inhabitants of this new City, in ancient piety and religion. Fearing least they might be infected with the poison of Atrian heresie, because nothing els made more spoile and hauock through all the Prouince, except the weapons of the Goths and Hunnes.

Such was the beginning of the City of Venice, and in such manner of liuing, and in such exercises shee spent her first infancy; till (by her vertues) shee attained vnto greater growth, and grounded her selfe in her instant state and condition. It hath constantly bene held, that this Commonwealt (euermore) retained that forme of government, which is termed Aristocratie, that is, that the most noble and worthiest Citizens should guide and govern. For, although it be saide, that it hath bene gouerned first by Consuls, then by Tribunes, and lastly by Dukes, and Masters of warlike power; notwithstanding, all these dignities, being but eleciue, and not hereditary, the election should (in right) appertain to the most Noble Islanders, and Gentlemen of name, by whose aduice the Commonwealt ought to be mana-managed, even as it hath bin, and still continueth to this day.

Consuls, to the number of three, were chosen for two yeares, and albeit that this kinde of Government lasted for about the space of threescore yeares, yet wee finde only but three consecutiu or succeeding elections of them. The first Consuls, were Albertus Phalaris, Thomas Candianus, and Zeno Daulo. These men first gouerned the City in her Nonage, & some are of the minde, that they were the first Authors of the Paduans flight, and their retirement to the Lakish or Marish Isles, as also of their first building there. The second Consuls, were Lucianus Granlus, Maximus, or Marinus Lucius, and Hugo Fufcus. The third, were Marcus Aurelius, Andreas Claudius, and Albinus Maurus. The names of such as were elected after these, are not to be found in anie Histories.

After, that the Isles (about the Rialto were filled with inhabitants: in stedd of Consuls, Tribunes were created, and for their creation, the matter was first debated priuately by few people, afterward, it was ordained and resolved in open assembly of the Islanders: that in each Isle there should be a Tribune, and hee should bee a yearly Magistrate, to render Iustice to the Cittizens, and with seuerity to punish their offences. But the remaynder which concerned the generalitie of the Common-weale: was referred to the generall assembly of the Islanders, to bee by them determined. Afterward, there was but one Tribune created for government of the Isles, which continued for some yeares. Finally, they concluded to create ten, wherunto were added two more, who should dwell in Heraclea; & this Tribuniary dignity held place for more then two hundred yeares. Heere is to bee noted, that the Tribunes of the Isles, abusing their authorities, did so trouble the State with ciuill diffentions, as it plainly appeared, that the maine body of the Cittie would be dissolved, without some good and immediate remedy. Which gaue occasion, that (to heare the complaints of euery one) a general assembly of the Isles was published, and their meeting to be in Heraclea.

In this assembly, Christophoro byshop of Grada was President, accompanied with a great number of the Cleargie, and after diuine seruice was performed, the first proposition which he made, was, that (for good of the Common-wealth, each man might complaine of the future Tribune, which being done, and the offences no longer to be endured, for publike benefit of the state in generall, resolution was set downe, to make election of a Duke, who should represent all honor and Maiesty in the State or Seigneury, & he should haue power to assemble the general counsell, when questions were to be made, of any important matter concerning the Commonwealth. He should haue power also, to elect yearly Tribunes or Magistrates in euery Isle, and their appellations to bee brought before him. Moreover, if any should obtaine any dignity, Prelacie, or Benefice, by suffrages of the Clergy or people: that he should not enjoy it, or be possessed therof, without the good liking and consent of the Duke, whose power also ended with his life.

This being thus concluded, in the year 697. Paulucio was created the first Duke; and so hath that Ducall dignity continued euer since. Saue only that in the year 737. after the death of the third Duke Orso, it was determined, that no duke should be elected, for six yeares, but that a Master of the armed troopes or Souldiours should be established, and his Authoritie to be annual, which lasted no longer then five yeares. For in the year, 742. they proceeded againe to a Dukes election; and since that time, the Common-wealth of Venice hath euermore had Dukes & Princes of the Seigneury; by whose wisdom (and his counsell assisting) it hath bin preserved in an euer flourishing estate, euen to this instant year, 1619.

CHAP. II.

A short Summary, of the lines of the Dukes and Princes of Venice: And a breuiate also of the most remarkable actions, in the times of their Government.

Paulucio Anapesto, was first Duke of the people, chosen in Heraclea. He took his his Oath before Christophoro, Patriarke of Grada, to gouerne according to the lawes, & to regard nothing more then the weale publike. He pacified the difference which Luiprand, king of the Lombards had with K. Aribert, and made friendship with them both: as well by his authority, as by arms. He brought the rebellious Aquileians vnder obedience, encreased the Citties customs and reuenues, and dyed, hauing bene Duke twenty yeares, sixe moneths, and eight dayes.

2 Marcello Tegaliano, of the same place of Heraclea, was elected his successeur, by common voyce of the people. He was deuoute, modest and affable; but much lesse diligent in gouerning, then his predecessor. The Patriarchat of Grada was transferred into Aquileia in his time, by Luiprand, and there hee had great warres, about the diffentions of the Bishops, wherinto he would not interpose himselfe; but dyed, hauing bene Duke nine yeares, and twenty one dayes.

3 Orso Hipato, a nobleman of Heraclea, wonne himselfe great reputation by his famous deedes. Paulo the Exarcho had recourse to him, the Gracian Arme being broken, and siegelayd to Rauenna by Luiprand. He re-gained Rauenna, made the Kings nephew his prisoner, slew the duke of Picenza, and released the Exarcho in his due rights. Hee bridlede the Aquileians, who troubled the publike peace, and put courage into the soules of the yonger sort. He was slaine, by reason of the diffentions of Iesolo, the eleauenth year, and sixt moneth of his Principality.

4 Theodato Hipato, sonne of Orso, was proclaimed Duke 5. yeares after the death of his father: during which time, the people were gouled by a Marshall or Master of the Souldiers: and forsaking Heraclea, he brought the State to Malamocco. There he was the first created, and limited his Confinnes with Astolpho King of the Lombards. He was also slayne by Galla a Cittizen of Malamocco, in the thirteenth year of his Principality.

5 Galla de Malamocco, a wicked and seditious man, yet shewing himselfe as Protector of publike peace, was established in the place of Theodato. But his wickednesse being knowne, and that (being but a subiect) he would needs make himselfe absolute Lord, hauing before slayne his chiefe Maister Theodato: the people plucked out his eyes, and tooke from him the Dignitie, which hee had a yeare vsturped.

6 Dominico Monegario, of Malamocco, was seated in the steade of Galla. Somewhat to bridle this Dukes authoritie, the people ioyned two yearly Tribunes with him. But he, being a man audacious and arrogant, fought to tyrannize ouer the people: wherat they growing into furiè, pluckt out his eyes, the eight yeare of his Principality.

7 Mauritio Galbaio, a noble Heracleian, for his iustice, wisdom, and wealth, was chosen to this dignity. He made his sonne Duke with him, and they gouerned together. In his time, the Church of Grada being molested, he sent an Ambassadour to Pope Stephen, to accord the difference. The Bishopricks of Saint Peter de Castello Olino, was then erected. And hee died, hauing gouerned twenty three yeares.

8 Giovanni Galbaio, hauing bene Duke nine yeares with his father, gouerned the Commonwealth yet nine yeares more, and after the sayd time, hee made Mauritio his sonne, companion with him in the Principality. But they being both of vnsufferable and wicked life, hauing murdered Iohn Patriarchat of Grada, throwing him downe heading from an high tower: Fortunatus, successeur in the Patriarchate, made a conspiracie against them, and another was elected Duke. Wherat, being not a little confounded, the father fled into Franunce, and the sonne to Mantua, the sixteenth yeare of their rule.

9 Obelerio, being elected Prince by them that had intelligence with Fortunatus, tooke his brother Beato as his affociate, and Valentine beside (being their third brother) was admitted with them in the same dignitie. And it is worth the noting, that of these three brethren, Beato is onelie placed in the ranke of Dukes in the Counsell chamber of Venice; whereas Obelerio incited Pepin King of Italy, to make warre on the Venicians: and Beato maintaind the Common-wealth, raigning five yeares.

10 Angelo Participatio, after he had wel borne himselfe in the warre against Pepin, was elected Duke, the people being summoned to the Rialto. He founded the Dukes palace, in the same place where that now built, standeth. The diuision of the Empire was made in his time, and the Venetians left in their owne liberty. The Citie was diuided into wards, streets, and precincts. The Pregadi, and the Quaranta, who (for criminall offences) was then instituted among them. He gouerned 18. years.

11 Giustiano Participatio, hauing bene an associate in the dignity with his father, was (after his death) confirmed by the people. Hee repealed home his brother Iohn, who was then at Constantinople, & accepted him as his fellow ruler: hee made the peoples authority greater then before, & gaue ayde to Michael the Emperor against the Sarazins. The body of Saint Marke was in his time brought from Alexandria, accepting it into his protection, and the Church remaining at this day, was consecrated in his memory. He died the second year of his dignity.

13 Gionanni Participatio, remained in the royalty, and enlarged the Church of S. Marke, placing therein a great number of Priests and Canons, & appointing a Primicerio to gouerne them. Hee caused the head of Obelerio to be cut off, whome hee had besiedged in the Isle of Curia. He made war vpon the Nauratines, and ouercame them. In the end, a conspiracy was deuised against him, and beeing confined to Grada, in the eight year of his Principality, hee shaued his head and beard, and made himselfe a Monke, in which estate he dyed.

12 Pietro Trademico of Pola, hauing carried himselfe to the peoples contentment in the warres against Pepin, was elected Duke. He ioynd Iohn his son in rule with him, and gaue succour to the Emperor of Constantinople, who made request thereof by Theodosius Patricius. He was made Protospatary of the Empire: in help whereof, he sent 60. Gallies. Lewes 2. granted him many priuiledges, and in the end, hee was slaine by a sedition, in his 27. year.

14 Orso Participatio hauing appeased the sedition, was made Du. The Turks hauing spoiled Dalmatia, euen so far as Grada, were vanquished by him, and Gionanni Participatio his son, whom he made associat with him in his gouernment. Basilus the Emperor, highly honoured him for that good service, and made him Promptuary of the Empire. He gouerned 17. years.

15 Gionanni Participatio, being confirmed in his dignity, tooke and burned Coma-

chia, wasted the Countie of Rauenna, to reuenge himself on the Count of Comachio, who had imprisoned and wounded vnto death his Brother Bradorio. He growing much ouercome with sicknesse, caused the Church of Saint Cornelius, and S. Cyprian to be built at Malamecco, and hauing gouerned fve yeares, and fixe moneths, renounced the Dignity.

16 Pietro Candiano, was elected after the voluntary dismission of his Predecessour. He was a valiant man, and verie expert in Armes; and yet notwithstanding, greatly addicted to deuotion. He went (in person) with ten Gallies against the Nauratines, who (as Theeues) robbed and purloyned from the Venitians. Fighting valiantly against them, hee dyed at the second time, with the Weapons in his handes. He gouerned no longer then fve moneths.

Dominico Tribuno, is set (by some) in ranke with the Dukes: but others, lesse curious in search of the History, haue omitted him; because he was duke but three moneths, and thirteene dayes, and nothing is remarkable in his time, but a certaine priuiledge, granted by him to Chioggia.

17 Pietro Tribuno, sonne of Dominico, was elected Duke. He obtained of Guydo, Emperor and King of Italy, a confirmation of all ancient Priuiledges. The Barbarian Hunnes came againe into Italy, and burned Heracles, Capo de Argier, and Chioggia. This Prince ouercame them, with very much honour: and this was the third time, that those Strangers fought to vsurp on that State. He gouerned twenty foure yeares.

18 Orso Badoaro, called himselfe Participatio, and was the first that chaunged his name. He sent for his sonne Pietro to Constantinople, and hee was made Protospatarie. In the yeare nine hundred and twentie, hee obtained of Rodulphus, Emperor and King of Italy, the confirmation of the Venitians ancient authoritie, to stampe Moneyes. Hee addicted himselfe wholly to piety, and in his 20. year, he renounced the Dignitie, to make himselfe a Monke, and liue priuately.

19 Pietro Candiano the second, was a worthy man, and made Warre on Lauetrio, Marquesse of Iliria, who hindred the Trafficke of the Venitians. He ouercame him him, and re-conquered the people of Capo d'Iliria. He vanquished Albertus, sonne to the Emperor Berengarius, who impatronizing himselfe of Rauenna, impeached the passage of the Venitians shippes. In his time, Maidens were stollen by the Testaines, to ioyne in marriage with them; but they were soone recovered. He gouerned seuen yeares.

20 Pietro Badoaro, the sonne of Orso, was redeemed by him from the Sclauonians. He gouerned but two yeares and seuen moneths, alwayes in peace, which he much affected. Berengarius the Emperor did him many fauours, for his great deserts.

11 Pietro Candiano the third, sonne to the second Candiano, associated himselfe in his dignity with his sonne Pietro: and at two seuerall times armed three & thirty Shippes against the Narentines; but at the second time, he made peace with the. His sonne being reproofed by him for his bad behauiour; revolted from him, and againt the Common-wealth. The people would haue slaine him, but hee was sent thence into exile: wher ioyning with Guydo, sonne of Berengarius, hee endangered the Commonwealth: wher at his Father greewing, died in his fiftieth year of gouernment.

22 Pietro Candiano the fourth, being repealed from exile (albeit the people had sworne neuer to receiue him) was made Prince with very great applause. He dealt in such sort with Pope Iohn the twelfth, that the Church of Grada was made Patriarchall, and Metropolitane of all the Venitians State, and of Iliria. Otho the Emperor, granted him many honourable priuiledges. He ruined Vderzo, and was slaine with his Sonne in a sedition of the people, hauing gouerned about twentie yeares.

23 Pietro Orscolo, was a man altogether deuout, and was elected by the people against his will. He would very often walk in an vnknowne habit, to visit the houses of poore people and Hospitals. Hee appeased the diffentions between the Venitians, and them of Capo d'Iliria, who yielding themselves tributary; hee went with Beato Romualdo of Rauenna, to liue Religiously. He gouerned two yeares and two months, doing many worthy and charitable deeds.

24 Pietro Candiano, Sonne of Pietro the third, made the confederacy with the Emperor Otho. He fell sicke so soone as hee entred vpon his charge: wherefore hee became a Monke, hauing gouerned about a yeare.

25 Tribuno Memo, was very rich, but no man of State. In his time happened great diffentions, betwene the families of Morefina and Calleprina; by reason whereof, many notorious murders were committed. Hee took part with the Morisini, which caused the faction to withdraw themselves to Verona, to the Emperor Otho. Hee gaue the Isle of S. Giorgio Maggiore to the Abbot of Morefina: and renounced the Principality in his twelfth yeare, entering into Religion.

26 Pietro Orscolo the second, being a very discrete man, ordered the matter so well with the Emperours Basilus and Alexius: that the Venitians were exempted from Tolles and Taxations. Otho the Emperor lying at Perona, did highly fauour him; and, among other graces, to holde one of his sonnes at Baptisme. Hee was the first that extended their Confines on the Sea, winning many places in Iliria and Dalmatia. Hauing caused the Church and Pallace to be finished in his time, hee dyed in the eighteenth year of his Principality.

27 Ottone Orscolo, hauing Gouerned some space with his father Pietro, was confirmed in the dignity, at the age of eighteene yeares. Hee vnned such reputation, that Geta King of Hungaria, gaue him one of his Sisters in marriage. In person hee conquered them of Iliria, who were become Rebelles; and went into Dalmatia, in the enterprize agaynst Cresimura. At length, the malicious enuiers of his glories, deuised a Conspiracie agaynst him, vpon the which, he was confined into Greece, in the seuenteenth yeare of his rule.

28 Pietro Centranico, or Barbolano, succeeded next to Otho. But hauing not well qualified all diffentions, as well concerning the Cittizens remouing, as the other Neighbours; he was compelled to forsake the dignity, and make himselfe a Monke. Orso, Brother of Otho, returned from Constantinople, being Patriarche of Grada, and he was constituted in expectation of Othos coming. He continued about a yeare in the Palace, and forsooke the Principality, newes being brought of Othos death. Dominico Orseolo would then perforce usurp the dignity; but he was expelled by the people the next morning, & died at Rauenna.

29 Dominico Flabanico, was elected during his exile, by the faction of them that had excluded Dominico Orseolo. In his time and in the year 1040. the national Council was held, for government of the Ecclesiastickes. He made the family of Orseolo suspicious to the State, by his owne meanes, and laboured for their vtter supplantation. He gouerned ten yeares, foure months, and twelue dayes.

30 Dominico Contarini was verie pleasing to the people. He brought Dalmatia to peace, beeing heauily burthened with the rebellion of Zara. He fauoured the Normans against Robert King of Apulia. And the discord which hapned betweene the Common-wealth, and Pepo, Patriarch of Aquileia, was by him qualified. Hee builded the Monasterie on the Lido, and dyed in the eight and twenty yeare of his Principality.

31 Dominico Silino, won himselfe such reputation, that Nicephorus, Emperour of Constantinople, gaue him his sister in marriage; by whose perswasion, he made war vpon the forenamed King Robert of Apulia, and (at the first attempt) returned with a very honourable victory, possessing himselfe of Duraz. But at his second aduerture, hee fought with small aduantage; whereby ensued the diminution of his credit. He pergetted the Church of Saint Marke with Marble, first and before any other, causing it also to be beautified with an artificall Checker-werke. He died in the thirteenth yeare of his gouernement.

32 Vitale Faliero being made Duke, he immediately obtained of Alexius, then Emperour, to haue the foueraigntie of Dalmatia and Croatia. Henry, successour in the Empire, did him many great fauours: and comming in deuotion to Venice, hee helde one of his daughters at Baptisme. The Office of proprieties was constituted in his time, and the workmanship of S. Markes Church continued. He died in his sixteenth yeare.

33 Vitale Michele, by his worthy aduerturing on the sea, did very farre extend the Commonwealths limites. Hee made the Easterne warre (by the perswasion of Pope Vrbane the second) for Conquest of the Holy Land, with the Princes of Christendome. The Isle of Smyrna, Suria, and Ierusalem were then recouered from the Infidels. He died in his sixty yeare.

34 Ordelfo Faliero, sonne of Vitale, assisted King Baldwine against the Infidels in conquest of the holy Land: and made such progression, as they deuided the Empire betweene them, thoroughout all the kingdom of Iudea. In the 8. yeare of his Principality, Malenoco was almost alburied and submerged; by reason whereof, the Episcopall See was transferred to Chioggia. He went in person to the Warre against Zara, which was becom rebellious, and winning the victory: he would needs returne thither againe a second time, and on the like occasion; where hee died in Armes, in the fifteenth yeare of his Principality.

35 Dominico Michele, being made Duke for his high repute and merite, went to giue aide to the Christians in the Holie Land. With 200. well appointed shippes and Gallies, he made the Infidels to raise their sledge from before Ioppa. Hee tooke Tyre, which he gaue to Faunand Patriarch of Ierusalem. Emanuel the Emperour made war against him, fro whom he won Chio, Rhodes, Samos, Mitylline, and Miser. He renounced his principality, in the 13. yeare of his rule.

36 Pietro Polani, kinsman to Michele, was a very wise man, inso much as he was made Arbitrator of the difference between Comrade and Emanuel the Emperour. Hee made war against them of Pisa & Padua, whom he conquered. He armed himselfe against the Duke of Apulia, in behalfe of the same Emanuel, to whose Empire hee added many worthy possessions. Some say, it was his sonne that won all the battalies, and that himselfe being false sickle, returned thence, and dyed in his 18. yeare of rule.

37 Dominico Moresini, hee swept the Gulfe of certaine Pyrats of Ancona, the cheefe whereof beeing called Gaiscardo, was taken and hanged. Hee layed sledge vnto Pola, which he tooke, with Parenzo; which Citties were become rebellious in Ithria. He held confederacy with William King of Sicily, of whom hee obtaeynd many many exemptions for the Trafficke of his Merchants. Zara made the Metropolitan Citie (at his instance) and hee so preuayled, that Dominico his Sonne was made an Earle. Hee beautified the Buildinges of the Citie of Venice, and began the Tower of Saint Marke. He dyed seauen monthes after the eight yeare of his Election.

38 Vitale Michele the second, subdued the Tarentines, which now had rebelled the third time. He imprisoned Vitrich, Patriarch of Aquileia, and twelue Chanons. In an hundred dayes, he put forth an hundred Gallies, and twentie Shippes on the Sea, against the Emperour Emanuel. The great Family of the Iustiniani, were, in his time brought to one onely man, and hee was become Religious; whom hee tooke forth of his Monastery (by the Popes consent) and gaue him his owne daughter in marriage, because hee would not haue fo worthy a house to be extinct. There hapned a great Pestilence in his time, the occasion whereof, the people (in their weak iudgment) laid vpon him. He was wounded, and dyed, hauing gouerned seuentene yeares, and xxvii. daies.

39 Sebastiano Ziani, was the first that euer was elected by the cleauen Electors. In his time there was a great Schisme in the Church, by meanes of the Emperour Fredericke Barbarossa, who caused Alexander the third to forsake the See, Ottavian hauing bene made Anti-pope, Alexander made his retirement to Venice, where hauing a long time ferued in the Monastery of La Charita; he was in the end known, and taken thence by the Prince and Seigneury. Heereupon, Barbarossa made warre against the Venetians: but his sonne Ottavian being taken, he mediated reconciliation betweene them. He died in the fifth yeare of his gouernment.

40 Orio Malipiero, or Mastrapetra, was the first Duke elected by the forty; and for that purpose was created by the death of Ziani. Hee had fixe Councillors allowed him to authorize his deliberations. Hee conquered Zara, that had now the fourth time rebelled. Hee sent supply vnto the Christians against the Moores, who began to vsurpe in the holy Land 88. yeares after that Baldwine had deliuered it. Ptolomus was recouered, and Andronicus, successor to Emanuel the Emperour deliuered many Venitian Marchants. Hee renounced the Principality in his 14. yeare, and entred into Religion.

41 Henrico Dandolo was likewise elected by the forty. They of Zara were once againe vanquished, and Pola conquered. In his time was the surprizall of Constantinople, & the acquisition of the East Empire, wherein hee assisted the Princes and French Barons. He died in his thirteenth yeare, being Generall of all the Christian Army.

42 Pietro Ziani, sonne of Sebastiano, was made Duke within a while after the death of Dandolo, the Correctors beeing then first instituted. In his time came Ambassadors from Athens and Achaia, to submit themselves in obedience to the Common wealth. Candia was then peopled with a Colony of noble Venitians. He married Constance, daughter to Tancred K. of Sicily. In the end, he renounced the Principality, hauing gouerned 24. yeares.

43 Giacomo Tiepolo, was made Duke by chance, in concurrency of Renieri Candolo, who had as many voices as he. Candie rebelled, and the seditious were fiercely chastised. Zara, that had long borne the yoke, was now reduced vnder obedience. He had Warre against them of Ferrara, and against Ezzelino, who would haue inuested himselfe with Padua. In conclusion, he gaue ouer the Principality in his 20. yeare, and died soone after.

44 Marino Moresini, was made Duke by the one and fortish; by reason of the precedent concurrence. In his time was another Courtly Noble-man sent into Candie, who builded the Canea. He made Warre against Ezzelino, who besiedged Mantua, and who (in a furious rage) caused 1200. Paduans to be hewne in peeces, which he had with him then in his armie. He died in the 4. yeare of his Principality.

45 Renieri Zeno Podeſta at Bermog was elected Duke, and sent to be fetch thence with foure Gallies. Vnder him, the Commonwealth wonne a famous victorie, against them of Genes: but the contentment therewith was very breefe, because Michaell Paleologus, expelled both the French-men and Venitians out of Constantinople, being ayded by the Geneway forces, which was eight and fifty yeares after the surprizing of the sayde Citie: yet once more (after that) the selfesame people were againe reconquered: and hauing gouerned this dignity 16. yeares, he dyed.

46 Lorenzo Tiepolo was made Duke, in memory of the victory hee had against them of Genes at Tyre. Hee allyed two of his sonnes (verie Nobly) with two strange Ladies: by reason whereof, a Lawe was then made, that the like might not be afterward done. He brought Seruis in obedience to the Common-wealth, and the Bolognians were vanquished by him: hee gouerned seven yeares, and five and twenty dayes.

47 Giouanni Contarini, being aged eighty yeares, and Attorney of S. Marke, was made Duke. The law against illegitimates was then enacted, and they excluded from all publike Offices. There were some rebellions moued in Itiria, and by them of Genes; but they were quickly appeased. At length, thorough vnwellicnesse of age, and by aduice of the Senat, hee gaue ouer the dignity, hauing gouerned in this authority, foure yeares, and six moneths.

48 Giouanni Dandolo was elected, being then absent. The City was (in his time) much afflicted by water, & an earthquake. He made warre in Itiria, agaynst the Patriarch of Aquileia, and the Count of Gorizia. At the instance of Pope Nicholas, he assisted the Archbysop of Tripoli with 25. Gallies. He died seven moneths after his eight yeare of rule.

49 Pietro Gradenigo, a man of great courage, deliuered the Common-wealth from two important dangers. One, was a high disgrace, which happened in a battell against them of Genes. The other was the conspiracie of Isiamonte, which was boldly checked with weapon in hand, vpon the place of S. Marke. It was then ordayned, that Noblemen onely should gouerne, and the counsil of ten was then instituted. Hauing ruled 22. yeares, and nine moneths, he dyed.

50 Marino Giorgia, was a man of such life, that they termed him a Saint. Venice was continually excommunicated in his time, by reason of the taking of Ferrara. Zara rebelled againe the sixt time, & much labour it cost, to reduce it vnder obedience againe. After hee builded the Monastery of Saint Dominicke, and died (at the age of eighty and one yeares) in his first yeare, hauing gouerned ten months, and ten dayes.

52 Giouanni Soranzo, had the honor of recouering Zara, and many other places, which had reuolted in his predecessours time. Negropont, was re-obtained, & warre afresh commenced against them of Genes. The excommunication was quitted from Venice, by the interposition of Francisco Dandolo, kneeling before the Pope, with a Chaîne of iron about his necke. The number of Atturneyes of S. Marke, was increased to fixe. Hee gouerned fixteene yeares, and six months.

52 Francisco Dandolo, who had so lowly humbled himselfe for his Countreyes good, was therefore exalted to her highest dignity. They of Pola, and of Valesia, submitted themselves to the Common-wealth, which gaue way vnto the warre against the Patriarch of Aquileia. Padua was taken on Albert Scaliger, and Treuisa, and the County remained to the Common-wealth. This man was of the league with the Christian Princes, against the Turke, and in his time were fixtie severall Ambassadors at Venice. He gouerned ten yeares, and ten months.

55 Bartolomeo Gradenigo, Attorney of S. Marke, was made Duke at twenty six yeares of age, by the intercession of Andreas Dandolo, and his cessation. In his time was Venice miraculously deliuered from a mighty imminent inundation. Candie rebelled, and the rebelles were feuerely punished. There hapned a great dearth in the City, which droue the people to discontentment: he dyed in his fourth yeare.

54 Andreas Dandolo, who had before resigned his place vnto Bartolomeo Gradenigo, caused the death for to cease; by sending for great store of Corne out of Sicily. Hee obtained of the King of Babylon, free Navigation into Egypt. Zara rebelled the seauenth time; and was repressed.

The Warre betweene them of Genes and the City, was troubled by two great accidents happening; the one, was an Earth-quake very dreadfull; and the other, was a greuous Pestilence. Hee gouerned twelue yeares, wanting some fewe months.

55 Marino Faliero, was elected Duke, being then Ambassador at Rome. Hauing recei-received an iniurie by some particulars, which was not reuenged according vnto his owne desire: hee determined in the eighty yeare of his age, to make himselfe absolutely Lord, without any controule. The conspiracy being discouered by Nicholas Lion; he had his head smitten off with in the Pallace. And it was ordayned, that his Picture should not be placed amongst the other dukes, but the place being left voyde, had only this Writing: This is the place of Marino Faliero, who, for his grievous offence, had his head cut off: hee was duke but ten moneths.

56 Giouanni Gradenigo had an excellent spirit, but a much mis-shapen countenance. The warre was renewed against the Genes, which tearmained with a mutual peace. He had warre against the King of Hungarie for Dalmatia. Treuisa was besieged in his time, and thither he went in person. Hee gouerned one yeare, three moneths and foureteene dayes.

56 Giouanni Delfino, was elected Duke when hee was in Treuisa, defending it against the King of Hungary. The Senate sent to demand free passage for him; which being denied, he came forth with two hundred horse to beard the enemy, and so attained to Marghera, where the Senate in person receiued him. In short time he gaue end to this warre, and recouered Conciliano, Sernalla, and Afola. He made peace for the souerainty of Dalmatia; and dyed aged forty and five yeares, hauing gouerned foure yeares, two moneths, and eleuen dayes.

58 Lorenzo Celfo, vpon a false bruite, of a victorie against them of reuolted Genes; was made Duke in concurrence of Pietro Gradenigo, Leonardo Dandolo, and Marco Cornaro. Candie rebelled againe, and it was regained with a very great difficulty. On this occasion, a lust and feast was publicly made in the place of Saint Marke: he dyed two daies after the fourth yeare of his Principallitie.

59 Marco Cornaro, a man very wise and leauend, was sent into Candie, which was rebellious, and there he made a cruel bloody warre: the Pope granting plenary Indulgence to all such as went thither. The Rebels being feuerely punished, the common-wealth sent to Pope Vrbane the fixt, a certain number of their Gallies. He gouerned two yeares, five months, and foure and twentie dayes.

60 Andreas Contarini, fled to the Paduans fearing to be elected Duke, and as prefiging the ruine which (in his time) would betide the Common-wealth. First of all, he made warre with them of Treviso, then soone after, with Carrara for the confines of Padua: and such was the fortune, that Chioggia being taken, the City of Venice found it selfe to bee in extreame danger. But in the end, he went and opposed himselfe (in person) against the enemies, vanquished them, and regained Chioggia: he dyed, hauing gouerned fifteen yeares, foure moneths, and fifteen daies.

61 Michele Morisini, was a man well furnished with Learning and Wisedome. Some say, that in his time the life of Themistos was taken, and not in the time of his predecessour Contarini. There were diuers Lawes then made (and amongst others) it was ordayned, that Homicides, who had formerly beene hanged, should afterwards haue their heads smitten off. He liued but foure months, and five daies in his dignitie, and dyed in the threescore and foureteene yeare of his age.

62 Antonio Veniero, was a rigorous obseruer of Iustice. He confined one of his owne Sonnes in exile, because he had (ouer-lightly) offended the familie of a noble Venitian. Hee made league with Galeazzo the Vicount, against Carrara, where vpon he tooke Padua. He assisted the Emperour Emmanuel against the Turke; and gaue aid also vnto Sigismund, King of Hungaria, who afterwarde came to the Empire. The place of Saint Marke, and that of the Rialto, were greatly beautified in his time. Hee dyed two moneths, and three dayes, after the eighteenth yeare of his rule.

63 Michele Steno, had the dignitie of Attourney of Saint Marke, with that of Duke. Hee wonne an important battell against the Genewais. Carrara was now the last time vanquished, and Padua and Verona surprised. They of Vicenza, to free themselves from his tyrannie, yielded themselves to the Common-wealth. Ladislaw King of Hungaria, did likewise forsake Zara: Hee dyed, hauing gouerned thirteene yeares, and three dayes.

64 Thomaso Mocenigo, was first General of the Goulfe. He embraced peace, to the end, that the Cittizens might traffike.

Vdina became obedient to the Commonwealth, with the Countrey of Friuli; by means of the Lords of Sauorgani, who were made noble-men of Venice. The Florentines were also succoured against the Duke of Milaine. In his tenth yere he died.

65 Francesco Foscar stoutly repressed the Duke of Milaine, who proceeded too farre on the liberties of Italy. Brescia, Bergame, and other Citties of Lombardy were then wonne: amongst which were Loda and Parma, and Rauenna in Romania. Hee made also a large progresse on the Seas, euen into Morca. The Senate assisted Palaeologus the Emperour, against the Turks, who vlrped Constantinople, in the yere 1453. Hee was made Arbitrator by the Duke of Milaine, in certaine differences of neighbour-hood. The King of Dacia was made a noble Venitian: And afterward, the Duke (in regarde of his age and infirmities) was dismissed, having gouerned thirty foure yeares, and fixe moneths.

66 Paschale Malapiero, was appoynted in the place of Foscar, being Attourney of Saint Marke, who dyed two dayes after his dismissal. He made a Lawe, That in following times, the Duke should not be depofed. In his dayes, the famous Arte of Printing was brought into Venice. The Artenall was greatly encreased: And hee maintayned the people in peace, during foure yeares, fixe moneths, and fixe daies that he gouerned.

67 Cristophoro Moro, a Procurator of Saint Marke, was made Duke. He liued for some time in peace, till the second yere of his gouernement; and then the Turke (proud of his surprizall of Constantinople) declared warre against the Venitians. He made peace with Pope Pius the first, and the Duke of Burgundy: But the Pope dying, they remayned alone, and maintayned warre which lasted twentie yeares. And yet he dyed, having reigned nine yeares, and fixe moneths.

68 Nicholo Trono had such good hap, that (in his time) the Common wealths affaires went well against the Turke. Pietro Mocenigo, Generall in the Archipelagus, vnted his power with the Popes. The King of Naples, and they of Rhodes sent eightie five gallies together, and tooke Satulia, a City of Pamphilia. He made league likewise with the King of Perfia, against the Turke. James King of Cyprus comming to Venice, espoused Catharina Cornara, adoptiue daughter of Saint Marke. He gouerned one yere, eight moneths, and fixe dayes.

69 Nicholo Marcello, Attourney of Saint Marke, after some laws made by the Correctors, was elected Duke. In his time there was a conspiracie in Cyprus, to haue the Kingdome fall into the power of Ferdinand King of Naples. Pietro Morosini went thither with a great Armie, where he appealed all troubles, and seuerely chaffited the Rebels. Scutari, a Cittie in Liburnia, was besieged by the Turke, and valiantly defended by Antonio Loredano. This duke gouerned one yere, foure moneths, and seenteene dayes.

70 Pietro Mocenigo was elected Duke, in defect of all his worthy decedes. Lepanto was besieged in his time by the Turke, and virtuously maintayned by Antonio Loredano. They brought their power likewise before the Isle of Stalimena, but the same Loredano (by his valour) defended it. The daughter to King Ferdinand came to Venice, with the Cardinall her brother, where they were roially entertained. This Prince caused a Money to bee stamped, which hee lurnamed by his owne name: And gouerned but two yeares, and nine moneths.

71 Andrea Vendramino had such ill hap in his gouernement, that the Venitian Army was two seuerall times put to flight by the Turkes: Once, neare to Croja in Albania, and the other in the countrey of Friuli. He was a goodly man of person, and had a most beautifull Lady to his wife, by whom he had as goodly children, whom he allied in marriage with the chiefeft Families: he gouerned one yere, and eight moneths.

72 Giovanni Mocenigo, brother to Pietro Mocenigo, hauing continued the warre against the Turke; in the end made peace with him: ordering the matter so, that he left Scutari and Stipula in liberty of Commerce, and power to keepe a Deputie at Constantinople. Hee made warre against Ferdinand King of Naples, at the instance of Pope Sixtus the fourth, which occasioned the long warre called Sociale. In the end, peace was made, the Commonwealth hauing gotten Rouigo & Polefano. The Cittie became much dilgraced by fire, and a pestilent sicknesse: The prince dyed, dyed, hauing raigned seauen yeares, and fixe moneths.

73 Marco Barbarigo, the plague being ceased, caused all to be new builded, which the fire had defaced in the Pallace. Hee was greatly differing from all other Princes, to wit, in pardoning, and forgetting particular iniuries doone vnto him: but such as were comitted against the State, he would haue reuenged with strictest feueritie. The grand Signeur or Turke sent a particular Ambassadour vnto him, to congratulate his election. He gouerned but nine moneths.

74 Agostino Barbarigo, withstood the progresse of Charles the eighth King of France, when hee made warre against them of Arragon, for the Kingdome of Naples, which he conquered. The Turke vlrped on the Common-weales of Leonto, Modona, and Corona. The Kingdome of Cyprus was brought vnder the tutelage of the Senate, and Qu. Catharina brought thence to Venice. The office of la Sante was created, by occasion of the pestilence: This Duke gouerned fifteen yeares, and twenty one dayes.

75 Leonardo Laureadano sustained a very rigorous war, against the chiefeft Princes of the world: there beeing a League made betweene the Emperour Maximilian; the King of France; them of Naples; and the Dukes of Sauoy, Ferrara, and Mantua, incited thereto by Pope Iulius the second. All the whole estate of firme land was surprized, except Treuisa; but in the end it was recovered. He liued in the Principality nineteene yeares, eight moneths, and twenty dayes.

76 Antonio Grimani, being Generall, had a most infamous dis-rout or foile, by which occasion, hee was dismissed of the charge of Procurator of Saint Marke, and confined to Cherso. He brake his limitation, and withdrew himselfe to Rometo to the Cardinall his sonne: where he had so many worthy Offices imposed vpon him, as, not onely he was re-established in his Attorneys place againe; but he was likewise made Duke, at the age of foure score and two yeares, and gouerned but one yere, ten moneths, and two dayes.

77 Andrea Gruti, gaining the best part of the glorie, for the reprizall of Padua, was in very great esteeme. Hee dealt so with the King of France, (to whom he was prisoner) that his Maiestie allied himselfe with the Commonwealth, and Brescia and Verona were reconquered. He knew very well, how to make his carriage pleasing to the Senate, during the warres betweene Charles the fifth, Emperour, and King France the first, as also against Solyman. He gouerned fifteen yeares, seauen moneths, and eight dayes.

78 Pietro Lando continued the defence of the Commonwealth against the Turke: with whom (at last) he made a peace, knowing how to make vse thereof, and maintaine his owne charge, whilest the warre continued betweene Charles the fifth, and King France the first. He gouerned fixe yeares, and eight moneths.

79 Francesco Donato, making benefite also of this peace, beautified the Cittie with many goodly buildings, besides that of the Pallace. He sent succor to the Emperour, against certaine Rebels in Germanie. The Princes of Guse, coming to Venice in his time, were entertained as fitted their degree. He gouerned seauen yeares, and fixe moneths.

80 Marco Antonio Trevisano, a man altogether deuout, laboured that the Commonwealth might abound in goodnesse and ciuill manners; preuenting (by his owne worthy example) that vices should not be wincked at, as, in too many countries they are. He gouerned a yere, wanting three dayes.

81 Francesco Veniero, could so well skill of gouerning the Commonwealth, that albeit the Turke (in his time) made warre in Apulia, and the King of France in Tuscanie: yet all was well at Venice, and the Queene of Poland roially welcommed thither. He gouerned two yeares, one moneth and twenty dayes.

82 Lorenzo Priuli, was sollicit (by the Pope) to make warre against the Emperour. But he being a friend to the Commonwealth; by no means would offend him, but mediated a pacification of those affaires. In his time peace was made betweene France and Spaine, and Charles the fifth dyed. This Prince gouerned three yeares, eleauen moneths, and eight dayes.

83 Girolamo Priuli, brother to the preceeder prince, enioyed those great honors, which Pope Pius the fourth gaue vnto the common-wealth: And all his delight was to heare ambassadors in the hall of Kings,

In his time the Council of Trent was concluded, whither he sent (as Ambassadors) Nicholo de Ponte, and Matteo Dandolo.

The Common-wealth helde (at Baptisme) the sonne to the Duke of Savoy, by a Deputie borne of Margueret of France. He dyed, hauing gouerned eight yeares, two moneths, and foure dayes.

84. Pietro Loredano, by the concurrence of two others, was elected Duke, contrarie to the hope of all, or his owne expectation. The Arsenal was burned in his time, and there then also happened a very great dearth of all things. Selim, successour of Solyman, tooke occasion to breake peace with the Common-wealth, demanding of them the kingdome of Cyprus, and moued warre vpon this Subiect. He gouerned foure yeares, fve moneths, and eight dayes.

85. Luigi Mocenigo, warre being kindled against the Turke, lost the kingdome of Cyprus, Nicosia being taken, and Famagosta surrendered. The Common-wealth made league with Pope Pius the fifth, and Phillip King of Spain, so that their armies (being ioyned together in the yeare of our Lord, one thousand fve hundred seuenty one) they obtayned a worthy victorie against the Turkes. Soone after, Henry the third, king of France, came to Venice, where he was magnificently entertayned. This Prince dyed in his seauenth yeare.

86. Sebastiano Veniero, was elected by common voyce, and with such applause, that diuers Turkes ranne to him and kissed his feete. He created fve Correctours of the Lawes, for ruling the affaires of the Pallace. The Citty was deliuered of a dangerous plague, and the Pallace was againe very greatly defaced by fire. This prince gouerned not aboue a whole yeare.

87. Nicholo de Ponte, was created Duke, a man very learned in all the Sciences, and whereof hee had made publike profession in Venice. He passed thorow all the honors of the Common-wealth, wherewith the Citizens could possibly gratifie him. The Seminary of Saint Marke was instituted by him. Certaine princes of Iapponia arriving then at Venice, were by him most honourably entertained. He builded the bridge of Canareggio: and gouerned seuen yeares, nine moneths, and thirteene dayes.

88. Paschale Cicogna, Procuratour of S. Marke, was elected when he was at diuine seruice in the Church. In his time there was great warres, betweene France and Spain, about Piedmont, and betweene the Emperour and the Turke, for some parts in Hungaria. He caused the towne of Palma to be builded, in the confines of the Countrey of Friuli, and a new castile or fortresse, in the Isle of Cephalonia. He had the honor of the wonderfull bridge of the Rialto, which he builded: And gouerned ten yeares, or thereabout.

89. Marino Grimini, Procuratour of Saint Marke, was so highly in grace and fauour of the people, that on the day of his Election; they declared extraordinary signes of ioy, and continued them for many following dayes. The second yeare of his Principality, he caused the dutchesse his wife to be crowned in great triumph. At which time, Pope Clement the eight sent her the Rose of gold. In his time was much ioy and triumph made, for the peace concluded betweene the Kings of France and Spain. Vpon occasion of the Popes coming to Ferrara, obtained by the Ecclesiasticall Estate, the Cardinall Aldobrandino passed thence to Venice, where he was most honourably wel-comed, with diuers other Cardinalls. There was such an extraordinary ouer-flow of waters, in the fift yeare of his Principality, that the Barkes, Boates, and Gundoloes floated on the place of Saint Mark, euen as if they had bene in a full maine riuer. He dyed, and was much bemoaned of the people, hauing gouerned ten yeares, and eight moneths.

90. Leonardo Dandolo, hauing by his worthy deseruings, singuler wisdom and dexterity, managied passed affaires, and gone thorow all honors of the Common-wealth, giuing euident testimonie of his care and faithfullnesse; was aduanced in the place of Grimini, the tenth day of Ianuary, 1606. He had bene sent Ambasadour to Constantinople to Mohamet (hee being newly come to the Empire of the East) in the Common-wealths name, to salute him with accustomed complements. He hath such a practick braine, & so happy a memory, seated in a soule so religiously zealous for common benefite; that the Senate hath referred more vnto him, then to any other of his Predecessours.

The Ctie hath (in his time) bene communicated, by Paulus Quintus, now Pope,

Pope, about some pretentions appertaining to his See: But it may well be sayd of this Prince, that, against such Thunder-clappes and Lightning flashes, hee hath shewne himselfe an immouable rocke, in defence of that estate in generall. In like maner, two principall Pillers of Christendome, threatned great disaster and ruine: but that most Christian Henry the fourth, King of France, embracing those two Collomnes, vpheld both the one and other, and redressed all discontentment, by the entermise of his Ambassadors, and hath erected a triumphall Arche, to the immortalitie of his glorie. This Prince now liuing happily in peace, doth daily acknowledge to France, his particular affection for such fauour, & may (in time) much better declare it. God long preferue him, and all other good Princes.

CHAP. III.

¶ Of Wounds made by Gun-shot, and other ferie Engines.

In the yeare of our Lord, 1536. the victorious king Frances sent a great Armie vnto Piedmont, to victualle Thurin, and to recover those townes and castles, which had bene taken by the Marquesse Du Guesle, Lieutenant generall of the Emperour, where Monsieur the Constable, then great Master, was Lieutenant generall of the Army, and Mounseigneur de Monte-jan Capitaine generall of the Footmen (of whom I was then Chirurgian). A great part of the Armie arrived at the Pas of Suze, where we found the enemy keeping the passage, and had made vnto themselves certayne forts and trenches; in such sort, that before they could be raised from thence, wee entered into battell: in which conflict there was many hurt and slaine, as well on the one side as on the other. But they were enforced to quit that passage, and to recover the castle; which they held not long, but were compelled to giue it vp; marching away in their shirts onely, hauing each of them a white W and in their hands: of whom, the most part went to the Castle de Villane, where there was about some two hundred Spaniards. To this castle my Lord the Constable drew his forces, because hee would make his way cleare before him. It is situate vpon a little Mountaine, which giueth great assistance to those within, that there can bee no Ordinance planted against it, to batter it downe. They were summoned to restore it vp, or else were threatned to haue it battered in peeces; which they flatly refused: answering thall, that they were as good and faithfull seruants to the Emperour, as Mounseigneur the Constable was to the King his master. Their answer being vnderstood, the same night there was mounted two great Canons, by the force of armes with ropes and cordes, by the Switzers, where, (as misfortune would) those cannons being planted, a Gunner by indiscretion fired a barrel of Gun-powder, wherewith he himselfe was extreemely burned, together with tenne or twelue soldiers. Moreover, the flame of the powder was the cause of the discouerie of the Ordinance, whereby those of the Castle, the night following, discharged their Ordinance at that place where they discouered our Cannons; inso much, that we had many of our men hurt and slaine.

The morrow after, very early wee beganne the battery, and in few houres after the breach was made; which those of the Castle perceiuing, desired a parley, but it was too late; for in the meane time some of our foot-men, perceiuing them to be astonished, mounted the breach, and entered the Castle, putting euery man to the sword, except onely a certaine beautifull Piedmontese, which a great Lord entertained into his seruice. The Capitaine and Ancient were taken aliue, but were presently after hanged vpon the Gate of the Towne, to terrifie the rest of the Emperours souldiers, not to be so foole-hardie, to hold such places against so great an armie. Now, the souldiers of the Castle seeing our men rushing in vpon them in such great furie, made all the resistance they could to defend themselves, in killing and wounding a great number of our Souldiers with their pikes and muskets; where the Chirurgians had a great deale of work cut out to their hands.

I was (at that time) but a yong Chirurgian, gian, and but little experienced in the Art, because I neuer (as yet) had seene the curation of anie Wounds made by Gun-shot. True it is, that I had read Iohn de Vigo, his first booke of Wounds in generall, chap. 8. where he saith, That those wounds made by fiery Engines, do participate of venenosity, because of the Powder; and for their curation, he commands to cauterize them with the Oile of Elders mixed with a little Treacle: yet neuertheless, because I would not be deceived, before I would make vse of the said boyling oile, as hot as possibly they could suffer it, extreme paine to the Patient, I obserued the methode of other Chirurgians in the first dressing of such wounds; which was by the application & infusion of the foresaid Oile, as hot as possibly they could suffer it, with Tents and Setons: wherefore I became emboldned to do as they did. But in the end my oile failed mee, so that I was constrained to vse in stead thereof, a digestive made of the yolke of an egge, Oile of Roses and Terebith. The night following, I could hardly sleep at mine ease, fearing lest that for wate of cauterizing, I should find my Patients, on whom I had not vsed of the foresaid Oyle, dead and empyofned; which made mee to rise early in the morning to visit them: where, beyond my expectation, I found those on whom I had vsed the digestive medicine, to feele but little paine, and their wounds without inflammation or tumor, hauing rested well all that night. The rest, on whom the foresaid Oile was applied, I found them inclining to Feauers, with great paine, tumor, and inflammation about their Wounds: then I resolued with my selfe, neuer to burne so cruelly the wounded Patients by Gun-shot any more.

When we entered Thurin, I was tolde of a Chirurgian, who was exceeding famous, especially for his curing wounds made by Gun-shot, with whom I found the means to acquaint my selfe: yet it was neare two yeares and a halfe, before hee would acquaint mee with his Medicine which hee called his Balme. In the meane time, Mounseieur the Marshall of Monte-jan, who was Lieutenant generall of the King in Piedmont, dyed: then I tolde this Chirurgian, that I had a desire to returne to Paris, withall, requesting him, that he would performe his promise, which was, to giue me the receit of his Balme, which he willingly did, seeing that I was to leaue that country. He sent me to fetch him two yong whelps, one pound of earth-worms, two pounds of the oyle of Lillies, six ounces of the Terebith of Venice, and one ounce of Aqua-vitæ: and in my presence, he boyled the whelps aloue in the said oile, vntill the flesh departed from the bones. Afterward, he tooke the wormes (hauing before killed and purified them in white Wine, to purge themselves of the earth which they haue alwayes in their bodies:) being so prepared, he boyled them also in the said oile, till they became dry; this he strained thorow a napkin, without anie great expression; that doone, hee added thereto the Terebith: and lastly, the Aqua-vitæ, and called God to witness, that this was his Balme which hee vsed in all wounds made by Gun-shot, and in others which required suppuration, withall, praying me not to divulge his secret.

From thence I returned to Paris, where shortly after, Mounseieur Siluius, Lecturer of the King in Physicke, a man greatly esteemed among learned men, requested me one day to dine with him, which I did willingly; where hee asked me many Questions, and among the rest, of the essence of wounds made by Gunne-shot, and of the combustions made by Gunne-powder. Whereupon, I presently prououed vnto him, that the powder was not any thing venomous at all; because that no Simple that enters therein is any way venomous, much lesse the composition. Also, I haue seene by experience, that some Souldiers being hurt, will take of the said powder in wine, saying, That powder so taken, doth preferue the body from the ensuing accidents, the which I approue not. Also, others hauing vlcers on their bodies, doe commonly vse of the said powder drie, and heale them without any danger at all. And as for the Bullets, they can not containe any such heat, that they should haue the facultie of burning: for a bullet being shot against a stone-wall, it may presently be helde in the naked hand, although the collision made against the Stones, should (in reason) heate it the more: And as for combustions or burnings made by Gun-powder, I neuer found any particular accident in it, whereby the cure ought to be diuersified from the cure of other combustions.

buftions. Whereupon, I related this History. A certaine boy of the Kitchen, of Mounseieur the Marshall of Monte-jan, fell into a Caldron full of oyle, almost boyling hot; to dresse whom being sent for, I went presently to an Apothecarie, demanding of him such cooling medicines, which are commonly applied vnto burnings. An auncient Countrey-woman being by, hearing mee speake of this burning, counselled me to apply for the first dressing (to prevent the rising of pustules or bladders) of rawe onions, bruised with a little salt. I demanded of this woman, Whether she had euer made experience of that Medicine before: Shee presently sware vnto me in her language, Si meste, à la fe de dé; which did incite me to make experience heereof, on this scullion of the Kitchen, where truly I found the morrow after, that in those parts, where the Onions had touched, to bee altogether free from vesicles or blisters, and the other parts, where the Onions were not applied, to be much blistered.

Nor long after, a certaine Dutch-man, one of the guard of the said Lord of Monte-jan, hauing drunke hard, by indiscretion; set his Flask as fire, which caused a great disaster, both to his hands and face; and being called to dresse him, I applied of the said Onions on the one halfe of his face; and on the other side, of other common remedies. At the second dressing, I found that part where I had applied the Onions, to be altogether without blisters; or any excoriation, and the other altogether blistered: then I first purposed to write of the effect of the said Onions.

Moreover, I tolde vnto the sayd Siluius, that for the better extraction of bullets which are hidden in any part of the body; it is requisite, the Patient should be placed in the same situation, that he was in at that time when he was wounded. Many other things I discovered vnto him, which are contayned in this Booke following. My Discourse ended; he prayed me very earnestly, that I would publish it by writings: to the end, that that false opinion of Vigo might be altogether abolished; the which I willingly consented vnto, and caused many instruments to be cut, such as had not bene diuulged for the extraction of Bullets, and other vnaturall things out of the body.

And it was first Imprinted in the year, 1545. and well receiued, which caused me to renew it agayne, and publish it the second time, in the year 1550. and lastly, in the year, 1564. where I haue enriched it with many other things, because I haue since followed the warres, haue bene in many battells, and besieged Townes, as in Metz and Hedin. Also, I haue bene entertained into the seruice of siue Kings, where I haue alwayes discourfed with the most excellent Physitians and Chirurgians of those times, to learne and discouer, if there were any other methode or way, to cure those wounds made by gun-shot; whereof the most part (specially those that haue followed the warres, and are guided by reason and experience) are of my opinion, which is, to vse Suppuratiues in the beginning, and not boyling oyles. And I did protest moreover to the sayd Siluius, that I haue found those wounds as easie to cure (being in fleshy partes) as all other great contused wounds are. But, where the Bullet meeteth with the bones and nervous parts; it teareth, dilacerateth, breaketh, and shinereth in peeces, not onely where it toucheth, but also the circumiacent parts, without any mercy; causing great accidents, which happen specially in the iointures or ioynets, and in bodies of euill constitution, and in time subiect to corruption, that is to say, where the Ayre is hote and moyst, then is the cure most difficult, and oftentimes impossible; not onely of wounds made by gun-shot, but also of those which are made by other instruments; yea, though they were but in fleshy partes.

Therefore, the foresaid accidents do not procede from the venenosity which is in the powder, or by the combustion or burning of the Bullet. For proofe of which, I will alleadge this obseruation, which I haue experimented (not long since) on the person of the Earle of Chandos, Lord of Atchmond, a Scottish-man, whom I cured by the contraindement of the Queene-mother, who was hurt with the shot of a Pistoll cleane through both the thighs, without fracture of the bones; he standing so neare the mouth of the Pistoll, that the fire tooke holde of his breeches; neuertheless, hee was perfectly cured in two and thirtie daies, without a Feauer or anie other euill accident. dress him at S. Iohn de Latran, in the house of the Archthoppe of Glisco, then Ambassadour for Scotland, who came every day to see him dress. Moreouer, for testimony, I could produce Mounſieur Brigard, Doctor Regent in the facultie of Philosophie, who was an assistant with me; together with James Guillemes, Chirurgical to the King, and sworne at Paris, who was with me vntill his perfect curation. The same likewise Mounſieur Hautin, Doctour Regent in the faculty of Physicke can testify, who sometimes came to see him. Also Giles Buzet, Scotchman and Chirurgical, euery of them maruailing how hee became so soone cured, without the application of hot and sharp medicines. Now, the reason wherefore I haue made this little Discourse, is to demonstrate, that it is about 30. yeares agoe, since I first found out this manner of curing wounds made by gunshot, without the vse of boiling oiles, or any other sharp or burning medicines, vnlesse I was contrained to vse them, for such accidents which hapned in Cacochymed bodies, or through the euil disposition and malignancy of the ayre, as I will shew more amply in this Discourse following, which I made vnto the deceased King, after the taking of Roan.

CHAP. IIIL

An Answer vnto a certayne demaund, propounded by the victorious Prince Charles the ninth, as touching the qualitie and Efficacy of wounds made by Gunne-shotte, as his Maiesties returne from the siege, and taking of the Towne of Roan.

On one day pleased your Maiestie, together with the Queene-Mother, my L. the prince of La Roche-sur-Ton, and many other Princes and great Lords, to demad of me how it came to passe, that in these last warres, the most part of such Gentlemen & Soldiers, who were wounded by Gun-shot, & other instruments of war, died, or were very hardly recovered from their diseases, although the wounds they receiued were but of small apparace, and the Chirurgicals which were employed for their cures, did performe their duties according to Art; I haue bin the bold-der to publish this discourse, to satisfie (in some measure) the duty of my Art, & that my Profession might not be sported with the least dishonor; and that your Maiestie might vnderstand the reasons, which might haue bin the cause of the death of so many valiant me; the most part of whom I haue scene (to my great grieue) to finish their dayes pitifully, without any possibilitie in mee, or anie other more experienced then my selfe to giue them remedy.

I know that this following Discourse will astonish some, who reposing themselves vpon their owne particular opinions, and not examining the matter deeply, will finde the first front of my disputation very strange; because that the contrary hath beene so long imprinted in their fantasies. For I doe hold, that the cause of the malignancy of wounds by Gun-shot, not to proceed from any poyson or venomous quality in the powder (as they imagine) or from the Bullet it selfe, being rubbed or infused in any venomous mixture. Neuerthelesse, if their meekenesse and patience will extend so farre, as first to weigh the motives, which first moued me to vndertake this subiect, which was a zeale of the publique good; towards the which the Lawe of Nature bindeth me, to shew the vtermost of my power in such things which the singular prouidence of Almighty God hath reuealed vnto me. And secondly, that they will examine with iudgement, the reasons which I shall vse in this present Treatise: then I shall see certayne, they will both accept my labour thankfully, and free it from all future calumnie. Otherwise they will shew themselves to be so ill affectioned toward me, as if I should present my selfe before them, enriched with all the treasures of the auncient Philosophers, and they should place mee in the number of the poorest and ignorantest men in the world. To prevent therefore all the Arguments of venome and poisoning, which the Aduersaries heere about mentioned may alleadge, I will make it plaine vnto your Maiestie, that such as are wounded by gunne-shot; I say the malignancy of such wounds, not to proceed from the venome of the Powder, beeing of it selfe simply considered: and much lesse from the coobustion or cauterization which the other fiery Engines.

Bullet so heated by the fire of the powder can make in those parts, which it rendeth & dilacerateth thorow the violence thereof: although neuerthelesse some do strue to maintayne; alledging for all reasons, That a certayne Tower full of powder hath heeretofore beene seene ruined in an instant, onely by the means of a Cannon shot. Also of a thatched house set on fire with a Musket shotte. Moreouer, because that such wounds which are made by Gunne-shotte, we commonly behold their Orifices and other circum-iacent parts so blacke, as if an actual Cauter had passed thereon. As also the fall of a certayne selfe, as they say. All which Arguments are so ill framed, that they deserue no authoritie, beeing builded on so slender a foundation: much lesse, that the resolution of your demaund should be taken from them, as I trust to giue you plainly to vnderstand in the Disputation following. Which (after I had scene a great number of those wounds, and diligently obserued them, handling them according to the methode) I haue collected from the auncient Philosophers, Physitians, and Chirurgicals to present vnto your Maiestie, and to withdraw your minde from the admiration of the lamentable death of so many braue Gentlemen and Souldiers.

Now, to enter into the matter propounded, and to answer the Arguments before alledged, we are first to examine, whether there be any poyson inclosed in the powder, or no: And if there bee, whether it may infect by means of the pretended poyson thereof. Which, that it may appeare plainly, we must search into the composition of the sayd powder, considering that it is not of substance simple, but compound: and so by examining the nature of such Simples, which enter into the composition thereof; I meane their qualities, effects, and operations, we shall the sooner attaine to the scope and intention pretended.

As for the Simples it is a most assured thing, that there are but three in all, which make the composition thereof, that is to say, coales of willow or birch, sulphure, and salt-peter, and sometimes Aqua-vitæ: which ingredients feuerally considered, are altogether exempt and free from poyson, or any venomous quality. And first for the coales, there is not any thing considerable in them, vnlesse it bee a drying quality, of subtilie substance, by means whereof it is apt to take fire, euen as a linnen cloth burned into Tinder doth the sparkes that fall from a Flint stone. Sulphure is hore and drie, neuerthelesse, not excessive, and of a more oile and viscous substance, yet not so easie to inflame as coales, although it doth retain the fire more forcibly when it is once inflamed, and is very hardly extinguished. As for the salt-peter, it is such, that many make vse thereof instead of salt. Now let vs examine, whether there be any venosity in the nature of these simples; namely, in that of sulphure, which is the most suspected. Dioscorides in his fifth booke, chap. 37. prescribeth it to be taken in an Egge, in the asthmaicke passion, coughes, and to stich which spit matter, and those that haue the jaundise. And Galen in his ninth booke of his Simples, cha. 36. ordaineth it as a topicall remedy, vnto such who are bitten by venomous beasts; and in all malignant praictises or ichtings; as for the Aqua-vitæ, it is a thing subtilie, that it will evaporate if it be set in the ayre; besides, it is vied by most Chirurgicals inwardly in drinckes, and outwardly in embrocations as a most singular medicine. These things considered, make mee to affirme, that the whole composition of powder is altogether free from venome or poyson, seeing that the ingredients are altogether cleare from the least touch in that kind.

Moreouer, I haue obserued it to bee the praictise of the Hollanders; being wounded by Gunne-shotte, to dissolve two charges of powder in Wine, and to drinke it off, hoping, by that meanes to be freed from all future accidents which might happen to their wounds (although I doe not approve thereof, because it is a most insufficient remedy.) Also, such vicers which are made through the combustion of powder, are of no other nature then those that are made by fire, or scalding water. But, wherefore should I alledge any forraine example? Do we not see amongst our owne souldiers, I do not know on what occasion, but only to shew themselves braue fellows, to empty their charges of powder into their cuppes, and drinke it without anie inconvenience at all; and others in like manner, being hurt on any part of their bodies, will apply of the same vpon their vicers to drie them, and finde much profit by it. As for those which do affirme that it is not in the powder, but the Bullet, which being subtilly pierced in many places, or filled vp with venome, or stieped, rubbed, or mixed with any poysen, causeth the aforesayd daungerous accidents: To such do I answer without further trouble, that the fire set to the powder, is sufficient to purifie the poysen of the Bullet, if any there were; the which can not be done by impoisoned Swords, Pikes, Arrows, and such like, because they passe not thorow the action of the fire. Briefly, to confirme my opinion to be true, there is not anie one of those that were in your Maiesties Campe at Roan, that doth not assuredly know, that those Bullets which were shotte against those of the Towne, to be altogether free from poysen. Neuerthelesse, the besieged Towne-men affirmed, that all those Bullets were poysened. Also, the Souldiers of your Maiesties Camp had the same opinion, of such Bullets which were shot at them out of the town, that they were all impoisoned by them; rather beleeuing and iudging of the qualitie of the wounds by their euill successe, then by the Causes whereby they were made.

True it is, that as in Physicke, according to the Sentence of Hippocrates in the Epidemies; as Galen noteth on the twenty sentence, and the twenty one of the third Section of the third booke, all diseases are called Pestilentiall and venomous, being from common and general causes of what kinde soeuer they be, and such kill many persons: so in the like maner, we may call such wounds as are made by Gunne-shot venomous, which are more difficult to heale then others; not because they doe participate of any venomosity, but from some general cause depending, either frō the Cacochemie of the body, putrification of the aire, or the corruption of the victualls, whereby those vicers are brought to be more malignant Cacoethes, and rebellious to all medicines.

Refutation of those that affirm that the Bullet causeth
combustion.

To affirme, that it is onely the combustion of the bullet, which causeth the aforesaid danger; I cannot conceiue their reasons, seeing that the Bullet is (for the most part) made but of lead, and therefore vna-ble to indure any great heate, without being altogether dissolved, which we neuerthelesse do see to passe thorow a coat Armour, and to penetrate the body through and through, and yet to remaine whole.

Moreouer, we do obserue, that if a Bullet be shot against a stone, or against anie solid matter, it may in the same instant be handled of vs in our hands, without feeling any notable heate, although the violent striking and collision made against the stone, should in reason encrease the heate, if anie there were. And which is more, if a Bullet bee shot against a bagge full of powder, the fire will not endanger it. This I dare be bolde to say and affirme moreouer, That if a quantitie of powder should take fire, being kept in a Tower, or any other place, by the meanes of a Bullet shot; it was not the heate of the Bullet, but rather the violent striking of the Bullet against the stones of the said Tower, which might cause sparkes of fire to fall amongst the powder; even as the smiting of a Steele against a flint stone. The like wee may iudge of such thatched houles, which haue bene set on fire by a musket shot, to haue rather proceeded from some wad, either of Towne or Paper, rammed in with the powder, and so fired with it. But that which doth most confirme mee in the assurance of mine opinion, is, that if a ball of Waxe be shot out of a Musket, it feelth no force of fire at all, for then would it melt; neuerthelesse, it will pierce an inch boord. An argument of sufficient weight to prooue, that the Bullets cannot be so extremely heated by the force of the powder, that they should cauterize and burne, as many haue esteemed.

And as for that blackenesse, which is ordinarily found to be about the Orifices of such wounds, and other adiacent parts: I affirme, that this accident doth not proceed from any qualitie of fire accompanying the Bullet, but because of the great conuulsion that it maketh. For it cannot enter into the body otherwise then by an extreme and incredible force, because it is of a round figure.

Vpon this point, if the wounded persons themselves be demanded; I beleue they will testifie the truth of my saying, because they are no sooner strooke with the Bullet, but they doe feele in the same instant, as if a club or some other heauie

but then were false on the offended part, in the which they feele a heauy paine, with a benumbed stupification of the part; which dissipath and sometimes extinguisheth the naturall heate, together with the spirites containd therein; from whence there foloweth oftentimes a gangrene and mortification of the part, yea sometimes of the whole body. And as for the Elcarre which they affirme there to be, and fall away as they say, they doe abuse themselves: for it is onely some certaine portion of the membranes and contused flesh, dilacerated by the Bullet, which becometh corrupted, and so seperateth it selfe from the found parts which are greatly contused.

Reasons of
those of contrary opinion.

Although that these reasons doe make it manifest enough, that there is no venomous qualitie in the powder, nor action of fire carryed with the Bullet; neuerthelesse, many, building their opinions vpon naturall Philosophie, doe maintayne the contrarie, affirming that Cannon shot is like vnto the clappes of Thunder, which burst forth of the Clouds in the middle Region of the ayre, and so fall violently on the earth. From the which similitude they would inferre and conclude, that there is both fire, and a venomous qualitie in the Bullet, as it proceedeth out of the mouth of the Cannon. I know (I thanke God) that Thunder being ingendered from a grosse and viscusous exhalation, by means of vapour conioyned with it, doth neuer breake forth of the Clouds to penetrate heere below; but it draweth and bringeth immediately with it a certaine fire, sometimes more subtile, sometimes more grosse, according to the diuersitie of the matter, whereof the exhalation is composed. For Seneca writeth in the second Booke of his Naturall Questions, chapter 49. that there are three kindes of Thunders, all differing the one from the other, according to the quantitie and manner of their inflammation. The first, by reason of the matter thereof, it being most thin and subtile, it doth pierce & penetrate suddenly the objects which it toucheth. The second kind, by reason of the violence thereof, breaketh and dissipath the same things, because the matter thereof is more violent, and compact as a tempest. The third sort being composed of a more earthie matter,

burneth with manifest tokens of the heate thereof. I also know, that the Thunder is of nature pestilentiall and fastidie, because of the grosse & stinky matter thereof; which being burnd, leaueth behind it such a stinking sauer, that all animals do so much auoid it, that if it do happen to fall into their dennes, other places of haunt, they will verily abandon and forsake such places; so much do they hate the infectious stinke of that poision. The same is noted by Plinius Magnus, in his Septentrional History, that in certayne places where Thunder hath fallne, presently after the fall thereof, the fields haue bene found afterwards to be covered & strewd ouer with sulphure, neuerthelesse vnprofitable, and almost extinguished. For all these reasons, I must not confesse, that the blows of Gun-shot are accompanied with poysen and fire, as the clappes of Thunder are. For although they doe agree the one with the other, in some similitude, it is not therefore in their substance and matter, but rather in the manner which they haue to batter, teare, and dissipate the objects which they doe meete with, that is to say, the clappes of Thunder through the force of fire; and of the bolte or stone sometimes engendered therein: and the blowes of Gunne-shot by the meanes of the Ayre forced away by impetuosity, and so conducting the Bullet, causeth the like disaster. What if I should be conuicted by stronger Arguments, so that I were enforced to auouch, that Thunder and the Cannon to be of the like substance; yet I should neuer bee forced to say, that the shotte of the Cannons and Muskets doe participate of a fierie qualitie. Plinie saith in the second Booke of his History, and the 1. chapter, that among Thunder, one kinde is composed of a maruellous drie matter, dissipating all such things it meete withall; neuerthelesse, without anie signe of burning; others, of a more humid nature, which in like manner burneth not, but blacketh and discoloreth much, more then the first. Others are composed of a very cleare and subtile matter: the nature whereof is most marvellous, forsomuch that it is not to be doubted (as Seneca hath well said) that there is therein a certayne diuine vertue: and it is in melting Golde or Siluer in a mans purse, the purse it selfe not being so much as touched therewith.

Also in melting a sword, the scabbard thereof remaining whole. Also, in dissolving into droppes the yron head of a Pike, without burning, or so much as heating the wood. In shedding the wine out of a vessell, without burning or breaking of the caske. According to the aforesayd testimony, I can assure you, and that without any prejudice, that those Thunders, which onelie breake and dissipate without any burning; and such which do leaue effects full of great admiration, not to be much vnlike in substance to the Canon shot, and not those which carrie immediately with them the action of fire.

Example.

To prouue my saying true, this one example shall suffice. A certaine Souldier receyued a wound in his Thigh with a Musket shot, from whence I extracted a bullet, the which being wrapped in the Taffatie of his breeches, made a very deepe wound. Neuerthelesse, I drew it forth of the wound with the same Taffatie, it being without any signe of burning.

And which is more, I haue seene many men, who not being shot, nor anie thing touched therewith, vnlesse it were in their apparrell only; haue receiued such an astonishment by a Cannon shot, that onely passed nere them: that their members thereby haue become blacke and liquid; and shortly after, haue fallen into a gangrene and mortification, whereof in the end they haue dyed.

These effects are like vnto those of the thunder before spoken of. Neuerthelesse, there is not in them any fire or poyson: which maketh mee conclude, that there is no poyson in the common and ordinarie powder. Seeing therefore, that this disaster was common to all those which were hurt in these last warres, and yet neither by fire or poyson that so many valiant men dyed. To what cause may wee impute this euill? I am so confident of the true cause (my Liege) that I hope presently to make your Maiestie vnderstand the same, to the end that your demand may be fully satisfied.

Those which haue consumed their age and study in the secrets of naturall Philosophie, haue left vs this amongst other things, for authentick and appoued of all times. Which is, that the Elements doe symbolize in such sort the one with the other, that they doe sometimes transforme and change themselves, the one into the other, in such sort, that not onelie their first qualities, which are heate, coldnes, driness and moisture: but also their substances are changed, by rarification or condensation of themselves; so the fire doth conuert it selfe ordinarily into ayre, the ayre into water, the water into earth; and contrariwise the earth into water, the water into ayre, and the ayre into fire. The which wee may dayly behold, and prouue it by those bellows of Copper which the Dutchman brings vs, being composed in the forme of a Boll, which being filled with water, and hauing but one hole in the middelt of the Spherical forme thereof: receiuethe the transmutation of the water within it into ayre, thorough the action of the fire, neare vnto the which the Boll must bee placed; and so thrusteth the ayre forth of it with violence, making a continuall noyse or sound, vntill all the ayre bee gone forth of it. The like may be knowne by Egges or Chellenuts; for eyther of them being put into the fire before they are crackt, or the Rhinds broken, presently the watery humidity contained in them, doth conuert it selfe into ayre, through the action of the fire: and the ayre in making his passage, bursteth the shell, because it occupieth more place being in the forme of ayre, into the which it was changed by rarification caused by the fire, then it did vnder the forme of water; and not finding passage, is constrained to make one by violence, according vnto the proposition helde for most certayne and true amongst all Physitians; that is to say, of that one part of earth is made tenne of water: and of one part of water is made tenne of ayre, as of one part of ayre ten of fire. I do say and affirme so much of the matters containyd in the said Gun-powder, which by meanes of the fire is conuerted into a great quantity of ayre; the which because it cannot be contained in the place, where the matter was before the transmutation thereof, is compelled to issue forth with an incredible violence: by meanes whereof, the bullet breaketh, shiuereth and rendeth all that euer it meets with, yet doth not the fire accompany it. Euen as wee see a Bow, or a Sling shoot forth an Arrow or Stone, without any aire at all.

But

The effect of Artillery like to the thunder

But the bullet driueth before it such a subtle winde, and so swiftly agitated, that sometimes the very winde it selfe, without the action of the Bullet, causeth strange and wonderfull effects. For sometimes, I haue knowne it make a fracture in the bones, without any diuision of the flesh. And herein it may be compared (as wee said before) vnto the effect of Thunder: euen so wee see, that if the saide powder bee inclosed in Mines and Vaults of the earth, and being conuerted into aire thorough the action of the fire set vnto it, howe it doeth ruinate and reuerse huge masses of earth almost as bigge as Mountaines. Also in this year, in your Maiesties Towne of Paris, a certaine quantity of powder, but newly made in the Arcenall, by taking fire, caused such a great tempest, that the whole Towne shooke at it: for with an horrible fury, it leuelled with the Earth all the houses nere vnto that place, and discovered and battered down the windowes of all those that stood within the fury of it. And to be briefe (euen as a clap of thunder) it did reuerse heere and there many men halfe slaine; taking away from some their eyes, from others their hearing, and left others no lesse torne and mangled in their members, then if foure horses had drawne them in pieces: and all this by the onely agitation of the ayre, into which substance, the powder was conuerted. The which, according to the quantity and quality of the matter thereof, and according to his motion, either more or lesse violent, hath caused so many wonderfull accidents in our Prouinces; altogether like vnto those which are caused through the inclosing of windes in the bowels and caviities of the earth, not being perspirable. The which, struing to haue vent, blotteth with such a strong and violent agitation, that they make the earth to tremble & quake thereat: thereby debolishing Cities, and ruinating buildings, and transporting them from one place to another. As the Townes of Megara and Egina, anciently much celebrated in the Country of Greece, perishing by Earth-quakes can witness vnto vs.

I omit to discouer (as but little seruing to our purpose) how the winde enclosed in the Entrailes of the earth, maketh a noyse of diuers sounds, and very strange, according to the diuers formes of the conduits and passages, through the which it issueth by, euen after the manner of musical Instruments; the which being large, do giue a great and bafe sound, & being narrow, do make high and sharpe notes, and being crooked or replied, make diuers sounds; as wee see by experience in the Huntsmans horne, and in Trumpets, the which also, being moistned with water, do make a hollow gurgling sound.

In like manner, these noises, murmuring, and clamors, are sundry wayes diuified, according to the places whence they proceed; in such sort, that sometimes hath bene heard a clamorous cry, representing (as it seemed) the assault of a City; the cries and lowings of Bulls, or the neighing of Horses, roaring of Lyons, sound of Trumpets, reports of Artillery, and many other dreadful things; yea sometimes humane voyces. As it is reported by one, who had heard a voyce (as it were) of a woman beatings, which made (as he imagined) such a wofull and greeuous lamentation; where-with he became so greatly affrighted, that he had scarcely breath sufficient to make this report. But when he had well vnderstood the cause of this plaintiue voyce, he was presently deliuered from that feare, which otherwise might haue killed him.

But some perhaps will say, that these things haue alwayes bene, and no lesse ordinary in the times past, then they are at this present: and therefore it is a great folly in me to alledge them, for efficient causes of the death of so many men. The which imputation, I should freely confesse, if I should present them for such: but seeing, that by them I would onely parallel and compare the impetuosity of Artillery, with that of thunder, and the motions of the earth; which being so, it will appeare, that it maketh nothing against my first intention, as I hope to demonstrate clearly, that I am slandered without a cause, if you please to giue eare to the deduction following. In the which, I will plainly and briefly describe the true causes of the late mortality, which happened among your Highnesse Soldiers.

Amongst the things necessary for our liues, there is nothing that can more alter our bodies, then the ayre; the which, continually (willing or vnwilling) we inspire by those conduites which Nature hath appointed pointed for that end; as the mouth, the nose, and generally through all the pores of the skinn and Arteries therein infixed, whether wee eate, drinke, watch, or sleepe, or doe any other action, whether Natural, Vitall, or Animall. From thence it commeth, that the aire inspired into the Lungs, the Heart, and the Braine, and vniuersally in all the parts of the bodie, to refresh, and in some measure to nourish the same, is the cause that a man cannot liue one minute without inspiration; according to the which wonderfull benefit, the excellent Physitian Hippocrates hath pronounced, and that truly, that the aire hath a kinde of Diuinity in it; because, that in breathing and blowing ouer all parts of the world vniuersally, it doth circumsuue all things therein contained: nourishing them miraculously, strengthening them firmly, and maintaining them in an amiable Vnion; also together symbolizing with the Starres and Planets, into the which the diuine providence is infused, which changeth the aire at his pleasure, and giueth it power not only ouer the mutation of times and seasons, but also of the alteration of naturall bodies. And therefore the Philosophers and Physicians haue expressly commanded, that we should haue a principall regarde vnto the situation and motions of the heavenly bodies, and constitutions of the Ayre, when the preservation of health, or the curation of diseases are in question: but especially the course and mutation of the aire is of great power, as wee may easily iudge by the foure seasons of the yeare. For the Aire being hot and dry in Sommer, our bodies in like manner doth thereby become heated and dried: and in winter the humidity and coldnesse of the ayre doth likewise fill our bodies with the very same qualities: in such order neuertheless, and in so good a disposition of nature, that although our temperatures seeme to bee changed, according to the foure seasons of the yeare; we neuertheless receive no harme thereby, if those times doe keepe their seasons and qualities free from excessse. But to the contrary, if the seasons bee peruerted, that the Sommer is colde, and the Winter hotte, and the other seasons in the like distemperature; this discord bringeth with it a great perturbacion, both in our bodies and in our spirits, constrained neuertheless to receive the danger, by reason that the causes are extreme, and on every side encompass vs; so that we are constrained to lodge in it vs by those Organes and Conduites appointed by Nature to that end, as partly, to expell the superfluous excrements of our nourishment, and partly to receiue the said externall causes, which is the ayre or winde, producing in vs diuers effects, according to those parts of the world from whence they do proceed.

For, it being so, that the Southerly Windes are hot and moyst, that of the North cold and dry; the Easterly Winds for the most part are cleare and pure, and the Westerly cloudy and subiect to rain; yet it is a most assured thing, that the ayre which we do inspire continually, holdeth in all, and through all, the qualitie that is most predominant. And therefore, wee should of necessity consider in all diseases, and the inconueniences which happen therein, the quality of the winds, and the power which they haue ouer the bodies; as Hippocrates hath learnedly left vs by writing in the third Booke of his Aphorisms, Chap. 11. and 17. saying, That our bodies do receiue a great alteration through the vicissitude of the times and seasons of the yeare. As by the South-winde our bodies are subiect to all diseases, because that moysture is their primitive cause: it also weakeneth our naturall heate, the which in the opposite case is much fortified thorough a cold and dry winde, which also maketh our spirits more quick and subtile. The verity of which sentence, the inhabitants of the Territory of Narbonne doe too much experient to their dammage. For being themselves betwene the lustiest and healthifullest people of all France; yet neuertheless they themselves are very sickly for the most part, their bodies leane, their countenances sad and heavy; their faces tawny, or of an Oliue colour, do manifestly shew the same. Also among other diseases, they are almost all subiect to the white Leprosie; and the last Vicers which they haue, which we make no account of at Poitiers or Paris, do ordinarily continue with them a whole yeare together. Not for any other cause, as they themselves confesse, and as all strangers know that haue liued in their country, but onely because they are for the most part, blasted and breathed vpon with a Southerly Winde, which in their language they call Altan, & maketh the aire to be grosse and cloudy; causing in their bodies all the effects which are attributed by Hippocrates to the Southerly winds, in his third booke and fifth Aphorisme, that is to say, when it reigneth, it dulleth the hearing, dimmeth the sight, swellth and aggrauateth the head, weakeneth and abateth all the forces of the body.

Lib. 13. Aphor.

Also, when Hippocrates compareth the temperatures of the one qualitie with the other, he resolueth vpon this point, That the dry seasons are farre more healthfull then the humid, that haue continued for a long succession of time, because excessive humidity is the true matter of putrefaction, as experience telleth vs. For wee see, that in those places where the Marine or Sea-winds haue long blowne, all kinds of flesh (though neuer so new and fresh) will corrupt in lesse then an houre. These things being considered, that it is most necessary for the conservation of our bodies in health, that the seasons should follow their naturall temperatures, without any excessse or contrariety, there is no doubt to be made, but that our bodies will fall into many vnaturall diseases, when the naturall qualities of the seasons are peruerted thorough the euill disposition of the aire and winde, that predominateth therein. It being so, that for these 3. yeares space here in France, the seasons of euery yeare haue not kept their ordinary qualities. In the Sommer wee haue but little heate, in the Winter a little or no cold at all. Also the other haue bene continually distempered with raine and moysture, together with much southerly winds whose nature we haue declared before, & this throughout all France.

I know no man so little seene in natural Philosophy, or in Astrologie, which will not finde the aire to be the efficient cause of so many euils, which for these 3. yeares space haue happened in the Kingdome of France. For from whence should proceed those contagious Pestilences, which happened indifferently to old and young, to rich and poore, and in so many places, but from the corruption of the Ayre? From whence should proceede so many kinds of Feauers, Pleuritis, Apostumes, Catars, defluitions of small Poxe and Meazels?

So many kinds of venomous Beastes, as Froegges, Toads, Grahoppers, Caterpillers, Spiders, Flies, Waspes, Snailes, Serpents, Vipers, Snakes, Lizards, Scorpions, and Aspicks, but onely from a putrefaction resulting from the humiditie of the aire, accompanied with a languishing heate. This is it (I say) that hath engendered in vs, and in all the Country of France, so many strange and vknownne accidents. Behold therefore how our naturall heate hath bene weakened, how our blood and humors haue bene corrupted through the malignity of the ayre, which these Southerly winds haue caused, thorough the hote and moyst quality thereof.

Thus much I haue obserued, that where there hath bene need of Phlebotomizing, there hath bene but little blood drawne from any, whether they wer yong or old, wounded, or not of so good or euill temperature, but it hath bene corrupted, and appeared of white or greenish Colours. This I haue alwayes obserued in these last Vvarres, and in other places where I haue bene called to cure the wounded: such as haue bene phlebotomized by the prescription of the Physitian, either for the prevention of accidents, or the furtherance of the cure. In all which, I say indifferently, I haue found the bloode putrified and corrupted.

This being so, it must needs follow, that the fleshy parts of our bodies cannot be otherwise then euilly disposed: and all our bodies Cacoehymate; seeing that their nourishment which is the blood, is purtified, and the ayre altogether corrupted. From whence it followeth, that those bodies which were wounded in the fleshy parts, were difficult to cure, considering that there was in them a perdition of substance; the which hauing neede of the regeneration of the flesh, could not bee accomplished, neither by Medicines, nor any Art of the Chirurgian; such & so great was the Cacoehimy or euill constitution of their bodies. Euen as in an Hydropticke person, there can no flesh be regenerated, because the blood is too colde and watery: and in the Elephantick or leprous disease, the flesh and other parts do abide in putrefaction, because of the corrupted blood whereby they are nourished. In like manner, in wounds of Cacoehymed bodies, dies, there can be no regeneration made of any good substance, because that to restore a lawdable flesh in the wounded part it is required, that the blood should not offend neither in quantity nor quality, & that the offended part bee in it naturall temperature. All these things were wanting in the times of these last Varres: and therefore it is not to be wondered at, if the woundes which were then received (although they were but small and of little consequence in the noble or ignoble parts) haue brought with them so many tedious accidents, and in the end death; because that the aire which doeth encompass vs, maketh the woundes to be corrupt and putrified, by reason of the inspiration and transpiration thereof, especially when it selfe is corrupt and putrified, by altering & corrupting the humors.

Intollerable stinke proceeding from the wounded parts of men.

Of this point I haue had the experience in many Wounds, which I haue bin called to dresse, that haue rendred a most insupportable stinking fauour, as a certain witness of corruption and infection, in so much, that the assistants could hardly endure to be present at their dressings. It need not to be here alledged, that this was for want of being cleanly kept, or often dressing, or for not administering to them things necessary: for this corruption was as common to Princes and great Lords, as vnto poore soldiers; whose woundes (if by chance one day escaped wherein they were not drest, so great was the number of the hurt soldiers) you should finde in them the morrow after, a great quantitie of wormes, with a marvellous stinking fauour. And moreover, there hapned vnto them many Apostumes in diuers parts of their bodies opposite to their hurts. For if they were shotte in the right shoulder, they shold haue an Apostume on the left knee; and if the wound were in the right leg, the Apostume would arise in the left arme. As it hapned to the late K. of Navarra, to Monsieur de Neuers, and to Monsieur de Renda, and almost to all others. So it seemeth, that Nature being so much oppressed with corrupted humors, could not be sufficiently purged and discharged of them by woundes onely, but sent some part of the corruption to some other part either hidden or apparent. For, if the Apostumes appeared not outwardly, they should be found in the inward part; as in the Liuer, Lungs, or Spleen. Fro those putrifications were stirred vp certain vapors, which through their combination with the heart, causeth continual Feauers; with the Liuer, a let and hinderance of the generation of good blood; & with the brain swoonings, faintings, convulsions, and consequently death.

Now because of those aforesayde accidents, it is vnpossible for any Chirurgicalian (were he neuer so expert) to correct the malignity of the aforesaid woundes: neuertheless those that are employed therein, ought not to be reprehended; because it is impossible for them to warre against God, nor against the aire, wherein oftentimes are hidden the rods of his diuine iustice. If therefore, according to the sentence of ancient Hippocrates, who saith; That all contused woundes ought to be brought to suppuration, thereby to be perfectly cured; which method wee are sometimes constrained to change, because of the putrifications Gangrenas and mortifications which doe accompanie such woundes, thorough the corruption of the aire; and can any blame or accuse vs, because we are constrained through necessity to change and alter that manner of curation, and insit of suppurative medicines to vse other remedies, to resist such accidents which not onely happen in woundes made by Gun-shot, but also by swords or stauies: which remedies shall be described in this present Discourse. Besides humane causes, that man is ill instructed in the knowledge of Celestial things, which doth not beleue for certaine, that the wrath of God hangeth ouer vs, to punish the faults which ordinarily we comit against his Maicesty. His scourges are prepared ready, his rods and weapons haue they ministers alwaies at hand, to execute the commandment of his diuine iustice, into whose secrets I dare enter no further, but will conclude with the opinion of the best aduised Practitioners, that the principall occasion of the aforesaide mortallitie, did proceede from the pure and determinate will of God, who by the temperature that he hath giuen to the ayre and windes (as the Heraldes of his diuine iustice) hath made vs apt to receyue the aforesaide inconueniences, which we haue incurred by our iniquities.

CHAP.

CHAP. V.

¶ Of the Excellencie of the Arte of Physicke, going farre beyond all other humane Arts and Sciences whatsoeuer.

What humane Arts are true to bee.

All Arts inuenced for the vse of man.

Diuinity expected from all humane Arts.

The nature or qualitie of knowledge in humane lawes.

The place allotted to Physicke in the second degree.

WE vnderstand humane Artes (as well Liberall as Mechanicall) to bee all those, that Man (inspired by God) hath inuenced for his necessitie, commoditie, or recreation. Amongst which also is Physicke, the practise of naturall Philosophie vpon the bodies of men, for whom all mechanical Arts were deuised; as Artes liberall for exercise of the minde. We except onely from all ordinary professions of Man, the sacred Science of Diuinity; which we vnderstand, not to come within compass of this comparison, when we extoll Physicke to be aboue all humane Arts: because it is neither Art or humane Science; but a matter merely and purely diuine, not inuented by men, but infused by God; concerning soules, and not bodies; eternal, infallible, immutable, hauing (for obiect) God Almighty, Creator of the World, who made it of nothing, and for the seruice of man. In whom we are to consider a reasonable soule, the body, and benefits which are giuen vnto him for the support and maintaining of his life.

Diuinity hath her especial care of the soule, and next to her, Moral Philosophie. Skill and knowledge, restrained vnto humane Lawes, do discourse on goods and proprieties appertaining to men, rendering to euery one that which is his owne. Betweene them both is Physicke, conferring the body in health, expelling Diseases, and sauing from death, so farre as it pleaseth God to permit. If then the excellency of professions, is to be esteemed in and by their subiects, according as they ought to bee: Physicke will then assume the second place. For, the soule is more then the body, and the bodie more then garments.

I will not heere contest with my Grand Masters the Magistrates, who haue power ouer mens bodies, as well in case of life, as death: for their authority is nothing else but a meere declaration; either of pardoning, or punishing with death, according to the quality of delict. As for the power of absolution or pardon, if it be in grace, as the sole Prince or Soueraigne Magistrate may do it: it proceedeth from the priuiledge giuen him by God, and not from any knowledge of the Lawes. Like to the other, that declareth the innocence and preuention of the accused: the which is properly to saue, or giue life, because the party standing so accused, hath not therefore deferred death.

And as for power of putting to death, therein is no praise; at least, it ought not to be compared with the power of sauing life. For, so much doth the Physitian (the grace of God assisting) to man, being artainted with deadly diseases, and doubtles should dye, except they were succoured in such manner. Now, whether it is effectable, or no, and that (by the Art of Physicke) life may be prolonged: that we shal more amply relate in the following chapter. Onely our intent heere, is, to shewe the excellency of man; to confirme the excellency of that Art, which is dedicated onely to his conseruation.

The principall dignity of Man, is in this, that God hath vouchsafed to bestow on him his owne Image and resemblance, giuing him an immortall soule, capable of the Diuinity: in regard that all things were submitted to him, for his necessitie, commoditie, and recreation; hauing made (for his seruice) Heauen, Earth, the Sea, and all that is in them. For God hath no neede of any thing, made by himselfe: All is for our vse, and therefore it is easie to vnderstand and know, that Man is more worthy and excellent then all the world. So, to speake truly, Heauen and Earth, which haue had a beginning, were ordained for an ending, and to waxe olde like a Garment. Onely Man shall neuer end, but change his condition, and of being mortall, he shall become immortall; in a short while after the soule shal receiue her diuorce from the body, taking it vp again, in much more glorious manner then before, and in such a perfect temper, as neuer can be subiect to corruption.

Seeing then, that Man is the worthiest thing in all the world, beside all other whatsoever: the Science ordained for his person,

The power of Magistrate in cases of life or death, holding their authority from God.

What diuinity is betweene the two powers, of sauing life, and putting to death.

Wherein the chiefest dignity of Man doth consist.

Man was created neuer to haue ending, but to change his present condition.

Man the only worthy thing in all the world.

son, must needs bee the most excellent above all other, next vnto that which properly concerneth his Creator. For, Man is the most worthy creature of all, and (by consequence) the Art or Science which maintaineth him in life and health, is the onely excellent of all humane Arts. This is a strong argument, for the preeminence and dignity of Physicke, according to the singularity of the subiect whereon it discourseth.

I could giue a glance at some other matters, which make (in like manner) for his commendation: As his Antiquity, Necessity, and Vtility, together with the Authority of them, that haue the more reuerenced and esteemed him, for the same reasons. As concerning his Antiquity, no man doubteth, but it is as olde as the transgression of Adam, and that so soone as he had sinned, he (thereby) became subiect to sicknesse. He must needs be Physitian to himselfe, to whom God had giuen knowledge, concerning the vertue of all things whatsoever, and causing him to giue them feuerall names, answerable and according to their feuerall proprieties.

Prophane Histories, doe attribute the invention of Physick to god Apollo, which is the Sonne: signifying thereby, that from the Sun proceedeth the vertue of Plants, and other medicaments, which the earth produceth. Hereupon they conclude, that Ascalapius (the first that made profession of this Art) was his sonne; and he the Father of Machaon & Podalirius, vulnerarie Physitians (otherwise called Chirurgions) who were in the warre of Troy, the History whereof, is the very ancientest in the world.

Now, concerning Antiquity, it is one of those conditions, that commendeth something; provided, that it hath beene continued. For, if it be neither vse-able, nor beneficiall, it will soon haue ending. But we see (even to this instant) that Physicke hath beene well maintained, euermore in augmentation, beauty, and liberall bounty. And that, by industrie of the chiefeest persons that haue bin, not onely Philosophers by profession, but likewise by Kings, Princes, and other men of greatest esteeme, it hath beene highly honoured, according as ancient Histories, and their learned labors left vs of Physicke, do plainly testifie.

True it is, that the Romaines did let it passe by them, for about fixe hundred yeares, as holding it in detestation; for the cruelty of some Chirurgions which came forth of Greece, a Nation to them very suspicious. But since those times, Physitians were honoured, much respected, & maintained in Rome; holding ranke with the chiefeest Noblemen and Knights.

Now, touching the Necessity thereof, it is so manifest, as nothing more. But it seemeth, that this may diminish the excellency of the Art; because it is not expetible or desirable of it selfe, but onely for neede. Like as in Moral Philosophy, this is most esteemed, which is desirable of it selfe (As to haue children, then acceptable, for some other respect, as to haue goods for those children;) Euen so, Physicke, being not desirable of it selfe (like to Musick) but for necessity; it appeareth to be the lesse commendable, euen as Mechanicall Arts, which cannot passe without vse. Yet notwithstanding, this is contrary; for, the more necessary Physick is, so much the more it is to be desired: and the excellency of her effects, maketh her to be the more excellent.

And heere, Vtility or commodity ioyne with it, commending it in the highest degree. For, as there is nothing in the world more welcome then Health, nor more desirable then long life: Physicke, providing both for the one and other, is the more beneficiall to the contentment of men, then any other humane Science can be. For (by the contrary) as whoeuer that hath not health, is vnprofitable to the world: euen so he that hath lyued but a litle while, brought therto the lesse benefit with him. For, as the Father of Eloquence sayd; We are not borne for our selues only, but our Parents, Kindred, & Friends, our Countrey, yea the whole world; all these do vrges from vs some emolument, and commodity.

It remaineth now, to confirme all these reasons by great and good Authority, of such as haue much esteemed and extolled Physicke, and the professors thereof, commending it infinitely by their Writings. In the performance whereof, I shall content my selfe, with the exhortation made in Ecclesiasticus, and the remonstrance of our graue father Hippocrates. Nor is he to be be suspected in the matter, because he was a Physitian: for, he was neuer mercenary, nor at the seruice of any man; but free and most liberrall of his profession. And he it was, that first diuided Physicke from Philoſophie. Because (in elder daies) Physitians were not distinguished by themselves, but Philoſophers did contemplate vpon diseases, and their remedies among naturall things: for their vse principally (as Celsus witnesseth) who had most need about other, in regarde of their bodies weaknesse, being overcome with continuall depressions of Age.

Hippocrates then was the first, that deuoted this Art from Philoſophy, and made profession thereof publickely; as (afterward) did Diocles, Praxagoras, Chrysippus, Herophilus, and Erasistratus, all his successors. And they (at length) diuided Physicke into three parts, for better accommodation thereof to sick persons: referring mechanickall people to manuell operation, called Chirurgery, and the preparation of Medicines, which are teatmed Pharmacie or Apothecaries skill, according as (in these our dayes) it is exercised among vs. But it is by mercenary people (for the most part) whose testimony in the Art of physick, can carry here no credit; no, not that of Galen himselfe, although he was one of the first subiected seruants thereto.

Wherefore that shall satisfie me, which is recorded by so great a Father, after I haue made recitall of the words of Ecclesiasticus, the wisdom of Iesus the sonne of Sirach, writing thus in his 38. Chapter, verse 1. Honor the Physitian with that honor which is due vnto him, because of the necessity thou hast of him; for the Lord hath created him. 2. Healing commeth of the most High, and the Physitian shall bee honoured euen of Kings. 3. The knowledge of the Physitian exalteth his head, and in the sight of Princes he shall bee had in admiration. 4. The Lord hath created Medicines of the Earth, and he that is wise will not abhorre them. 5. Was not the water made sweete with woad, that men should know the vertue thereof? 6. So he hath giuen knowledge vnto men, that he might be glorified in his mercenall works. 7. With such doth hee heale men, and taketh away their paines.

8. The Apothecarie maketh his commixtions, and yet hee cannot finish his owne work: for, it is from God, that health commeth vnto

all the earth.

9. My sonne, faile not in thy sicknesse, but pray vnto God, and he will make thee whole.

10. Leaue off from sinne, and order thine hands aright, and cleanse thine heart from all wickednesse.

11. Offer sweete Incense, and fine Flour for a remembrance; make the Offering faste, for thou art not the first giuer.

12. Then giue place to the Physitian; for the Lord hath created him, let him not goe from thee, for thou hast need of him.

13. The houre may come, that their enterprizes may haue good successe.

14. For they shall also pray vnto the Lord, that hee would prosper that which is giuen for cause, and their Physicke for prolonging life.

These diuine words do conclude (& verie sufficient) our purpose, for the dignity, excellency, necessity, vtility, and prerogative of Physitians: condemning all such, as hold them in vile esteeme, and (in them) do despise the great goodnesse of Almighty God, who hath bestowed vpon men such meanes of healing. Let vs now heare what was spoken by the learned Hippocrates. The good olde man, in the Booke of the Lawe, complained so long since, that (euen in his time) Physick was but slenderly esteemed, in regarde of abuse; much more then must it needes be now at this day.

The Art of Physicke (saith hee) is the most apparant of all other: but by the ignorance of some that vse it, and such as indge of the Professours, it is too farre ouer-gone by all other Artes. The faulte (methinks) proceedeth principally from this: That in Cities, there is no punishment appointed to the Art of Physicke, as to other. Except dishonours done it, which are not instructions sufficient for such as sayle therein.

They may well be compared vnto the Actors in a Tragedie, who haue the habite, visage, and outward behaviour, of those personages which they represent and counterfeite. In like manner, there are many Physitians in name and repute; but verie few that are the men in deede. For, in him that would truly haue the knowledge of Physicke, fixe feuerall qualities or conditions, are necessarily required, which followe thus. 1. The Nature. 2. Discipline. 3. Good Manners. 4. Learning from his Childe-hood.

by these he shall become a good Physician, not only in name, but in deed also. But ignorance is a wicked treasure, & a Jewell of vile price, to such as haue it, and liue but as in a dreame or opinion.

Plinie pursuing this matter, and to the same purpose, taxing the vulgare, that know not how to distinguish betwene
the good and badde Physician, listning only to such as are full of talke, making great vaunts and bragges of themselves, hath these words: They get (saith hee) a little taste of the Arte only, and their rash iudgement sodainly conceiteth, that presently they are skilfull Physicians; albeit (in anie kinde of lying) there is no greater danger, yet it is not easily discovered, for pleasing is the sweetnesse to a man, in perswasion, and commending himselfe.

Moreover, there is not any Lawe, for the punishing of capital ignorance, where it importeth the liues of men, neither is there anie example of vengeance: for, they undertake matters of difficulty and danger, and make their proofes by killing men, and yet passe unpunished for thus murdering men. Nay, and that which is farre worse, when themselves do iustly deserue the reproch: they excuse it, by the sickes patients intemperance, and impudently doe lay their owne sinne vpon the dead.

I thought it expedient to set downe
these words, to the end it may be known, that (euen in these dayes of ours) there are many, that wearing the mask and appearance of Physicians, cause Physicke (thorough their abuses) to bee greatly despised. Euen as many other things (good of themselves, or newtall) are made worse then they be indeede, in regard that they are very easily abused. But because I haue formerly promised, to declare in another Chapter, whether life may be prolonged by Physicke, or no, which is an action singular and excellent: I will next set downe in ample manner, what mine opinion is concerning that point.

CHAP. VI.

Whether it bee possible, or no, to prolong the life of man, or woman, by Physicke.

His Question hath alwayes appeared to bee verie difficult, and hath much afflicted the verie greatest spirits:
as lying hid and concealed in the darkest and deepest secretie of Nature; and therefore it hath bene the more painfull, to such as haue curiously sought after it. The reasons of them that haue debated it, are so strong and powerfull on either side; that hardly can any resolution bee yeilded, or what best may be faide in the case. For there are very many Arguments, absolutely concluding; that the life of man cannot be prolonged, by any remedies or meanes of Physicke. On the contrary, Physicians haue and doe maintaine, that it is possible. Therefore, for the better disciding of this doubt, I will first of all defend each of the seuerall sides, and in the end (like to an honest and indifferent Arbitrator) deliuer therein, mine owne opinion and iudge-ment.

That there is a tearme or limitation, appointed vnto the life of man, and that hee cannot goe beyond it by any meanes whatsoever; wee haue (in the first place) that which the patient man Job said, chap.
14. verses 1. 5. inspired by the Spirit of God. The dayes of Man are short; the number of his Moneths are with the Lord; He hath ordained the boundes and limits of his life, which he cannot passe.

Aristotle affirmeth the same, in his second booke of generation and corruption;
*The time and life (saith he) of euery thing,
hath his infinite count and determination:
For, in all things there is an order, and all life and time is measured by a period. Also, in his fourth booke of the Generation of Creatures, hee sayeth; It is but reasonable, that there should be periods and seasons, as well for Groweth, as for Generation and Life: which are accounted by dayes, monethes, yeares, or other times that are* decree for them here. And Auicenna ex-plicating the same faith, *All things that are,

haue (necessarily) life determined vnto them.*

Seeing then, that all the works of Nature do (necessarily) consist on a certainty of order, so that they neither can be otherwise, or auoide it: And seeing also,
that Art is heerein much inferiour to Nature: it may easily bee concluded (as Galen disputeth in the Booke called Marafmus) that life is no way to bee prolonged by any cunning. Whereunto Auicenna con-senteth, where hee maketh an expresse search, for the causes of our ineuitable death, saying: This naturall death is vni-uersall to euery man, differing one from another, according to their prime complexion, vntill the time they haue in their power, for conserving their naturall humidity. For, e-uery one hath his tearme prefixed, which is diuers in their indiuision, by diuersity of their temper: who haue naturall tearmes, which in other are shortened, and yet all according to the will of God, &c.

If then the tearmes of life are prefix-ed and assigned to euery person, by the will of God, and his ordinance (Nature being but a seruant to God, to wir, establishing things (by order in this World) from their beginning;) it is not to bee exceeded or out-stept, by any meanes in Man, but only by the grace & goodnesse of Almighty God. As to King Ezechias, to whom the Prophet Isaiah had signified his death. Yet vpon his Repentance, life was prolonged to him for fifteene yeares, only by the mercy of God. Who also promiseth in his sacred Law long life vnto children, That Honor their Father and Mother, and are no way ingratefull to them.

Thus wee see, if (contrary to these allegations so certaine) wee can extend and prolong the naturall termes of life, by any ordinances or remedies in our Arte. Because there are some store of reasons, which perswade, that not only the order of Nature, but also our industry, doth promise long life. First of all, Astrologers do maintaine it, where they discourse on elections, figures, and Images. And this hath bene confirmed by experience, in the care and diligence of Physicians to manie persons, who being assisted by remedies and good government: haue maintained themselves in health. And being crazy & sickly, haue held out for long time: whereas otherwise, they had dyed yong, and neuer seene so many yeares.

Plato & Aristotle (great and graue Authors) without all exception, doe testifie (to this purpose) that a learned man, named Herodiscus, the most subiect to sick-nesse of any in his time: did yet neuer the-lesse liue an hundred yeares, by great skill, and exquisite manner of Government.
Galen also (in diuers places) confesseth his owne naturall infirmity; but he faith without all, that he had so wel corrected it, as hardly was he (at any time) sicke; at least after he gaue himselfe wholly to exercise Phys-
ick. Except, when he was once or twice affected with the Ephemerie (which is of a daies continuance) only being painfull to him, in traouling to visit his Friends.
And, if wee may credite some that haue written, he liued aboute seuen score yeares, which may be counted a goodly time.

We shall not need to cite the authority of Plutarch, who speaketh of manie verie weak (yet delicate) bodies, that liued long time by the meanes of this Art: because we see the same now daily experienced as so many. Nor shall we likewise neede to oppose against them, diuers intemperate and dissolute persons, that daily haue despised all good government; and yet notwithstanding, haue attained to great yeares, yea, to decrepite age. For, it is ve-rie certaine, that if such persons as are wel borne, and of good temper, would liue and be assisted by Physicall means in their necessities: they should be slower to Age, and haue the benefit (doubtlesse) of long life. Which is easie to proue, because wee oftentimes see, that some, who are vnhealthfull by nature, or else by accident: do yet liue longer time, then others that are more strong and lustie. Because strong bodies, trusting onlie in their strength, do liue disorderly without any lawe or government at all. Others, being sober and continent, abstaining from hurtfull things, and obseruing a certaine manner of liuing, by direction of a skilfull Physician indeede;
haue hadde their life time longer, and much more healthfull. Wherevpon grew the old Prouerbe, A crackt Pitcher (sometime) lasteth longer, then one that is new.

Heere vpon Galen saide well: It is verie credible, that such men liue lesse time, then is ordained them by Nature: who (being ignorant) do despise the healthfull manner of living. For, the Science of Physicke, providing for the health and life of Man, hath such vertue, as if any one shall rashly contemne the ordinances thereof, he not onely liueth in misery, and all irkesome of diseases, but also cutteth off his length of life, and abridgeth the tearme which Nature had prefixed for him, anticipating his death, and (as we may well say) thereby cutteth his owne throte. As much to say, when (by vsing euill gouernment) he consumeth his radicall humour, sooner then it was ordained for him, or suffocate, or quencheth his naturall heate: on both which, do consist the continuance of life.

Now, if such be the law and nature of contraries, that they are said to be in one and the same subiect; as, if the one hold, the other also must do the like: it followeth then necessarily, that if the one can shorten life, the other like wile can prolong it. And seeing it is most euident, that if the life of Man may be abridged, by diuers fautes and blemishes of excess: it may also as sufficiently be concluded, that life may be prolonged by good gouernment and discrete order. For, although the discommodities, which depend vpon the principles of our generation, are not (by any means) to be auoyded or prevented (as the effluxion and continuall dissipation of our whole substance, which is done by naturall heate, being the reason of Ages sooner ensuing, in regard of excessive and ineuitable exsiccation:) yet notwithstanding, it may be tardied by Physicke, and so hindered, that the last day shall not come so soone, nor so hastily.

Hath it not bene (almost) in generall obseruation, that diuers haue been gasping yea, even ready to giue vp the ghost; who (nevertheless) haue bin continued in life for longer time, by taking a small quantity of Malmesie, Aquavite, Aqua Imperialis, the Confection of Acherues, or some other cordiall thing? The period and last limit of life being then so neere; hath it not bene deferred (by those means) vntill another houre? It is reported of laughing Democritus, that being entertained by his Household seruants (seeing his health very crazie) that hee would banish all griefe and sorrow from his house, during the Troisusporian Feasts, which were then neere at hand, by prolonging his life till then: that he did it by the sinell of Honey, though some others say, that it was by the sauour of hot bread. Thus you see what our Physitions haue deliuered, wherein there is a verie great apparence of truth.

We haue heard the two parties plead and debate, by contrariety of sentences and reasons on either side: it behooueth now, to qualifie the contention, and to resolve on that which hath the best hold. And to the end, that it may be done with the greater cunning; it is necessarie also, to distinguish the termes of life; that some are super-naturall, others naturall, and others accidentarie, which wee call shortened or abridged.

We call those super-naturall, which GOD Almighty ordained and prefixed to some, out of his owne meere will, such as are not to be instituted by anie Atteor Councell. As the date of verie long life, which God appointed in the first Age of the Worlde, and before the Flood, for the multiplication of mankind; and especially to Noah, for the restauration thereof.

Those which we terme Naturall, are they that be bestowed vpon every man, according both to the diuersity of temper and building, as they are in the principles and foundations, cyther strong or weak. In regard whereof, some may live long, others lesse while, according vnto the order of Nature. And they that doe attaine vnto these termes (the grace of God assisting) except they fall into disorder, or some inconvenience happeneth to them; which are (already to be called) the limit or termes of the third kind, and which we haue named accidentarie, or accidentall, that may happen in, or to any age, by callall and inopinate causes; as Wounds, Poysons, Burnings, falls, ruines, shipwrackes, plagues, and other populare harmes. Such inconveniences are (most often) ineuitable, and it lieth not in the Science of Physicke, to vie any precaution against them; but onely to heale the harme already happened, if it be possible. So leauing these termes of life to the arbitration of fortune (which is nothing else, to speake more piously) then the then the pure will of God, without order of Nature, as elsewhere we haue instituted: let vs speake only concerning the tearme of naturall life, and explicate the manner thereof more amply.

All the Philosophers and Physitions do agree together, that we ought to measure and bound the continuance or duration of our life, on that which may lengthen naturall heate, and the radicall humor. Now, to the end that these things may last the longer in vs, our good Mother Nature (as Galen speaketh) hath placed in vs a meruailous power, which by continuall application of Nourishment, defendeth the ordinary dissipation of our substance and Radicall humor, maintaining our naturall heate, as well by this means, as by respiration, and the pulse of Arteries.

But such a kinde of power as we terme Nutritiue, being limited, and not infinit; cannot alwayes defend and conserue the sayde humour in suggesting another. Wherby it commeth so to passe, that the body waxing dry, by little and little; procureth thence, that that power (afterward) is not well exercised in it selfe: but weakeneth daily more and more, so that in the end, the bodies power ceaseth, from being nourished sufficiently. In this manner, those parts becomming saplesse and withered, the body waxeth meager & diminishing; and so passing on further thus, it dryeth; and then this condition is called wrinkled Age. This is the principall naturall necessity of corruption and death, to all bodies begotten: for death ensueth then, when the humor primitiue, sustayning or radicall, fayleth, and naturall heat becommeth quenched; and this is the end of life, which we terme naturall ending.

As concerning the Art of Physicke: It is an Art (saith Auicenne) that exempteth not from death, nor can conduce every one so farre as to the latest tearme of humane life. But it assureth and exempteth from two things; the one is from putrefaction, that it can no way seize vpon the body, except it bee by some externall occasion, as the Pestilence, or poyson; the other is in defending the naturall humiditie, to the end, that it may last the longer, and bee the slower in consuming.

These two things are in the power of Physicke, whereby it may prolong life, for so long time as it is due, according to the temper of euery man, and that by three means. The first whereof, is, to preoccupate strange heats; to hinder opilation; and to eject the excrements, from whence ensueth the generation of putrifying; or when they are engendered, to qualifie and quench them. The second is, the due administration of drinking & eating; in substance, quality, quantity, time, and order. The third is, to abstaine from things, which, in consuming and exhausting the Radicall humor, in a very short while doeth resolve, or dissipate together the naturall heate; as excessive traualle or labour; vse of sharpe or piercing things, watchings, cares, and diuers passions of the minde. But about all other, immoderate carnall Copulation, and at incommensurable houres; with some other such like things, which a man may, and ought to shunne, by following the good and wholesome ordinances and rules of Physicke.

But (say you) no man neede doubt of these things, for euery one will gladly agree, to moue the foresaide Reasons; that such cannot but liue long, as keepe within the compass of temperance, and haue an especial care of their health. This is not the matter, of attaining vnto the end and tearme ordained by Nature, without abridging or shortning it, although this is a case verie rare. But I demand principally, whether the end and naturall period of life, may be aduanced and prolonged by the Art of Physicke, or no? The Answer heereunto, is, That life is not onely conserued by Physicke, but likewise prolonged. For, it standeth with good reason, that the thing must needs be the more confirmed and auanced, the principles, foundation, and produced causes whereof, may be continued and extended, yea, & (especially) made the stronger. Nowe, the principles of life (that is, naturall heate, and the primitiue humor) if they cannot be re-integrated, yet (at least) they may be repaired, & made more vigorous by this Art. According as the curing of Heusticke or continuall Feauers doth shew vs, and the recovering or amending of euery complexion; whereby the naturall heate is ordered and tempered.

If then, by way of liuing humectiue, or or moistly, as by Bathes of pure fresh waters, and other such like remedies, the radicall humour may be the longer conferred, which otherwise would be ouer soon consumed; and naturall heat kept temperate; so that it may consume her feeding the more sparingly, by defect whereof, death naturally ensueth) wher is the man who wil not confesse, that life may be prolonged by Physicke, which else would haue bin much shorter, and according to Nature? I know well, and I confesse it, that the solide and spermatike parts, cannot be moistned substantially, & of themselves: neuertheless, you will grant, that they may be moistned through the void spaces and pores, by which the feeding humour infiltrateth it selfe, and whereby also the waiting of the radicall humour is the more tardied. And it is almost in the same manner, as when we put water with oyle into a Lampe, to the end, that the Oyle may the more strongly resist the flames deuouring.

But yet (say you) although the termes of life may be lengthened, yet it is not strongly enough proued by this argumēt. Let me then reply, that of the Complexions or tempers of the body, that of the most and cheefest life, is moisture, or that which is in like manner (or together with it) hot and moist, which vulgarly wee vse to terme Sanguine: the contrary, which we call Melancholy, is of far shorter life. So that, whensoever both of them shall vse one gouernement together, and like maintaining; yet notwithstanding, the first will be of longest lasting, because it hath the terme of it owne life furthest off, from the principles of it owne generation. Now, the Art of Physicke enstrueth, & the vertue thereof is so great, that it can change (by little and little) the naturall temperature of cold and dry, into their contrary: as Galen teacheth how to do it, in his two last bookes of the preferation of health. Doth it not follow then hereby immediately, that the terme of life may likewise be prolonged by the Art of Physicke? Yea, and that some one, vnfortunatly borne, and (euen bound as it were) to shortnesse of life; hath yet chaunged the condition, and become thereby farre more liuely and cheerful. Onely by this meanes (in mine opinion) that euerie one easily vnderstandeth, how to learn of another; which is nothing else, but how to lengthen the limits of all Ages, whereby ensueth, that the course of euery life may be prolonged.

And first of all, that the vigor and flour of youth may long time be preferred by the Art of Physicke; Galen declareth it in this manner: There are two principall ends in the conseruation of health, which are in our power: namely, to restore the substance dissipated by meats and drinks conuenient, & to resist the excrements proceeding from them. If no defaultance bee made in any of these: the body (so long) shall inioy health, and will bee very long time conferred in the strength of his owne vigour. In like manner, and by the selfesame reason, Age (altogether vnauidable, of such as ought to dye by naturall death) is to bee prolonged by the helpe of Physicke: so that swoonings, trances, and the pale asthie countenances of extreme olde Age, shall come very slowly.

Heereby finally we may conclude, that as in all ages (for we may in like manner, and much more easily, vnderstande the termes of childhood, infancy, & youth) and euery estate of life: the termes may be prolonged by Physicke, for further time then they are ordained by Nature. And these are the limits, which God (the principall Authour of Physicke) would haue subiected to this Art: which are in our power, so long as God permitte, and cutteth not our thred of life, vntill it pleaseth him. Euen as in like manner hee rector, and beyond all the order of Nature by him appointed: he sustained and prolonged life myraculously, without anie Physicall helpe, yea, euen without eating and drinking.

which agree likewise (very wonderfully) together in many other things, as may more at large be discerned, by diuers discourses following. For, to explicate (familiarily) the deeds of Physicke, I shall often borrow similitudes from warre-like actions, and namely at this instant (mee-thinks) I may serue my turne with one, which aptly offers it selfe for my purpose, thus. If a General besiedge a Towne, & take it not within some promised time, or else so soon as they hope, who are far off, without knowing how it might be taken; although the Capitaine performed his vtmost diligence: he shall be suspected and accused in diuers kindes, as of negligence, slothfulness, intelligence, corruption, treason, ignorance, precipitation, or tardinesse in his enterprizes, badde conduction, pusillanimity, or some other defect in his charge, & yet all these viterly false. But they which iudged thus peremptorily, knew not what resistance the besiedged made, what good prouision they had, what strength of men, and all thinges requisite to defend themselves, beyond the expectation of the besiedged; who might be abused by his fowtes and spies, and diuers, making report of the estate of the place, and of some other exterior semblances, whence might be imagined, what was within the Towne.

So farreth it with the Physition, who besiedgedh any disease, treacherously entred into the bodye of Man, to enforce him forsake the place. Oftentimes, hee is abused by exterior signes, and very goodly outward resemblances: whereby, thinking that he is at the end of the Cure, he is compelled to beginne againe. For, hee meeteth with more corruption and ill humours, then hee knew how to fore see, the Disease making farre greater resistance, then the Physition thought on: reinforcing, and repaying it selfe dayly more and more, against the best succour and remedies applied. So that the sicknesse will last longer, then himselfe that hath it expected, and cannot be cured so soone, as (perhappes) the Physition promised, or others imagined, that had intelligence thereof. Whereuppon, hee groweth suspected presently, eyther of ignorance, or of negligence, of couetousnesse, malice, or some other vice, which induceth him to lengthen out the disease, longer then it ought to be.

As touching ignorance, I suppose it could not bee so, but that the Physition was held to bee skillfull, expert, and an honest man. If he prouoe not such a one, it was ill dole to call him, and to commit the patients life into his handes: so that the Patient may well say, as Iesus Christ replied vnto Pilate, Iohn 19, verse 11. He that deliuered me to thee, hath the greater blame.

As for negligence, I grant that there are Physitions learned, expert, and men of good esteeme, who may passe (somewhat ouer-lightly) their visitation and curing of sicke persones: but I can neuer thinke, that it should bee to any such end, as to prolong the paine; but rather that it is a negligence of inaduertence, as may happen in diuers of their other affaires. For which, there is very good remedy, by earnest solicitations, inciting them (as they ought) to doe their duties, and wishing them to be more frequent in attendance; or else, by giuing them a coadiutor or assistant, to make them the more diligent in their care.

The most that is to bee doubted (in mine opinion) is greedie Auarice: For the vulgar sort thinke, that Physitions (commonly) lengthen out Diseases, and draw the into some time of continuance, to deriue the greater profite from them. Wherefore, I would gladly stand somewhat the longer vpon this point, to refute this false opinion, which is the most erroneous of all.

First, I am of the minde, that the Physition should bee an honest man, in regarde, that hee ought to loue his owne Honour and Reputation. I desire also, that hee should profite in his profession; as euerie one should gette Goodes honestly by his Vocation. If hee bee an honest and Worthie man; hee hath bowelles of Christian Compassion, and neuer will suffer any man, (by or with his will) to languish out in sicknesse or disease: but if hee bee no such man, hee ought not to bee employed, as I haue formerly saide. But if hee be badly enclined; he may make his aime and intent, to graspe vp Wealth; getting a name for no other end, but to become rich. Yet let me tell yee, if hee prolong Diseases, which he may and can shorten: hee

he is no able man, but goeth quite contrary to his intention. For, if he can cure in lesser time than other men do; he shall be in the greater request: hee shall have such crowdes of patients resort vnto him, as hee can hardly come neare them himselfe, and rather they will giue him a french Crowne, then a Teller to any other. For, what is hee, that would not rather pay double, treble, yea foure-fold more than ordinarie, to be so soone recovered? If, to some other Physitian, who commeth ouer-late to the cure, ten Crownes be giuen: there needeth no complaint, if fiftie Crownes be distributed to him, that shall abridge the time of a mans agony, in halfe the third or fourth part of suffrance.

Physitions
are not able to cure or re-couer at their own pleasure.

But, to speake vprightly, it is not in the Physitians power, to doe any such acte at his owne pleasure. He would gladly will it so, that he had such a vertue, as to heale by touching, feeling, or the very first receipt giuen, or onely by good gouernement, or any other such light direction. He should haue the lesser paines, betwene times the more esteemed; and gaine infinitely to his owne aduantage. Oh good God! how soone might hee be rich, that could be so prosperous and successfull. It is not then to be imagined, that Physitians (prouoked by couetousnesse) should delight in prolonging diseases: seeing they may gaine so much with good-will, reputation, yea, and extraordinarie recompence, if they had power to cure with such expedition. But I pray you tell me one thing, Is there a Physitian, that hauing parents, kintred & familiar friends, of who he will take nothing for his paines? Can hee cure them (for his credite sake) in lesser time: the disease being alike, and the subiect answerable? Hee winneth nothing by the length of such sicknesses; it is enough if he loose not the good opinion conceived of him, and diuers kind offices doe vnto him. Let mee say moreouer, when himselfe, his wife, or children lie sicke; they depend vpon his owne expence, and neede not to haue any delay in their recouerie: but can hee sooner cure them, then any other being in the same distresse? Questionlesse, it is a great follie, to thinke, that Physitions should be so forgetfull of themselves, as, to prolong diseases willingly, and with their knowledge; in regard of iust affection to their owne honour and profite.

It may fall out with them, as it often doeth to hardie Souldiours, in besieging some appoynted or determined place, who thinke to effect the businesse in three dayes compass, and yet continue there a month before it, without dissembling or sparing any paines. They were perswaded, that a wall could not resist tenne shotte of the Cannon; and yet it out-flooded more than an hundred. They held opinion, that the besieged were not stored with victuals and munition, for about eight dayes, and finde them furnished for more then two months. Whatsoeuer is thought or conceived in this kinde, be they neuer so many, they are but coniectures, idiomes of some resemblance, examples and obseruations, which faile as often as they speed. And yet (for all this) the valiant Capitaine assaiant, ought not to be accused, for ill doing his duty, when hee performed all that Arte and Industrie could require.

In all respects, this is the Physitians case, who is most excusable altogether, when hee sayleth in the quantity and efficacy of his remedies. For this is the principall matter (as Galen auoucheth in many places) that makes the Arte of Physicke coniectural, Defining coniecture to be a means or condition, between perfect knowledge, and pure ignorance. Therefore it ought to be interpreted to the best, and taken in good part, what successe the remedies sort vnto, which a learned, expert, diligent and honest Physitian applyeth fittest for the purpose, and the most iustly as is possible for him; euermore referring the euent and issue to Almighty God, who giueth and taketh, augmenteth and diminisheth the power of those remedies, according as it best pleaseth him, whether the disease shall be soone or slowly ended; one while indifferently amending, another while agayne as doubtfully depending.

Mallice or spleene now remayneth; which may be suspected in the Physitian. If there be the very least occasion of rancour, hatred and ill will betwene the Physitian and his patient: there was no good aduice or discretion, in calling such a man to the businesse. For (on the contrary) it is very expedient, that the sicke person should loue his Physitian, and he him agayne in like manner, although they haue no knowledge of each other, eyther by name or action. In this case, a strict concordance of amity, ought to be contracted betwene their hearts: For otherwise, the patient will neuer kindly receiue his Physitions best succour, nor the other care for administering, where hee findeth his paynes not to be affected. As for deliberate and purposed mallice, with an intent to doe hurt secretly; if there be any Physitian to be taxed with such a sin: hee ought rather to be ranked with impostors, and not any way to be employed.

But, I vnderstand by the vulgar sort, that they take this word Mallice in another kinde offence, to wit, that Physitians (with their intent and knowledge) doe cast downe their patients bodies ouerlowe, by abstinence and euacuations, euen endangering the very latest passage. And that this is done, but in ostentation of their Arte, and to winne the worrier reputation, when they can come off with any credit: or else they salue and shield it, with some prognosticke opinion, conceyued at the beginning and vndertaking the businesse, that the patient was (euen then) in daunger of death; but this doth proceede from such, as haue formerly fallen into the same perill. Thus doe I comprehend the doubtful coniecture of the common people, and (many times) they spare not to speake it.

In very truth, it were most maliciously, traitorously and wickedly doone, if anie Physitian should play such pranks with a poore sicke bodie: yea, as vildly done, as if a man should throw such a one into a riuer, as knew not how to swimme, hoping quickly to cast a cord after him, thereby to get him on shoare agayne. For, it may so fall out, that the party thus fowled and submerged in the water, knowes not how to catch the cord, or cannot hold it strongly enough, or hath not power sufficient to be drawne forth, and so is drowned in this distresse. But surely, it is not credible or likely, that any Physitians should be so badly minded, as to bring sicke bodies so lowely by their applications: which (if they are not) ought to be well instituted, and accordingly as best appertayneth to the case. It is the disease it selfe, which continually vndermineth the forces of nature, encreasing till his owne power to a certayne poynt, which is the vigour and foueraigne condition of the sicknesse. After which, if the disease be curable, enueth the declination and diminution of the maladie; and thorow all these accidents, the patient proceedeth on to health, as wee shall haue fitter occasion to speake of hereafter.

There are people somewhat more modest, who say not, that Physitians do take downe their patients bodies so lowe, and bring them into daunger: but that they stretch forth the sicknesse in length, eyther by their indulgence (that is, by ouermuch pleasing the sicke persons humour) or to binde him in the larger aduantage to them, by recouering him out of a long lingering maladie. As touching indulgence, or tender-heartednesse, it is verie true, that many sicke men affect rather, to be slowe in recouering, then speedily, onely by being the gentlier handled: which is an excuse sufficient for the Physitian, provided, that hee makes protestation thereof, for safetie of his owne honour and reputation.

As for such as prolong sicknesse, thereby to deriue the greater benefite: that were a smoothe-faced kind of treason, and (indeede) meer villany. And surely, it cannot be credible (if the Physitian do vnderstand himselfe well) that he should (at any time) offer to delay a disease. For, he is not able to measure, or comprehend the times length; and, by giuing way to such protraction, the interior euill may grow the worse; wherein is greater perill, then delaying simply, or the cure waxing long. It is another manner of thing, then vlcers dealt withall by the Chirurgian: for they may well bee maintayned, without any prejudice to the person, because the inner parts of the body may be safe enough, purging themselves by the vicer, and that there be no other harme, then the vicerated parts.

For prooue whereof, wee oftentimes appoynt, that Fistulaes should be entertained with delay, and make issues and fontanelles in many places of the body, which wee must haue kept open for verie long time. But inward maladies are of another consideration, and neuer ought to be dallyed withall: but if they can be cured, red, to procure it with all possible speede, or so soone as may be.

Another point of calumny, is, that Physitians doe abuse the world, that men may well be cured without them; nay, much better and sooner: and they doe nothing else but deale confusedly. Wee haue already sufficiently confuted this follie, by the sacred authority of Ecclesiasticus. Notwithstanding, I will borrow one similitude more from that famous (and as much wronged) Militarie profession, our Arte holding therein equal comparifon. Some places doe gladly yeeld themselves to the besieger, in regarde hee hath cutte off all their victuals and prouision. Others, at the very first view of the Cannon: Other at the first assault: And contrariwise, some there are that remain impregnable. Now, if we should argument in this manner, we daily see places, that yeelde themselves without enforcing: what neede is there then of besieging, assaulting, fighting, ruining the walles or any other hostile acte? What neede we to make warre on Towne or Cittie; when (many times) wee see them voluntarily submitte themselves? It is then but an abuse, and a foolish idle expence to the country (how feiditions sorow it be) to haue Souldiers, Artillerie, and any other furniture for warre: where such employment is counted a meere inuention, and cheating of the people, who liue free from such molestiation, and all goes well with them.

Another allusion to Militarie seruice.

The Country that is free from warre, hath no need of weapons.

Sicknesses incident to the body with their apt comparatiues.

To our purpose then. If all places be feeble, and no resistance is made, by men well munited, and provided with courage, and other things requisite for their defence; those places may easily yeelde themselves. As the like doe light diseases, against which needeth no force of notable remedies; but many times doe weare away of themselves: yea, and sometimes the very strongest, as burning feauers, when there is no great munition within the body to entertaine them, but that the naturall forces make worthy resistance, against the infolencie of the euill. Otherwise, there is neede of succour, to employ batterie, and all kindes of the best remedies: albeit often it cometh so to passe, that all these doe advantage nothing, the disease remayning still incurable.

What benefite is it to sorrow then, or say, that the partie might haue bene better holpen without all this, or that the patient is meely abused? Rather account that truly for an abuse, if a man promise cure of a disease, which is held to be incurable; hee not knowing any remedie, that hath power sufficient to overcome it. Euen as he shall be abused, that attempteth to compell a Towne to yeelde, by blowes of his fists, or to beate downe the walles with a harquebuzze shot: where the Cannon is rather too little, and no answerable engin or instrument is to be had. Such are the notable abuses, & true cheateries, which Mounte-banke Emperickes impose vpon the people, promising the curing of all diseases, and more then all many times. We may it be said, that they abuse the world, and not naturall Physitians, being learned, expert, and approued honest men.

Where the Physition is refused, no meuaile if the cure grow desperate.

Such are those beggerly wretches about the countries.

CHAP. VIII.

That it is neither sinne, or any acte ill done, to call for the Physition, and to use his remedies, when men are diseased.

Here is an other kinde of error grounded on the foolish superstition of some Ideots, who thinke it an offence to God; if they call for the Physitian, to cure their harms & sickness; saying, It is to contradict, and oppose our selves against the will of God, who hath visited them with such an affliction, and onely for their good: because, by chastising the bodie, the soule is purged from sinne. Adding further, as maister Gwydo Chauliac declareth in his singular chapter. God hath sent me, as he pleased, and he will take it from mee, when he pleaseth, the name of God be blessed, Amen. Referring their health and recovery (wholly) to the intercession of the Saints and the Saints of Paradyse, making Vows, Almes, Prayers, and Pilgrimages, &c.

This opinion most erroneous, is easily refuted, by that which wee haue already alleaged, out of the Booke of Ecclesiasticus, where he piously exhorteth the sicke (and with great wisdom) To reconcile himselfe first to God, whome hee hath offended: and after, to giue way to the Physition, whom God hath created, & giuen him knowledge,

Curious Cosmographers that well vnderstand not what they say but rather offend God themselves by their nice curiosity.

The aduice of the Wise man to euery sicke person.

ledge, to be glorified in his wonderfull works. It is most true, that God sendeth afflictions for our chastisement, and hath made vs subiect vnto them, because wee should acknowledge our owne infirmities. From him also proceeds health and recovery, by those means which he hath ordered in nature: giuing vertue to plants and other creatures, to overcome and expell diseases: ordaining the Science of Physicke, & the Apothecaries skill to that effect, euen as well as Tillage and husbandrie, ordained for the sustentation of men, and support of this fraile and mortall life.

We may wee say then, that these are the means which ought not to be despised; for, a wife man will no way disdain them. Otherwise it is to tempt God, as if (vainely) wee would haue him to worke myracles, according to our appetite. For, he that saith, If God will that I shall be healed of this sickness, I shall be healed, without using the Physition: And if I must die, the Physition can not save mee. This is euen as if hee should say; If I must yet liue a yeare longer, and that it be so appointed by God: I shall safely liue without eating or drinking, and then such expences may well be spared. For if I must liue so long, it is impossible that I should die before, although I neither eate nor drinke.

An extraordinary follie and rashnesse, for a man to promise to himself, that God will worke a miracle vpon him: euen to tempt him by such an essay, hauing foode fit for him, and appointed by God for the nourishment of his body. Is not this meely tempting of God, to trie whether hee will worke against the order of nature, or no? He may suffer him to die in this follie by meere extremitie of hunger, and the poore Idiot shall then finde by effect, that he vainely collected this fantastick brutallie in his munde, that God should maintaine him in life, without receiving sustentation. If God will, he can doe so, but we know the ordination of his owne will, for all men to make vse of his blessings in their food; whereto we are to keep vs, and not to seek after other extraordinary means, which are vnknewne to vs, and not to be employed, according to our presuming appetites.

So it standeth the case of Physicke, appointed by God, for the health of the sicke, and conseruation of them in sound condition. For, whoeuer will be cured otherwise, and hath gotten an opinion, that if he must haue health, he may haue it without helpe of the Physition, who hath the only meanes to doe it: he tempteth God, and expects, that hee should performe a miracle, foolishly concerning the naturall course, which God ordained against diseases. Euen as if his house were on fire, and hee will suffer none to quench it with water, saying: If God will that it shall be saved, the fire will be quenched by other means.

Physicke ordained by God, for benefite of the sicke, and healthfull, and that no man should despise it.

CHAP. IX.

Concerning the ingratitude and unkindnes in sicke and diseased persons, towards Physitions.

Ingratitude is most odious both to God & men, and hath iustly bin reputed for so notorious a vice: as he that speaketh of Ingratitude, speaks of all the euills in the world. And this sin is so common amongst men, especially in the case of Physitions; as I am amazed many times, that any generous heart will be a Physition: his profession being euery where subiect to calumny, and coline germane to Ingratitude.

But there are some friends, men of reason, honest and acknowledging, who can yet cleaneely couer this offence: seeming willing in any goodnes towards the profession, and not altogether so vnthankfull as others are. For there are some so compleate in courtesie, as they haue protected publicly, & very often: that (next vnder God) they hold their liues of such & such Physitions. And, hauing acknowledged (according to their faculty) the labor and industry of the Physition; will also confesse freely, that they are vnable to recompense him with all their goodnes, as therein they speak no more then truth. For, if they owe their liues to the Physitions succour, and life is of greatest valew about all their goods: it is not in their power to discharge that debt, though they gaue him all their substance.

But the chiefeft poynt of recompence, is, their thankful protestations to the Physition, saying; they stand obliged to him, and

and are indebted to him for their life. This is even as much, as if a man should snatch a sword out of anothers hand, that stood ready to kill him therewith, or a strangling cord, by which he meant to end his daies. Were it your case, stood you not beholding to that man for your life? And could (all you had) make him sufficient recompence? Some will say, I have well payed my Physitian, yea, over-payd him; I have given him so much every day, I owe him nothing. If he have made me well, I have as well requited him. Alas poore man, that which is given to the Physitian, is a small acknowledgement, for so great a good as thou hast received: for thou payest or recompencest him with the fruit of his own labour: If hee preferred thee from death, (as happily he did, the grace of God assisting) there is no equal recompence in thy power, except thou expose thy life for him, as he made no spare of his for thee. In this manner thou remainest (for ever) indebted, and thus thou confessest truly thy obligation, when (with an intire and vpright heart) thou makest such an acknowledgement to him.

I know there are some, who will thinke these words to be hard, and harsh; when I say, he saved thy life, and preferred thee from death; notwithstanding, it is discerned evidently. But the case, that a man being wounded, loseth his blood in extreme abundance, and doubtlesse dyeth instantly, except the blood be staied: he that puts his finger into the wound, & thereby ceaseth bleeding; is not he worthily said, that hee saveth life? As much, and farre more doth he, that restraynes it by medcins, and so consolidates the wound, as (otherwise) it could not be healed. As much also doth he, that restrayneth a fluxe in the belly, an extreme vomiting, or some other pernicious and deadly vacuities: Or (conveniently) healeth a Pleurisie: Or him, whom the Squinzie hath stuffed and halfe strangled. As much also (questionlesse) doth he, that catcheth a child out of the fire, where he had beene burnt to death, but for such present succour.

No lesse account ought to be made of Physitians, who make prouision against inward euilles, and succour nature secretly by diuers means, the power whereof appeareth by worthy effects; because they are (as Herophilus saith) The hands of God.

For he releueth and draweth from deadly dangers, by the means of apt remedies, which the Physitian vseth in needefull time. Is it not then a worke more diuine then humane, and can no way be sufficiently recompenced? whereof Ecclesiasticus spake very well. The Science of Physicke, and knowledge in the Physitian, shall exalt his head, and make him admirable among Princes: the Physitian shall be honoured of Kings. These are the principall acknowledgements due vnto him, honour and gratitude, as a certaine obligation: and not perswasion, that money can returne him sufficient, or equall recompence.

But there are some, that doe deale farre worse, who, after they haue beene healed, by the means of good and loyall succour: can not endure to betolde, that they are beholding to the Physitian, but growe hatefull against him, that saved their liues. Oh extreme ingratitude! but yet not only in these our dayes: For Hippocrates, in his Epistle to Damagetes, maketh Democritus to speake in this manner. I thinke (saith he) O Hippocrates, that in our Science, many things are subject to obloquie and ingratitude. For sicke persons (if they escape) referre their recovery to the Gods, or else to Fortune, or else to their owne good complexion, robbing the Physitian of all honour: Whome (oftentimes) they hate afterwards, being angry and offended, that woe should thinke them beholding, or indebted to him.

Moreover, they will not attesse or confesse their obligation: but rather are well pleased, that ignorantes in the Arte (who neuertheless liue by the Profession) should be of the same temper, kicking enuiously against him &c.

This suiteth (best of all other) with these our dayes. For, the most part of sicke people now referre theyr recovery wholly, to some he-Saint or the-Saint of Paradise, to whome they vowe and deuote themselves.

And although (many times) they do not performe their vowes; yet can they follow that which the Italian sayd: Passato lo malo gabato lo Santo: The disease being past, the Saint is cheated. Euen (for all the world) as men make great promises to the Physitian; so long as the extremitie of anguish lasteth, professing to giue him mountaines and maruailes; yea, to pay all in Golde and precious Stones, or else, a good pension all his life time.

In briebe, mne's goodnesse is pretended to be doone him; but when the patient cometh to health, then hee is of a quite contrary minde: Eyther, that the Physitian performed not the cure, but that it might haue beene doone without him. Or else, from the solleme vowe he made, came the cause of his recovery, with the good attendance of his Keepers, and diuers comfortable broaths. Or else, from the Apothecarie, to whome hee rather will attribute all the successe, rather then to the Physitian; although the other did nothing but by his direction. Else, hee will attribute it vnto the goodnesse of his owne complexion: or to some casual chauce, by some disorder in him committed and doone: some of these must haue the reference of his healing: So that the Physitian shall surely haue the smallest part, or rather none at all, of the honour, gratitude, kindnesse and recompence.

And as concerning promises, the man being recovered, then he considereth, what charges the sicknesse hath cost him; how long hee hath depended vpon the cure, and what an hinderance it hath bin vnto him. Thus his debt to the Physitian is forgotten, and to him hee imputeth a part of his expences, reputing all superfluous, and keeping his bodie ouer long, hoping hee should haue beene restored much sooner, and with a great deale lesse charges. So that (in his account) the Physitian should be indebted to him: and if hee could finde Iudges answerable to his minde, hauing iudiciall authority; he would haue him condemned in the greatest part of his expences. Here is good acknowledgement of a benefite received; was there euer the like ingratitude?

Surely, I can compare it with none other, then as if a man should strangle himselfe by despayre; or otherwise, and some one coming to succour him, did cut the cord: when the other (maliciously) afterwards, should make him pay for cutting the halter. Or an other man, ready to be drowned in the water; any man endeavouring to saue him, put his own life in perill: (by chance) to be a lapper of his garment; and the drowned man (after) to enforce repayment for his toine garment. So, they which should be payers, doe become demanders; confessing neyther gree nor grace, for all the good seruice performed vnto them: but rather affected, that an ignorant varlet, or some charrre-chamber woman, procured their healthfull recovery, when the care and industrie of the painefull Physitian. And I guesse this to ensue from one of these two reasons; eyther that they are so dull and sottish, as they haue not the capacite of comprehension. Or else, knowing it well enough; they are ashamed and confounded, for not hauing the will to acknowledge and confesse it. Well may I then conclude, as I beganne this Chapter: Ingratitude is most contemptible to God and men.

CHAP. VI.

¶ That the vulgar sort doe account it nothing, if they be not cured or healed contrary to their owne opinion. That the latest applied remedies haue all the honour: And happy is the Physitian that cometh to the declination of the disease.

OVr next ensuing error, is strongly in conjunction with the former, and (oftentimes) is the cause of the sayde Ingratitude. For, if a sicke person be not healed against his owne opinion, or of such as come to visite him; there is nothing at all doone, and therefore they know not how to conceiue of the Physitian.

Now, to heale or recover a man against opinion, consisteth of two partes: One is, to heale in least time, and (as it were) a vnawares. As, if the disease last commonly with so much access, or so many dayes; so cure it in much lesser space. For otherwise, say they: Well fir, the malady hath made his full course, and yet the Physitian hath done little or no seruice at all; as well might it haue beene done within the same time. Poore iudgements, doe yee not beholde, that in one and the same kinde of infirmities, some are short, and others long? There are tertian Feauers or Agues; and of conti-

Two imagined reasons of this base ingratitude to well deficiuies nuance also, which last and hold for a mo-neth or two,, you imagine, that the Tertiani should not exceed (at the most) a feuenth access, which are fourteene daies, and the continuer to consist of feauen, e-leauen, or foureteene, as you haue heard Physitions speake, which is the tearme of exquisite feauers. But you know not, that of a thousand, we shall hardly meete with two such, because the most part are confused and mingled, whereby their tearme is much more lengthened, as in all disca-ses engendered of diuers humours.

You imagine (and it is true) that if the tertian Ague doe end within three weeks, or a month, being well beaten by our remedies: that (but for such encountering) would haue endured two or three mo-neths, as hath bin seene in many others.
Was it not well rebated, and cunningly ouer-lept for the patient? Yet nothing at all is done (saith he) if much more be not performed, then he pretended. For he is of the mind, that a Physitian may handle sicknesse, as men doe Stirrop-leathers, in lengthening or shortening them as they list. The acte is not sufficient to abate or extenuate a quarter, a third part, or the moitie of the paine, and to hinder or appease those diuers accidents, which commonly happen in all kindes of diseases, de-cliuering sound and probable reasons, for the best account that can be possible, and the charges equall to his owne desire.

Yet this is falling into an other part of vulgar opinion, as namely, that all is nothing worth Sir, except yecan heale such as are held for dead. For, admit the sick-nes to be deadly, as all diseases are, which we call eager (that is to say, cutting, goes on swiftly, and is not without terrible accidents) if the patient or his visitants hold opinion, that this great danger may be re-cured, and it prooue to be so: yet still nothing is done. Contrariwise, if the sicke man chance to die, then the Physitian is in all the fault. For, the assistants were persuaded (though the Physitian found the contrarie in his prognosticke rule) that he might be recovered. But if they imagine that a man will dye, or hold him already for dead, then the Physitian beholdeth great wisdom. For, though he doe nothing else, but appoynt Beuonks for him, with some drogues or confectiōs, especially restitutiue and cordiall things

(albeit they are not to any purpose,) yet hath he performed a chiefe piece of work.
Heere is a rare cure; hee hath recovered such a man, giuen ouer for dead: he hath rayed him agayne: Oh, he is a great and worthy man, & pity it is he should want.

The same Doctour, at the very same time, hath another patient, whose sick-nes is not reputed deadly, because the euill lies more closely concealed. He takes very great payns to restore his health, and to compasse his intent, imployeth all his skill and industry for the patients safety:
whom he knoweth to be in greater danger, then all the friends (standing by) doe or can imagine. At the last, he dyeth, quite contrary to their common opinion. Look then vpon Maister Physitian, his reputation is sodainly lost, and then they tell him: That hee meddled with too many matters at once: The other man was much better gouerned. Thus, neuer is any thing doone of value, if it be not performed, against the hope and expectation of the vulgar.

An other error propounded in this Chapter, is, the attribution of the successe in the cure, to the latest administrated remedies: euen as they refferre the occasion of sicknes, to the last hurtfull acte that the party committed. As if a man had fed on some fruit, salad, or other thing lesse ordinary, & (soon after) the party falls sicke, of some disease more then of a months continuance) yet that must be the only cause:
neuer remembering other precedent disorders, which procured the greater part in preparation. For, euill humors will haue a meeting together by little and little, till they come to a certayne quantity, against which nature hath power to resist no longer.
Euen as wee see a Glasse (set in the raine) to fill it selfe by many drops of water, so long as till they come to the brim:
but being full, the least drop then following, makes an ouer-flow. Euen so, the least addition, to that which nature hath already supported, makes hir to sinke vnder the ouer-plus: as a yong Mule, yfed to a common charge: how little fouer is added to her vidual burden, she is (by no meanes) able to beare.

It was not then the last morsell, meate, or disorder, that did the harme, the precedent riots had performed their parts before. Euen as in the felling of a tree, 100.

cuts (giuen with an Axe) appeare to be in-

and eleauenth stroke that ouerthrowes it.
Now, if a man shal say, the last odde blow
did the deede; should hee nor do great wrōg to all the rest? As also, when a strong Tower hath endured 1000. discharges of the canon, and at the last shot of all, it falleth:
Did the last do any more then the first? It is all one in judging of remedies, which abate the harme, and expell sicknesse out of the body. The last application (whatsoeuer it was) may haue the honor by vulgar censure, speaking according to their capacity: but what was the labour and paines performed before, of purging, glysters, drugges of diuers kinds, administrated both within and without, did all these nothing?
In the end, some one thing is added, and then the man is made well. Poore idle opinion, if this last admired acte had bene done at the first, it had serued to no vse at all: but after the hot seruice of so many other remedies, which controuled and disheartened the euill, shaking, and renting it from the root; the least thing in the world could then quite displace it.

Like to poore besieged people, no longer able to hold out, let but a man be slain among them, and they yeelde themselves immediately. Shall it therefore be sayd, that all the battery, all the assaults, cutting them off from vitailles, and other good means for conquering; these serued to no purpose at all? But only he did the deed, that discharged the last Musket; and yet (notwithstanding) he killed but one man:
If he had slaine a chiefe Commander, it had bin a matter of much more moment:
Euen so, a brieffe or ticket, hung about the neck; or drugges tied about the wrist of a man; shall haue the honour of healing Agues, affirming, that they could not be cured by any other applyed good orders, directions, remedies, and great medicines.
This is all one, as if the disease hung but by a twine threed, which may easily be broken by perswasion and opinion, and thereupon the sicke man restored: but if this had bene applyed in the beginning,
the patient could not haue bene cured,
by an hundred times as many perswas-ions, or the very strongest imaginations.
Perswasion & imagination may do som-what in healing, but not all, nor alone of themselves. Thus you see, how true and certaine remedies, are robbed of their due honour, by judging ill of the successe, because men would be cured suddenly, before any thing at all is done to effect it: othe-wise, all indeuor else is but in vaine, & serueth to no purpose. He only is the author of the happines, after whom (immediatly)

a man findes himselfe to be recovered.

And because it is commonly said (which is the fourth poynt of this Chapter) Happiness is the Physitian, that comes to the declination of the disease; we must imagine, that what fouuer was done before, health stoued at the doore, tarrying but for his entrance, & healths introduction is attributed to him.
And although that Physitian shall do nothing at all, nor appoint or giue direction;
yet (say the people) he is the cause of the happines: and if he had bin sent for at the beginning, the sicke man had sooner bin set on foot. But if the Physitian be wife & honest, he will not be bonneted with this honor, consenting to thieftish larceny and detraction; against them that well entreated the patient, & (vnder God) were truly the Authors of his restoring: Rather he will reforme those poore opinionists, by shewing them, that the accidents formerly past, were of the nature of the sicknes, which hath had such a course; and that (by good directions already administrated) all succeeded well, and to the advantage of the patient.

If he doe otherwise, and attribute that honor to himselfe, or accept it from their vulgar ignorance, he commits a shamefull wrong, and the like Jewell may after wards hang at his owne care. For, of what sufficiency or reputation souer he be, it may so come to passe, that another Physitian shall be called, vpon the ending of some cure by him taken in hand at the first, and he may requite him in the same kinde. E-uery man therefore ought to be well advised, and honestly content himselfe, with such honor as is due vnto him; not robbing his colleague or fellow-labourer in painfull endeauours, yeelding good and faithfull testimony, of each others laudable performed actions. Accounting himselfe happy (neuertheless) that he came to the declination of the disease; where, taking no more paines, yet he shared a part in the grateful acceptance, due vnto them that were employed from the first beginning.

CHAP. XL.

Against such as censure and iudge of Physitions sufficiency, by their success: which oftentimes is more due to a happy chance, then skill or knowledge.

Badly can a blinde man iudge of colours, no more can a foole of Physicke.

IT is a great matter, that the Science of Physicke should be so obscure & profound, as nothing more: and yet notwithstanding, there is not any so foolish but will take on him to censure the knowledge of a Physition. To iudge soundly & iustly, concerning the sufficiency of anie man: it behoueth him (at the least) to be of the same profession, and to know something therein too. It must needs then be great rashnesse, for men that vnderstand nothing in Physicke, to enterprize to iudge, who are the best and most skillfull Physitions. Their eye and censure waites on the successe of their practise: & if from one heale (by chance, or fadainely, as we said before:) he is censured for a singular Physition, although he did not any thing deferring speech. On the contrarye, the Physition little knowes, whether the patient shall die, or linger long in the agonie; which the vulgar esteeme lightest of all. Modesty will neuer say, such a mā is more or lesse skillfull, if he be reputed learned among men of knowledge: but will rather say he is not happy among sicke men, and consequently, no great Physition; euer more censuring by the successe.

Good and ill hap awaiteth vpon the actions of all men, and consequently vpon Physitions.

It is vndoubtedly true, that in all things there is a happinesse and unhappinesse, & (as the Italian saith) La buona e la male sorte, Good fortune and bad. And the best happinesse for the Physition is, not to be called or employed, for such as are certain to die. For, there is no reputation to bee had, no, not in respect of friendship; neuertheless, he shal be sure not to escape blame, although he hath done his very vttermost endeavour, and ought to bee no lesse esteemed, then if the patient had escaped. Euen as we may say of a Captain, that shall defend a Town to the very latest Effort and labour, hauing eaten vp all the horses, Asses, Dogs, Cats, Rats, which the besieged place could afford, hides, parch-

ments, and other vile foodes (as is sayde of them of Sanferre, in the yeare 1573. who fed vpon the very tiles and flates, making bread of them, as I know not how.) Hauing lost the most part of his men, the wall battered, and no meanes whereby to resist any longer; constrainedly (in the end) renders vp the Towne. Shall hee deferre lesse commendation (nay rather not farre more) then he that faued his own towne, being well munitioned and provided of all things needfull, which he preferred without any paine, & very easily might do so?

If this case should bee controuerfed, it were easie to be decided; provided, that the censurer be a man of iudgement, and not transported with affection; as the most part of men are, in being wilfully blinded. Wherevpon ensteth, that they will not bee perfwaded, but that there must bee a fault in the Physition, if the patient (of whom he is most carefull and diligent) amend not as they desire and hope. Nor doth this case differ from the Captaines, that was the Gouernor of the lost Town, against whom remaineth continuall rancour and discontentment; because he did not sufficiently foresee the sieges affaires; but thus is all his paines baffulde in particularities of opinions, euen to the valere of a straw. Whereas contrarywise, he shal bee accounted for a valiant man (although hee bee the basest villaine in the world) if hee haue but good successe in his enterprizes.

Assuredly, it is no meane matter, for a man to bee happie in his attempts; but this happinesse dependeth not vpon his knowledge or sufficiency, because it is an especiall gift of God; without which, he may be called to succour such as shal escape, continuing and effectuating the vertues giuen to remedies; as also, in not being called to such as shall dye, to whome the greatest paines and skill profiteth nothing. It is then verie ill done, to censure the sufficiency of a Physition by successe, which is more due to happinesse, and to the grace of God, then to all the knowledge that can be in man.

And yet wee may not from hence inferre, or conclude, that it is all one, whatsoever Physition is called, to say; If God will that the sicke man shall recouer, hee will bestow his blessing on the remedies, if they bee ministred by the most ignorant man in the world, and they shall prooue happy. It is very true, but yet it is to tempt God, as we haue formerly alleaded. As if we would haue him, that of stones, he should make bread; and, of a remedie to no purpose, make it profitable. It is a common saying: Helpe thou, and God will assist thee. Let all the best meanes bee sought that may be vsed, and referre the issue to God, in whose hands are all things.

CHAP. VIII.

Against such men, to whom all things are suspected, and Physitions slandered, in the most part of those accidents, which happen in diseases.

A heavy burden to the very best Physition.

Accusations vpon the patients weakness, and imputed to the Physitions error.

For such as despise all good meanes ordained for their health.

Impuration led vpon diseases, by ignorance of such as are sicke censurers.

ONe of the very great paines, which a Physition (beeing the most generous, and of the best spirit) hath, is, to support the reproaches, and false accusations of the sicke person, or of his assistant friends, who are so vnreasonable; that all the accidents which do happen in sickenesse, they attribute them to the remedies; and those of good successe, they doubt whether they are due to the Physition, or no.

For first of all, when they see the person very weak, they accuse the abstinence and paucitie of food, appointed to him by the Physition: or else letting him bloud, or the purgation, and that they are the causes of the weakness; imputing no vertue to the remedies, which (in diminishing the euill and bad humours) sustained the sicke body in farre greater strength; for, but by the vse of them, his estate would be a great deale weaker. That this must needs be so, do we not see some, who, condemning abstinence, bloudletting and purgatiues, become in farre more feeble condition? If they that make no vse of such remedies, maintaine themselves in greater strength then other; one then might better say, that the remedies are the occasion of weakness; but on the contrary, we behold those despiters to be more feeble, and (in the end) to die sooner then the other.

So is it of the other accidents, imputed vniuittly to the remedies; as vomiting, flux of the belly, distaste of meates, alteration, paine, want of sleepe or watching, raving and such like, happening by reason of the disease properly, & from the nature thereof: but not from applied remedies as ignorant people suppose. For, if after the patient hath taken something, by ordination of the Physition, or onely some matter is applied vnto him, and then (quickly after) he hath a casting, or fluxe in the belly: this was the cause, by reason he did it not before. After such a medicine received, this Syrope, that Restauratiue; this Cordiall potion is so distastefull, as nothing can be more, alteration hath made the impresseure far greater then before.

It is true, that these occurrences happen after, but not thereby caused. And is it not as ill argued, if a man should say: Since it snowed, my cloake grew more warme then it was before; therefore the snow was the cause thereof. Or otherwise? Since I fed on that Capon, I haue had the head-ach, the Collicke, or fluxe in the belly; therefore the Capon caused all these accidents. Sillic capacities, whatsoever commeth after, proceeds not from all that which hath preceded. The fluxe in the belly, the casting, distasting, alteration, lacke of sleepe, raving, and the like other causes (to you vnknowne) which produce such effects in their due time was, as the learned Physition knew how to direct the medicine, by breaking the course of the disease, foreseeing the dangerous accidents, and diminishing them. All which notwithstanding, in despite of what hee hath doone; the sickenesse will make his part good against him, and encrease it selfe to a certain point commonly called, the estate of the disease: but that may grow on more gently, then is to be permitted.

And if alteration, distaste, and other accidents doe encrease, after the vse of some medicaments well appointed: beleue assuredly, that they are from the diseases further progression, notwithstanding all the re-trenchings and resistances formerly made. Credite also, that the sickenesse would haue bene more furious, and the aforementioned accidents lesse supportable, if no meanes had bene made against them: as wee see by good experience, in such as mis-prise those remedies. For if it be true, that many do die through want of helpe (which is a Maxime receyued generally) it must needs fall out then;

that they haue had more accidēt, & more tediousnes, then such as escape in the like perils. There is no need then of suspicēting, or calumniating the remedies, which haue bin followed by some accidents, olde or new, and then to say: This frontall (after the vse of it) he hath left lesse, or rauced more; for the frontall was no cause thereof, but the sickenes it selfe, that could not by the best meanes then be tamed.

Faults are easily found, but few good reasons can be shewne for them.

Next, after the Cordiall potion, he had the hiccok, the disenterie, or the cramp. It is very true: but this taile belongs not to this Calse, as we say in the common Proverb, this is another manner of straine. I deny not, but remedies may be shrewd occasions sometimes, for they may be ill ordered, and but badly to the purpose. But I euer presume, that the Physition should be learned, diligent and affectionate: of all which he should continually relish, for the better interpretation of his ordināces, and receiuing them in the more respect; attributing rather to the disease, or the expresse will of God, those accidents which happen (be they new or olde) then to the remedies. For there are diuers sodaine encounters, and which cannot any way be foreseen, to make a garde or preuention of them: as sometimes of a very light medicine, we shall proceed so far as blood, because the patient was then vpon the poynt, of hauing the fluxe in his belly.

The Physition, who can not diuine, especially on a neutrall body, neither sicke nor sound, that keeps not in bed, because he would be no sicker then he listeth: if nature make some euacuation of it selfe; hee (knowing it needfull) makes his medicine light enough. It hapneth hereupon, that after the operation, nature passeth on further, and makes a flux in the belly, which continueth inordinately: because the expulserix vertue, being pricked by the eagre and mordant excrements, cannot of her selfe restrain them. And the matter being corrosiue, cuts out the way as it passes along, that blood ensueth of it. The medicine must endure the accusation of all this, which (notwithstanding) gaue but two or three small sieges: all the rest was but a surrounding, & as a meere torrent of humours, gathered together of longer time. As sometime it comes to passe, that a man pulling but one stone out of a wall; a fadome or two follows after, because it was so old and ruinous. Against a strong wall, there needs a Cannon or double cannon; but for a weak and feeble wall, a field-piece there will make a great breach.

And also, to iudge well of the effects of medicines; their true condition & estate must first be knowne, which none can so well do as the Physition, and not to iudge only by the effects. For, if during the operation, or soone after, we see that happen, which is not of that nature, caried or forced from the medicine; it is not to be attributed thereunto. No more then as if a child, should giue a blow with his fist to a drunken reeling man, and hee should sodainely fall to the ground. It was not the stroke of the hand, that had such strength; but the wine or strong drinke which had overcome him, whereby the fall happened to him.

Neuertheless, some one may reply by the selfesame comparison, that in like manner, to a sicke man (very weak) a light medicine being giuen, it hath the power to ouerthrow him to the ground. Then may we well couple therewith this other comparison: If a man should giue a fillop on the arme, to a woman being great with child, immediately after she should miscarry. Hapned this by the fillop? The arme is far enough from the belly, & the fillop too light to enforce it: It is to be vnderstood then, that from some other inward occasion, this so sodaine mis-hap receiued such vigour. Euen so, many other things doe meet together of themselves, not any way depending one vpon another; but casuall & accidentally, & the causes (commonly) neuer preceded, or by any means discerned.

The quality & condition of remedies must be knowne rather then their effects.

Comparisons that hold no true correspondence with the rules of physick.

Many are medlers in giuing counsell but few or none can giue right directions.

A pretty question mooued by the Noble Duke of Ferrara.

CHAP. IX.

¶ That there are more store and plentie of Physitions, then of any other sort of people.

Finde recorded, that Alphonso de Este, Duke of Ferrara, being on a time in familiar conference, demanded; of what trade or profession there was most people. One answered, of Cordwainers or Shoemakers; another saide, of Tailers; another, of Carpenters; another, of Mariners; and another, of Lawyers. Gonello, a famous Buffone, Chap. 12. Of suspitious Detractions.

Buffone or Iester, replied, that there were more store of Physitions, then of any other kinde of people: and waged agaynst the Duke his master (who was far off from any such conceite) that he would approue his wordes, within the compasse of foure and twenty houres.

On the morrow morning, Gonello went from his lodging, with a great Night-cap on his head, and a Kerchiefe binding vpon his chin, and then a huge hatte covering them all, beside a warme cloake about his body. In this furnishment, hee tooke the way towards the Pallace of his Excellencie, along the streete called La rue des Angers. The first man he met withall, demanded of him, what he ayled? Where to hee answered, that he had an outrageous pain in his teeth. O my good friend (sayde the other) I know the best receipt in the world for it, telling him the matter & the means. Gonello wrote downe his name in his Tables, making shew, as if he had set downe the receipt. Not two paces further had he gone, but hee found two or three talking together: who demanding of him the same question; each man declared to him a seuerall remedy; he writing downe their names, as hee did the first.

As he held on his way along the same street, going a soft and gentle pace, euerie man he met withall, still gaue him counsell for seuerall receipts, and no one agreeing with another; yet still each friend assured him, that (what he spake off) had bin approued certaine and infallible; and still he wrote downe euery mans name. Being come to the low Bulwarke of the Pallace; hee was round engirt with many people there attending; because he was most familiarly knowne to them all; and euerie man ptyring to see him thus distressed, (vnderstanding the reason of his pain) aduised him to many receiptes, which each man auouched to be the verie best in the World: he writing downe their Names, gaue them infinite thanks at his departing.

Being entred into the Dukes chamber, his Excellencie no sooner sawe him, but running to him, saide: How now Gonello, what aylest thou? In pittifull manner hee replied (euen as if he had bene scarce able to speake:) Ah my Lord, I haue the tooth-ache, in the most cruell manner that euer man had. Whereupon, his Excellencie saide vnto him; Alas poore Gonello, I know a thing that will helpe thy paine presently, yea, if thy teeth were spoiled and rotten: Maister Antonio Musfa Brassuolo, my Physition, neuer found a better in all his practise; take it, and it will immediately helpe thee. Sodainely, Gonello threw off all his sickely outside, saying out aloud: How now my Lord, what are you become a Physition too? See heere my roll of Physitions, how many I haue met withall, betweene mine owne Lodging, and your Court: they are in number almost two hundred, and yet I haue past through but one streete only. I will gage as much more to my wagger, to finde about ten thousand in this Cittie, if I should but go thorow it, as I haue done this one streete: finde you out as many more my Lord, of some other profession.

A history well met withall to our purpose, and verie true; for, euery man will be a Physition for one thing or other, and there are very few people, but they pretend to knowe enough, may more then some Physitions do. I fet aside some Chirurgions, Barbers, Apothecaries, Nursses, or attendants vpon sicke persons, wife women, Mountebanks, and other Empiricks, euen to very Merchants, who, to make some profession of a part of Physick become meere Polypragmons; pretending to vnderstand more then Maister Menuche, making great outward shewes, and meddling with many diseases, accompanied with shamelesse assurances, and no meane promises. I would leaue them, but that they are such a goodly number, and daily they encrease by multitudes, out of the basest mechanical trades; as it is most lamentable to behold, and many liues perishe by their meanes.

There are diuers of them, that will controule the directions of a Physition, presuming to handle the patients pulse, and obserue his Vrine. Deliuering their own aduices, quite contrary to that which the Physition appointed. If there be any, who are better aduised heerein; I thinke the number of them to be so small, as a man had much rather write of those presumptuous companions, making vp a role of so many vnder takers, as (indeed) they would appeare to be infinite. Some of the are so bold and impudent, as before the learned Physition (yea, euen in his presence)

In brieſe, the great controller, euen the prime and cheefeſt Iudge of all, is, the ignorant vulgar, moſt vniuſt and vniindifferent, who (as Terence ſaide) Thinke nothing to be well done, but what they do themſelues. And if their aduiſe be not followed, it is attributed to the Patients death, or to the prolonging of his ſickneſſe, if that ſome other courſe is not taken. Let the but imagine, and the Patient bee perſwaded (by them) that it muſt be ſo; all other proceeding is abſolutely erroneous, and things elſe is blamed, be they applied to the true purpoſe indeede. Is not this a miſerable caſe? In other Arts, which are leſſe obſcure and difficult, and all things (well-neere) apparant to euery eye; the Artizan is permitted to follow his owne mind. In Phyſicke, the moſt ſecre and hidden of all, and wherein the people cannot diſcerne a jot; euery man will domineer, like Rats in ſtraw. CHAP. XIII.

That it is not for the ſicke Patients profite, to haue many Phyſitions, as in ordinarie: but one Phyſition ſufficieth, being aſſiduaſe and ſkilfull.

His propoſition may be vnderſtood, by what we haue lately ſaide, touching vulgar eſtimation of Phyſitions: but I would not be miſtaken, becauſe my meaning here properly is; of ſuch as are truly Phyſitions, in ſkill, knowledge, and profeſſion. It is verily reaſonable and neceſſary, that the aduiſe of many ſhould bee had, in difficulties, and matters doubtfull concerning a ſickneſſe. For (as the common ſaying is) Four eyes may ſee more then two; that is, ſuppoſing them all to ſee clearly; for, one may aduiſe one thing, and a contrary party another; whereby, their meeting and agreement, is to the profit of the patient. But to haue many Phyſitions, in ordinary (as it were) and all to haue equal care of the ſicke perſon; can no way bee for his good and profit. For, in euery purpoſe, they may contradict one another in ſome thing, or elſe about a matter indifferent, one in enuy of another, and more for oſtentation then neceſſity.

Pliny did very well obſerue and note this writing thus. It needs not to be doubted, that Phyſitions (conſeuting reputation by ſome novelty) make a ſodaine Traffick of our ſouls. Hence enſueeth thoſe miſerable contentions, about ſicke bodies; none of them being of one and the ſame opinion, becauſe no repetition muſt be made. Thence came that ſuperſcription on the vnhappy Tombe: I was ſpoiled by hauing too many Phyſitions. Meaning thereby the Emperor Adrian, who (in dying) cryed out: That the multitude of Phyſitions had killd him.

The reaſon of this miſcheefe is diuers waies vnderſtood. As firſt, the enuy or iealouſie, which (commonly) one man beareth to another; eſpecially ſuch, as are the worſt created, ambitious, and couetous, beyond the ordinary courſe of other Artcemen. For, it is vſually ſcene: That one Potter is enuious at another, according to the ancient Adage. But much more (without compariſon) the Phyſition, becauſe he deſireth, that the whole honour ſhould be referred to him, of well predicting, well ordering, and well finiſhing the diſeaſe. Wherefore, hee cannot willingly endure, that any other ſhould ſhare a part with them. I ſpeak of the couetous ambitious man: who is likewiſe (commonly) quarrellous, a detractor, and inſupportable.

You haue ſome men very modeſt, but yet iealous of the honor, which they conceiue is due to them; chiefly, in ſuch occaſions, which they thinke may be done by themſelues, as being caſes light, common, and ordinarie. They can bee well contented, not to be contradicted; & yet notwithstanding, they will giue conſent, and yeelde to the deſire or pleaſure of the Patient, or thoſe friends that are about him. But this is not for the ſicke parties profite, as I haue vnderſtanden to proue. For, although there be three or foure Phyſitions, one aſſiſting to another for cure of the man, being all modeſt, peacefull, and ſkilfull: yet notwithstanding, wee knowe not how to preuent and auoide, the moſt part of ſuch inconueniences as I will ſette downe, and are (oſentimes) ordinary. For I leaue to them, who haue obſerued it by others, to iudge, how much this manner of proceeding is incommodious, and hurtfull to poore patients.

Firſt, if there be but one or two Phyſitions ordinarily employed: they will (no doubt) be moſt carefull, moſt diligent, moſt affectionate, to come off with their credit and honour. And yet one man alone, who ſhall haue the charge layde on his ſhoulders, may be there much more attentiuely, becauſe the truſt is wholly reposed in him, and all the worth muſt redound to him. If that man haue a good heart, he will ſtudie and labor, to do much better, then if he were conſorted with another; conſidering euery man (as he ought to do) that in all difficulties he may quickly haue counſell.

Another diſcommodity is; that manie Phyſitions can hardly meete together, to viſit the ſicke patient, and all, as one boyr. For each of them haue other cures of viſitation, beſide ſome hapning in the meane while, and other affaires of importance: whereby, men are oftentimes compelled, to faile of the appointed time, that all cannot be preſent with the ſicke perſon. In this caſe, the Phyſition moſt vſed, or ſuch as meete there, are greatly hindered in giuing their aduiſe, or for ordering againſt ſome occaſion which may happen; fearing leaſt the abſent parties or parties, ſhall not allow their iudgement; whereupon, it may breed an error in the patient, or his aſſiſting friends, who will after knowe his opinion, and demand it alone by himſelfe. Some time, this may chance but about a Cherry, or a difference of ſmall moment, deſeruing (of it ſelfe) not to be ſpoken of; but yet al muſt agree together, and giue conſent in the caſe. This keeps the attending Phyſitions in no meane af-ſiſtion, and many times the patient in much more.

In like manner (comming now vnto a third point) they may endure many ſmall things, which the ordinary and preſent Phyſition would order otherwiſe, following ſuch occaſions as preſent themſelues at euery moment. I do call them ſmall of themſelues, yet often might bee brought to the patients great benefit; but hee dare not apply them, dreading diſcontentment in them which are abſent. Hereby the patient may paſſe thorow diuers afflictions (from which hee might haue bene freed) as, during too much drought, or being kept ouer-hot, or too much preſſed with ſoode and Medicines, or prohibited of ſome pleaſure and recreation, no way preiudiciall to his healing, and ſuch like. I hold my ſelfe ſatiſfied, in ſetting downe theſe three inconueniences, which are ordinary in the plurality of Phyſitions, to ſhew and approue, that it is much better (without compariſon) to haue but one Phyſition; provided, that he be aſſiduaſe and carefull.

It is the greateſt happineſſe for the ſick man (that can be) to haue but one Phyſition, that goeth not away from him. For, by viſiting him once or twice in a day, the patient cannot bee well cured: this may be called healing in groſſe, and not exactly. For the preſent Phyſition, obſerueth many particularities, which cauſeth him to change opinion euery houre; as well of his nourishment, as in other Remedies. Wherefore Celſus ſaide very well, where he ſheweth, what diligence a Phyſition ought to vſe, in well directing the patients ſoode, for due houres, and meaſure of them, becauſe it is one of the cheefeſt points in the whole cure. For (as hee writeth) Foodes fitted to purpoſe, is a moſt ſingular Medicine and remedy: it ought alwayes to be obſerued, and generally, that the attending Phyſition do continually reſpect the Patients ſtrength: When it ſhall be good & able, to uſe abſtinenſe; and when hee begins to doubt his weakeneſſe, then to make ſupply of food. For it is his duty, that he ſurcharge not the ſick body with ſuperfluous matter; neither to let it be too ſeuerely, by famine, or ſtarving, &c. Hereby may eaſily bee vnderſtood, that many (together) cannot be cured by one Phyſition: & that he (if hee vnderſtand truly his Art) is moſt proper, that neuer par- teeth from the sicke person. But such as are addicted to gaine, because much is to be had by a multitude of people: they willingly embrace those Rules, which require no such great curiety, as in this case. For it is verie easie, to account daies, and houres, and other times of access, especially in such, as use not often to see their patients. But it behooueth him to be attendant, that must haue a care of all needfull things, and when the patient shall bee once feeble, so see that hee haue good nourishment.

The great importance of the sick mans seruice.

Heereby you may perceiue, how important the sicke mans seruice is, that he must alwayes be assisted by a good Physitian, both for his gouernement, and also for the vse of remedies. For, by being present, hee may aduance or tardie, encrease or diminish, and doe many things in other manner, then when the sick-man is scene but by starts and leysures, as is too much practised vpon the people. Wherefore, it is best to haue but one Physitian, though he be of the lesse sufficiency or reputation (and consequently of lesse pretiure, so that he be honest, most frequent, and diligent. For diligence, vigilancy, & careful obseruation in the ordinary Physitian; may counterpoize one of greater knowledge, that is not halfe so much employed.

CHAP. XV.

Against such as complaine on the over-short visitation of some Physitions.

Vr life is full of contrarieties, according as Democritus declared to Hippocrates, in the conference which they had together: as Hippocrates writeth to Damocritus in his Epistles. For, that which pleaseth vs now, will discontent vs within an houre. The labourer would be a souldier, and (in short time) fall to his former condition againe. The Merchant would be made a Gentleman, and (soone after) returne to his Merchandize againe. But contradiction is yet more palpably discovered, when wee see contradictionarie quality in one and the same thing. As, to be a souldier, and yet not engaged to follow war, to be a great landed man, and yet not subiect to suites in law; to haue Varettes and Drabs in the house, and yet to be free from robbings to liue dissolutely, and neuer to be sicke. So is it in many, who would haue Physitions of greatest following, and most reported of for practise, (of whom the vulgar giue great iudgement, as they are men of singular knowledge, as oftentimes it so falls out, though not alwayes.) And sodainely they make complaint, of their too short or seldome visitation, and that they come not (so often as they ought) to see them.

This is a complaint commonly made of our Parisian Physitions, being the most famous, who in so great a Citie, haue ordinarily such plenty of patients, as it is vterly impossible, that they should stay long with any one of them. For, if a Physitian haue twentie patients to visite in a day, is it not much, if hee abide with each one a quarter of an houre at a time? For, in the longest day, which may consist of xvi. houres, I would haue him begin to visite at five of the clock in the morning, and so continue vntill ten: then begin againe at noon, and hold on till five in the euening, heere are ten houres employed in visitation. It is verie necessary, that hee should haue some time of rest, as from tenne to twelue for his dinner, & refreshing from five to seauen in the same euening, and then to sleepe in quiet: for if he cease not day nor night, it is not possible for him to haue long continuance.

I will yet allow six houres for the morning, and six more after dinner. For, to go from one house to another, to mount and descend againe all the staires, importeth wel the space of two houres, in visiting of twentie seuerall persons. For no man whatsoever, can ride in poste quite thorough a Citie, and then in the Sommer, when the dayes bee long, the swiftnesse of motion is very dangerous, by over-heating, sweating, alteration of body, and other such like accidents. There remaineth then ten houres wholly cleere, that the Physitian may bee by each sicke mans bedde, and that is the most for such employment: And howe much time is heere allowed then to each of the twenty? If I could account well, there were (for euery one) a quarter of an houre in the morning, and as much againe after dinner.

But very certaine it is, that the most famous Physitions, haue to visite (som such dayes) about thirty patients; and besides that, to vse consultations, where a man is constrained to stay longer then a simple visiting. Whence ensueth necessitie, yea, and inuitably, that each of the other visitations, cannot bee halfe a quarter of an houre. For, hee must content euery man, and he that imparts himselfe among so many, must needs allow euery one a little. Thus the Physitian, doth but enter and depart, and (cursorily) informeth himselfe of the patients estate; feelles his pulse, obserues his vrine, speaketh a word of that which is to be done, and then away to another.

He is not iustly to bee blamed, for his celerity and summarie visitation, seeing it is not possible for him to doe otherwise; and they that call such men to their cure, are not well informed. Nay more, if the Physitian answer sometime, that hee can haue no leysure, considering the great number of patients he is to attend: some one or other will reply, O good Sir, if you do but wake to a doores, and then depart; the sicke man will thinke, that he shall bee healed by your verie sight only: if you would but once in a day see him, as you passe along, hee were well satisfied. As much saith another, yea, three or foure: What shall we say to such a man?

But some one will answer mee: He ought to haue regard of the persons quality, and make longer stay with a great Lord, Bishoppe, Abbot, Earle, Baron, President, Councillor, Treasurer, General of the Finances, and other men of Honour, who haue wherewithall to acknowledge and recompence him better, then ordinarily other men doe or can. I heare one make reply, that he ought to do his duty towards all men, and to acquite himselfe faithfully of his Charge. Beside, that (by some) he is to be much more commended; as his parents, neere Kindred, Friends, Familiars, and some to whom he standeth in high degree obliged. Such persons indeed (according vnto humane sense and iudgement) ought to be preferred before the other, what ranke or degree fouer they hold. And such, of whom no money is to be taken, in regarde of the fore-named obligation; do iustly require of the Physitian, much more care and diligence, then they from whom hee may expect recompence. And therefore, it is no small matter, to haue a learned & wise Physitian obliged and affected vnto anie one, who will alwayes make more regard of friendship, then of greatnesse.

And although the most part of our greatest personnes, haue no other knowledge of the Physitian, but by his Fame onely, and are much lesse knowne to the Physitian; yet such knowledge being not reciprocal, and having no familiaritie, friendship, nor mutual Obligation; the Physitian is no more proper to them, then any other beside of the same profession, who hauing fewer crowds following the, may (happily) as soone minister succour, and giue more respect. But passion is so prevalent in these our dayes, as none must bee had, but hee that is in most request; and euery man would very willingly haue him, which properly is no way possible, and yet they complaine of his slack attendance too.

If a man say, I am none of the meanest persons, and I haue wherewithall to pay him, as well as another: you shall haue an hundred to speake the same Wordes: What shall the Physitian then doe? But diuide his visitations into so many pieces, as euery one may haue a little. But euer more let him referue the longest, for such to whom hee is most obliged, and standeth engaged; as reason and humanitie commandeth him.

Wherefore, it were much better (in my minde) that men heerein would take more aduise, and to desire which they may haue: that is, a Physitian easier to bee had, among them that are accounted learned and expert, and yet haue not such busie employment; because their season is not as yet come, being post-pozed to others, that haue more name, and longer time. And if there bee any difficultie in the disease, it may as iudiciously bee consulted on, as they that bragge most, and performe least. Beleue it vndoubtedly, that if the Physitian be an able man, he can soone vnderstand, and hath fewest words, which he had rather should appeare by proofe, then waste the time in vaine lip-labour.

This is the best aduice that a sicke patient

Great men are guided by the fame of Physitions.

tient can take, of what quality focuer hee be, for his soonest helpe and succor. And if this meanes be such, as to haue the Physition full with him, or that hee goe but little from him: it will be much the better for him, imitating what hath bin discoursed in the precedent Chapter.

CHAP. XVI.

How much it importeth, that the sicke patient should repose confidence in his Physition.

The Authors clearing himselfe concerning the former chapter.

SOME may mis-vnderstand, that which I haue serdown in the neighboring Chapter; as if I reprehended the affection which many haue to be visited by the most famous Physitions, and who (for their great reputation) haue most access in the best Cities. God forbid, I should therein do wrong to very venerable and rare persons, who (by their merit) haue acquired such renowne: And I should also offer iniurie to the sick if I perswaded them from affection, and recourse to the healers of their harmes. For, on the contrary, if men may ioy plainly, and so much as neede requireth; none in the Worlde may better doe it than they.

He taxeth nothing but vulgar complaints only.

I take onely vulgar complaint, and in such as (to their owne shame) are discontented, because they cannot enioy what they would haue. I alwaies maintaine, that they are onely the meekest men, in regard of themselves, and for their respect. Onely this is my desire, that men of such fame and reputation, remaining alwaies in so great request: should also be most skillfull and expert, happy in their practises, and conformable to their patients. For otherwise, their high failes will strike, and their reputation (badly grounded) will flie vp in smoke.

In commendation of the renowned generally by the world.

But for the choise men themselves, they are verie meeke, apt, and correspondent, to cure the greatest diseases, and in the worthiest personages: in which respect, they holde reputation, and the cheefest ranke among Physitions, onely for happinesse in their cures. Because opinion conceived of them, giues certaine confidence to the sicke man, to bee recovered better, and more securely by their means, then any other whatsoever. Whereupon, we commonly say in our schooles, Hee healeth most diseases, in whom most confidence is reposed. And this proceedeth from strong imagination, which hath mightie power, to make impression in vs; as I sufficiently haue shewne, in the Preface to my 2. booke of Laughter.

Confidence in the patient is halfe a halp to the Physion.

It is a power of the soule, which strongly moueth the blood and spirits, in such a strange manner; that if the walke along (hand in hand) with firme opinion and confidence, the very powers of Nature assemble, to fight against the sicknes. And thereupon, great changes are noted in the Patient, onely at the very presence of a Physition devoutly attending. For, desire and hope being satisfied, the soule releaseth it selfe, and re-enforceth against the sicknesse. So that (verie often) Nature maketh some braue fall and effort; chasing the matter of offence impetuouslie, by a Crisis as we vse to call it, which is the consist of Nature and Sicknesse. Contrariwise, if the Physition be not verie answerable in liking to the patient, perceiving him not so succourable, as hee desireth or would haue: such a Physition shal neuer proceed successfully, and the sicke man (contrifing and discouraging) will become much more feeble then euer hee was. For his spirit is being danted, they haue no vigour at all; onely by the feare and distrust which hath before seized vpon his heart.

The power of Desire and hope on their satisfaction.

An vnpleasing Physition can do no good to his patient.

There is another benefite, which returneth to the patient, by hauing a Physition at his owne deuotion, and according to his wish and liking; because from him hee hopeth to haue great comfort. For, hee willingly apareth and accommodateth him selfe, to whatsoever he ordaineth for him; with a chearefull confidence, that all this will surely helpe and heale him. As on the contrarie, what hee receiueth (from another Physition) all is in mislike & disdain, whereby, nothing can be profitable vnto him. For, although it were the best, and most delicate thing in the world, if hee haue not a good opinion of it; the stomach falls to a loathing, and neuer can it come so gladfome to his heart, as when he takes it with a chearefull disposition. CHAP. XVII.

Of such as will haue Physitions, and yet desire to do as they appoint and direct them.

NOT long since, I met at Narbona with a Gentleman of France, who was Ambassador to the Seignery, and he talking purposely concerning

The Negatives of Physitions better credited then their affirmatives.

Physitions, pleasantly said: That he would beleeue them well in their Negatives, but not in their affirmatives. This was a good old man, gallant and pleasantly disposed, who came from Spaine, having accomplished the teatime of his legation with King Phillip. Hee thus interpreted Negatives prohibited by Physitions: As not to drink Wine, nor cate fruit, nor to feede on windie meates, and such like. And their affirmatives were, to take medicines, glister, leleppes, and other things by them appointed. Was not this a goodly proposition, which many put in practise, to their extreme harme. For, they are willing to haue Physitions: but go looke for such as shal do as they direct them. Hardly will they keepe within the boundes of this Feminar, who (at least) would abstaine from what he was forbidden: but the most part of patients now a dayes, do quite contrary. What aualeth it to haue a Physition, if a man bee resolu'd, not to execute and accomplish his counsell, for the defence of his owne life?

The Physition may be kindly welcome, but his counsell nothing respected.

Some will answer, that the presence of the Physition comforteth, delighteth, and increaseth courage; whereby they feeble the infirmity to diminish, & their strength to augment. Another saith, I will doe something that the Physition doth aduise mee, at least of foode and gouernment; but of his Drugges I will not heare him speake.

Friuous answers in denying the Physitions counsell.

We'll may wee compare this case, vnto people besiedged in a Towne or Cittie; calling some good and expert Capitaine for Commander, for their succour and defence. Hee being come to them, they will not obey him, nor accomplis any of his

Partridge, are most excellent nourishments, delicate, and dainty: but if a man take them frowningly, with an ill opinion of the Butlers bringing them, or that the Cookes dressing them is not agreeable; all will doe no good, the stomach being directly opposit vnto them. What will he thinke then of things, which (are of themselves) very vnpleasing, and sickness abhorreth naturally, as medicines & other drugges?

Many afflictions happen to the patient if he bee not confident in his Physition.

It followeth moreouer, that the patient will endure many annoyances, wherein he shal be greatly impatient to his owne prejudice: if he haue not a good opinion of his Physition, and be confident in him. For, hee may approue him to bee such a man, as the credite of any other could neuer perswade him. Therefore, it is not in vaine, that poore sicke men should desire such as holde great reputation, and of whom (commonly) passeth good opinion; for such haue the best efficacy in their proceedings and directions. But yet they are not so much to bee affected, as no respect at all should be vsed of other: whereof choise also may bee made at a second or third time of occasion, and they then must needs bee vsed, for want of the former. When any such man happens to be called: the patient must likewise repose his trust, confidence, and affection in him, without desiring any other; relying onely vpon God, who giueth vertue to remedies, at his owne good will and pleasure.

Marriage vsed as a comparison with the present argument.

For, in marriage, Maids couet to match in great houses; but if it will not come so to passe, they must content themselves with meaner place, giuing all their loue and affection, to the husbands chosen by themselves. And God may giue them as much (or more) happinesse and contentment with their meane match, then if they had the richest husbands in the Worlde. This may redound to an honest household life, whereas the other might haue procured iust nothing like the Physition, standing out of his patients affection, being daily desirous of another.

ordinances, but say: That they are well pleased with his presence, and they are sufficiently fortified; it is enough for them, if he but take order for victuals, & be provident in policie. As for fight, mounting the Artillery, and other needfull preparations, they will not heare a word of that. Is this any thing else, but merely to mock a braue soldier for his paines, & send him away with losse of credit?

Ecclesi. 38. 4.

I durst not tearme this folly, if Ecclesiasticus had not taught me, saying: Hee that is wife, will not abhorre the Physitian. Oh, but Physicke (say some) is very ytkesome to take. It is true, and God hath so ordained it, that it may the better fight against the euill. For, as health is pleasing and acceptable, so is it entertained with as acceptable things: and as sickness is vnpleasing, so must distastfull things helpe to conquer it. It is not wisdom, if we apply not our willes, to whatsoever the Physitian appointeth, without concerning any thing. For oftentimes, thorough defect of one obseruation, which may seeme but small: the disease impaireth, euen to death. Like as a Towne may (sometime) bee lost, by lacke of a Sentinell; or by the meanes of a little hole or passage, which appeared to be of no importance. Sometime, a sparke of fire enflames a whole heape of Straw, and thereby a house, and of one house, a whole Burrough or Towne. If a small fault grow into excess, or faileth of help in due time, no meane disorder ensueth thereon.

Small errors may grow out great to be easily perceived.

Concerners of Physicke seek for helpe thereby, when it is too late.

What then shall become of such as despise the Physitian, when he (many times) hath worke enough to doe, to saue them, that are willing to doe whatsoever hee would haue them? Commonly it falleth out with them who are so difficult, that (in the end) they would yeeld to all, & more, euen then when there is neither meane, nor time, and can no way bee preferred from death, as they might haue bene before, by Gods gracious assistance. Euen like to besieged people, that began but coldly in their owne defence, not employing all their means; but sparing their bed-rickes, ballies of Wooll, Chests, Cuppeboords, and other moueables, for re-impairing their victualles and money, that their Soldiers, Armes, and persons might be the better secured, and to fight valiantly. But at length, beholding themselves constrained; then they can offer bags of Gold, Plate, Jewels, yea, all to their verie bowels, onely for safety; when there is no remedy at all to sted them, but become wise too late, with the Phrygians, according to the Prouerbe. Wherefore, let euery man determine with himselfe (euen in the very beginning) to doe willingly what the Physitian shall counsell and ordaine for him, without restriction, or distinguishing Negatives and affirmatives, that God may the better giue his blessing, to concurre with the Physitions true endeavour.

Delay in such cases is euen more dangerous, & hardly recovered.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of such as in their sickness, will admitte no medicine or remedy; but only for the present paine and anguish.

Obserued this opinion, in a Gentleman of Vitruues, affected greatly to his pleasures. He made no particular account of infirmities, which were without greauance, thinking remedies to serue little or nothing at all for them; euen as if it were necessary, that the disease should haue his course. And whatsoever was done, the infirmity would passe his fourte times, if it were recoverable: but if it were deadly, then there was no remedy that could bee proper for it; which were erroneous speeches, grounded on those folies heretofore refused. In breefe, he would not allow of any Physitian, nor any medicine; but to take away instant anguishes. But if he wer false into a palsey, which is a disease without paine, I beleue he could gladly haue desired, that it might be cured by medicin, or any other helpe else whatsoever.

Now, concerning dolorous and painefull diseases, it is to bee vnderstoode, that grieue there is not the principal (although of very great importance) and that the euill must and ought to be taken away, in which the anguish proceedeth, if men do deale iustly in their cures. For, if one stand trifling simply vpon the paine, & the cause is mistaken (which is the source, root, and mother of euill :) there are then but two

No application of remedie, but to the place of present paine.

Concerning dolorous and painefull diseases, wherein anguish is not cheefe.

meanes; the one is by Anodyne medicines, which diminish the pain in some measure, and caueh the party to endure the rest more patiently.

The other is by Arcotick medicines, that is to say stupifying, making the member sleepe, in attorning the Naturall heate. Which is not to be vsed, but in extreme necessitie, and very wisely: but, as wel the one, as the other, do not let passe or lessen the grieue, but onely for a time.

Euermore, wee should come to Cure the principall, otherwise it is still to begin againe. And if our remedies serue not to take away the euill, which is without paine, or which causeth paine: that were the greatest fallshood in the worlde; as I haue apparently proued before, where I ouerthrew the idle imagination, that Physitions serued to no purpose, but abused the world. If any yet shall reply vnto me, that many are well re-cured, both without Physitions and Medicines: I answer also in the same manner, that as many lose their greauances, without Physicke, or any other applyed remedies, whereby that proposition is merely confounded of itselfe.

The ground cause of euill is to be taken away, or else all our labour is to no purpose.

CHAP. XIX.

That such as are subiect to diseases, are in like manner subiect to Physicke: and that they not.

ANY throw aspersions of blame and reproote, on such as obseure some orderly rule and government, subiecting themselves to certaine remedies, to maintaine their healthfull condition, and prevent some knowne euilles, whereto they are subiect. They that commend those meanes, are (doubtles) verie healthfull, and of good Complexion: in which respect, the position is verie true, according to that which is saide in Sacred Scripture, The law was not giuen to the iust. But more expressly, where it is saide, The whole need not the Physitian; but they that are sicke. These words likewise do confirm the contrary, to wit: That such as are sicke, haue need of the Physitian; & such as are Men strong & healthfull, commend such as are weak, and sicke.

Math. 9. 12.

subiect to any sickness, are also subiect to some rule. Euen according as we are subiect to sin, so are we subiect to the Law.

I shall alwaies giue consent with most eloquent Celsus: That the healthfull Man, while he carrieth himselfe well, and is truly himselfe: needeth not to be tyed to any Law or Government, nor to employ the Physitian. It is very expedient, that he should haue diuers manners of life; one while in the field, then againe in the City, but more often in the field.

To Natures, hunt, to be at rest, and ease sometimes, but yet to exercise himselfe more often. For, sloath and idleness, maketh the body drowsie and dull, but trauell confirmeth it: The one is the hastner of Age, the other is the continuer of iolly youth.

It is good also sometimes to bath, and sometimes to use colde waters; one while to amoint, then againe to forbear. Feare no kind of meats, that are vsed among civil people to be sometimes present at Feasts, another while to reframe them. One while feede somewhat immeasurably, and afterward soberly. Make two meales a day more often then one, and alwaies eate well, so long as it may haue digestion, &c. As concerning carnall Copulation, it may not be desired too much, nor too much feared neither: That which is rare and sildome, exciteh the body; that more frequent dissoleth it, &c.

These rules are to be obserued by such, that haue their health firme, and can so keepe themselves; that remedies ordainned for euil carriage be not employed & consumed in vaine. In this maner are men of sound health indifferent to all, and subiect to nothing, while they beare themselves well, and are so firmly in health, as Celsus hath limited. It were very great shame for a man, to make himselfe delicate, soft, and tender, slouping and encreasing his good and strong Complexion; which would extend it selfe a great deale more, by bolde, valiant, and manly exercises. But for valeudinarie personnes, vnhealthfull, subiect vnto manie Diseases, as Epilepsies (commonly called, Mel de S. Iean) Megrimmes, Rheumes, Catarrhs, shortnesse of breath, Ache in the bones, Oppilations in the Liuer or Spleene, the Winde Collicke, or Stone, Gouts, and the like infirmities (whereof the most part are Hereditarie, yea, and the Leaprofitop) who makes any doubt or question, but that such men ought to liue within rule, if their owne ease they be not enuious of, and desire to see manie dayes?

Such also as addict themselves to studie, or vnto publike charges in the Common-wealth, because they are subiect to many necessities, ought to be gouerned; otherwise, they often fall into diuers infirmities. For they tie & constraîne themselves to store of things, which are verie hurtful for them. And Celsus in the words before alledged, presupposeth, that the healthfull man, must also be wholly himselfe in all respects.

How we are to vnderstand
our being sub-
iect to sickness

Now, in the position formerly alledged, saying, Subiect to diseases; we vnderstand a particular subiection & aptitude. For all men in the world are subiect to all kinds of sickness, euen as we are all subiect to death. But we say, some are subiect thereto particularly, that haue an inclination and disposition to some euil, the rudiment wherof is in them: not that they are already sicke, but because a small matter will throw them into sickness; and therefore, they ought the more respectiue, to carry themselves. By example of him formerly spoken of, who being the only sick man in his time: made shift yet to liue an hundred yeares, by great cunning, & exquisite manner of liue.

CHAP. XX.

That such as know some little matter in Physicke, are more dangerous to be meeere sicke personnes, then they that know nothing at all.

In the 13.
chape before.

Must confesse, that this error ought to haue followed a former Chapter, where we declared, that there were more Physicians, then of anie other profession. But fearing to offend any succorable people, I had a long conflict with mine owne cogitations, whether I should censure and reprove them in such publike manner. At length, I concluded to holde on my course; knowing, that ther is more danger (then we wold easily think) in such as know something, and imagine to know all things. For out of this ouer-weening, either they presume, & vndertake the very greatest cures; or withstand and hinder Physicians, from being employed in principall remedies, necessarily requiring quick and sure healing. But these insolent controllers, keep them so engaged to fear; that they neither dare, nor will aduenture.

There are some persons, who know not any thing in Physick, in regard of discourse and reason; as ignorant women, who can neither write nor read; but once haue certaine obseruations and rules, knowing how to make a good Broth, a Cullise, a Restorative, to make a bed well, and knit a kerchiefe about the sick mans head. Beside, they know some infant remedies, against itch, scabs, burnings, falling of the Vulua, wormes, the Mother, &c. Hereupon, they imagine themselves compleat in knowledge, and make many things out of their owne braine and fantasie; and if their experiment succede ill, they spare not to vaunt, that the Physicians great Gowne shall couer all this.

It were very good and expedient, that assistants about sicke patients, did know nothing else, but to obey the Physicians directions. It were a knowledge very beneficiall to the patient; for, such as do not presume of themselves, will neuer attempt to execute any thing, but what is prescribed, ordained, and commanded. Others, that dreame they haue knowledge; they will adde, diminish, alter, or else do iust nothing at all. Like to lewd Apothecaries, who execute the Physicians directions at their owne pleasure, as presuming to know the curing of the disease, and the nature better in course, then he doth: being drunke with some opinion concerning the like; as hauing obserued diuers the like sicknesses, attended many Physicians, and seene the successe of the like receipts.

O dangerous ouer-weening! see here the verie ruine of most sicke personnes. It were much better (before God I speak it) not to know any thing, then to know thus in this Empericke manner. What more unhappinesse for the patients life, and honour to the Physician, then to haue an Apothecarie so ouerweening, temerarious, and presumptuous? In Italy, and in Spain, the the sicke are in much better manner serued. For, the Apothecary goeth not to see the sicke man, except it be in courtlesse and friendship; and yet not as an Apothecary neither: nor do the Physicians vnder write their bills of receipts, by or for who the remedies were compounded. Whereby, the Apothecarie knowes as litle of the Physicians intent, euen as if hee were acquainted with nothing. By this meanes, hee cannot abuse the Physicians directions; or, much lesse then our Apothecaries, to whom all is imparted ouer familiarly.

Next to Apothecaries, I speak of those vile and bad (not good, proud, modest, and honest people, that meddle not, but what they haue to doe withall) yea, most dangerous keepers or seruants, attending about poore weak patients, who thinke they haue more knowledge then the Physician (especially, if they be anciently traded in the businesse) touching nourishing principally; because it ought to be of inestimable importance, qualitie, fit hours, and measure. True it is, of the quality they credite enough by the Physicians order; but for the houre and measure, they do all at their owne liking. I spare the drugeris they covertly vie, and the omissions of Ordinances appointed to them, when they meete with patients fitte for their purpose. Such people are most dangerous, and much better to haue them that know no such cunning, neither haue learned any other lesson; but to doe what they are appointed, which is the main article of their duty.

CHAP. XXI.

The manner of knowing Opportunity truly, for vnderstanding or performing such actions, as we would haue to be well done: And how our graue Elders used to depit or figure Occasion.

Opportunity is the greatest matter, belonging to the life of man.

Here consisteth no meane wit and iudgement, in knowing howe to make vse of Opportunity; & to perform our actions in due time: because great care is to be had, either for doing, or not doing a thing at a time; in regard there is no alteration or returning backe, when defect falleth vpon the aduenture. Hereupon, the Grecian Philosophers leste vs many notable sentences in writing, making to that purpose: in regard that they truly vnderstood, what wisdom depended vpon knowledge, for doing a businesse in apt opportunitee, and taking occasion when it is fairly offered.

Salomon saith in his Ecclesiastes: To all things there is an appointed time. There is a time to be borne, and a time to dye: A time to plant, and a time to plucke up that which is planted: A time to kill, and a time to be killed: A time to build, and a time to rinate: A time for warre, and a time for peace. In breecfe, many examples might be alledged, whereby to demonstrate, what losse relyeth on dooing any thing out of due time; and what benefite redoundeth vnto men, when things are accomplished aptly to time and place.

Menander, a Greeke Poet said; That all things done to purpose, & in time, haue great grace, for Opportunity hath more power then Law. So that a litle attendance giuen on time, is esteemed highly worth. Hesiodus, a Greeke Authour also, appointed vs to keepe meanes and obseruation of times: For, the importance of all affayres (saith he) consisteth in attending on time and opportunity. Pindarus said; Time hath great power in all things. Also (according to Horace), A man should alwaies set forward his affayres, when he seeth due time. Socrates, writing to Democritus, said; All things are naught, being done out of due season. In breecfe, there is no man of iudgement or experience, but will pursue his busines in fittest times.

All which notwithstanding, it is to be noted, that as it is good to waite on Opportunity, and aptest times to performe any thing: so likewise, the point or instant is not to bee slipp, for exact executing any matter when it cometh. This is that which hath commonly bene sayde, Occasion is neuer to be surprized. For, all things are done out of their constellation, & consent of the stars (although occasion cometh otherwise) can neuer grow to good perfection.

And to speake seriously, occasion and opportunity for our actions, was in such high esteeme with our Ancients, as well Greeks as Latines; that they had alwaies her portraiture, like as a Mirrour before their eyes. The Latines figured Occasion in the form of a woman; but the Grecians figured her in the shape of an infant, holding one foot vpon a turning wheele, and all before the face couered with Hayre, dangling downe in long tresses; but all the head behind was bald and shauen. This shape was given to occasion or Opportunity, by Pofidius, or Pofidippus as some called him, a Greek Poet, translated into Latine by the learned Erafmus, and Aufonius the Lombards Poet. Whom Sir Tho: More of England, a man much renowned for wisdom and learning, traduced into the Caftilian tongue, in forme of a dialogue. For More said, that Occasion, standing so vpon a wheele, declared thereby her inconstancy, and hauing wings both at her handes and feet, shewed, how lightly shee past away, without tarrying. Moreouer, said he, her forehead and face being couered with hairy long locks, expressed; that shee might easily be held, by such to whom shee presented her selfe; but being vnwilling to be known to others, shee kept her face so couered, because she would escape away vnknown: being all bald and shauen behinde, for feare she should be stayed, after shee was once past. Whereby may be comprehended, that Opportunity once lost, is not to bee recovered, by all our paines applied afterward.

Aufonius making a further addition to this picture, placed the figure of Repentance, sitting vpon the shoulers of Occasion: declaring thereby, that whatsoever happeneth by the losse of Occasion, may well be repented. And truly there are two kinds of people, who might make good vse of this example. For, some are so faine in their affaires, that they can neuer bring them about, by not tarrying for opportune time. And others (on the contrary) are so long and tedious in concluding their businesse, being troubled with so many inconueniences, which may happen; that in the time of this lingering negotiating, Occasion hath past by. Both which extremities are to bee auoyded by men of good iudgement, who, in waiting the time for best performing their businesse suffer no occasions (in the meane while) offaire to offer to ouer-slip them. For other wife, they may fall into a tardy repentance, which will be little to their credite and benefit.

CHAP. XXII.

Of Favour, Grace, or Good opinion: How it hath bene described by picture, and also concerning the Morall signification.

The precedent discourse, concerning the portraiture of Opportunity, or Occasion, hath brought that to my remembrance, which the ancient Romanes gaue and granted to Fauor, Grace, or good Opinion: as well for the great conueniency which these two things hold together, as also because the true time and very occasion of well-doing any thing is, when Fauour standeth fairest for him; as much to say, as when the Prince lendeth an attentue care, and vouchsafeth (withall) a gracious countenance: For, a man that is in credite with a Prince, is very much made of by all men, euerie one thinks well of what he doth, or saith; because all things succede to his good and honor: for all are full of fauour towards him, either with an honest heart, or else in outward ceremony.

Little need is there to produce Histories or examples to this effect, considering that (at all times) it hath bin in practise, & euerie yeare is a breuiate thereof; wherefore it shal suffice me only to represent the true figure of Fauor, according to the draught of our graue Elders, which may for way conformance it selfe with that of Occasion. For, in their truest picturing Fauour, they figured a yong infant blind, being alone, & without any company. Bartholomewus Dardanus, moralizing vpon this picture (introduceth himselfe) speaking to the Painter Apelles by way of dialogue, in this manner.

O Apelles! Perceyuing the great paines that thou hast taken, to portraite truly the Image of Favour: I pray thee tell mee, of what race shee is descended? Whereunto Apelles (sodainly replying, saydes) Her Race is knowne, but to verie few people. And indeede, the Originall of Favour is hardly to be found. For some say, that fauour cometh by corporall beauty: Others hold, that she cometh by aduenture, or good hap. Yet some will haue her to be the daughter of Fortune, or of accident. And yet neuer thelesse, many are of the minde, that seee yssueth from true Noblesse of the minde. As is easilie discerned, by this short Dialogue following, where a Poet, speaking to Apelles, beginneth thus.

A discourse Dialogue (according to Morall sense) betweene a Poet and Apelles, concerning the true Image of Fauour.

Poet. What is that Woman, standing on yonder side, who is neuer forsaken, but still hath store of company?

Apelles. Her name is Flattery.

Poet. And what is shee that attendeth, or followeth after her?

Apelles. Her Name is commonly called Enmie.

Poet. What people are they that follow engirt her?

Apelles. They are such as continually keep company with Fauour, and are especially obedient to her: As namely, Riches and Pleasures, the source and originall of all vices.

Poet. Why hast thou (in figure) giuen wings to Fauour?

Apelles. Because shee cannot step a foote abroad, but she mounts aloft, when the wind of good Fortune raiseeth her.

Poet. And wherefore hast thou painted her blinde?

Apelles. Because such as are in credite, will no more take knowledge of their ancient Friends.

Poet. And why hast thou placed hir feet vpon a wheele?

Apelles. Because shee followeth the steps of Fortune, being enmore as inconsistent as shee.

Poet. But why dost thou make her puffe and swell so proudly?

Apelles. Because prosperitie blindeth the vnderstanding of all men.

This Dialogue, reported in the Language belonging to it, would haue much more grace, then any tongue else can be-flow vpon it. Neuerthelesse, the most gracious Fauourites may heereby take aduice, to know, what companions attend vpon Fauour, and the instabilitie both of them and her. To the end, they may the better gouerne themselves with modestie in their credit, without puffing or swelling vp into pride. For, ouer and beside, that God is greatly there-with offended, there are many other dangers else, by the obseruation of passed times: as true testimonie hath bene made, by the vnhappy and lamentable end of many Princes Fauourites, that knew not howe to vie their credit so wisely, as they should haue done.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of those seven Wise men of Greece, commonly called the seven Sages: With many notable Sentences which they left behinde them in writing.

Among the ancient Grecians, such were called Sages, or Wise men, as now we vlie to terme Philosophers. But Socrates, accounting the title of Sage or wise to be ouer-arrogant (because it was only proper and peculiar to God, to bee absolutely called Sage or Wise) inuented the name of Philosopher, as much to say, as a louer of wisdom; and being somewhat better qualified, and more moderate then the name of Sage or Wise; so that all Wise men, which were since the time of Socrates, were well contented with the Title of Philosophers. Notwithstanding, there were seven seuerall men, vnto whom the name of Sages or Wise-men, were attributed, by common consent of all Greece, in regarde of their Knowledge and Vertue.

And indeede, many Authors (as well Ancient as Moderne) do make mention of them, and of notable Sentences left by them for memory: whereof (I purpose) to set downe heere a breefe summarie, that vnderstanding Readers (yet ignorant in the originall Language) may the better be acquainted with their witty sayings.

Occasion or Opportunity, moralized in Figure.

Occasion familiarly described by Sir Thom. More, Englishman.

Repentance figured sitting on the shoulers of Occasion.

A worthy precedent for two sorts of people.

Authors of great & good sufficiency. The names of the seauen Sages of Greece	Setting aside then that vaine and foolish Booke of the Seauen Sages, which hath runne thorow too many Countreies, with many opinions divulged, concerning their liues (which were defiled, and rent in peeces by Diogenes Laertius) I will shap my courſe, according vnto that which hath bene auouched by Saint Augustine, Erasmus, Philiſt Melancthon, Beroaldus, Raphaell Volateranus, and many other Authors of great fame. The names of those seauen men, were Solon, Chilo, Cleobulus, Thales, Bias, Pittacus, and Periander, and they are all liuing together at one time: although some of them were more aged then the other, and (happily) liued longer then the rest did. For, all of them were in perfect beeing, during the reigne of Cyrus King of Persia, at such time as the Iewes remayned captiues in Babylon: which was about the space of fife hundred and fiftie yeares, before the comming of our Lord and Saviour Iesus Christ, as Eusebius saith.	About all things, this man sought still to maintaine loue and amity, & therefore he was held the chieffest in the Common-wealth: he would say, he had much rather be a iudge between two of his friends, then between two of his enemies: for in condemning a friend, he should loose his friendship; but in iudging betwixt two enemies, hee for whome the sentence was giuen, would become a friend. A lewd man once demanded of him, what was to be pittied in religion; wherto Bias answered not a word: the man growing angry, mooued the same question againe; and Bias replied, Why dost thou aske such a case of me, as concerns not thee at all? He liued oft-times to say, that the greater part of men, were the worst men; and Auſonius took great paines in confirming this saying. But it is so manifest and true, that it needs no other confirmation, then what is auouched in the Gospell, where it is said: Many are called, but few are chosen. Cicero also maintaines it to be true, affecting the race of the wicked to be great. Plato also laide to the same purpose, That good men were gone, and growne to nothing: but contrariwise, the vices of the wicked encreased daily, euen as if they were watered hearbs.
At what time the seauen Sages liued.	We purpose to speake of them particularly, and likewise of some of their principall Sentences, which they left respectiue for vs: albeit memory hath embred infinite common sayings of theirs, as ordinarily all Authors haue concluded in their writings. Auſonius, a famous Poet of Lombardie, verie elegantly reduced into verse, many notable Sentences of those Sages, whereof he maketh very ample relation in three feuerall Bookes published by him.	There are some Authors, who alledge many other sentences of Bias, very singular, and necessary; as, Attribute to God all the good thou doest: Neuer be enuious at the rich. Hee may well be called a good man, that hath no remorse of conscience. The greatest danger that happens to a man, cometh from man: The very richest gift in a woman, is to be vertuous and honest.
Antonius the Lombard Poet.	First then, we will begin with wife Bias, who was borne in Priene, a Sea-coast towne of Ionica, a Region in Greece, hauing a very poore man to his father, named Tamius. This Bias was a great Oratour, a good Aduocate, and well scene in all the Sciences; beeing otherwise endued with many vertues. Among which, he held in highest estimation, to contern the riches and honors of the world. Cicero, speaking of him, saith, that when the enemy defroide the towne where he dwelt, and euery man labored to saue and carry away the best of his goods: Bias would not saue any thing belonging to him. And being demanded, why he was so respectlesse of his goods: he answered, All my goods I carry with mee: meaning his wisdome, which (indeed) is the greatest wealth of all.	Aristotle attributeth this to Bias. Degrees of honor and offices, do most manifest what a man is for; many appeare to be honest men (as indeede their actions shew no lesse) beeing priuate persons: but hauing power to command, doe manifestly declare the malignitie of their hearts: He addeth also. That a man should so carry himselfe to his friend, as if (another day) he should become his enemy: and so to deale with an enemy, as hoping (one day) he may be his friend. Yet Aristotle himselfe reproued this saying, in his Rhetorike. Notwithstanding in due consideration of managing friendship in these dayes, wee shall finde this Sentence to be most true.
Cicero in Orat. pro Cluent. Omnia mea mecum porto.		There

Bias buried at the Common wealths charge	There are many other sayings, well deserving memorie, which are attributed to this Philosopher, & would aske too much time heere to insert: and therefore I will leaue them, hauing first informed the Reader, that after the death of Bias, his funeral was solemnely performed, at the cost and charge of the Common-wealth, in signe of his perpetuall honour.	subject to a tyrant. Heereupon, after that Pisistratus had gotten full possession of Athens, Solon departed thence, and travelled Countreies for the space of tenne yeares, as well in Egypt as in other places. Till at the length, he came to the Court of Craſus, the rich and powerfull King of Lydia, who hauing shewed him his abundant treasures, demanded of him, if euer hee had scene more Royall possessions? Whereunto Solon (like a Philosopher and Free-man) replied: That he had scene the possessions of diuers Fowles, Cockes, Capons, and such like, which seemed goodlier to him, because they were naturall to them. Againe hee demanded of him, if euer hee had scene any man more rich, or so happy as hee was? Solon answered him (without flattery) that hee had scene a man in his owne Countrey, named Tellus, who (in his opinion) was more happy then Craſus; for hee was an honest and vertuous man, and had scene his children, and the children of his children so well aduanced, that hee receyued seruaice from them in his age. Nay more, being growne into the extremitie of yeares; he dyed in the defence of his Countrey, and repelling the enemy.
Solon, the second Sage or wife Man of Greece.	The second Sage or wiseman of Greece was Solon, although some ranke him in the prime place. Plutarke, and many other haue written at large of his life, saying: That hee was borne in Salamina, an Island in subiection to the Athenians, illused of an ancient and most Noble house; his fathers name being called Acræſtides. The Athenians made such pretious esteem of Solon, as well in regarde of his wisdom, and the victories which he had obtaeyned against them of Mytilene, with sundry other enterprises, which hee had finished very dexteriously; that they limited themselves to his ordinances, which were great (as Plutarke affirmeth) recording many of them by particular mention.	The King being much displeased at the answer of Solon, layd vnto him: Why dost not thou attribute to me some degree of happinesse? Whereunto Solon replying, shewed him the great traueses and mutations, which may enſue vnto such as are constituted in great Estates: and they being subiect to such alterations, he could not tearme them truly happy, alledging a common Proverbe, vied among the Athenians: That the end of life must first be scene, before any iudgement of happinesse passe thereon.
Solon highly esteemed among the Athenians.	Especially he moderated the Lawes of Draco, which were very rigorous, so that for the very least fault committed in Athens, life depended thereupon. For, Demetrius the Oratour sayd, That the Lawes appointed by Draco, were written downe with the blood of men. Solon therefore corrected them, and confirmed in Athens, the Councell of the Areopagites, according as Aristotle and Plutarke do plainly maintayne.	Of most notable saying, though to Aristotle, it seemed not receivable: for, while a man continueth in life, hee is alwayes vncertayne of his estate and condition, as also of his fame and reputation: as it was well approved by the Wise man, who said, Commend no man before his death. And our blessed Lord also, would haue his Apostles and Disciples to make stay in no place, or to salute any body by the way: which some expounded according to the saying of Solon, who affirmed, that man (in his life time) could not assure him
Plutarch in vit. Sol.	Draco lawes registered in blood.	Craesus would haue some degree of happinesse granted to him.
Pisistratus, an opposer against Solon.	Hee had a concurrent or corruall in Athens, a kinsman of his owne, named Pisistratus; so that, the more Solon labored the libertie of his Countrey, so much the more did hee study and endeavour to oppresse it. Neuerthelesse, in conclusion, the cloquence of Pisistratus had more power, then all the approved goodnesse in Solon, whereby hee possessed himselfe of the Seignerie and Rule of Athens; which Solon might haue done (much more easily then hee) if he would haue vied but his owne meanes. For, when the men of Athens offered him the soweraigntie of their City, hee made them answer thus: The house of tyrannie is very pleasing, but it must haue a winding staires to mount it: And therefore, I will neither be a tyrant, nor	A witty Athenian proverb. selfe from falling into many inevitable in-conueniences. Pliny also conforming him selfe to Solon, sayd: One day indgeth another, and the last day indgeth all. Ouid maketh the like affirmation, saying: Whosoever considereth the last day of man, which is conseruative, it is not possible for him to say, that he can be any way truly happy.

Solon departed from his Circus, as a man vnderdred.

But returne we againe to King Crasus, who, notwithstanding the wife answer Solon had made him, he regarded him not, neither what great benefit might after befall him, by enjoying the companie of a man so worthy, as neuer respecting future occasions to follow. Whereupon Solon departed from his Court, with very vnkinde entertainment: but afterward, such an adventure happed, as made him deare-ly acknowledge his error, and well to remember the words of Solon. For, Great King Cyrus waging new warre against him; and hauing vanquished and taken him prisoner, gaue Sentence, that hee should be burned alive. Hee being vpon the pile of wood, and fire making readie to consume him: cryed foudainely out aloud, O Solon, Solon, remember now in this extremitie, that his saying was true, and that no man could be happy while he liued! Crasus commanding the Officers to slay, and to keepe the fire from the pile: would needs vnderstand of him, wherefore he vsed that inuocation vpon Solon, or expected thereby for deliuerance from death? Crasus reported the whole History to him, what Solon had sayd, concerning his imaginarie happinesse; the trued whereof he had now too apparently proued. Cyrus being much amazed thereat, and entering into mature consideration, of the strange and vnaoidable mutabilitie of Fortune, deliuered King Crasus from death & captiuitie, doing him to great honor, that he made him his associate in his kingdomes. Whereby we may perceiue, that this wise and worthy saying of Solon, was the meanes of seeing one mighty King from death, and made an other also much wiser then hee was before.

Cicero found Solons words
true to the nomen hazard
of his life.

Solon, hauing attained vnto the age of four score yeares, dyed at Rhodes, ordaining by his testament (as Aristotle sayth) that his body should be burned, and his ashes scattered in the Isle of Salamina: because they should not be caried to Athenes,

for contraying them (by that meanes) to keepe his ordinances. Because, before he departed from Athenes, he made the Athenians to take an oathe, that they should keepe his Lawes inuolubly, vntill he was returned from his voyage. And indeede, according vnto Aristotle, the Commonwealth of the Athenians maintained them felices very prosperously, so long as they kept the Lawes of Solon.

Now, as concerning the sentences and sayings of Solon; for the most part, they were conformable to Christian Religion, and all Ciuillitie. As, *Honour God: Be help-full to thy neighbour: Maintain the vertue of thy friend: Obey the Lawes: Bristle thine anger: Honor thy father and mother: Swear not: Keepe thy selfe from Envy: Be not too light in confirming a friend, but learne to keep him when thou hast him. Marrie with time equall: Reprooue thy friend in secret, but publicly thou mayest commend him: Shunne the company of wicked people: Praise and follow vertue. Hee sayd moreover, That Lawes were like to Spiders webs, wherein poore little Flies were soone entangled, but such as were great and strong, could easily breake throug.
Such, and the like notable Sentences, are found among his Lawes and Ordinances:
And so much for Solon.*

Chilo, son of Amaratius, was also numbered amongst the seauen Sages of Greece. He was of Lacedemon, a city highly renowned in Greece, where he was elected in the Councell of the Ephori, in regard of his great wisdom & knowledge:
this was an Estate among the Lacedemonians, as the Conseruatorous and Tribunes were among the Romains. Chilo was very summary and succinct in his Discourse, as (ordinarily) all the Lacedemonians
were: and hee was likewise called Ariftogoras, in regard of that qualitie. When any one compiled an Oration, in few and witty words, they vsed to say; That he had written a Chilonical Oration. He liued so long (as Pliny and some others say) euen till nature fayled in him. Neuerthelesse, he dyed with a conceit of himselfe, seeing one of his sonnes, to winne the prizes of Honour in the Olympian games, and after his death; the Lacedemonians performed his funerall with great solemnitie.

Chilo called sing.

tences which he had written; but especially in this, that he exhorted every man to know himselfe. Which being heedfullly obserued, men would not be too vaine, nor so proude and inordinate, as usually they are: because all voyces and disorders do proceed from selfe-conceite, and no man truly knowing himselfe. Hee cupon

Isenall.

Plato recordeth, that this saying of Chilo, Know thy selfe, was written in letters of golde, vpon the portall of Apollos Temple. Isenall saith, That this saying came frō Heauen. Macrobius, in his Tract of Scipios Dreame, saith; That the Oracle of Apollo being demanded the meanes, what course should be taken, for attaining to felicity, answered: Only teach a man to know himselfe. Demonius, being asked, at what time
he began to be a Philosopher, answered;
When I began to know my selfe. O most necessary rule; for if a man would consider himselfe well, and study but to vnderstand his condition, estate and vacations, and frame his life accordingly thereto: hee could neuer bee so changed, to attempt such things, as he neyther shold or ought to do, neyther would there bee so much disorder in the world, as now there is.

Things find necessary for all men to know and v-derstand.

Chilo also had an accustomed kinde of Prouerbiall speeches, to wit: *Remember thou must dye, and therefore provide for thine owne saluation. Honour olde men. Be no murmurer. Speake no euill of an offender.
Chuse rather losse, then dishonest gaine. In violence and constraint bee milde and humble.
Labour rather to be loued, then feared. Try Gold by the touch; for, a golden-songed man, who keepeth all that comes into his mouth,
men may often heare from him, such things as they would not.*

Witty and grave sentences written & vsed by Chilo.

Chilo being asked by one, named Æ-sop, what God had done, answered; Hee exalted humble men, and suppressed proud & ignorant Fooles. Being demanded also, what was the hardest thing in the world to bee done, replied: To rise and imploy a mans time well, and to pardon injuries and outrages received. In briefe, he would vsually say, that he would so dispose the course of his life: That the greatest persons should ne-derseele, nor the meanest feare him. Finally,

Chilo both wrote and spake many notable things in his time, which would require ouermuch leysure to report: And therefore, we take our leaue of him, making way to entertaine our 4. man of Greece.

Cleobulus, who was also one of the seauen Sages, was borne in Lindus, a City in the Isle of Rhodes; or as some others say, in Caria, a Towne of Anchidia, a Region in Greece; and his Fathers name was Euagoras. This Cleobulus, beside his being a very singular wise man, was also of very goodly bodily feature, and wonderfully active of his person: so that eyther, or both these happy blessings together, made him admired, and esteemed generally.
The loue of learning preuailed in such fort with him, that he forsooke his Country, Parents and Friends; trauiailing into Egypt, where (in those times) were many goodly and famous Vniuersities.

Cleobulus,
the fourth wise man of Greece, a man of learning and excellent composure of body.

He had a Daughter named Cleobolina, that could inuent and write in prose, beyond ordinary compass of men or women, and very skilfull shee was beside, in propounding questions of difficult resolution; as this one for an example: A Father had twelue children, and each childe had thirty sonnes, all white by nature, and thirty daughters, all of them naturally blacke: all which were immortal, and yet (notwithstanding) were discerned to dye daily. By which Enigma, shee vnderstood the yeare, that hath twelue Moneths, and euery Moneth thirty dayes and thirty nightes.

Cleobolina,
daughter to Cleobulus, a woman of rare ingenuity.

But come we againe to Cleobulus, who after his returne out of Egypt, deferred so highly by his learning and iudgement, as to be ranked among the seauen Sages of Greece. And many of his learned sayings and sentences, were held as rules and directions for mens liues. Among other, he vsed most of all to say; That Mediocrity was without compare. And assuredly, these words greatly confirmed the saying of Chilo, who would haue every man to know himselfe: For if we knew our felices well, and as we ought to do, a meane then in all things would easily gouerne vs. By this sentence then of Cleobulus, making such precious account of Mediocrity; we may well conclude, that all extremities are vicious. As much to say, when there is too much, or too little: whereupon our ancient Philosophers vsed to say; Beare of

on of Mediocrity.

too much, declaring thereby, that all excesse is vile.

Aristotle attributeth this Sentence to wife Bias, and some other to Solon, but be it howsoever: Vertue alwayes consisteth in mediocrity: According to the saying of Aristotle: Vertue consisteth in it selfe by too much, or too little: For vertue is nothing else but a mean or mediocrity, consisteth between two extremities. Horse appointed in his Discourses, that a mean should be obserued in all things. For (saith he) all that goeth before it, or contendeth to come after it, keeping neither meane nor measure, can neuer be said to be well accomplished.

An infinite number of examples may be alledged to this purpose, especially concerning the foure principall vertues, which are commonly called Cardinal.
For, Fortitude is lodged betwixt Feare & Boldnes; & Liberality keeps the mid-way betwixt Couetousnes and Prodigiousnes;
as the like may be sayd of other vertues, and humane operations, which ought to gouerne themselves by time and necessity:
yet with this charge neuertheless, to be aware of ouer-much in any. This is a doctrine conformable to the saying of Heli-odorus, oftentimes alledged by reuerend Erasmus, commanding all men to obserue a measure in their actions. As much maintaineth Plato, Terence, Plautus, and many other Authors both ancient and moderne, euery one of them auouching commonly, *That happy men alwayes follow a meane
in their trauels*.

And (in this case) the reason is peremp-tory, for all things are euen as nothing, they haue their beginning and their end,
and so they passe away: Reason then fits them with an apte conclusion, that their perfection consisteth in the midst of the five Zones or Places, which girdle round the whole wide Vniuers; the two extremest are held to be inhabitable: and yet contrarywise, those in the midst are allowed to be most perfect. The Sunne which is held to be Prince of the Planets, is in the midst of the eare and wandring Stars. Among men, the place of honour is in the midst, & indeed it is hard to make any agreement, except rather be a third, to serue as the means. To conclude, the meane is much commended to vs in all things, con-cernes chiefly Christ, that best would be called the Mediator betwixt God & man.

He vied diuers other notable sentences:
beside, as, Beware of giving thy friend occasion to reprove thee: Shunne the vnbalances of thy enemy: Before thou goest out of thy house, remember what thou hast to do: and upon returning home, consider what thou hast done:
match not in marriage, but with thine equall,
for if thou takest a wife of a better house then thine owne, thou makest thy selfe a slave to her and her kindred: Pardon the errours of other men, and neuer be sparing of thine owne: The more liberty thou hast, so much the lesse rise make of it: Be not proud in prosperity, nor faint-hearted in aduersity. Inure thy selfe to beare the traueses of fortune patiently. Many other singular Sentences are attributed to Cleobulus, which Ausonius and Diogenes Laertius haue recorded in their works, affirming withall, that he dyed at the age of seauenty yeares.

NOW it remaineth to speake of Pittacus, of Mitylene, the capitall City in the Isle of Leibos, and at this day called Mity-lene, his fathers name being called Hyrra-dus. He was of such learning, wilddome and ingenuitie of spirit, that the Græcians placed him in ranke among the seauen Sages. The loue hee bare to his Countrey, moued him to make warre against the tyrant Melæger (who vsurped thereon) so that hee enforced him to flight. In the war betwixt the Athenians and them of Mity-lene, about a field then in controuersie hee was General for the Mityleneans, and became Conquerour, and slew Erinenes Generall for the Athenians in the open field.
Whereupon, the Athenians quitted vnto Pittacus, the contentious field which they quarrelled for, in regarde of the victorie which hee obtayned against them: and gaue him the gouernment of their Common-wealth, which he ruled worthily the space of ten yeares, ordaining many good Laws and Constitutions for the benefit thereof. Which hauing done, he willingly gaue ouer his gouernement, as it was freely put vpon him: and liued vntill hee was seauenty yeares olde, beloued and honoured generally.

His sayings and Sentences are no lesse considerable, then those of the other Sages, neyther the manner of his life. For, first of all, he made so final account of the dignity, gold and riches of Croesus; King of Lydia, that hee would not receive any of him.

already a great deale more, then willingly he would haue. Giving thereby to vn-derstand, that hee was sorry for his Brothers succellion, which happened to him, because he affected his Brother, better then his owne welfare. He often saide, that things to come, were very difficult to vnderstand; and that there was nothing in the world more certain then the earth;
and contrariwise, that there was not any certainty in the Sea.

A wise man (quoth he) ought to foresee disasters: before they happen, the better to Thales, the sixth of the Sages of Greece, was a Native of Miletum, a City much renowned in Greece; and for the many vertues abiding in him, deferred well, that the cheefe place among the Sages, should be assigned to him. For, in the first place, he was Soueraigne in Geometry, and the first man that discouered the principall secrets of Astrology: as the course of the Sun, the reason of his Eclipses; and likewise of the Moone, and the Equinoctials. In briefe, he brought to light the course of the Planets, and many other secrets of naturall Philosophy. Moreouer, he was the cause, that the proud Title of Sages, remained to the seuen learned men of Greece, by this accident.

Vpon a day, sundry young men, and friendly companions of Miletum, had bought a draught of certaine Fishermen, hauing cast forth their Net into the sea, and the seely young men were to haue the benefit, of al to be drawne vp at that time. A most admirable case suddenly happened;
for when the Net was drawne vp, they found therein a Table of Golde, beautified and enriched in most costly and sumptuous manner. They which bought the draught, pretended, that the table of gold belonged to them, by their bargain. The Fishermen (on the contrary) auouched it to be no filth, & that they bought nothing of them, but only all the filth which should be taken: and therefore (in that respect) they had no right at all to the Table. A long and great contention grew between them; which to be the sooner ended, by full consent on eyther side, they sent to the Oracle of Apollo, for a final resolution:

where he, or the diuell speaking by him, made this answer: That the Table must be giuen to the only wise man of Greece.

Which being thus vnderstood, the golden Table was sent to Thales, as being the wisest man in Greece. But he was so modest, that he sent it to another of the Sages before named (for they were all liuing at that time) and hee sent it to another, so that the Table of gold passed from hand to hand, vntill at last it came to Solon, who likewise would not enioy it, but sent it to the Temple of Apollo, at Delphos.

Ausonius, Callimachus, and many other write, that through the countie vied in the Sages one towards another, the Table returned againe to the hand of Thales, to whom at first it was presented; and that he sent it to the Delphian Oracle. But how-soever those Authors write diuersly, concerning this History; yet all doe agree together in this, that Thales was the first man, to whom the golden Table was sent.

Aristotle making mention of Thales, reciteth many conceited sayings proce-ding from him, especially in his Bookes of Pollicies, and namely one, which he vied ordinarily. That when he pleased, he could be rich. Whereof he made good and sufficient proofe; for foreseeing by Astrology, that there would be a good season for Oli-ues, and Oyle of Oliues (soone after) was likely to be deare; he laid out his money, to buy Oliue Oyle while the season serued, which afterwards hee sold at what rate he pleased. Not because thereby hee would enrich himselfe; but to make a manifestation, that when he listed he could be rich, considering what knowledge he had, both for times of abundance, & likewise of dearth, when they would happen.
On a time it came to passe, that as he was gazing vpon the stars, he fell into a ditch;
which an old woman seeing, & comming (vpon his outcry) to help him, in mocking manner said to him. *Tell me Thales, how dardest

He was wont to say; That ouer-great assurance and confidence, was euermore accompanied with repentance. For many times, such as trust too much to others faithfull promises, are faine to pay the debts, from which no other caution could preuaile with them. He sayd moreover; That the true meanes of liuing vertuously, is, by not doing such things, as we condemne in other men.

Periander the last of the ten-uon Sages of Greece.

Now we come to speake of Periander, the last of the Græcian Sages, of whom I haue no great matters to relate; because (according to diuers authors) he was not in the rancke of the seauen Sages, and yet a man of singular wit and vnderstanding. Periander was King of Corinth, and the son of King Cypselus: the manner of his life being rather tyrannicall, as liuing like a Sol-dior or Captaine, rather then a Philoso-pher. And hence it ensued, that Heraclides, and many more beside, esteemed Periander to be none of the seauen Sages of Greece: but another Periander, who was (indeed) a great Philosopher; and a man highly renowned for vertue. Neuerthe-lesse, the most voices gaue the title of Sage to Periander; for although hee reigned by power at Corinth: yet notwithstanding, he was so discrete, valiant and so abso-lute vnderstanding, that thereby he won the name of Sage among the Greeks.

It was demanded of him, why he did not depart from his tyranny & kingdom; because (quoth he) I may fall into as great danger, by willingly leauing my king-dome, which none other can dispossele me of by force. He vied continually many notable Sentences, and had the word Consideration very frequent in his talke, as declaring thereby, that the principall thing we should haue care of, is, to consider well what affaires we vndertake. The Poet Ausonius, expounding the word Consi-deration, saith; A man should thinke some times on any thing, before hee presume to at-tempt it. For men (often-times) fall into great dangers, through much inconsi-deration: especially, when they will not be governed by wisdom or counsell, but rashly follow the persuasions of For-tune.

Vertue (sayd Periander) is immortal, but the pleasures of this world are of small continuance. In times of prosperity, be wise and modest; & in aduersity patient and constant. Live in such sort, that thou mayest haue honour by thy life, and that after thy death, men may account thee happy. Let an- cient Lawes and Ordinances be rules for thy gouernement, inducing no nouelties into the Common-wealth. Profite should alwayes be accompanied with good grace and honestie. Performe that chearefully, which thou canst not preuent but cowardly.

Complete he was in these, and in-finite other of the same nature, which bre-uiary maketh me spare to speake of.

CHAP. XXIII.

¶ That Sight is the chiefest and principall Sense of all the rest. And of many being blind, who neuertheless were men of great honour and renowne.

Aristotle had great reason to say; Sight is the very principall Sense of all the other corporeall senses. For, it is seated as in the maine Cittadell, in the high & most eminent part of the body, whereby we may vnderstand, that it partaketh greatly with fire: by vertue and power whereof, it is placed aboue all the other senses. Touching hath a terrestriall partici-pation, for the earth is most touchable and tractable; and of all the Elements, Tasting holdeth with Aquositie and hu-miditie: for, without humidity, a man cannot taste any thing. As for Smelling, Aristotle attributeth it to fire, saying; Heat is the foundation of odour, and her cold consisteth in vapour, ioynt to an Ayre grosse, and full of exhalation. Concerning

Hearing,

Hearing, euerie one well knoweth, that it partaketh with ayre, which entering into the eares, by found, causeth hearing; but sight participateth with fire.

And although that the Eye were com-posed of a moylt and waterish bodie, yet notwithstanding, without Fire, it wer not possibl: to haue sight: whereby wee may perceiue, that Sight or Seeing holdeth more of fire, then all the other senses doe beside. And because the eye (as Aristo-tle saith) doth more present the figures of things to a man, then all the other senses: to it is granted, the beginning of contemplation, and knowledge of all things. For from sight proceedeth admiration, and the consideration which a man hath by seeing, occasioneth a desire in him, of co-ming to vertue: So that (by good right) we may call the Eye, the Author and Inuenter of all Arts and Disciplines.

In the prime place, by the Eye, a man considereth the admirable Architecture of the heauens, & of all the other bodies: by the Eye we discern their colours and greatnesse, their formes, number, propor-tion, and measure; their sense, motion, & their resting. And although Hearing had some concurrence in this case with See-ing, so that it might be termed a sense of doctrine and of discipline, because men learne vertue by hearing and vnderstand-ing: yet (for all this) that title appertayneth principally to the sight, as vnto her, that giueth the meanes to the vnderstand-ing, to enquire by the plenitude of things which she heareth, to come to the true knowledge of them; to the end, that this knowledge may afterward be communi-cated to other. Hereby then we may ob-serve, that the first source or spring of in-struction, cometh from the Sight, who afterward maketh Hearing mistress of the worke, by comprehending those admi-rable things: presented first to the eyes cen-sure. Wherein also may be noted, that Hearing can comprehend nothing of it selfe, without vying the meane of another; but the Sight comprehendeth all things (as it were) euen of it selfe.

Moreover, Seeing surpasseth all other senses, in swiftnesse and promptitude of her operations: for in an instant, and with no more then a cast of the eye, the per-fecteth her designs: whereas the other senses are long, & laborious in their working. For, Touching must haue one thing or another, to execute her power and of-fice vpon, before (hee can expresse her prerogative. Tasting also must needs tar-ry, for some things answerable to his pal-late. And Smelling requireth such a ley-fure, in receiuing an ayre qualified, as may penetrate into her nostrilles: As the like doth Hearing, to comprehend a voice en-tering into the eares. But Sight only wor-keth instantly, and presently comprehendeth the images of things presented to hir in an vnspokeable and gracious manner. For, blowes may be seene giuen a great way off, and although the sound or noyse of them bee not heard so soone; yet not-withstanding, there is nothing that can conceale sight of the strokes, for they are sodaine and apprehensue vnto the Eye. And therefore, Seeing surmounteth the other senses, because it extendeth it selfe so farre.

In this respect, by many Histories and examples reported by Pliny, wee may ca-sily gather, that Sight hath a farre larger extent, then all the other senses, without any comparison, or wearying her selfe re-ligiously, as all the other do. For the Taste tareth it selfe by too much feeding. The Eare is easily offended, by talkative bab-bling. The Smell is trauailed extremely, by continuation of sweete Odors. But Sight folie, hath no sense of paine in her opera-tions. Nor doth she at any time wearie her selfe, as to close her lids retiredly; but rather, she is neuer satished with Seeing. In briefe, the excellency of Seeing is so great, that the name of Seeing is attrib-uted to all the other senses, in theyr severall operations. For, men ordinarily say, Be-holde the excellencie of this sweete O-dour a little while; or the Delicacie of this Musick; or the rare taste of this Fruite.

The name of Seeing, extendeth it selfe to the operations of the vnderstanding; for it is an vniuersall saying; Marke how my intention will come to passe. It is like-wise sayde in the Gospell, that our Lord and Sauour saw (that is to say, knew) the thoughts of the Scribes and Pharisees. And verily, among the miracles & workes which our blessed Sauour did in those vnworthy Countreys; it is helde for the most especiall and singular, that he gaue sight to the blind. labor, wherein our Physitions more glad-ly study and take paines, then to preferue and maintaine the sight of men.

I reade of a holy man named Azarius, who being present in a consultation, that diuers Physitions made before Fredericke King of Naples, concerning the maintaining of mens sight. When it came to his turne to speake, he said; There is nothing better to comfort the sight, then enuy, because it will alwayes make the goodes of an other man seeme greater then they are. This agreeeth with Ouids saying, Enuy euery thinks his neighbours Corne, more goodly then his owne. Notwithstanding, according to the opinion (almost) of all men, Spectacles do greatly serue to defend the sight: and surely, they were a very good inuention, though the first deuiler neuer knew it.

I haue heard of a great Lord in Spain, that would alwaies eate Cherries with his Spectacles on his nose; onely to make them seeme the bigger and more nourishing: but yet this gourmandise was exorbitant. An other Gentleman, being quipt by K. Phillip, because he fed ordinarily with Spectacles on his nose; answered the King, Sir you count it not strange, that I use my Spectacles in reading a Letter, in which can be no danger at all: why then do you blame me, because I eat fish with Spectacles on my nose, wherein are such an infinite number of bones, as the very least is able to strangle me, & which I cannot see without my Spectacles? Spectacles then serue to very good purpose many times. But to our former purpose againe concerning Sight.

Although Sight is the chiefe guide of many; yet notwithstanding, I haue read of diuers blind men, who were of no meane fame and reputation: Nature supplying their vnderstanding, for whatsoever wanted in their sight. Appian Claudius the great Orator, highly honored and esteemed of Cicero and Titus Linus, although hee was blind; was elected Censor at Rome, which office hee managed with so singular authority, as he only hindered the peace the whole Senate had concluded with King Pyrrius, Cicero discourseth amply in the fifth Booke of his Tusculan Questions, concerning the blindness of Appian Claudius, and of remedies against diseases in the eyes.

Caius Drusus, the most famous Lawyer and Advocate, was blinde; and yet neuertheless, his house was continually full of clients and suitors, who rather affected to be guided by his darke wisdom, then by their owne eye-sight. Caius Aspidius, a great companion with Cicero in his youth, was Prætor of Rome; and yet left not to opine in the Senate, and all his friends receiued counsell from him, in their very greatest and weightiest affairs. And notwithstanding this blindness, yet he digested a very notable Chronicle, of his own writing, whereof was made most high estimation. Diadorus a Stoical philosopher, was greatly renowned in his darkenes, and for all that imperfection, he could study in the night time, & play on his viole in the day; nay more, he taught Geometry publicly, a matter almost incredible, considering that it can not be practised but by the eye.

Antipater of Cyrenæica, and Aclepiades the Critique Poet, were both of the blind; and yet bearing their disaster with patient soules, they neuer gaue ouer studying Philosophy, but therein spent their time to the benefit of many. And when certain Ladies (grieving at his hard fortune) sate weeping by Aclepiades, hee said to them: Forbear (noble Ladies) because you know not what a pleasure it is, to dwell in darknes: they then demanding of him, what profit he receiued by his blindness, he replied; I haue a boy more now to keep me company then I had before. Homer, the Prince of Poets, was blind also, as his name imported; according to the saying of Cicero: neuertheless, tis vnkowne when he lost his sight; but true it is (as Ouid saith) that this disaster happed to him in his olde age.

Didimus Alexandrinus, may likewise be ranked with them that haue gone before, who being blinde euen from his youth, became (neuertheless) a most perfect Logician; studying besides, in all other humane disciplines; and hee made a very notable Commentary vpon the Psalms of David. Such then, as wee haue before spoken of, perceiving themselves to be deprived of their sight, did yet striue and labour to performe thin memorable, as Necessity is alwayes sayd to be industrious.

But that which Democritus did to himselfe, made the world both astonished & smile smile at together: For, (as Lucretius and Andrus Gellius do affirme) he plucked out his owne eyes, to enjoy the more freedom in his contemplations. But Tertullian (who was an Author worthy of credite) maintaineth, that he did it, onely to auoide the inordinate appetites of the flesh.

About all other men, subiected to the infelicite of blindness, Zisca the Bohemian deserueth no meane remembrance, who being blind, was chosen chiefe Capitaine and Commander of the Sect hee professed among the Bohemians; and so well executed his charge, that he obtained many victories against his enemies, and carried himselfe so worthily in his place, that hee atchieued immortal memorie.

Belus also, second king of Hungaria being elected chiefe of the Hungarian army; had his eyes plucked out by the meanes of King Colomanus, his owne vncle. Being blinded thus, hee withdrew into Greece, where he made such plaine apparence of his manly spirit and wisdom: that King Stephen, sonne to King Colomanus, repeated him, and gaue him in marriage the daughter to the count of Serua. In which dignity he carried himselfe with such rare integritie, as (after the death of King Stephen) hee was chosen King of Hungaria. And being blinde, reigned nine yeares; during which time he had diuers warres, and especially against Braccus, the bastard sonne to King Colomanus; whom yet he vanquished, so that he left the kingdom of Hungaria peaceably to his sonnes.

The last blinde man, whereof wee will speake at this time, was John, King of Bohemia, who reigned in the yeare of our Lord 1350. or thereabout. And surely, it is almost myraculous of this Prince, that blinde Zisca should maintaine his Commanders place so worthily, being General of the Bohemian army, against Belus then reigning in Hungaria: yet I hold all nothing to blinde John of Bohemia, who had so much valour (after his owne victory) to succour (in person) Phillip King of France, his kinsman, in his warre against King Edward of England. For, this blind King, euer affected to make one in the field; assisting also the Earle of Flanders, and many French Princes.

CHAP. XXV.

¶ That Auarice or Couetousnesse, is a most enormous vice, and subiect to great dangers: With sundry examples of diuerse persons, who were extremely couetous.

He Auarice of our instant dayes, induced mee to discourse on this sin, as a case of most perillous and extreme danger: and to intermeddle among my relations, certain histories of many couetous men, which may serue as exampls to other yet liuing. Desiring all Readers (in the meane while) to consider the estate of a couetous man, with the like eie, as common people doe diligently looke vpon a monster, which foule juggler or Mountebanke bringeth into a city, for singularity & obseruation.

As entrance then into our discourse, it is to be noted, that Aristotle, Cicero, Thomas Aquinas, and many other Authours beside, haue diuersly defined what Auarice is; neuertheless, we may deriue this resolution from their definitions. That Auarice is an inordinate desire of a mans enriching himselfe, without sparing part of his goods to any other; so that we may well say, this vice is excessiue in desiring and griping, but very cold and slowe in giuing or parting with any thing. Vnder the cloake of this sinne, march a thousand disorders, infinite iniustices and abominations, sheltering themselves there so safely, as they cannot doe the like in anie of the other vices. For, as Virgil saith; Execrable famine of gold, is there any vice, which thou inducest not into the hearts of men? S. Paul also saith: Couetousnesse or Auarice is the source or roote of all euils, hauing made many to wander from Faith, which otherwise would haue kept and followed it.

That Auarice is a sinne most abhominable, appeareth sufficiently in this, because it makes a man hated both of God and men, being (of it selfe) quite contrary to Charitie: which is such a vertue, as conioyneth God and men together, euen as the opposite sinne maketh a man hateful vnto himselfe. For, the loue of our selues is so rooted in our hearts, that wee respect not any thing, in regarde of our felues, louing alwayes our owne profit, more then any others. And yet notwithstanding, Auarice hath gotten such preeminence ouer man, as he cares for nothing but getting money, being loth to forgetfull of himselfe, that hee will neither eate, drinke, nor clothe himselfe decently; but rather is content to fast, and almost starue himselfe, because he will not allow the least leisure from the scraping goods together. Nay, he feareth not to hazard both his soule & body, so he may be sure to get money; which is a thing repugnant to the Lawe of Nature, who ordained and instructed vs, to affect and maintaine our felues, and contemne all things, before our owne liues. And yet the couetous man cares not to loose and condemne his owne soule; yea, and abridge his life, which he will endanger in a moment, for the getting of a Crowne.

Vndoubtedly, it is much to be lamented, that a man should not respect himselfe, nor his parents, wife, children nor friends; provided that he may wallow in wealth and mucke of the world: such an one was the Rich man, spoken of in the Gospell. What a miserable and wretched follie is it, to endure hunger, thirst, colde, ill cloathing, and neither sleep by day or night, but every houre to endanger life, and yet make no vse of golde when it is gotten? It ought, and should serue for the sustentation of life, and to that end riches were ordaind. Obserue the words of our blessed Sauour; What a wayleth is a man to winne the whole world, and loose his life, that is, his soule? Surely, I am of opinion, that this happeneth by the Diuine permission, casting such couetous men into a reprobate sence, to the end they may die in that avaritious will and desire.

And yet notwithstanding, God often permitteth that wealth scraped together, by such toyale and trauaile: shall fall into the hands of other, to scatter as prodigally, as it was gotten wickedly, and wonderfully sparing. This is that whereof Salomon speaketh in his Ecclesiastes: Such as heape up riches, gotten by iniustice, leave them for other to spend. For, can that thing bee good for an other, which is euill in him who hath it? Iuuenall also vpon the very same words speaketh thus. Some doe gaine and make profit, only to maintaine their life; and there are others, who live not but to gaine. In brieft, this wicked vice doth so captiuate a man, that it robbes him of all loue and respect to himselfe: so that there is not any wickednesse in this world, but it may well bee expected in a couetous man.

* Dion the Philosopher said, Auarice is the head of all wickednesse. Euripides saith, An ambitious & couetous Iudge, can neither thinke or desire any iust thing. Saint Augustine saith, who soeuer suffereth himselfe to be gouerned by Auarice, becometh subiect to all vices and wickednesse. And this is conformable to good reason. For, the couetous man (by Auarice) becometh a tempter, periured, an euill payer, an vflurer, a deceiver, a traytor, a turne-taile, a thiefe, a tyrant, and an idolater: so that it is not possible, that a couetous man should haue any good being; neither as Lord nor vassalle, gouernour nor subiect, father nor sonne, nor friend or coufine, and in the end, neuer doth good, except when he dyeth.

* Lucilius sayd, An avaritious man is good to no bodie, because he is wicked to himselfe. Democritus maintained, That extreme Auarice, is worse then extreme Pouertie. Aristotle in the first Booke of his Politiques saith: Desire to become rich, peruerseth the mind; and therefore riches serue as powertie to a couetous man: because hee dare not rise them, for feare of empaying his estate. The Stoicks had a saying, That wisdom and necessitie came not of powertie, but of abundance: for, the more that a man hath, so much the more needy is he. Concluding, It is good to haue a little, because as no time to be needie. Plato gaue this counsell to a couetous man, to become rich indeed, hee should not encrease his wealth, but rather decrease his auarice or couetoufnesse.

All these notable Sentences before remembered, are intirely conformable to the sacred Scriptures, who declare; That the eyes of a couetous man are insatiable. Salomon also saith in Ecclesiastes: A couetous man is neuer satisfied with money: And that who soeuer addictheth his mind to riches, shall neuer enjoy them. Saint Augustine compareth the couetous man to hell, which can neuer be glutted enough, and neuer saith it hath sufficient, although it hath beene so long time in filling. greedy couetous man is neuer satisfied, but the more he gaineth, the more he gapeth still after gayne; thinking himselfe poorer and poorer. Saint Ierome sayth: The couetous man is so needie of that which hee hath, as if hee had it not at all. And alwayes his auarice encrease, as fire doth being continually fed with dry wood. As much or rather more, haue many other holie men sayd; all in vtter detestation of this damnable sinne.

Neuertheless, because I will no longer weary the Reader, I shall conclude this point with the saying of Saint Augustine: *How strangely insatiable is this desire in men? Other creatures haue their appetites limited for they hunt when they are hungry, and being satisfied, they leave their prey. But hee that coueteth the riches of this world, is insatiable: for hee seeketh and boordeth up daily, taking wealth from all hands, without fearing, cyther God or men. Hee knoweth neither father nor mother, he maketh no account of his brethren, or any friends of his; hee neuer careth for keeping his word: Hee oppresseth Widowes, robbeth Orphanes, and serues his turne with free-men, euen as if they were slaves: He is commonly a false witness, and cares not how hee engroffeth up dead mens goods: Are not these commendable qualities in a couetous man? Let vs flee then from this accursed vice, which (ouer & beside the former notes of wickednes) is incurable (according vnto the saying of Aristotle) for it increaseth with age: so that Auarice is in his full reigne, when bodily strength faileth in man.*

To shunne one falling into this slauiish sin, I will alleadge some examples of wicked couetous men, among whom, Indas Iscariot marcheth in the first rancke; he being an Apostle and Disciple of Christ Iesus, was so subiect to Auarice: that he would robbe the money from the rest of his fellowes and companions, by bearing the bagge, and hauing the money in his owne possession. This wicked passion had so farre blinded him, that he accounted the precious Oyntment to be lost, wherewith Mary Magdalen anoynted the feete of our blessed Sauour. For, if the Oyntment had beene solde, hee would haue stolne part of the price. In the end, he was so strangely led by this sinne, that (for money) he solde his Lord and Master. This onely example were sufficient to approue whatsoeuer hath beene said concerning couetoufnesse: neuertheless, I am content to report some other, among which, Tiberius Caesar Emperour of Rome is the foremost man; and questionlesse, there is no other vice in the world, better to be exampld in the Romain Emperours, then this of Auarice.

This Prince, among other his notorious vices, (whereto hee was very easily moued) was so subiect to penurious griping, and pinching, that although he was Lord of the whole world; yet notwithstanding, he put to death Cnaeus Lentulus (whom he had instituted to be his heire) onely to enjoy his wealth. As much did he to the King of the Parthians, who did come to liue with him vnder his safe-conduct; onely to possesse himselfe of the riches and treasure, belonging to the simply abused Prince. He so heauily charged the poore with taxes and toyles, that they were enforced to forsake their countries, in such sort; that the Cities and Townes remayned desert and vnhabitable. In the end, pursuing on still his insatiable inclination: Caligula smothered him between two pillowes, and so hee dyed.

Domitian the Emperour was more couetous then he: And the Emperour Commodus (therein) exceeded them both: for he (ordinarily) vsed to make port-sale of iustice: and therefore heauen iustly permitted them to be stabbd to death by Ponnyards. Achelous King of Lydia, was so ouercome with couetoufnesse, that hee could not be contented with his Crowne lands, and very large ordinary reuenues; but layd (beside) such taxes and impositions vpon his subiects, that they arose in Armes against him, and hauing taken him, murdered him most miserably, and (afterwards) hung him vp by the heeles.

Pontanus maketh mention of a Cardinal, who was so extraordinarily avaritious, as he would often disguise himselfe like vnto a poore groom or slave, and steale away the prouender from before his owne horses. Horace saith, that there was a man in Rome, named Ouid, who was so abundantly rich in money, that he could measure his gold and Silver by many bushels: and yet notwithstanding, hee would goe starke naked, and neuer did eate halfe so much as would suffice him; as feazing still accident of his confederates death, which he neuer dreamed of; and he himselfe forsworne for nothing.

Heere to I will adde Cæsar Borgia, Duke of Valentia; whome Machiavel so highly admitteth, that he propoeth him for a patterne or example to his Prince. This Cæsar, being become exceeding rich and potent, by the helpe and Authority of Alexander the sixt, his Father; and fearing nothing so much as his Fathers death, whereby it might chance, that some enemie of his might be chosen to succede him; studied and laboured by all meanes possible to prevent that inconvenience, & to procure, that the election of his Fathers successor, might fall into the power of himselfe and his friends. Which when hee had provided sufficiently, as he thought; it chanced by such meanes as I will declare.

After a while, not onely his Father died; but he fell likewise so extremely sicke at that time, that hee could execute nothing of that which hee had before resolved. Whereby it came to passe (God so disposing in his iust judgement) that an enemy of his fathers and his (being chosen to succede) he was within a while utterly overthrowne. In which respect, he himselfe was wont afterward to confesse, and lament the imbecility of mans witte, because when hee thought, that he had foreseene all inconveniences, which might happen to him by his Fathers death, and provided to prevent them: hee neuer so much as imagined, that he should bee so sicke at the same time, that he should not be able to put any of his designements in execution.

And herein is also to be noted; for further prooffe of the matter in hand, that he himselfe was the cause, as well of his owne sickness, as of his fathers death, and consequently of his owne overthrowe, by a wonderful chance, which hapned contrary to his expectation. For, having invited his Father, and Cardinall Cornetti to a Vineyard, with intent to poyson the Cardinall, so the end to inherit his goods; hee re-commended a certaine Bottle of impoisoned wine, to a trusty servant of his, with speciall charge to keepe it safe, and giue it to none without his expresse order. But it to fell out, by his servants negligence (or rather by Gods iustice)

that as the Psalmist saith; Incident in fouem quam fecit: He fell into the pit himselfe, that he had made for other. For his Father, coming into supper very hot and thirstie, by reason of the great heates, and calling for wine; the servant that had charge of the Bottle (not knowing it was poysoned; but imagining onely, that it was some speciall wine, more precious then the residue) & not having any other ready (because the poyson was not brought from the Pallace) gaue him of that wine, whereof not onely he, but his son Borgia drank. And being both poysoned therewith, the Father (who was old and weake) died presently: but the Sonne being young, and more able to resist the force of the poyson; had time to take great and potent remedies, whereby (after a long and dangerous sickness) he hardly escaped. Thus was his bloody plot and pernicious purpose preuented, by an accident which he neuer minded.

But lets come now to an example in our Countrey of England, which manie yet may well remember. The Lord John Dudley, Earle of Warwick, and after Duke of Northumberland, in the time of K. Edward the sixte, meaning to advance himselfe and his Family; married the Lorde Guilford Dudley (his fourth sonne) to the Lady Jane, daughter to the Duke of Sussex; pretending to make her Queene after King Edward, in prejudice of the Lady Mary, daughter to King Henry the 8. and eldest sister to the sayd King Edward. For, by reason of the Kings lingering sickness, he had time to vie all the meanes, which he thought convenient for the accomplishing of his desire. And therefore partly for friendship, and partly for feare, hee had herein so farre preuailed, that there seemed to want nothing for assurance of his intention: but only to haue the Lady Mary in his hands; whome therefore hee procured the Councell to send for in the Kings name; vpon pretence, that the should come to comfort the king; where to the obeyed, not suspecting any sinister meaning in the Duke.

But as she was vpon the way, and somewhat neere to London; before she fell into the snare prepared for her, it pleased God, that shee received aduice of the Dukes designement, from one of his owne counsell: wherupon she returned sodainly, ly, and within a while after, that she arrived at her owne house; she had newes of the King her Brothers death. And although the was destitute of men, money, counsell, and all other meanes to enable her, whereby to resist to great an adversary as the Duke (who was not meanly provided) yet such was her trust in God, as also the iustice and right of her cause; that she provided her household servants to proclaim her Queene presently in the countrey Townes thereabout. Whereupon, first the common people of the countrey adioyning, and (afterward) diuers gentlemen of account repaired vnto her in so great a number: that the Duke of Northumberland and the Councell (who had already proclaimed the Lady Jane in London, and in diuers parts) thought it convenient to leuy forces, and to make a royal Army, whereof the Duke himselfe (for the authority of his person) was General.

The Duke then presently put himselfe into the field, leaving the charge of the City & Tower of London, to the Lords of the Councell: who, vpon his absence, and vnderstanding the great concourse of people, to the assistance of the Lady Mary, and the equity of her cause iustly considered: they agreed amongst themselves, to proclaim her in London, as presently they did, and committed to prison the Lady Jane. Then sent they order to apprehend the Duke, who was so dismayed therewith when he vnderstood it; that he utterly lost his high and hopeful courage; and being taken prisoner at or neere Cambridge, was brought to London, and there afterward executed.

By these examples, and infinite others which might be alleged, it is verie evident, that there is no surety in the plottes and contriuings of men, be they neuer so wise, except they be guided by the Spirit of God particularly. For, when they haue built (as a man may say) Towers of policy, as high as the Tower of Babel; a sodaine blast of an accident vnexpected, shall cast them downe to the very ground, to the confusion (many times) and ruine of the builders and contriuers.

But what shall we say of counsellors and policies, that seeme not only to be grounded vpon great reason, and continued also with as great prudence; but also suc-ceede (for some time) notably well; & yet in the end proue to be pernicious? Vnder these we haue seene sufficient experience in the Romane Empire, which was overthrowne in course of time, by that (which for many years) seemed to bee the strength and security thereof. For, whereas the first Romane Emperors, having oppressed the Common-wealth by Armes, perswaded themselves, that their state was to bee established and conferred, by the selfsame meanes as it was gotten, and therefore resolved, that the safety thereof, & of theyr persons, consisted in strong Guards, garisons, Legions, and Armies of soldiers, to be distributed throughout all the parts of their Dominions: it is euident, that the same was (in the end) one of the principall and cheefest causes, of the Emperors utter overthrow, though (at the first) it seemed greatly to establish and assure the same.

For, after the death of Nero (when the Family of the Cæsars was ended) not onely the Guards departed for the custody, & safeguard of the Emperors persons, called Pretorian milites; but also the Legions & Armies, disposed and placed in diuerse quarters of the Empire (seeing as well the personnes of the Emperors, as also the strength of the Empire in their own hands) did arrogate vnto themselves, such authority and liberty to chuse new Emperors: that they set them vppe, and pulled them downe at their pleasure. Vnder which then one year after Neros death, foure Emperors, Galba, Otho, Vitellius, and Vespasian, were chosen by the Guardes, who forced the Senate to admit and confirme them. And their insolency grew to such extremity in time, that after the death of the Emperor Pertinax (whom they killed) they made offer of the empire (by publike proclamation) to whosoever would giue most for it.

And whereas there was but onely two that offered money for it, Sulpicianus, and Didius Iulianus; they gaue it to the latter, partly because he gaue them ready money, and partly because Sulpicianus was Father in Law to Pertinax, whom they had slain. And, whilst not onely the Emperours guards, but also the soldiors of every army tooke vpon them to make Emperors: it fell out sometimes, that there were as many Emperors chosen at once, as there were

Thus was the Romane Empire ouerthrowne, by the same meanes, that were not only ordained to conserue and maintaine it; but also did indeede (for a time) preserue it from many dangers, both domesticall and forraigne, to wit, as well from inuasion of forraigne enemies, as from rebellions of Subiects: which by the Emperours Guards, and the ordinary Legions, dispersed through all parts of the empire, were either easily preuented, or speedily repressed. For which cause, the Emperours themselves were content, to stand (as it were) at their mercy, to the end that they might (by them) rule and command others; which although to some it was a safeguard and security, yet to manie more it brought ruine and perdition; as to Caligula, Pertinax, Caracalla, Heliogabalus, Papianus, Balbinus, Galen, Sewerus, Macrinus, Aurelianus, Julius Maximinus, Probus, with diuers other; some of them being slaine by their owne Guards, and some by their Soldiers.

The Turkes

This inconuenience, the Emperours of Turkes doe seeke to remedy, in their Tyrannicall Dominion (which they also vphold by force, as the Romans did, though with lesse danger.) For, although they haue about three hundred thousand horse, and foote euery readinesse, vnder their Colonels and Captaines, in Europe, Asia, and Africa: yet they keepe them alwayes fundered, and farre dispersed, that they neuer come together in any number, vnlesse they are to be employed in some forraigne Warre. Neuerthelesse, their Guardes of Janizaries, which they haue alwayes neere about them, for the security of their persons, to the number of thirtene or foureteene thousand, haue proued (many times) no lesse dammageable, then dangerous to their States. For they haue not onely sometime set the younger Brother against the elder, and holpe the sonne to depose the father: but also (euen in our Age) haue taken the most confident Officers, and greatest fauorites of the Turke from him by force, and smote off their heades; and compelled him to pardon them, yea, and to giue them whatsoeuer they would demand, to appease them.

Whereupon, two considerations may be gathered; the one, the infelicities of Tyrants, who while they seek rather to be feared, then louingly affected: are forced to make themselves subiects & slaues to those, by whome they keepe other in subiection and slavery. Whereby wee see, how true it is which Seneca saith; Quod a lieno metum magnum est, suo non vacat. That which is great by others feare, is not void of feare in it selfe. The other consideration, is, how tickle the state of Princes is, how weak their policies, how vncertaine the successe of their plots; and consequently, how needfull it is for them, to craue and haue the especiall protection of Almighty God, in all their designements and actions; seeing the meanes wherby they labour to preserue themselves from dangers, proue many times more dangerous in the end, then the dangers themselves, which they seeke to auoid.

This may further appeare, by the policie which Rodericke King of Spain vied, to assure his state against the children and friends of King Ysida, whom hee had deposed. For, fearing lest his subiects might rebell in their fauour, hee dismantled all the strong holds and places in Spain, and disarmed the people. Whereby, though hee strengthened his state, in regard of domesticall danger; yet hee weakened it, in respect of forraigne attempts. In somuch, that the Moores inuading him shortly after, and ouerthrowing him in battell, found so slender resistance afterward, that in feauen or eight moneths, they conquered almost all Spain.

The like also may be saide of the Brittaines, to whom their owne policie proued most pernicious; for, being mollified by the Picts and Scottes; they called in the Saxons for their defence, who (for sometime) serued them to good purpose; but in the end, they conquered them & their Country.

In like manner, the Queene of Hungarie thought it good policie, to procure the the ayde and assistance of Solyman the Great Turke, against Ferdinando King of the Romanes, brother vnto the Emperour Charles, the fifth of that name; and (for a certayne time) hee was relected and supported thereby: but in the end, Solyman coming into Hungarie, in his owne person, with a pretence to succour her: hee depriued both her and her sonne of their Kingdome: Also Amurath, one of Solyman's Ancestours, conquered and subdued the greatest part of all Greece, euen by the very like kinde of meanes and occasion.

But peraduenture you will say, that this was so grosse a follie in Christian Princes (to put confidence and trust in the helpe of such potent and perfidious Infidells) that it is not to bee alledged for an example of policie. I graunt that it was follie; but such kindes of follie may bee committed and doone, euen by the wisest Princes and their counsellors, when Almighty GOD will punish and afflict them. For, hee eyther taketh from them their politicke wittes, to the end they may erre and precipitate themselves: or, hee ouerthroweth their wisest designements, by such kinde of meanes as they cannot imagine: or else, hee doth bring them to such exigents, that they are forced (sometimes) wittingly, to take in hand some dangerous and desperate resolution, whereby they are disgraced and ruined.

CHAP. XXVIII.

A briefe Discourse concerning the first foundation of Ierusalem: What fortunes (from time to time) befall there to: And of the Kings that there did reigne.

The admirable graces & priviledges of Ierusalem in precedent
time.

Neuer was there any Towne or Cittie (of what estate or condition soeuer) that had so many especiall graces and priuiledges from Almighty God, nor euer had such store of sacred mysteries therein performed, as in the Cittie of Ierusalem: although it had not had that (onely chiefe) note, that our blessed Lord and Saviour was there crucified, dead and buried; and that the mysteries and secrets of our redemption, had not bene there accomplished: Contrariwise, there is not any Cittie in the world, that euery endured so many miseries and mischances, or fell into such slauiish seruitude, as hee, and as is to be discerned at this day.

As concerning her riches, and sumptuous buildings, no Cittie vpon the earth could euer equal them; as Pliny extollet it about all the Citties in the East, and Cornelius Tacitus amply describeth the situation thereof: whereby wee may easily collect, that it was one of the most potent Citties in the world. As much affirmeth Iosephus, who describeth the three wals wherewith it was ingirt: which neuerthelesse were adorned with goodly Towers, Bulwarkes, and buildings most rare; besides the excellencie of the Temple, a thing beyond all compasse of comparison. All which considered, I thought it not vn-necessary, to make some briefe report, concerning the first foundation of this Cittie, with what fortunes happened thereto (as well good as euill) by a summarie Collection, of such things as I find recorded in her owne Chronicles.

Ierusalem was situated and founded, in the very midst of Iudea or Ierrie, at the toppe or knap of Mount Sion; which is helde or reputed (commonly) to be the middle or centre of the earths superficies. Ezechiel also saith, That it was seated in the midst of Nations. David likewise saith, That the saluation of men was perfected in the midst of the earth. Which Saint Hierome declareth, writing on that passage of Ezechiel before specified. Moreover, it is written in Genesis, That Melchisedech (which, according to the interpretation of Saint Paul) is as much to say, as a Iust King, or a King of Iustice. Abraham hauing conquered foure Kings, that kept Lot prisoner, mett him and made a sacrifice to God; and that this Prince baptized this Cittie of Salem, or (as some say) Salem, which is as much to say, as Peace: in regard wherof, he was called King of Peace.

Salem then was the first name imposed vpon this Cittie: although Saint Eliensis is of the opinion, that it had the name of Iebus at the beginning. Strabo, Cornelius Tacitus, and many other Authors beside, called it Solima, speaking otherwise of the foundation, then formerly hath bene sayd.

This City likewise was called Iebus and Ierusalem, as wee may reade in the sacred Scriptures. Saint Hierome writing to Dardanus, doeth giue it three names: Notwithstanding, it was (in the end) called Aelia, in regarde of the Emperours name Aelius Adrianus, who caused it to bee re-built and fortified. Saint Hierome sayth, that it had the name of Iebus, in regard of the Iebusites, who had founded it, vntill the time of the holy Prophet Dauid.

Iosephus and Agesippus say, that Melchisedech gaue it the name of Ierusalem, as much to say, as Vision of peace: making one word of Iebus and Salem. So that Ierusalem found it selfe to be composed of these two wordes, onely by changing B into R. Others say, that it had the name of Here, that is to say, Vision: by reason of the Angel which appeared to Abraham, when hee would haue sacrificed his sonne Isaac.

Some others say, that it was called Ierusalem, as much to say, as the house of Salomon: in regarde of the admirable buildings which King Salomon erected there: many other opinions are there vpon this poynt, which I passe ouer lightly; because I am of the minde, that as the Iewes called it in their tongue Ierusalem, so did the Greekes and the Latines name it Ierosolima, as wee may reade in Iosephus and Agesippus, Greeke Authors. Yet, Nicholas de Lyra will not haue it to bee so receyued, because hee sayth, that Ierusalem was first called Luca and Bethel: which I can giue but little credite vnto; for (according as Saint Hierome sayth) Bethel is twelue miles off from Ierusalem, as wee may see it also auouched by Iosephus. Notwithstanding all these opinions, it is to be noted, that Ierusalem (in former times) had many particular names; which were thereto attributed, in regard of the manifold high mysteries therein accomplished. As, The holy City; The Sacred Citty; The Citty of Dauid, and many other such like Titles, besides her owne proper and peculiar name, Ierusalem.

But come wee now vnto the Historie. The Iebusites and the Canaanites, who were one and the same Nation (for Iabub or Iebus, was the sonne of Canaan, the sonne of Can, Nephew to Noah, of whom these Nations tooke their name) were Lordes of Ierusalem, at such time as the Children of Israel (deliuered from the Captiuitie of Egipt) possessed themselues of Palestine and Iudea. And it came to passe, that in the diuision or partage, which the twelue Tribes of Israel made of the Land promised vnto them: Ierusalem fell into the portion of the Tribe of Beniamin. Neuerthelesse, because this Tribe of Beniamin (notwithstanding all their aduentures in Armes) could not wholly cleare the Country of the Iebusites: they were constrained to let them liue there among them, for more then three hundred and seauenty yeares after, euen to the time of Dauid. Hee being both a Prophet and King, and descended of the Tribe of Iuda; expelling the Iebusites, wonne their Fortresses from them, building them new againe, and erected there a goodly Pallace, as wee may reade in the Booke of Kings, and also in Iosephus. Dauid hauing thus expelled the Iebusites, called Ierusalem, The City of God, creating it to be the chiefe and Capital City in all Iudea.

During the Reigne of King Dauid, Ierusalem was in her triumphing iollity, and highly renowned among all the Nations, in regarde of the great victories which Dauid obtayned: after whose death, wife Salomon succeeded him. And although this King laboured to liue in peace, yet Ierusalem still increased in fame, riches and sumptuous buildings: for Salomon enlarged the walles thereof, and erected there goodly fortifications. Hee builded many other costly Castles beside: but especially the Temple, so greatly renowned, in regard of the treasure and artificial cunning bestowed thereon, as neuer could any other building be compared therewith. For, as wee may reade in holy Scripture, and also in Iosephus, the Furniture thereto belonging, was infinite and incomprehensible. So that the very fame thereof, incited the Queene of Saba to visite King Salomon.

Many

Many Kings likewise sent him choyle Presents to the same effect, Gold, Silver, and Treasure, which they brought to him by sea, and in such abundance, as no more account was made thereof, then as stones in the streete.

This King neuerthelesse, forgetting the great blessings which God had bestowed vpon him; became an Idolater, so that God suffered his kingdome to be diuided after his death.

Hauing reigned forty yeares, Rehoboam his sonne succeeded him; against whom ten of the Tribes revolted, who elected Ieroboam to be their King. Rehoboam had but two of the Tribes onely, to wit, Iuda and Beniamin, whereupon he fortified his Cities: and afterward, this Kingdome remaining to his successours, began to take and continue the name of Ierusalem, because of the Tribe of Iuda. Ieroboam and his successours, called themselues Kings of Israel, and chose Samaria to be the chiefe City of that Kingdome: and by this diuision, those Kings were alwayes at continuall warre, each against other. Notwithstanding, although Rehoboam had but two of the Tribes subiect to him, yet his reputation was so great (because hee was descended of Dauid) that euermore hee prevailed in fight, and was much more feared and obeyed, then the King of Israel, so that Ierusalem became not a little diminished, eyther in strength or riches. But when the Kings of Iuda and their people, grew offensive to God by Idolatry: then this goodly City suffered many miseries and calamities.

Rehoboam hauing strongly defended his Townes and Cities, and they flourishing in all pompe and prosperity; hee notwithstanding, fell to Idolatry, as wee may reade in the holy Chronicles; and likewise in Iosephus. In regard whereof, God raised vp against him, Sufac or Shishbak, King of Egipt, who came and towred his Country with twelue hundred Chariots, threescore thousand horse, and a countless number of Infantry, belonging to the Egiptians, Ethiopians, Troglodytes, with many Lybians, which came from Gynna, to his seruice. Boldly they entred into Ierusalem, sacked the City and the Temple, from whence they carried infinite Treasures, as is to be obserued in his chronicle. After which chastisements, the anger of God being appeased; Rehoboam remained peaceably in his Kingdome, all the remainder of his life: and being dead, Abias succeeded him, who ouer-came Ieroboam King of Israel; in which conquest were slaine fifty thousand men belonging to Ieroboam.

After the death of Abias, who liued but a while (being also an Idolater; and yet God permitted him to haue this victory, in consideration of Dauid his grandfather) Asa succeeded him. This Prince was good, iust, and feared God, and therefore hee gaue him many great and signall victories, against Zarab, King of Ethiopia: who had entred so farre vpon his Country, that he kept Ierusalem besieged. In his time, the Kingdome of Iuda was so flourishing, that (vpon an account made) there were found five hundred and fourescore thousand men, able to beare Arms. I finde also in the sacred Scripture, that this King builded and fortified many Cities.

Hee being deceased, Iehoshaphat his sonne came to the Crowne, during whose Reigne, Ierusalem was in great reputation: chiefly in respect of Prophets, as Abias, Michas, Ostias, Elias and Elihu, who were all then at that time. This King found such fauour in the sight of God (according as wee reade in the holy Chronicles of the Kings) that the Moadibites, Ammonites, and the Mountaineers of Seir (being gathered together, with an infinite number of people, to runne vpon this Prince) God sent a dissention among them; that they conuerted thence, and employed their powers to spoyle themselues, so that without striking a stroke, King Iehoshaphat returned with great triumph to Ierusalem. Where hauing reigned peaceably, and in no wicane power, hee dyed, leauing the Kingdome vnto Joram his sonne, giuing also to his other Children, diuers Cities, with great summes of gold and silver.

Joram being come vnto the Crowne, hee followed not the steps of his Father, nor of his Grand-father. But gaue himselfe to impiety and crudelly, putting to death his owne Brethren. He laboured also to haue alliance with Achab, King of Israel, whose counsell hee mainly followed in his affaires, and likewise tooke his Daughter in marriage. Whereat

God being displeased, suffered the men of Edom to revolt from him. The Arabs also made warre vpon him; which proved in such cruell manner, that the whole Countrey of Iuda, was thereby vterly waited.

After his death, Ahasias, or Ochozias his Sonne, succeeded in the Kingdome, with his Mother Athalia: and, as they were both of most Wicked life, came to, hadde they asynhappie an ending.

Next him succeeded Ochozias, who gaue good apparence in the beginning of his Reigne, to doe all things for the best, as well in regard of Religion, as for actions of policie. For, he reduced the Temple into the first condition, and re-established all the damages and iniuries which the Kinges of Egypt (and especially his Father Ahasias) had done. But soone after, hee fell vnto Idolatrie, so that (by common voyce of the people) hee caused the Prophet Zacharie to be put to death.

So highly was the goodnesse of Almighty God distasteth herewith, that he sent a terrible chastisement vpon Ierusalem, and that in the time of King Amasias, Sonne vnto this Ochozias. Who hauing Warre against Ioua, King of Israell, and neuer remembering the great Victories, which God had giuen him against the Idumeans, and manie other Nations: both hee and his people were overcome, and being ledde Prisoner vnto Ierusalem his owne City, was compelled to yeelde it to the mercy of Ioua, who caused it to be dismantled, and foure hundred fadomes of the Vallies to bee beaten downe. He spoyleth the Temple also, and possided himselfe of all the wealth and riches belonging vnto King Amasias: returning home afterwards (in Triumph) to his Citie of Samarita.

Furthermore, King Amasias being slaine by Treason, Azarias, or Ozias his Sonne next succeeded, who was a verie valiant and potent Prince. First of all, he strengthened Ierusalem, and all the other dismantled Cities, enriching his Countrey, by diuers great victories which hee obtained against the Philistines, Arabs, and Ammonites, making them all Tributaries vnto his Crowne; so that the renoune of Ierusalem, encreased day by day, while hee reigned; and hee founded and builded many Townes and Cities beside.

Neuerthelesse, pride made him to forget his dutie; for, perceiving that he had three hundred thousand men subiect vnto him, and all in abilitie to carry Armes: hee grew so exceeding arrogant, that hee would needes vsurpe the High-Priestes Office. But as hee was performing his Sacrifice in the Temple; God smote him with a fowle Leaprotie, the which continued with him to the time of his death.

After his decease, Iotham his Sonne next succeeded him, being a Prince very wise, iust, and valiaunt; hee also enlarged Ierusalem verie spaciouly, by manie reparations and new foundations; besides, the building of some other Cities. Hee likewise ouercame and vanquished the Ammonites, from whom he brought backe great summes of Golde and Silver. But after his death, Triumphant things beganne to weare away, and all unhappinesse fell vpon the people of Iuda: For, his Sonne Achaz, sur-named Elezazar, being come to the Crowne; gaue himselfe to Idolatry, introducing the ceremonies and superstitions of the Pagans. In regard whereof, God chastised them by the hand of Rasias, King of Suria; and Phezas King of Israell, who slaughtered (in one day) fixe score thousand men. After which pittifull ouerthrow, they ranne thorow the Countrey of Iuda, robbing and spoyling it in lamentable manner; and because Ierusalem was strong, it stood the sharpe besieging of these kings so long, til they despayring of their insufficiency, were forced (with great summes of Golde) to buy their succor of Salmanazar king of the Assyrians. And for the better satisfaction of him, they tooke the Vesselles of Gold and Silver, which onely were for the Temples service, to helpe them withall in this great distresse.

Salmanazar being come to assist the king of Iuda, vanquished and ouerthrew the king of Israell: and yet notwithstanding, ledde away with him a great number of the Iewes prisoners, to whom he gaue the Region of Libna to dwell in. And this was the first dispersion and captiuitie of

of the Iewes, since their miraculous deliuerance out of Egypt: and in short time after, the Assyrian king, compelled the King of Israell, euery yeare to pay them Tribute. At this very time, the Prophets Osai, Esay, Amos, Micha and Iona were in great reputation.

After the death of this vnfortunate Achaz, next came to the Crowne his son Ezechias, a man farre beyond the Nature of his Father; for, hee was wise, iust, religious, and one that feared God. Ierusalem also (in his reigne) recovered once more her former credite; policy becoming better reformed, and the seruice of God reduced to such perfection: that (as the Scripture it selfe amply declareth) the Realme of Iudab neuer had a better king; liuing in great prosperity, and honouring his Countrey, with many famous Victories.

Hee could not content himselfe, with renting vp the rootes of Idolatry, whereto the people were ouer-much inclined; and bringing them entirely vnto the true seruice of God: but hee also gaue summons to the ten Tribes of Israell, to lue according to that Lawe, which God had deliuered by the hand of Moyse. Whereunto many condiscending, they came to Sacrifice in Ierusalem, and to celebrate Easter, according vnto the ordinance of Moyse.

Notwithstanding, as the sacred Scriptures doe testifye, the rest perseuered still in their Idolatry, and made a mockerie of those gentle inuitations, as also the aduertisements which the Prophets had giuen them. For which contempt, GOD layde his correcting rodde vpon them, aswell by Salmanazar, as Sennacherib, Kings of the Assyrians, who oppressed them greatly, in the first yeare of King Ezechias his reigne.

Also in the fourth yeare of the reign of Ozias, King of Israell, the Assyrian brought so heauy a warre against ten Tribes of Israell, for the space of three whole yeares: as he enforced them to forsake their countries, and to go dwell as slaues among the Medes.

Thus you see how the Iewes were dispersed here and there, among forrayne and strange Nations, without euer returning againe home to their owne houses, so that none knew what afterward should become of them. For heere was the end and ruine of the kingdom of Israell, which had continued three hundred and seuentie yeares.

On the contrarie, Salmanazar sent his Assyrians into Samarita, to inhabite there; who (vsurpingly) got possession of all the Countreys (wherein the Israelites had formerly dwelt) and tooke the name of Samaritanes vpon them. Yet Eusebius taketh that name but as a Garrison, wherein his opinion (me thinks) is not warrantable: for they were called Samaritanes, after the name of Samarita, the chiefe and principall City of that Countrey. The Assyrians made a mixture of the Iewes Lawes with their Idolatries; yet held them in abomination, as excommunicated people. As concerning their actions, I shall be silent therein, because it no way concerneth my discourse: and if heerein I haue committed any error, I submit my selfe to the Churches correction.

After the ouerthrow and ruine of the Israelites, the Kingdome of Iuda onely remayned on foote: For the good King Ezechias, to saue his people from the fierce rage and furie of King Salmanazar, and to preferre his owne dominions in peace; gaue him great summes of gold, buying (by that means) peace for long time. Neuerthelesse, this Infidell King falsified his Fayth vnto him, and came with a mighty powerfull Armie, intending to ruine the Kingdome of Iuda, as formerly hee had done the Kingdome of Israell. But GOD being pleased to defend his people, sent the Prophet Esay vnto King Ezechias to comfort him, (because this Prophet liued then) and in one night, the Angell of the Lorde, slew one hundred and fourescore thousand fighting men in the Assyrians camp: by meanes of which great slaughter, the rest retired thence. And Ezechias, hauing escaped this dangerous perill to himselfe, and his people, lyued the remainder of his dayes peacefully in his Kingdome. And God hauing evidently declared great Myacles, on the behalfe of this King, he dyed peaceably, leaving his Sonne Manasses succedour in his kingdome.

This Prince wandered from the good wayes of his Father, and added him selfe altogether to Idolatry, committing many most abominable finnes, directly contrary to the Law of God, and thereto likewise induced the people. Whereat God growing offended, raised vp the Affyrians against him, who so well chastised him; that, ouer and beside the ouerthrow of his people, himselfe was taken prisoner, and ledde away captiue into Babylon. Notwithstanding, he repented him of his finnes, which caused God to deliuer him out of the Affyrians hands; so that hee returned home to his owne estates, and dyed there in peace. After him, succeeded his wicked son Amon, who was slain most miserably: the Prophets Iel, Nahum, and Habbakuk succeeded in his time. Next him, came to the crowne his sonne Iofias, who was a Prince that feared God, & very vigilant for the reformation of his people; performing many other actions, rightly becoming to good and iust a King. For, he expulld all idolatry quite out of his kingdom, which had taken deepe roote in the hearts of men, and he repaid the Temple also. Neuertheless, the anger of God against the Iewes was not appeased, in regard of the abominable idolatries committed, in the reigns of the Kings Manasses & Amon. Notwithstanding, in respect of King Iofias, who (thorough his owne folly) dyed poorly; God deferred to chastise the Iewish people, in such manner as he did afterward.

This king dyed of a wound, which hee receiued on the day that hee had agaynst Necar, King of Egypt, when hee might haue bin better employed. For Necar had no matter of quarrell against him, but rather sought his friendship so much as hee could; and hauing no other intention, but to imploy his forces against the King of Affyria. Neuertheless, in a brauery of spirit, Iofias would needs meddle with him, which cost the deere price of his life. His death was very much bemoaned, especially by the Prophet Ieremy, who wrote his Lamentations on his behalfe.

Iochaz his son succeeded him, who was giuen to all iniquity and wickedness; wherefore God furnished him to reigne no more then three moneths: for Necar, who had before foyled his father, depriued him of his kingdom, making the country of Iudea tributary, paying an hundred Talents of Gold, and one of Silver, every yeare.

Iochaz being thus defeated of his kingdome, and led prisoner into Egypt, where he dyed; Iochim his Brother, was entailed in his place, behauing himselfe verie wickedly; for hee was wholly affected to Idolatry, and prouoked his people to doe the like. In which respect, God stirred vp king Nabuchodonosor to be his enemy, who had already reigned forty foure yeares in Babylon.

This Prince hauing won the victorie against the Iewish people, ledde away the most part of the greatest personnes in all the Countrey, as captiue slaues and Vassals, and tooke away also the Vesselles of the Temple. The occasion of this warre grew, because Iochim gaue ayde vnto the King of Egypt, against Nabuchodonosor, contrary to the counsell of Ieremy. Iochim hauing reigned eleuen yeeres, and liued prisoner three yeeres, dyed in great pouty.

After whom succeeded Iechonias, following the steps of his Father, because hee was as wicked as hee. In his time, God began to display his rigorous rods of vengeance, prepared long time before against Ierusalem, but deferred in the regard of Iofias, according as the Prophets had foretold. For King Nabuchodonosor came in his owne person, with an exceeding great and powerfull Armie, to besiege the Citie of Ierusalem: but, Iechonias being not able to make resistance, submitted vnto his will, himselfe, his Mother, his Wife, and the principall personnes that were of his House. Moreover, hee made him a present, of the Vesselles and Treasures which remained (as yet) in the Temple. By which means, King Iechonias, and the chiefeft men of his Court, were ledde away captiues into Babylon: But Nabuchodonosor, tooke all the assurances and fidelitie of Mattathias, vncle to King Iechonias, and made him king of Iudea, calling him by the name of Sedechias.

In speaking of this King, I must needs say, hee was one of the most Wicked and vnhappy Princes that euer reigned: For, not onely was hee ingratefull vnto Almighty GOD, for the great Graces which hee had bestowed vpon him (turning still his backe, and not willing to heare any thing which the Prophet Ieremy tolde him) but also did falsifie his word vnto King Nabuchodonosor; who Iochaz dyed a prisoner in Egypt, led thither in captiuitie.

King Nabuchodonosor ouerthrowed the Iewish people.

who had entailed him in the Kingdome, denying him his friendship. And if this Prince was no more worthy: much lesse then were the sacrificing Priests, and least of all the common people: so that all abominations and idolatries reigned in Iudea, euen to the prophanation of the Temple, which had bene held in such sacred esteeme. And notwithstanding all the aduertisements giuen to this King, by Ieremie, Ezechiel, and other Prophets: yet his obstinacy encreased daily more and more. Whereupon, God raised Nabuchodonosor, who, to reuenge the wrongs done him by Sedechias, in the ninth yeare of his Reigne, he came and couered the Countrey of Iudea with a mighty Army, and held Ierusalem besiedged, the space of two yeeres, where King Sedechias had betaken himselfe for his more security.

The poore people languishing with famine & pestilence, were no longer able to endure the sidge; but being thus by extremity compelled, yeelede to the enemies mercy: when hee entring into the Citie, put all to fire and sword. Sedechias was taken in his flight, and being brought before Nabuchodonosor; saw his own children flaine before his face; and as for himselfe, he had his eyes plucked out, and sent (in that miserable manner) captiue to Babylon. After the Conqueror was returned home, he sent to Ierusalem Nabuzaradan, who was one of his principall Captaines, with especiall charge, vtterly to ruinate the Temple. This was foure hundred yeeres after the building thereof by King Salomon: as he performed the like; to all the Fortresses and sumptuous buildings of Ierusalem, beating downe the walles of the Citie, and defacing the Pallace belonging to the Kings of Iuda.

Hee carried away also all the mettall that was in the Temple, and ledde thence the Sacrificers, and all the chiefe men, as well of Ierusalem, as throughout the countrey beside, with their Wiues and Children; who continued Captiues in Babylon, for the space of about threecore and ten yeares. This was the Captiuitie of Babylon, which hath so much bene spoken of, and which happened about fixe hundred yeeres before the comming of our Lord and Sauour Iesus Christ. Thus you see, how the poore Citie of Ierusalem remained desiert and desolate, except some few of the meaner people, left behinde to till and husband the grounds: vnder the charge (neuertheless) of Gadolias, Deputy Gouernor in Iudea. But the people falling into mutiny, slew Gadolias, and then fearing the fury of Nabuchodonosor; such as remained of the Iewes, went and dwelt in Egypt, leauing Ierusalem waste and vnpeopled.

S. Hierome saith, that after the surprizal and lacking of Ierusalem, there passed well neere fifty yeeres, when neyther Man, Beast nor Bird entred into it: whereby may sufficiently be knowne, what great punishments this people had deserved, that were so highly beloued and priuiledged by God. Seauenty yeeres being passed ouer, it pleased God with the eye of pity, to looke vpon the Captiuitie of his people: being then, when the Empire fell into the dominion of the Persians, who thereof disseized the Affyrians, and in the time of the puissant King Cyrus. He, being moued by the Spirit of God, suffered fifty thousand Iewes to returne home into their Countrey, vnder the conduct of Zerobabell their Captaine, and Iosiah or Iesias, the foueraigne Sacrificer or High Priest: who being returned into Iudea, began to repaire the ruines of their Cities, and especially Ierusalem, which they re-built with great ioy, offering sacrifices to God, according to the Ordinances appointed in his Law.

CHAP. XXIX.

What difference there is betwenee Leasling and Lying; And how a man may tell a Leasling, and yet not to be false, that it is a lye.

Lying, is one of the greatest vices that any man can haue; for it is not any way possible to negotiate, or to conclude any matter, with him that is a lyar, because lying maketh euerie thing to be suspected. Moreover, the horrour of lying sheweth it selfe sufficiently, in that it is directly opposite to truth, which is God: as likewise the diuell is called the Father of lyes. Salomon (in his his Prouerbs) placeth lying in the second ranke, of the seauen vices greatly displeasing to God. In briefe, this vice hath (at all times) bene so abhorred both by Infidels and Christians; that a man knowne to be a liar, was reputed as a plague to the Common-wealth, as we may perceiue in Euripides, according as is auouched by Stobæus.

The difference
betweene lying & telling a leasung.

But not to make any longer stay, in shewing how pernicious and detestable a thing lying is, in regard that it is so common and vulgar: I take it as a matter conuenient, to declare what difference there is betweene leasing and lying, according to the saying of Aulus Gellius, and of many other Authors more; for oftentimes, there is a great difference in these two bad qualities. Obserue we then to this effect, that to tell a lye, is to affirme the contrary, of that which a man knoweth to be true. But telling a fallacie or leasing, is to affirme lying, with an intention to speake truth: wherein a man cannot be saide to haue lyed, when he speaketh not against that which he holdeth for truth, & knoweth it to be.

How a man may lye in speaking truth.

Contrariwise, a man may lye, and yet (notwithstanding) tell truth, when hee speaketh against that which hee thinketh, although that which he hath said, be true. But when a man vttereth a leasing, knowing the thing it selfe to be otherwise then as he hath said; hee lyeth, and then it is a dire & lye. From hence it ensueth, that it is impossible to tell a lye without vice or sinne; but he that speaketh a leasing, thinking to say the truth, lyeth not at all. This is that which Nigidius saith, according to the expreffion of Gellius: That an honest man will neuer lye, and a wise man hates to tell a leasing. For mine owne opinion hereine, I would aduise all men to auoide both the one and other vice, although they may imagine to speake truly.

Heere it is to be noted, that although the tongue keepe silence, yet deeds sometimes may betray the person. For as Saint Ambrose saith: He which makes profession of being a Christian, without conforming himselfe to the works of Christ, lieth, or is a liar. As also that man doth, which makes a solemn promise to obserue Religion, and yet notwithstanding obserueth none at all. As much may we say of some vgly women, as black as faire diuels, who paint & paint to get them better faces, and look thereby worse the euer they did: And foolish olde men, that would be young againe by fantastick meanes.

I remember an old man, of whom Theophrastus speaketh, who being of great authority and credite, and hauing some important businesse before the Lacedæmon Senate; was very much greeued, to appeare there in such antiquity of yeares as he was slept into; which made him to cut and shau his head and beard, hoping by this meanes to seeme much younger. As the cause was in debating, Archidamus (speaking for his Clyent, against him) declared to the Senate, that no credit ought to be giuen to the words of him, that apparently carried lying in his head & face. So that, according to Archidamus, such aged fooles can lye, without speaking any words.

CHAP. XXX.

Of the twelue Moneths in the yeare; how both Ancients and Moderne men vied to figure them: And of some mysteries represented by them.

NO great mystery consisteth in knowing the signification of the twelue Moneths by their figures. Neuertheless, considering that few or none haue written of them, in our vulgar tongue: I am the more willing to take a little paines, in acquainting some particular friends, that by looking vpon their portraictures, they may the better reach to their interpretation.

First of all then, beginning with January, it was presented by a man seated at a Table, holding a Glasse of WV in his hand, as being ready to drinke. Whereby was intended, that in this Moneth, all creatures haue better appetite and desire to eate and drinke, then at any other time: because heat is retired inward, & strengtheneth the stomacke in such sort, that it is capable of the easier digestion.

February, was a mā heating his hands about his own body: for in this month, fire is very requisite, in regard of the great coldes in *WV*inter, caused by the absence of the Sunne.

March, was figured in form of a Gardiner: because (in this Moneth) the pores and spiracles of the earth, do open themselves, in such, that the moisture of the earth commeth (of it owne accord) to all the Trees, Hearbs and Plants. In which respect, all superfluities are to bee cut away, that the nutritiue humour may extend it selfe to the liuing Branches, for bearing the fairer fruite.

April, was made in the shape of a young man, holding a Nosegay of flowers in his hand: for in this Moneth, the earth hauing communicated his vertue to Trees and Hearbs, maketh euery thing to flourish, and bring forth Flowers.

For May, a yong gallant Gentleman was portraied, being mounted on horsebacke, and brauely apparelled, bearing a Hawke vpon his Fist. Considering, that in this Moneth, the Trees commonly begin to beare fruite. Birds flye abroad merrily, and all creatures strue to haue their best pleasures, and make loue to one another.

June, was painted, carrying a Scythe on his backe; because in this Moneth, the Meadows must be mowed downe.

July, carried a Sickle in his hand, where-with to reape downe the ripened Corne.

And because these Fruites are commonly to bee gathered in August, and then they are to be laide and lockt vp in Barnes and Garners: August was figured like to a Country Carter, standing by his laden Cart, with a whip in his hand, as hastening homeward with his sheaves of Corne.

September, was in the habite of a Vintager; as the cyb signifying, that the beginning of Vintage is to bee in this Moneth.

October, was figured like a husbandman, carrying a Sack vpon his shoulders, and sowing Corne as hee passeth along. Meaning thereby, that as this Moneth is colde and dry, so is it very apt and conuenient, for the sowing of Seede.

November stood in the shape of a Thrasher, labouring his Flayle vpon the Corne in the sheaves. He had another companion standing by him, who with a pole did beate downe the ACornes from the Trees, because in this Month, ACornes serue best to fatten Swine, and then also they ordinarily kill Swine, for making Bacon.

December stood in the likenesse of a Butcher, with a knife in his hand, and killing a Hog. Thus were the twelue Moneths vually figured.

As for the yeare it selfe, they made the modell thereof, in the relemblance of a Serpent, withed into a rounde, & holding the tayle in the mouth: because the end of the yeare euermore is ioyned with the beginning.

CHAP. XXXI.

Of a strange Coniuration or Conspiracy, which happened in the goodly City of Florence, and of the slaughter which ensued thereon.

AL L The World is naturally delicious to heare and vnderstand the greatest enterprizes, and such strange accidentes as happen to men: to the ende, that they may the better defend themselves, from falling into such inconueniences, as waite vpon inconstant and mutable Fortune. And therefore I concluded with my selfe, to relate a very rare and admirable chauce, which happened in the wealthy City of Florence, and which (in mine opinion) is one that deserueth as much meruaile, as any other that euer I heard of.

In the yeare, 1478, the City of Florence was in great peace, abounding (day by day) in sumptuousnesse and riches, and the affayres of the Common-wealth holding on such a prosperous course, that no imagination was so idle, as to thinke; that any misfortune had the power to alter this happinesse. In those Sun-shine dayes, the illustrious house of Medici (of whom the Duke was Cosimo, and all the Dukes of Florence to this day are descended) gouerned the said State and Common-wealth: so that all affaires passed through the hands and intelligence of the two Lords, Juliano and Laurentio de Medici.

sis, Brethren; who were highly esteemed among the people; in regard of their Ancestours, and especially for Cosimo de Medici their Grand-father, who had beene the onely and richest Merchant of Italy; although that in Florence were very wealthy Merchants beside.

Now there were (at this time) in the saide City, many other Gentlemen and rich Merchants, who thought themselves euery way as sufficient, to manage and order the Common-wealths affaires; as those that were of the house of Medici. Neuertheless, the Medici still had the great opinion, being euery day respected, hayled and louingly entertained of the people. In the ende, the house of the Pazzi, Saluati, and many other, issued of Noble and ancient Families in Florence (being moued by passion and particular affection (coupled with innatred enuy, which they bare to them of the Medici) contriued a secret complot, whereby to take the Common-wealths government from the Medici. And this their intent could not be accomplished, without the death of Iuliano and Laurentio de Medici, because they were rich and potent Lords.

Francesco and Giovanni de Pazzi, Cousins-germaine to Giuliano de Pazzi, and cheefest men of that house, undertooke to kill the said Brethren of the Medici, and joyned with them the Family of the Saluati, especially Signior Francesco Saluati; Archbishop of Pisa, and they undertooke to kill Pope Sixtus the fourth, Vncle to them of the Medici, & likewise Ferdinando, King of Naples, whom they had constrained into their league! all verily perswaded, that being rid of them, they should not meete with any resistance in the execution of their purpose.

This complot fully agreed vpon, and all things provided to fit their enterprize accordingly; the Archbishoppe of Pisa came to Florence, where (vnder another colour) they entred into roule a number of Soldiours, all well knowne; yet without discovering to any one, what was to be done. The Archbishop of Pisa, of whom neuer any doubt was conceived, practised such means, that a young Cardinal, Nephew to Pope Sixtus (who then studied at Bologna) should come to passe the time a while at Florence, to fitt their turne (in the action) with him and his people, yet neuer acquainting him with a thought of the intention.

Order being taken for all occasions, and euery thing kept close in the bowels of the principall conspirators, the conclusion was thus; that the two Brethren of Medici should be slaine together, eyther in the great Church, or else where the Cardinall should heare Masse. Francesco de Pazzi, and Bernardo Bandino, tooke charge of killing the Lord Iuliano de Medici; but the death of the Lord Laurentio, was committed to Antonio de Volterra, and to another, called Stephano, being a Priest. The houre or moment, assigned by Giuliano de Pazzi, for the execution of these two murders, was at such time, as the Priests should be at the elevation in Masse, holding the Host or Sacrifice aloft about his head, although the two brethren then were in diuers places.

Vpon the Sunday following, which was the third of May, 1478, this conclusion tooke effect thus. The Cardinall came to heare Masse, and with him the Lord Laurentio de Medici, without his brother. For they vfed to walke (as men suspecting ambushes) sildome or neuer together in the City, for feare of falling into any disallter together: knowing right well, that no man durst make an attempt offensively vpon them, if one of the two were left aloue. The conspirators perceiuing that Lord Iuliano came not at all; Francesco de Pazzi, and Bernardo Bandino (who had sworne his death) vnder the shadow of Courty attendance, went to come along with him from his house, and bestowed so many embarrasadoes vpon him, that they brought him vnto the Church where his Brother was, and yet hee then sawe farre enough off from his Brother. Conspiring eyes were still fixed on them both, enuying that they should sitte so farre asunder: but yet the time and place gaue the courage, that they might easily accomplish the acte; and yet not be prosecuted by any, for few or none tooke notice of them.

The point for performance being come, Francesco de Pazzi gaue a stabbe with his poniard to the Lord Iuliano, which thwarted the stomacke, and issued forth at his shoulder, so that immediately he fel down dead; and Bernardo Bandino, by making haste (least Lord Iuliano should not be thoroughly sped) wounded himselfe with his owne Dagger in the stomacke, albeit hee saw the Lord Iuliano lye dead before him. There dyed also Francesco Nori, slaine by Bernardo Bandino, because he laid hand on his weapon, in the defence of Lord Iuliano. Antonio Volterra, and Stephano the Priest, sharply assayed the Lord Laurentio de Medici, but yet with such slender dexterity; that vifing his owne courageous defence, hee was wounded a litle in the mouth, and (in despite of all they could do) by meanes of certaine friends, he got into the Sacrifistia or Vestrie, and there saued himselfe from their fury.

Lord Laurentio saved his life in the Vestrie.

The young Cardinall hardly saved himselfe.

The whole Seignury runs halfe to the pallace.

The Arch-Bishop of Pisa with to the Pallace, to conferre with the Seignury.

This assault was so sudden, that it had speedier execution, then any knowledge could be had of them that acted it: for such was the cry of the people, as if the Church had fallen to the earth. The Cardinall had worke enough to doe, to get himselfe free, and in safety to the high Altar. All the City was vp in a furious vpror; for some cryed out, that the two Brethren of Medici were slaine, & others saide no, putting themselves presently in Armes. They of the houses of Pazzi and Saluati, began aloud to cry Liberty, so that the Seignury resorted to the great Pallace with all diligence, where the Gonfaloniero ioyning with them, they fortified themselves with armed men in the house. The Councillors of the Citie, and such as tooke part with the Medici, went to seeke part with the Lord Laurentio; conducing him home to his own house, where stood readily prepared, about eight thousand armed men.

As for the Archbishop of Pisa, hee pursuing on still the point with the Saluati, being accompanied with many of their league, and such as were the Cardinals followers; rode directly vnto the Pallace, with intent to make their meaning well liking to the Seignury. The Lords of the Seignury, although they tooke part with the house of Medici; yet notwithstanding they were so pressed, as they had not any leysure, for making any Armed prouision, nor to appoint a Garrison for the Pallace. Yet they knew well enough, that Lord Laurentio was not much hurt, and that hee had men about him valiant & hardy.

The Archbishop perceiuing, that the Seignury had no leysure to take a resolution, in some matters that he would haue propounded to them: diuided the traine of his followers into two Companies, appointing one part of them to keep possession of the Pallace Gates. Hee, with the other company, ascended vp into the Pallace, and made it knowne to the Seignury, that hee had some what to acquaint them withall, for general benefit of the Common-wealth. Whereupon, he being admitted in, with some few of his people, that knew no part of his vile purpose: the Gates of the Pallace were made so strongly fast; that the Archbishop could haue no succor of his followers, nor the Lords of the Seignury themselves haue any assistance. So loudly did the Archbishop deliuer his minde, speaking of matters in such vnorderly manner; that the Seignurie (well vnderstanding his bad intention) commanded the Gonfaloniero to take hold of him, as also of Giuliano Saluati, and Giuliano, the sonne of Meister Poggio de Pazzi. And so vnuly grew the tumult, that all their attendants were instantly slaine in the fury, and thirty dead bodies throwne out of the Pallace windowes, vpon the heads of them that were beneath in the Court.

The Arch-Bishop admitted to speake with the Seignury.

The Arch-Bishop seized on, and his followers most of them slaine.

The other part of the Archbishops attendants slaine, & himselfe hanged.

Within a while after, the common people, who greatly fauoured them of the Medici, ranne in huge heapes and crowds to the Pallace: where all the other part of the Archbishops men (that had the trust of keeping the Pallace Gates) were taken and slaine presently, without any respect vfed towards them. As for the Arch-Bishop, and his two friends with him; they were hanged in the Market-place, to cause more terrour in the rest. Giuliano de Pazzi, and diuers other of the Conspirators, rode vp and downe through the City, crying Liberty, Liberty: but perceiuing none to make them answer, as leaning rather to the part of Lord Laurentio; they thought to saue themselves by flight. Only Bernardo Bandino excepted, who lay in his bed very sicke, by paine of the wound which hee had giuen himselfe; so that hee was not able to sit on horsebacke, or come come abroad out of his Chamber.

By this time the whole City was vp in Armes, to defend the cause of the Lord Laurentio, who extremely grieved for the death of Lord Iuliano his Brother: causing seuerer pursuite after the Conspirators, so that many, who were but meere-ly suspected suspected in the case, could not escape, although no matter was proved against them; but no known offender could any way be spared. The young Cardinall, Nephew to the Pope, was kept prisoner in the Pallace, with very great perill of his life: but at length, his innocence being truly knowne, he was acquitted; continuing (neuertheless) long time prisoner. Bernardo Bandino, was ledde stark naked to the Pallace, and so hanged vp, next to the Archbishop. As for Antonio de Paltarra, and Stephano the Priest, who should haue slaine the Lord Laurentio: they were trodden to death among the rude multitude, that ranne every where in the City, crying Medici, Medici, burning and pulling downe all their houses, whom they knew to be of the contrary Faction. In briefe, the disorder was such, and so confused, as it exceeded the capacity of writing; especially the furies and cruelties, committed in this horrid tempest.

Giacomo de Pazzi, was taken in his flight, & brought back to Florence: where he was hanged or fringed, and his body being cut in peeces, was after buried in prophane ground; all his lands & goods (which being of great value) were confiscated, and adjudged to the Seigneuries possession. And after condigne punishment inflicted vpon the malefactors, the body of Lord Juliano was most honourably buried, and with very solemne Funerall pompe.

Such issue had the Coniuration of the Pazzi, which was a matter very strange. For, in lesse then three houres, the Lord Juliano de Medicis (an extraordinary rich man) was slaine; the Archbishop of Pisa hanged, with some other of his confederates, and the houses of the aduerser part utterly destroyed. Pope Sixtus, and Ferdinando, King of Naples, conceived such a spleene against this action at Florence: that they (together) leuyed a powerfull Army against the Florentines, who (with the aid of their friends) defended themselves so well, that no other advantage was due to the disturbers, but that the war was long, and very cruell, great effusion of blood happening on eyther side. Behold the poore and vnfortunate issue of these conspirators, who thinking to winne honour, and high degrees by indiscreete meanes: lost their liues, disioynted the peace and unity of their Country, and made their enemy much mightier then before, for Lord Laurentio de Medicis gouerned Florence so long as he liued.

CHAP. XXXII.

A very remarkable and worthy History, deliuering in true and briefe discourse; the life and memorable actions of that famous Capitaine, commonly called, Castruccio Castracagnio.

Astruccio Castracagnio, a Capitaine of much fame and merit, in my poore opinion, may be ranked among the greatest and most renowned Captaines of the world: considering the poverty of his originally, and the slender meanes he had, without the fauours of any, compared also with those strange traueles, which Fortune put vpon him. Wherein I may well say, that very few Captaines or Generals are to be found, who with so poore & imperfect furnishment; did euer reach to those honours and estates, as this our Castruccio Castracagnio attained. Wherefore, I thought it no disparagement vnto our precedent best subjects, that his History should make one among them: not purposing to vse any larger dilation therein, then already I haue obserued in the rest, because it shall suffice me, summarily to report the courage of this Capitaine.

Beginning then with his originally, which was very strange, you are to vnderstand, that in Luca, a City of no meane fame in Italy, there was a Chanon belonging to the Church of S. Michael, named Messire Antonio Castracagnio, who had a sister (of his owne) liuing with him, being a very honest and vertuous woman. Close ioyning to this Chanons house, was a little Close or Field of Antines, which was plentifully furnished with variety of fruitfull Trees, as is the manner vied in Italy. The sister to this Chanon (by fortune) going one morning into this Close, to gather some Herbs for her vse, without dreaming on any such matter as after happened: as she was gathering Herbs heere

It is not poetry of birth that hindere the merite of any well-deserving man.

Here the Author briefly discourseth the originall of Castruccio Castracagnio, & in what manner he was found.

*They are Vines talke- ned to Trees, according to the manner in Italy.

and there, heard a small voyce, as if it were of some new borne babe. And walking that way where she heard the cry; among the leaues and young bourgeons of the Vines, was an infant laide, appearing to bee very lately before borne, tenderly crying, as desiring aide in that wofull distresse.

The good widow, somewhat sadly moved at the beginning of this aduenture, yet prouoked by a womans louing compassion: carried in the tender childe, & shewed it to the Chanon her brother, who being amazed at so strange an accident, and yet overcome with Christianlike pity, determined to prouide nursing for the Babe. And in regard that it was a manchilde, hee gaue it the name of his owne Father, calling him Castruccio. When the Nurse was come, he caused it to be nourished as if it had bene his owne: & after growing to a great boy, sent him to schoole, with full intention of surrendring his Chansons place to him. But when the Lad grew to 14. yeares of age, Learning and Bookes was the least part of his care, for he was no way addicted to letters, but rather delighted in handling of a sword, and in regard that he was very active of body, he gaue himselfe greatly to leaping, dancing, & wrastling with other strong Lads like himself. Speaking al in a word, he was so dexterious in whatsoever he did; as none of his companions could equall him, but Castruccio became respected in euery eye.

It so fortuned, that Capitaine Francesco Guinigo, a man much renowned, for worthy actions of Armes performed by him in Lombardy, was then at Luca. He hearing such report of young Castruccio, & seeing him bold & brauely spirited; found meanes to haue him in his seruice. And Castruccio being now where he best desired, became (in lesse then five yeares) so expert a Soldier, as his like was not to be found, as well on horse as foot: for he could so cunningly manage any horse, that Cannalcadore of Italie hardly came neere him.

Being come to the age of 18. yeares, Capitaine Guinigo, his Master, departed thence for Milaine, in aide of the Piscontiners, who were in Armes against the Thurians, and many other Milaine Gentlemen. He tooke Castruccio along with him, who caried him selfe so valiant and wisely in this war; that hee bare away the fame from all the Soldiers in the Campe. This war lasted five or six yeares, which being ended by peace or truce; Capitaine Guinigo returned to Luca, with his Castruccio, where he was most kindly embraced by euery one, as well in general as particular, in regard of the good report noised euery where of him. So that more account was made of him, then of Guinigo his Master; for hee was so humane and courteous to euery man, that affection increased towards him daily more & more.

Within a short while after, Capitaine Guinigo feeling himselfe sicke, & in some danger of death; gaue the tutelage & gouernement of Pagola his sonne, to his maner himselfe so faithfully, that so long as he liued, he had at his command the affairs of Pagola, even as if hee had bene his owne sonne. After the decease of Capitaine Guinigo, the credite and reputation of Castruccio wonderfully augmented. Neuertheless, because he was very fiery, impatient and vindicative, when any wrong had bene done vnto him: the men of Luca began to grow suspicious, that he purposed to make himselfe Lord of Luca, and not without some pregnant occasion; in which respect, the Seignrey commanded him to auoid the City. Which disgrace Castruccio so much distasted, that hee resolved to be reuenged, even with the ruine and confusion of his head-strong enemies. At this very time, the Factions of the Guelphes and Gibelines reigned powerfully in Italy; and euery the also, the lord Hugo Fagnola was in some command, who being possessed of the Seignrey of Pisa; Castruccio practised (by insinuation) to compass grace & fauour with this Lord Fagnola, & therefore plotted with the Gibelines, to make Fagnola Lord of Luca. Working this traine on secretly, hee preuailed so well with some of his friends in the City: that (at an appointed instant) he won a Port of Luca. By meanes whereof, the Gibelines entred, with such succor as the Lord Fagnola had giuen them, expelling thence the Guelphes, after they had done their very uttermost they could.

Castruccio was now in greater esteeme the euer, & in such fort, as he was held to be the Lord of Luca, although he was inferior to the lord Fagnola, to who hee made recourse in times of necessity. The Florentines, who deadly despighted Castruccio, vnderstanding the successe of his affaires; leuyed a great Army, by helpe of such as were in league with the, purposing to ouer-run Castruccio.

But Lord Fagiola and Castruccio, disposed so well for the meeting with them, that the warre grew to be very cruell & bloody. Concerning men of name in the Florentines Campe, there was among them Don Pedro, Brother to Robert, King of Naples, accompanied with Don Carolo his Nephew, sonne to Phillip. But the vertue of Lord Fagiola and Castruccio, serued wel to counterpoise the greatnes of the other. After that this war had continued for some space of time, the Lord Fagiola receiued intelligence, that there had happened a great commotion at Pisa, in redresse whereof, Lord Fagiola was faine to leaue the Armies conduct wholly to Castruccio, who behaued himselfe so wisely and valiantly in this great trust, that after many sallies and light skirmishes, hee came to battaile with the Florentines. Castruccio maintained the fight with such good order and iudgement, that (although he was the most obdurate ma that euer was born in Italy) yet notwithstanding, the victory remained to him, and the slaughter was so great, that there were slaine about tenne thousand Florentines, among whom, Don Pedro and Don Carolo his Nephew, were found in number with the dead. Which victory, assured to the Lord Fagiola, all those estates (held by him) in faire better security, and enlarged the credite and reputation of Castruccio, beyond all common expectation.

Winter being come, Castruccio returned to Luca, by the command of Lord Fagiola, towards whom he shewed himselfe very obedient. But as it is a customary case, that wealth and great honors doe cause feare and enuy: so the Lord Fagiola, perceiving the credite of Castruccio to encrease daily more and more: determined his death, in recompence of all the worthy seruices he had done him. To effect this dishonourable businesse, he sent one of his sonnes to Luca, who caused Castruccio to be committed prisoner, vnder pretence, of some secret blame imposed vpon him. But the imprisonment of Castruccio was so offensive to the Lucanes; that the people began to mutiny against their Lord Fagiola: who hauing aduertisement thereof, left Pisa, and marched thither with a potent Army.

But there hapned to him a very strange accident, and yet no more then hee iustly deserued for his vnmanly dealing. When the Pisanes were aduertised, that Castruccio was deteined as a prisoner; they began so to stomacke the matter, that they slew the Gouernor, whom Lord Fagiola had left as his Deputy, and all such as were to do him any seruice; so that they enfranchized themselves from the tyranny of Fagiola. He receiuing intelligence of this mishap, and that (by this meanes) his returne to Pisa was bard vp against him: pursued on his purpose, to make all sure and safe at Luca. But therein he proued likewise as vnfortunate as at Pisa, for the Pisanes had informed the Lucanes of their affaires, and with such speedy diligence; that the Poste fro the Pisanes arrived at Luca, much sooner then the Lord Fagiola could do.

Hereupon, the Lucanes put thei selues in Armes, so that they expulsed the sonne of Fagiola out of Luca, with absolute purpose, of allowing no entrance to the Father; but gaue freedom to Castruccio, in mere despight of him. Yet some say, that Fagiola entred Luca, & very quickly was expelled thence; when losing all hope of recouering his estates, he was glad to saue himselfe by flight into Lombardy. But he it howeouer, this I am sure of, that hee lost his dominion ouer both the Cities in one day: which he might safely haue enjoyed still, if he had but kept faire friendship with Castruccio: who being thus set at liberty, was elected Capitaine and General of the Lucanes, by free consent of the whole Seignury. In which authority he being loath to liue idle, leuyed a great Army, where-with hee recouered many strong Holds from the Florentines, which they had long vnrped from the Lucanes: taking diuers other of their owne beside, in despight of their best Forces, albeit they were strong indeed. Castruccio returning then to Luca, was there most honourably welcomed in regard of his worthy victories obtained, and created absolute Lord of Luca. From which time forward, hee became much feared of the neighbours round about, especially the Florentines, who were the most powerfull in all Tuscany: For, he had many wars against them, and tooke many Forts and Castles from them, yea, and ouerthrew them in a plaine field of Battaille, equally appointed on either side.

An Army of forty thousand men leuied by the Florentines against Castruccio.

rick came into Italy, to be crowned Emperor there: when being entrusted of the many good parts remaining in Castruccio, he laboured greatly to win him to his seruice. Castruccio then leauing Pagolo Guingano (of whom he had thus long bene Tutor) as his Lieutenant to gouern Luca: went to see the Emperor Frederick, whom he followed so far as Rome. Some hold, that he came thither before the Coronation; but, after the Emperors return into Germany, Castruccio preuailed so well by good means, that they of Pisa chose him to be their Prince. Which newes being brought to Rene, King of Naples (his old heauy enemy) he began to grow doubtfull of Castruccio, and perceiving his power to encrease so greatly: hee made a league with the Florentines against Castruccio, intending now to see the utter ruine of him, and recouery of all the honors appertaining to him.

Hereupon, the King of Naples & the Florentines prepared a strong army, which was so manfully encountered by Castruccio; that euermore he had the better of the, although with great expence of blood, and recouery of many places from them: so that the Florentines were meerey enforced, to craue a truce for certaine time; during which respite, Castruccio largely increased his power. For, as they of * Pistorium were in difference one with another within the Towne: Castruccio shouldred in (during their ciuill dissention) and possessed himselfe of Pistorium, and all other places subiect to that City.

The Florentines seeing themselves more and more in daily dangers, endenoured by al the best meanes they could deuise, to gather people from all parts, onely to breake the Forces of Castruccio, or else to drine him out of Pistorium. In which respect, the supplies which came to them, as well from the Kingdome of Naples, as other places more remote, were so great; that vpon the musters account, they were numbred to be 40000. men. Seeing then, that they had so goodly an Army, they began their march directly towards Pistorium, where Castruccio had his Campe, consisting of far fewer people then the Florentines. Neuertheless, he guided his war so wisely, vsing so many surprizals, skirmishes and encounters, that successe attended vpon him continually.

In the end, coming to the day of battaile, he proceeded therein with such good order, that he vanquished the Florentines: in which overthrow was great slaughter made, and store of rich booty taken, for all the chiefeest of the Florentines were eyther slaine, or taken prisoners. Castruccio himselfe being wounded, and a great number of his men slaine; yet all this could not a iote daunt his courage, but still he pursued vpon his victory, marching in all haste with his Army against * Partum, which he tooke very speedily, as also all the Castles and Townes thereof. So that (without any resistance) he went and placed his Campe within two miles of Florence, wher at the Florentines were not a little amazed.

As hee was essaying all meanes for his entrance into Florence, hee receiued aduertisement, that the Pisanes were practising some matter to his disadvantage: so that, leauing his intent for Florence, he returned to Pisa a triumphant Conqueror. After he had inflicted punishment vpon the mutiners, he went to visite all the neighbouring parts, taking order for all needfull occasions befeening warre: because he was well assured, neuer to continue long in peace, without some employment for warre.

The Florentines, mightily confounded by their peoples ouerthrow, and losse beside of so many Towns: freely gaue themselves to the King of Naples, promising him a yearly tribute of two hundred thousand Crownes. The King of Naples accepted the Florentines offer, and sent Don Carolo his sonne to their assistance, with the most part of the Caualery and Infanterie that hee could command; and the like did some other Cities of Italy, who stood all in feare of Castruccio's Forces: so that now the Army of the Florentines consisted of tenne thousand horse, and thirty thousand foote. With this powerfull preparation (persuading themselves, that Castruccio durst not come into the field) they intended to besiege Pisa; but Castruccio, who was one of the most valiant & politike Generals, that the whole world then afforded, went forth to meete them, attended only with 4000. horse, and 20000. foote, but all in excellent Military order. As these two Camps began to draw neere each other, there passed diuers skirmishes in the plaine field, wherein continually Castruccio had the best. Finally, Castruccio seeking opportunity, to deliuer battaile to the Florentines: passed ouer the Foord at the Riuer of * Arno, and found the Florentines in such disorder, as he compelled the to accept the battell, wherein was a great slaughter.

CHAP. XXXIII.

A Discourse concerning the Windes: And of their severall names, as well Ancient, as Moderne.

THE Windes, according as Seneca faith, are very meete and necessary for the spacious Vniuerse; to conferue the temperature of Heauen and Earth; to disperse and scatter raines and mylts; and to helpe the Trees in producing their Fruits. Nature also gaue them creation, to be the meanes of mens Nauigation, whereby they might communicate together the goods of the earth: so that Regions which are fertile in some particular things, may impart them to other that are not so well provided. In briefe, the Windes do cause an infinity of commerces among men, which my intended breuery will not spare me to speake of.

Onely I haue propounded to my selfe, to shew how many Windes there are, what they are, whence they come, and how they are: wherein I am perswaded, that some benefit will redound to diuers persons, especially to such as profess to sayling on the Seas. To vnderstand then, what the Windes is, I will not relye on diuersity of opinions, in such as haue written thereon: but following Aristotle, and the most common judgment of the wise; I say, that the Wind is a vapour and exhalation hot and dry, drawne vp into the Ayre by vertue of the Sunne. And being driven aloft by his heate and lightnesse, proceeding on into the middle Region of the Ayre, which is alwayes coldest, cometh to be repulled by that contrary quality. So that being vnable to mount any higher, it breaketh forth into blasts whither it can go, & being hindered of descending downe, in regard of lightnesse is constrained to toss and tumble here & there in the Ayre; eyther more or lesse, according to the strength of the matter wherof it is caused. So that the definition of Seneca is not warrantable, who saith, That the Wind is nothing else, but the Ayre moued, without any other matter: because these are the exhalations and vapours, which stir and moue the Ayre; for, after they are consumed, the wind ceaseth.

The Arguments introduced to be counted in this Chapter.

The windes vapour or exhalation hot and dry.

Thereof the Windes building in the Ayre.

Exhalations and vapours mouing the Ayre to spend themselves.

As concerning their names, our reuerend Ancients imposed such vpon them, as corresponded with the parts and Regions of the world, from whence they came. Neuertheless, Antiquitie neuer acknowledged for many windes, as haue bene since those times. For, according as Plinie, Anlus Gellius, Vegetius, Homer and other ancient Poets say, no other mention was made, but of foure windes onely, which came from the foure parts or quarters of the world, viz. East, West, North and South; those are the parts or quarters most remarkable that can be observed throughout the world. For, as David and Lucan say; Hence cometh day, and thence cometh night.

According then vnto this proportion, our ancient Latines termed Subsolanus, the wind that came from the East Equinoctiall: The Greekes called it Apeliotes, or Eurus: In Italy and Spaine, they call it Leuante; and French Marriners terme it Est. Now, for the right wind belonging to Sunne-setting, which is opposite and contrary to the precedent: the Greekes called it Zephyrus, that is, Purifying: for it makes all plants to flourish: The Latines named it Fauonius: And the Italians and Spaniards call it Ponente: But our French Marriners call it Ouest. And yet some others say, that the word Zephyrus signifieth couching or setting. The third wind was called by the Latines Septentrio, in regard of the North-Starre. By the same reason the Greekes called it Apparetas, or Boreas; the Italians terme it Tramontana; the Spaniards Nort-e-brisa; and the French do give it the title of Nort. The fourth wind, which is opposite to the North, the Latines termed Auster, even as if they would haue called it a Water driuer, for that this wind is often rainy; which made the Greekes to call it Notus, that is, watrish, or moist. The Italians name it Mezzodi; the Spaniards Abrego sur, and Vendaval; and the French, Sud.

Thus you see as concerning the foure windes, whereof only Seneca, Homer, and Osid in his Metamorphosis. But (with much more respect and reuerence) let vs yet say, that our blessed Lord and Saviour makes mention of the foure windes, speaking of the last day of Iudgement, both in Saint Matthew and Saint Marke, where he sayth: That hee will send his Angells with troupes, to assemble his Elect from the foure windes.

Now, as touching the qualitie of the foure windes, we will make some relation thereof, in discoursing on other subalternate windes. Since the time of Homer, we find an addition of foure other windes to the former, as assigning (between the Leuant or East, and the Mezzodi, or South) a wind which the Latines call Eurus, because this wind whisteth like the wing of a Vulture, when he dislodgeth. The Greekes do terme it Eurus; and some call it vulgarly in Italian Leuante, or Siroc, or Suef.

The other wind which rayseth it selfe from the place, where the Sunne mounteth at mid Iune, hath no name amongst the Latines. Notwithstanding, some call it Ardant, or Helleponticus, because it cometh from the coast of the Helleponticke Sea. Our Marriners call it Grec, or Nordeff. Gellius and Vegetius, attribute thereto the name of Aquila, which neuertheless is the name of another wind.

The other wind is iustly betweene the North and the West, and cometh from that Region, where the Sunne setteth in winter, and is called by the Latines Africus, because (in regard of Rome) this wind cometh directly from Africa. The Greekes called it Lybia, because they entitle Gyneya to be Lybia: Our Italians terme it Lybechio, the French and Spaniards Su-ouest, or Garbin.

The other wind is iustly betweene the North and the West, and cometh from the place where the Sunne coucheth him selfe in broad day. Some call it Austo, or Candro. The Greekes called it Argelles, as much to say, as full of rayes. His impetuoussesse is called Apix, because it cometh from a quarter of Italy, so called: Others give it the name of Olympick. Our Italians stile it Mesfrall, the French & Spaniards doe terme it Nort-ouest. These are the eight severall winds, whereof Anlus Gellius and Petrus, maketh mention of.

Moreover, Andronicus the Athenian Philosopher, builded a Tower at Athens, with eight angles or corners of Marble, & at euery angle was figured the Image of a Wind, which blew against the faide angle. On the top of the same Tower, was fixed a Triton of gold (reputed to be the God of the Sea) holding a Rodde in his hand. And this Triton was composed in such artificiall fort, that he turned still with every winde; like as the Vaynes or weather-flags vpon Castles or stately houses now adays do; shewing, or pointing still with his Rod, from whence the winde came, and where it reigned or domineered.

Ouer and beside the forenamed eight windes, there were yet added foure more, to make vp iust the number of twelue: placing two windes on this side, and beyond the North, which is the high North, and two other on both sides of the South, which is the right winde for the South. That on the right side of the Tramontana or North, betweene that and the winde Cassias, they called Aquilo; in regard of his impetuous blustering, which is more sudden, then the wing of the fleetest Faulcon that is or can bee. The Greekes also called it Boreas, in respect of the great noise it maketh when it bloweth: some other terme it Mefes. The other winde, which is on the side of the couchant or Sun-setting, betweene the Tramontana & the winde Cancro, was cald by the Greekes Thrafsias. Seneca giueth it no name at all in Latine; neuertheless, there are some who name it Circius, or Cirrus: the Chabillians call it Galego.

The other two windes are also opposite to these heere related, whereof the one cometh from the entrance to the right winde of the South, and the Region where the Sunne hideth himselfe in Winter, which also is called Euro-auster, or Euronorus. Aristotle reporteth, that (in his time) in Africa they vsed to call it Phe-nicius. The other winde plainly is betweene the direct winde of the South and the Garbin or Su-West: in which respect they call it Lybonorus, or Lybonufter. And these are the twelue Windes, according to the foure Regions of the World.

Aristotle in his Booke of Heauen & the World, and in his Meteors, maketh mention of the Windes; but he neyther assigneth to them any names or number. Pliny notwithstanding, Seneca and Vegetius doe make mention of twelue; as the like also is done by our moderne Astrologers and Cosmographers, as namely Orotius, Appianus, Gemma-Frisius, Henri- cus Glareanus, Stapherinus, Ioannes Beronius, Ioannes Fernellius, Robertus Valturinus, and many more beside. Vitruuius neuertheless, after he hath assigned the eight principall Windes to their Regions: doth yet giue two subalternate Windes to each of the other Windes; so that (by his account) there should be foure and twenty Windes.

Notwithstanding, to enstruct our better apprehension of the Windes, he presupposeth three Circles, whereof one serueth for the opinion of foure Windes, the other is for that of eight, and the last for that of twelue. Hee setteth downe (beside) the names of the Windes, according as Marriners (and especially the Spaniards) haue vsed them. Yet (in the mean while) it is to be obserued, that the windes are alwayes conformed, to the qualities of the Regions from whence they come.

For the three Orientall or East-windes, that is to say, Subsolannus, Cassias, and Vulturinus, are hot and dry: whereas contrariwise, Zephyrus and his neighbours, which come from the West or Sun-set, are colde and moist: because the absence of the Sunne, maketh the Regions colde where those windes blow. As is easily discerned by the night time, which is euermore colde, as also by places subiect to shades, that are (ordinarily) coole and fresh. From the same cause proceedeth humidity; for, as heate in the day time dryeth the Easterne windes: so on the contrary, moisture encreaseth in the nights coolenesse.

As for the three Septentrional or Northern Windes, they are cold and dry; because they come from colde Regions, & they haue their rayes writhed and wrinkled. Their coldnes also causeth drinefesse, which they borrow of the eastern windes, that are their neighbours: and yet they can take no moisture from the Occidentall or Westerne windes, because their drought and humidity are directly contrary.

Come we now to the Meridional or Southerly Windes, they are hot & moist: because they deriue their warmth from hot Regions, coming from where the Sunne heateh downe right: with this addition moreouer, that they are neighbors to the East windes, which are hot. Concerning their humidity, they draw it from the Westerne windes, and vapours both of the Sea and Land. In Mountainy Regions, charged with Snowes, the Southerly winde may there get his moisture, as the like hee doth in fenny and muddy places: euen as drinefesse may be caused by Plaines and champaigne grounds, so that they may be charged in the occurrences, according to the qualities of the windes. Here we are to obserue, that in euery Region, the three windes coming thence, are all of one quality, & produce the same effects, which cause other effects (great or small) according to such as they happen to meete withall.

It resteth now to speake of the particular qualitie belonging to each winde. Beginne wee then with the right East winde, which is the most healthfull of all. For, it is subtle and pure, and partaketh more with choller, then his companions. His neighbour, blowing against the South, is more moist; and farre more furious then the former, and chargeth the ayre with cloudes. Aristotle sayth, that when this winde bloweth, all things do seeme more great and grosse, then they are indeede. The right winde of the South, causeth raines and tempests, it troubleth the ayre with cloudes, procuring penitence and corruption. The winde Carbin, which is neighbor to the right West, is very tempestiue, according vnto Virgil. But the Ouest or West wind, encreaseth fleugme, and procureth thunders: it beginneth to blow, at the first appearing of the Spring. The direct Tramontana, which we call the right North winde, causeth colde and frost, it burneth floures and fruites, and purifieth a corrupted ayre. Now, in regard it shutteth and locketh vp the pores in mens bodies; this winde is helde very apt for healk. As much may be sayde of the other Septentrional windes, which are his comforts or companions.

It is to be held then for a conclusion, that these windes proceede from vapours and hore exhalations, and that (in all) there are twelue: without depending vpon other allegories, assigned to some infant windes. The Spaniards hold for principall winds, those foure which come from the foure parts of the world, to wit, East, West, North and South. As for the other foure, they tooke their names from their precedent: for the North-east is betweene the North and East wind: that which is betweene the Sunne-set and the South, is also called South-west, and the other betweene the East and South, is also termed South-east; these are their seuerall nominations.

Afterward, eight other were talked of, which are equally bi-parted betweene the former eight, being termed Collateral, side or middle windes. As that which is betweene the North and the North-east, was called North-North-east: The other which is betwixt the East and the North, is called by the Spaniards Zefur-deli, and by French Marriners, North-east; that which is betweene the South and South-east, is called South-South-east; and the other betweene East and South-east, is named East-South-east. The other betweene South-west and East, is termed West-South-West; and so of the other in the same distinguishing: so that fixe-teene Windes are equally distributed ouer the Earth. Some adde other fixe-teene Windes beside, which they tearme Quarter windes, by which allowance, wee should then haue two and thirty windes: but these latter borrowe all their names of their neighbours. Thus much therefore may serue for all the Windes.

Of the Great Prouince of Moscouia: As also the Manners, Religion, and Power, of the Prince there Ruling. Divided into five several Tractes.

CHAP. I.

In this first Tract, is contained a Cosmographical description of the whole Countrey; the Climate and Soyle. Also what Soires or Regions are therein contained. What Commodities the severall parts of the Land yeeldeth: And then a briefe Collection, of the principall Citties and Townes in Moscouia or Rusfia.

Moscouia or Rusfia, is a great northerly Region, containing more then five hundred leagues in length. The principall Cittie thereof, being called Mosca, or Moscuua, greater then the City Paris in France, and seated on the River Mosqua. I read also, that this Countrey was (sometimes) called Sarmatia, and came to vary or change from the name, by calling it selfe Rusfia, as being parted or divided into sundry finally, yet absolute Regiments, neyther depending, or being in subiection one to another.

Some of their Writers doe affirme, that the North partes of the Countrey, chanced to bee divided betwene foure Brethren, whose names were Trubor, Xurico, Sincee, and Varimus, and in that coun-trei Language, when they speak the word Russe, it implyeth as much, as to part or divide. They avouch likewise, that foure other persons made the like partition of the South parts, as Kio, Scieko, Chovamus, and a Sister of theirs, named Libella; and every one teimed his Prouince or Territory, according vnto his owne particular name: and so from this their division, the Countrey came to be called Rusfia, about the yeare of our Lord eight hundred and sixty.

At such time as it was called Sarmatia, it consisted of two peculiar Divisions: Namely, the Blacke and White. White Sarmatia contained all that portion that lyeth towards the North, and on the side of Liceland, which Prouinces are now termed Dvyna, Vagha, Vologda, Cargopolia, Novogradia, &c. Novogradia being the chief and Metropolitane City of them all. The Blacke Sarmatia contained all the country Southward, towards the black or Euxine Sea, with the Dukedome of Volodomer of Mosca, Resan, &c. It is bounded Northward by the Lappes and the north Ocean: On the Southside by the Tartars, called Chrimes: Eastward they have the Nagai Tartar, who possesseth all the country of the East side of the Volgha, toward the Caspian Sea: On the west and South-west border, lye Lithuania, Livonia, and Polonia.

All the Countrey being brought to the obedience of one Governour, do comprehend these cheefe Shires or Prouin-ces.

There are the shires naturally belonging to Moscouia or Rusfia; but farre greater and larger then the Shires of England; albeit I cannot say that they are so well peopled. The other Countreyes or Prouinces, which the Emperors have wonne by power, and more lately annexed to their former Dominion, follow by these names. Twerra, Tougboria, Permia, Vadska, Boughoria, Mefnizo, Ovdoria, Obdoria, Condora, beside a great part of Siberia, where the people, (though they are not naturall Rusfians) obey the Emperor of Rusfia or Moscouia, being governed by his Countrey Lawes; paying Taxes and Customes, even as his owne people doe. Over and beside all which, the Kingdomes of Casan and Astracan (not long since obtained by conquest) are vnder his command.

Concerning all his possessions in Lithuania (to the number of thirte great Townes, and more) with Narve & Dorp in Livonia: they are quite gone from him, being (of late yeares) surprized by the Kings of Poland and Sweden. The fore-named Prouinces or Shires, are all reduced into foure Iurisdiccions, tearmed by them Chetfyrds, as much to say, as Tetrarchies or fourth-parts, whereof wee shall have more occasion to speake hereafter.

The whole countrey is of great length and breadth: for, from the North vnto the South (measuring from Cola to Astracan, leaning somewhat Eastward) containeth in length about foure thousand two hundred sixty miles, which they terme verst. And yet the Emperor hath more extensure Northward, farre beyond Cola, even to the Riuet of Tromchua, which runneth a thousand verst or miles beyond Peching, neere to Wardouffe, yet not intire nor clearly limited, because the kings of Sweden and Denmarke, having diuers Townes there, as well as the Russe; are plotted together, the one with the other, all of them laying claime to those whole North-parts as their owne peculiar right. As for the Countreyes bredth, from that part of the Territory lying furthest Westward on the Narue side, to the Eastward parts of Siberia, where the Emperors Garrisons are kept, is counted forty four thousand verst or miles, or thereabout. They holde a Verst to be a thousand paces, yet lesse (by a quarter) then an English Mile. If the whole Dominion of the Russian Emperour were all habitable, and peopled in all places; he would either hardly hold it all within one Gouvernement, or bee too potent for all his neighboring Princes.

To speake somewhat of the Soile and Climate, for the most part it consisteth of a slight sandy mould, yet differing farre in one place from another; for yeelding such things as the earth affordeth. Concerning the Countrey Northward, vnto the parts of Saint Nicholas and Cola, and North-East towards Siberia; it is all verie barren, and full of desert woodes, by reason of the Clymate, and extremite of the cold in winter.

In like manner, along the river Volgha, betweene the Countreyes of Casan and Astracan, where, though the soyle is fruitful, yet it is vn-inhabited: except on the west side of the river Volgha, where the Emperour hath some few Castellis, and garrisons in them. But this is occasioned by the Chrim Tartar, who will neyther him selfe plant Townes to dwell there (as delighting in an extravagant and wilde kinde of life) nor yet suffer the Russe (who is farre off with the strength of his Countrey) to people those parts.

From Vologda, which lieth well-neare seauen thousand verst from the Port of Saint Nicholas, downe toward Mosko, and so towards the South Port, bordering vpon the Chrim, containeth the like space of 1700. verst: it is a very pleasant and fruitful Countrey, yeelding pasture and corne, with woods and waters in great plenty. The like is betweene Resan (lying South-east from Mosko) to Novograd and Pobsko, the which reacheth furthest towards the mountaines: So betweene Mosko and Smolensko (lying South-west towards Lithuania, is a very pleasant and fruitful soyle.

To observe the whole Countrey, maketh a great difference from it selfe, in regard of the yeares course; vrging a strange alteration, betweene Winter and Summer in Rusfia. All the Countrey lyeth in Winter,

Winter vnder snow, which falleth there continually, containyng (sometime) two yardes in thickenesse, and yet farre greater towards the North: the Riueres and Waters being all frozen ouer a yard and more in depth of crust, how broad or swift in current fouer they bee, continuing so commonly for the space of sixe months; as from the beginning of November, vntill it draw towards the end of March, and then the Snowes begin to melt.

Well may we iudge of the ayres sharpnesse there; because Water dropping downe, or throwne vp into the Aire, freezeth to Ice before it can fall to the ground. And let a man hold a dish or pot of pewter in his hand, during the extremitie of Winter (except in some chamber where the warme Stouaes are) and his fingers will freeze fast vnto it, euen to tearing the skin off at the parting with it. And let a man go out of a warme room into a cold, he shall sensibly feeble his breath to grow starke, euen as fishing with the cold, drawing it in, and vrging it forth.

Many haue bene noted, not onely such as trauaile abroad, but others in the frequented Markets, and common streetes of Townes, to bee mortally pinched, and meerey killed with cold. So that diuers haue bene seene to droppe downe dead in the streetes, and many traualyers are brought into the Townes, sitting stiffe and dead in their Sleds: yea, some haue lost their noses, the tips of their eares, the balles of their cheekes, their v. rie Toes, feete, &c. Many times, when Winter is very hard and violent, Beares & Wolves haue come (by hugetroopes) out of the woods, as enforced thereto by meere hunger, and entering into Townes and Villages, haue rent and torne whatsoever they could finde or meete withall, whereby the inhabitants were enforced to flight, onely for safety of their liues.

But when the Sommer is come, neuer was seene a more fresh and delicate countrey, the woods (consisting most of Firre and Birch) being so sweet and louely; the Pastures and Meddowes so Greene and well growne, yea and vpon a sodaine, such variety of Flowers, such harmonic of Birdes (chiefly of Nightingales, whose notes seeme more loud and variable, then in other countries) that no man can lightly trauaile in a more delightfull countrey. From the fresh and speedy growth of the Spring there, the slow giuech no meane reason of opinion, because all winter time it seemeth as mantled in a white Liuerie, which keepeth it warme clothed all winter while, till Spring time, and then the Suns heat dissolueth it to water. All which, do so sweetly sympathize with the ground, bestowing on it such sufficient drenching and soaking (being of a slight and fandie mould, chearing it againe with the sunnes reuterberating brightnesse) that it produceth quickly all hearbes and plants in extraordinary abundance. So that as winter there superaboundeth in colde, Sommer answers it with so much the more heate: chiefly in Iune, Iuly, and August, it equalling then the best ayres in any other Countrey.

Commeng nowe to speake of the Riueres, the first is the famous Volga, whose head or Spring ariseth at an Alder-trees roote, some two hundred Verst beyonde Tarusskoe. It entrench into such bigynes by the entercourse of other riueres gyryng into it; that in some places it extendeth in breadth a mile and more, till at length it falleth into the Caspian sea, by estimation neere 2800. Verst or miles in length. Borissenes is the second, called now Neper: diuiding the country from Lismania, and thence hauing his course into the Euxine Sea. Tanais, otherwise termed Don (bounding anciently betweene Asia and Europ) seemeth to haue his rising out of the Rezan Oзера, passing thorough the Chym Tartares Countrey, till hee makes his fall into the Sea-lake, or great Meare, neere to the Cittie of Azon, called Maotis. Report runneth among the Russes, that from their cheefe City of Moscou, euen to Constantinople, and so into all those parts of the world; men may easily make passage by this Riuer. But then the conuoy Boate must bee drawne ouer a little Istmus, some fewe Verstes thwart-wile, as prooue was not long since made of.

Dunya, being many hundred Miles in length, must bee remembered amongst the rest, falling North into the Bay of Saint Nicholas, and on the Sea-side it hath great Rockes of Alabastrer vpon each banke. Duna emptieth it selfe into the Balticke Sea, neere to the town of Riga. And then is Omega, which some ninetie Verst from the port of Saint Nicholas hath his down-fall into the Bay at Solouefco. Not far beneath Cargopolia, this riuer meeteth with another, called Volocke, which by Tama (a small Towne, droppeth into the Finland sea. Into which Sea, from Saint Nicholas port, and so into the Sound, the Russes easily passe by water.

Suchana is another, which flowing into Dunya, runneth on into the North sea. As for Otko, his head commeth from the Chyrms borders, streeming on into Volgha. And Moscou glideth thorough the Cittie Moscou, borrowing his name thereof. Wichida likewise is a very long and spacious riuer, rising out of Permia, and falling into the Volgha. So much for these memorabile riueres in this country.

We come now to speak of those fruites as Moscouia yeldeth, which are in diuers kinds; as Apples, Peares, Plums, Cherries red and blacke, but the black ones are wilde. Then haue they a Deene, which is like to a Musk Mellon, but much more sweete and delicious. Also Cucumbers, Gourdes (which they tearme Arbouze), Raspes, Straw-berries, and Hurtleberries, beside many other in great plenty; for euerie Woodde and hedge is well stored with them.

But if you demand of their Corne and Graine, they haue Wheate, Rye, Barley, Oates, Pease, Buckwheat, Phlytha, which resembleth Rice in taste. The Countrey is so rebounding in these Graines, that it can allow a large ouer-plus quantity: for Wheate is sometime there folde for two Alcens the Chet first, valewing ten pence sterling, and the measure amounteth well neere to three Bushels.

Concerning seasons of Husbandrie, Rye is there sown before Winter, and all other graine in the Spring time. Such as dwell farre off in the North, and desert places, as the Permians; the partes more Southward do furnish them: being constrained yet (sometimes) to make Bread of a Roote called Vaghnay, and of the middle rind of the Firre tree, when any dearth hapneth.

Natiue commodities yelded by the Countrey are many, and of good worth, for seruice of the peoples best expectati- on, and benefitting the Emperor, by venting them abroad in the World: for the cold of the Climate (being a naturall inconuenience) by Gods great goodnesse, is therein much remedied. Their cheefe Furres are Blacke Fox, Sables, Lufenes, Dun-fox, Martrones, Gurnalles or Armines, Lats or Mineuer, Beuer, Wuluerins, being the skine of a great water-Rat, that fuxelleth naturally like Muske; Calaber or gray Squirrell, redde Squirrell, red and white Fox, what plentie of these are spent in the Countrey (because the people weare Furres all the winter time) is almost incredible. And yet the Merchants some yeares, transport thence, to the valew of foure or fise hundred thousand Rubbles, to Turkie, Perfia, Southeria, Georgia, Armenia, with some other of Christendome.

In the Countreyes of Pechora, Mongoforia, Cbarskey, and other places, do the best Sable furres growe; and the worser in Siberia, Perm, and such like places. The blacke Foxe and red come from Siberia, as from Pechora the white and Dun: the Wolves and Beares skins (both being white) come also thence. Perm yeldeth the choyest Wuluerin, and the best Martrones come from Siberia, Cadam, Morum, Perm, and Cazan. Gilletts & Onglites send out the best Lufenes, Miniuer, and Ermines: yet some come from Novogrod and Perm; and Murmonsky by Colah hath the best breed of Beauers. Common Furres (with some of these fore-named) are in euery part of the Countrey.

A second commoditie is waxe, which hath bene shipt thence into far remote Countreyes yearlye, the valew of 50000. Pood. Honey also is there in great quantity, spent dayly in their ordinarie drinckes, which is Mead of all sorts: and yet carried out of the Countrey in great abundance. Mordua and Cadam nere vnto Cheremissen Tartar, yeldeth the greatest encrease of Honey: but good store also cometh out of Senerikoy, Rezan, Morum, Cazan, Dorogobofe, and Vasma.

Tallow is yelded in great weight for transportation, by reason of much good ground for feeding Cattle; as also manie Lents obserued among them. Partly beside, because the greatest personnes vse waxe Lights: as the poorer and meaner sort do Byrch, dried in their stoues, being cut into long slices, called these Luchine.

os. Some yeares haue sent away by Shipping, above an hundred thousand Poode yearly, which hath come out of the parts and Territories of Smolensko, Taruflaue, Ouglitz, Novograd, Volozda, Ofter and Gorodetsky.

Another principal commodity is Loth and Cow-hides: their Loth and Buffe being very faire. Their Bull and Cow-hide is but small of size, for Oxen they make none, nor of weather. Strange Merchants haue transported thence some yeares about an hundred thousand hides, beside great store of Goats skines, shipt also thence in large number. The breede for the fairest Loth or Buffe, is about Rafone, Wichida, Novograd, Morum and Perm, as the lesser sort are in the kingdom of Cazan.

Traine Oyle, being made or drawne out of the Seale-fish, is no mean commodity there. And because we are speaking of the Seale-fish, it shall not much dissent from our matter, to report in what manner they hunt the Seale, whereof afterward this Oyle is made. When the end of Summer draweth neere, and the frosts are not (as yet) begun; they defend with their boats into S. Nicholas Baye, to the Cape called Cusconesse or Founesse, where they leave their boats till the next spring tide. When the Sunne waxeth warme towards the spring, and yet the ice not melted in the Bay; they return thither again, and drawing their Boats ouer the ice, vse them as houses to lodge and rest in. Commonly, there are about seauenteene or eightene flecte of them, being diuided into diuers companies, five or fixe boates alwayes conforthing together.

Such as light first vpon the fishes haunt or resort, do fire a Beacon, carryed with them for the same purpose, and certaine are appointed, to obserue when the Beacon shall be fired; whereof report being made to the other Companies, they resort all together, compassing the Seals round in a ring, as they ly Sunning themselves together vpon the lees, being commonly foure or five thousand in a shoale. Then euery man, hauing a Clubbe in his hand, enters stoutly vpon them; & if they hit them on the nose, then they are soone kilde. But if on the backe or sides, they beate out the blowes stiffly, and manie times catch the club so fast, and holde it downe with their teeth so strongly, that the party is forced to call for helpe to his fellows.

The manner of the Seales is, when they perceiue themselves beset round about; to gather all close together, as in a throng or heape, to sway and beate downe the Ice, and to break it if they can: which bending of the Ice, brings vp such a Sea-water vpon it, that the Hunters are faine to wade a foote or more deepe. When they haue killed what they can, & intend no further slaughter at that time: the hunters fall to sharing, euery boat his part by equal portions. And so they flay them, taking off the skine from the bodie, and the Lard or fat withall that cleaueth vnto the skine, which they beare thence with them, going to the shore, leauing the bodies behind. Pits they dig in the ground, of a fathome & a halfe in depth, and hauing taken off the Fat or Lard from the skin, cast it into the pits, and then hurle in hot burning coales to melt it withall. The vppermost and purest is fold, and vfed to oyle wooll for cloth: but the grossest, being red of colour, they sell to make Soap.

Great quantity also of Ickary or Cauetery, is made vpon the river of Volga, out of a Fish called Bellouzina, the Sturgeon, the Seweriga, and the Sterledy: most part whereof is shipt thence by French & Netherland Merchants for Italy, Spaine, and England.

Flaxe and Hempe is another commodity, whereof hath bene shipt at the Port of Narue, the more part of an hundred Ships small and great yearly. But great abatement is in these and other commodities, by shutting vp the Port of Narue towards the Finland Sea, which is now in possession of the Sweden. The stop of passage also ouer land, by the way of Smolensko and Plotsko in regard of warre with the Poland: which causeth the people to be lesse careful in providing these and other commodities, because they want sale. For growth of Flax, the Prouince of Volosko and country thereabout is chief: like as Smolensko, Dorogoboffe, and Rafma is for Hempe.

Great store of Salt the Country maketh, whereof the best is at Stararouffe in very great quantity, hauing store of Salt wells, some two hundred fifty nine Verst from

Salt, whereof some is made naturally of the sea water from the Sea. But at Astracan, Salt is naturally made by the Sea-water, which causteth it vp in great hilles, from whence it is digged downe, and carryed away by Merchants, or any that will fetch of it. Three pence Ruffe is payed to the Emperour vpon euery hundred weight of Salt, which is likewise made in many other places, as in Berm, Wichida, Totina, Kenisfma, Sanoletskey, &c. all out of Salt-pits, except at Solouetskey, which lyeth neare vnto the Sea.

Tarre also they make great store of, out of Firre trees in the Country of Dynma and Smolensko, sending no meane plenty thereof abroad. To these before remembered, there are many more (natural to the country) though of meane estimation: As the fish-tooth, which they call Ribaznos, vfed both amongst themselves, and the Perjans and Bongbarians, who fetch it thence for Beades, Knives and Sword-handles for Noblemen and Gentlemen, and diuerse other vses.

Some doe vse the powder of it against poyson; like to Vnicornes horn, and the fish that oweith it, is called a Morse, being caught about Pechora: Some of these teeth are well-neare two foote in length, and do weigh cleauen or twelue pounds each tooth.

There is a soft Rocke, which they doe cutte into peeces or into thinne flakes, and are naturally to be vsed and employed as Glasse, for Lant-hornes and such like: but yet yet is not so brittle in breaking as Glasse, yet it dooth giue a farre clearer light. They doe tearme it Slude, and it groweth in the Prouince of Corelia, and about the River Dynna, towards the North Sea.

Besides, they make Salt-peter in many places, as at Ouglitz, Taruflaue, and Vitig; with some meane store of Brimstone vpon the River Volga; but they want skill to refine it.

As for their Iron, it is but brittle; yet much thereof is made in Corelia, Cargapolsia, and Vitig Thelma, for other mines they haue none growing within the kingdom.

As for Beasts of strange kinds, they haue the Loth, the Ollen, the wilde Horse, the Wulvering or Wood-dogge, the Lyserne, the Beauer, the Sable, the Martroun, the blacke and dunne Fox, the white Beare, towards the Sea-coast of Pechora, the Gurnfall, and the Lafet or Minuer. Likewise, there is a kinde of Squirrell, hauing growing on the pinion of his shoulder bone, a long tuft of haire, much like vnto feathers, with a farre broader taile then other Squirrells haue, which they doe moue and shake, as they moue from tree to tree, like to a Wing in resemblance, and seeming as if they flew thereby, whereby they were called, Zetach vechshe, that is to say, flying Squirrells. In the Summer their Hares and Squirrells are of the same colour as other; but in Winter, the Hare changeth her coate into milke-white, and the Squirrell into grey, and thereof is it that the Calaber commeth.

Fallow Deere likewise they haue, the Roe Bucke, and great plenty and store of Goates. Their horses are but small, yet swift and hard, and both in Winter and Summer, they trauell them vnfold, vying no respect at all of pace. Small are their sheepe, bearing harsh and course wooll, not so apt and conuenient for the making of Cloath, as is afforded in diuers other Countries, nor of so good a wearing.

Of Fowles they haue of the principall kinds; and great store of Hawkes, as also the Eagle, the Ger-falcon, the Slight-falcon, the Gof hawke, the Tassell, the Spar-hawke. But the principall Hawke breeding in the Country is counted the Ger-falcon. We may not forget other chiefe Fowles, as the Swanne wilde and tame in great plenty; the Storke, the Crane, the Tedder, resembling a Fa-fant in colour, but much bigger, and liueth in the Firre woods. Of Pheazant and Partridge they haue great plenty; and an Owle, so great and ougly to beholde, as few countries afforde the like, with a huge broad face, and eares much like to a man.

We come now to speake of fresh-water Fish, besides the common sort; as Carpes, Pikes, Pearch, Tench, Roach, &c. they haue diuerse kinds very good and delicate. As the Bellouga or Bellouzina, of foure or foue elles in length; the Ostrima or Sturgeon, the Seweriga and Sterledy, somewhat in fashion and in taste like vnto the Sturgeon, but not so thicke, nor so long.

A strange Squirrell.

Hares milke white.

Fallow deere, Roe Bucks, and Goats.

Fowles of diuers kinds both wilde and tame.

Variety of fresh-water Fish and other beside.

These foure Kindes of Fish breed in the Volgha, and are there catcht in great abundance, seruing generally (as a great food) to the whole kingdom. And of the roes of these foure fishes, are made very great store of lary or Casery.

Besides these breeding in the Volgha, they haue a Fish called Ribabela, or white Salmon, which they hold to be more delicate then the red Salmon, hauing also great plenty of them in the Riues northward, as in Dunya and Cela, &c. In the Ozera, or Lake neare to Perisslaue, they haue a small Fish, which they call the freiherring, of the same fashion, and tasting also like a Sea herring. From the trades of fishing the Emperor hath an yearely large custome, which they practise in the Summer: but send it frozen in the Winter into all parts of the Realme.

Now, because wee aymed at a formalitie in the description, wee enter into a relation of the chiefe and principall Cities in Moscouia or Rufsia, and as our direction guideth vs, these are their names.

The City of Mosko is supposed to bee of great antiquitie, though the first founder thereof be vnkowne to the Moscouites or Russe. It seemeth to deriue the name from the riuer, running on the one side thereof. Berosus the Chaldean telleth vs, that Nimrod (in other profane Stories called Saturne) sent Assyrius, Medus, Mofcus and Mages into Asia, to plant Colonies there, and that Mofcus planted both in Asia and Europe. Which may make some probability, that the City, or rather the Riuer whereon it is built, tooke the denomination from this Mofcus. And so much the rather, because of the Climate or situation, which is in the very furthest part and lift of Europe, bordering vpon Asia.

It appeareth, that this Citie was much enlarged by one Euan or Iohn sonne vnto Daniel, the first that changed his Title of Duke into King; though that honor continued not to his posteritie, the rather, because hee was inuelted into it by the Popes Legate, who at that time was Innocentius the fourth, about the yere 1246. which was much milkt by the Russe people, being then a part of the Easterne or Greeke Church. Since that time, the name of that Citie hath growne more famous, and much better knowne to the world. In somuch, that not only the province, but the whole country of Moscouia or Rufsia, is termed by some, by the name of Moscouia the Metropolit Citie.

The forme of this City is (in a maner) round, with three strong walles, circuling the one within the other, and streetes lying betweene, whereof the in-most wall, and the buildings closed within it, lying so fast (as the heart within the body) fenced and warded with the Riuer Moskua, which runneth close by it; is all accounted the Emperours Castell. The number of houses through the whole City (being reckoned a litle before it was fiered by the Chirims) were 41500. Since the Tartar besieged and fiered it (which was in the yere 1571.) there doth lye waste of it a great breadth of ground, which before was wel set and planted with buildings; especially that part on the South side of Moskua, built (not long before) by Basilus the Emperour for his garrison of Souldiours, to whom he gaue priuilege to drinke Mead and Beere, at the drie or prohibited times. And for that cause called his new Citie Naloi, that is to say, Skinke or paure in. So that now the Citie of Mosko is not much bigger then the City of London in England.

The next in greatnesse, and (in a maner) as large, is the City Nowograd, where happened (as the Russe sayth) the memorable warre, so much spoken of in Histories, of the Scythian seruants, that tooke vppon Armes against their Maisters, which they haue reported to be after this manner.

Chap. 1. Of the Country, Climate and People.

The Boiardiens or Gentle men of Nowograd, and the adiacent territories (that onely are Souldiers after the discipline of those countries) had warre with the Tartars. Which being well performed and ended by them, they returned homewards. Where they vnderstoode by the way, that their Choloppy, or Bondslaves whom they left at home, had (in their absence) possessed their townes, lands, houses, wines and all. At which newes being somewhat amazed, and yet disdayning the villanie of their seruants; they made the more speed home, and so, not farre from Nowograd, mette them in warrelike maner marching against them.

Whereupon, aduising what was best to be done, they all agreed, to set vpon them with no other shew of weapons, but with their horse whippes (which as their manner is, every man rideth withall) to put them in remembrance of their seruile condition, thereby to terrifie them and abate their courage. And so marching on, lashing all together with their whips in their hands, they gaue the on-falls, which seemed so terrible in the eares of the villaines, and strooke such a fence into them of the whips smart (whereof they had sharply tasted before) that they all fled together, euen like sheepe before their driuers. In memorie of which victorie, the Nowogradians (euer since) haue stamped their Coine, which they call a Dingoe Nowogradskoy, currant through all Rufsia: with the figure of a man on horsebacke, shaking a whip aloft in his hand. These two Citties exceede the rest in greatnesse.

For strength, their chiefe Citties are Yobsko, Smolensko, Cazan and Astracan, as all lying vpon the borders; but for situation, Iaruslaue farre exceedeth all the rest. Because, beside those commodities yielded by pasturage and corne, it lieth vpon the famous riuer Volgha, and lookes ouer it, from a banke most faire and statelily to beholde, whereof the Towne taketh name. For Iaruslaue (in that language) signifieth a faire and famous banke. In this Citie (as may be well imagined by that name) dwelt the Moscouian or Russe King Yladimir, surnamed Iaruslaue: that married the daughter to Harold King of England, by mediation of Sueno the Dane, as the Danish historie testifieth, about the yere of our Lord God, one thousand sixty seauen.

Nothing greatly memorable, is to be spoken of the other Citties and Townes, but onely ruines within their walles: which declareth the peoples decreafe vnder this gouernement. In stead of paving, the streetes (in their Townes and Citties) are plankt with Firre trees, plained and layd euen close one to another. Their houses are of wood, without any Lime or Stone, built very close and warme, with Firre trees playned, and layd one vpon another, being fastened together with dents or notches at euery corner, and so clapped fast together. Betwixt the trees of timber, they thrust in Mosse, whereof they gather plenty in the woods, to keepe out the ayre: And euery house hath a paire of staires, which leade vpp into the chambers out of the yard or streete, after the Scottish maner. This building appeareth farre better for their Country, then that of Stone and Bricke; because they are darker and more colde, then those wooden houses; especially them of Firre, which is a verie drie and warme kinde of wood: whereof God hath provided them such store, that a faire house may be built for twenty or thirty Rubbels, or litle more where wood is scant.

Onely the greatest inconvenience of their wooden building, is the aptnesse for fiering, which happeneth there verie often, and in as fearefull sort, by reason of the drienesse and famesse of the Firre, that being once fiered, it burneth like voto a Torch, and is hardly quenched, till all be quite consumed.

CHAP. II.

Our second Tract, relateth of what Linage or house the great Emperours are descended: And a view of their entailment or Inauguration in that supreme dignitie: with the form of publike Government, & order observed in holding their Parliaments. Then, of the Nobility dignifying the state, with the regiment of their Provinces and Councell attending upon the Emperour: His Customs, Renewalls & Sophismes, and a breife relation of the Communitie, in their obedience and service.

HE surname of the Imperial house of Moscouia or Russia, is called Beala, receiving Originall (as is supposed) from the kings of Hungaria, which may appeare the more probable; because the Hungarian Kings (many years since) have borne that name, as is noted by Bonfinius, and other Histories written of that Countrey. For, about the yeare, 1059. mention is made of one Beala, that succeeded his brother Andreas, who reduced the Hungarians to the Christian Faith, from which they were falsly by Turkish perswasion before. The second of that name was called Beala the Blinde, after whome succeeded diuers of the same name.

That their Ancestours came not of the Russe Nation, Iuan Vasiliowich (Father to this Emperour) would many times boast, disdaining (as it should seeme) to haue his progeny deriued from the Russian blood. As namely, to an English-man his Goldsmith, that had receiued Bullion of him to make certaine Plate: whome the Emperour commanded, to looke wel to his weight. For my Russe (said he) are all Theeues. Whereat the workman, looking stedfastly vpon the Emperour, began to smile.

The Emperour being of verie quicke conceite, charged him to tell, what hee smiled at. If your Maiesty will pardon me (quoth the Gold-smith) I will tell you. Your Highnesse sayde, that all the Russes were Theeues, and forgotte (in the meane while) that your selfe was a Russe. I thought so sayde the Emperour, but thou art deceyued, for I am no Russe: my Ancestours were Germaines (for so they account the Hungarians, to bee part of the Germaine Nation) although (indeede) they come of the Hunnes, who mollest and invaded that country, and rested in those partes of Pannonia, now called Hungary.

How they aspired to the Dukedome of Volodemer (which was their first degree, and ingrafting into Moscouia.) And whether it were by Conquest, or by Marriage, or by what other meanes; no certainty is to be learned among them. But from these beginnings, of a small Dukedom (which bare notwithstanding an absolute government with it, as at that time did all the other Shires or Provinces of Moscouia) this house of Beala spread it selfe forth, and aspired (by degrees) vnto the Monarchie of the whole Countrey, as it is a thing well knowne, and but of late memory.

The cheefe of that house, that aduanced the Stocke, and enlarged their Dominions: were the three last that reigned before this Emperour, to witte, Iuan Basilien, and Iuan, Father to the other that reigneth at this time. Whereof the first that tooke vnto him the Name and Title of Emperour, was Basilien, Father to Iuan, and Grandfather vnto this man. For (before that time) they onely were contented, to bee called by the Name of Great Dukes of Mosco or Moscouia.

What hath beene done by eyther of these three, and how much they haue added vnto their first estate, eyther by Conquest, or otherwise; wee shall shew more at large, when we come to speake of their Colonies, or purchases perforce. For the continuance of the race, this House of Beala at this present, is in like case, as are many of the greatest Houses of Christendome, (Viz:) the whole Stocke and Race, concluded in one, two, or some fewe of the blood. For, besides the Emperour that now is, who hath no childe (neyther is like euer to haue, for ought that can bee conieured by the constitution of his bodye, and barrenesse of his wife, after so many yeares marriage) there is but one more, which is a Childe of fixe or seauen yeares olde, in whom resteth all the hope of succession, and posteritie of that house.

As for the other Brother, that was eldest of the three, and of the best towardnesse: hee dyed of a blow giuen him by his Father vpon the head (in furie) with his walking Staffe, or (as some say) of a thrust with the prong of it, driuen deep into his head. That hee meant him no such mortall harme, when hee gaue him the blowe, appeared by his wonderfull great mourning and passion after his Sonnes vntimely death; which neuer left him, vntill it brought him to his Graue. Wherein may bee noted the Iustice of God, that punished his delight in shedding of blood, with this murder of his Sonne by his owne hand. And so ended his dayes and tyranny together, with the murdering of himselfe by extreame grief, for this his vnhappy, and most vnnatural facte.

The Emperours younger Brother, of fixe or seauen yeares olde (as was said before) is kept in a remote place from the Mosko, vnder the tuition and government of his Mother, and her Kindred, of the house of the Nagaias: yet not safe (as I haue heard) from attempts of making away, by practise of some that would aspire vnto the Crowne, if the Emperour dye without any yssue. For, the Nurf that tasted before him of certaine meate, (as I haue heard reported) dyed immediately.

That he is the Naturall Sonne vnto Iuan Vasiliowich, the Russe people warrant it, by the fathers qualities, which appear already in his tender yeeres. He delights to see Sheepe and other Cattle kilde, and to looke on their throates, while they are bleeding (which commonly, children are affrayde to beholde) and to beate Geese and Hennes with a Staffe, till hee see them dead.

Besides these of the masse kinde, there is a Widow, that hath right in the succession, Sister to the olde Emperour, and Aunt to him liuing; sometime wife vnto Magnus, Duke of Holst. Brother to the King of Denmarke, by whom she had one daughter.

This Woman, since the death of her Husband, hath beene allured againe into Russia, by some that loue the succession better then her selfe, which appeareth by the sequelle. For her selfe, with her daughter, so soone as they were returned againe into Russia, were thrust into a Nunnery, where her daughter dyed this last yeare, but of no naturall disease, as was supposed.

The Mother remaineth still in the Nunnery, bewailing her selfe, and cursing the time when shee returned into Russia, enticed with the hope of Marriage, and many other fayre promises in the Emperours name. And thus it standeth with the Imperiall stocke of Russia, of the House of Beala, which is like to determine in those that now are, and to make a conuersion of the Russe Estate. If it bee into a Government of some better temper, and milder constitution; it will bee happy for the people, that are nowe oppressed with intollerable seruitude.

Our next Discourse, must extend it selfe, to report such solemnities, as are commonly vsed at the Russe Emperours Coronation, which followeth in this manner.

Of the manner of Crowning or Inauguration of the Russe Emperours.

HE solemnities vsed at the Russe Emperours Coronation, are on this manner. In the great Church of Preb. He (or our Ladie) within the Emperours Castle, is erected a stage, whereon standeth a Screene, that beareth vpon it the Imperiall Cappe and Robe, of exceeding rich stuffe. When the day of Inauguration is come, there resorteth thither, first the Patriarche with the Metropolitanes, Arch-bishops, Bishoppes, Abbots, and Priors, alrichly clad in their Pontificalibus. Then enter the Deacons, with the Quier of singers: who so soon as the Emperour setteth foot into the church begin to sing: Many yeeres may line noble Theodore Iuanowich, &c. Whereunto the Patriarch and Metropolit, with the reit of the Cleargy, answer with a certaine Hymne, in forme of a prayer, singing it all together, with a great noise. The Hymne being ended, the Patriarch with the Emperor mount vp the stage, where standeth a feat ready for the Emperour. Whereon the Patriarch willeth him to sit down, and then placing himselfe by him, vpon another feat provided for that purpose, boweth down his head toward the ground, and saith this prayer.

The prayer uttered by the Patriarch, before the Coronation.

Oh Lord God, King of Kinges, Lord of Lords, which by the Prophet Samuel diddest chuse thy seruant David, and anoint him for King ouer thy people Israel; heare nowe our Prayers, and looke from thy Sanctuarie vpon this thy seruant Theodore, whom thou hast chosen, and exalted for King, ouer the thy holy Nations. Annoint him with the Oyle of gladnesse, protect him by thy power, put vpon his head a Crowne of Gold & precious stones, giue him length of dayes, place him in the seat of Iustice, strengthen his arme, make subiect vnto him all the barbarous Nations. Let thy feare be in his whole heart; turne him from an euill Faith, and from all error, and shew him the saluation of thy holie & vniuersall Church; that he may iudge thy people with Iustice, and protect the children of the poore; and finally attaine euerslasting life. This prayer he speaketh with a low voyce, and then pronounceth aloud: All praise and power to God the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost.

The Ceremonies to be performed in order.

The prayer being ended, he commandeth certaine Abbots to reach the Imperiall Robe and Cap; which is done verie decently, and with great solemnitie, the Patriarch withall pronouncing alowde; Peace be vnto all. And so he beginneth another prayer to this effect: Now your selues together with vs, and pray to him that reigneth ouer all. Preserve him (O Lord) vnder thy protection, keepe him that he may do good and holy things, let iustice shine forth in his dayes, that we may liue quietly without strife and malice.

This is pronounced somewhat softly by the Patriarch, whereto he addeth againe alowd: Thou art the King of the whole world, and the Saviour of our soules, to thee the Father, Sonne, and Holy Ghost, be all praise for euer and euer, Amen. Then putting on the Robe and the Cap, he blesteth the Emperor with the signe of the Crosse: saying withall; In the name of the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost. The like is done by the Metropolit, Arch-bishops, and Bishops: who all in their order come to the Chaire, and one after another, doe blesteth the Emperor with their two fore-fingers.

Then is saide by the Patriarch another prayer, that beginneth, O most holy Virgin, mother of God, &c. After which, a Deacon pronounceth with an high lowde voyce: Many yeeres to Noble Theodore, good, honourable, beloued of God, great Duke of Volodemer of Mosko, Emperour, and Monarch of all Rusfia, &c. Whereto the other priests and Deacons, that stand somewhat far off by the Altar or Table, answer singing: Many yeeres, many yeeres to the noble Theodore. The same note is taken vppe by the Priests and Deacons, that are placed at the right and left side of the Church, and then all together they chaunt and thunder out, singing; Many yeeres to the noble Theodore, good, honourable, beloued of God, great Duke of Volodemer, Mosko, Emperour, of all Rusfia, &c.

These solemnities being ended, first cometh the Patriarch with the Metropolit, Arch-bishops, and Bishops; then the Nobility, and the whole companie in their order, to doe homage vnto the Emperour, bending downe theyr heades, and knocking them at his feete vnto the very ground.

According to their ancient custome

Homage and obeyance done to the Emperour.

The Stile wherewith hee is inuest at his Coronation, runneth after this manner.

Theodore Iuanowich, by the Grace of God, great Lord and Emperour of all Rusfia, great Duke of Volodemer, Mosko, and Novograd, King of Casan, King of Astracan, Lord of Plesko, and great Duke of Smolensko, of Tuveria, Touzhoria, Permia, Vadska, Bulghoria, and others. Lord and great Duke of Novograd of the Low Countreies, of Chermigo, Rezan, Polotskoj, Rostou, Tarsuslawej, Bealozera, Liefland, Oudoria, Obdoria, and Condens: Commander of all Siberia, and of the North partes, and Lorde of many other Countreies, &c.

This

The Emperor proud of his many Titles.

This stile containeth in it all the Emperors Prouinces, and setteth forth his greatnesse. And therefore they haue a very great delight and pride in it, forcing not onely their owne people, but likewise strangers (that haue any matter to deliuer to the Emperor by speech or writing) to repeat the whole forme from the beginning to the end. Which breedeth much caull, and sometimes quarrell, betwixt them and the Tatar, and Poland Ambassadors; who refuse to call him Czar, that is Emperour, and to repeat the other parts of his long stile.

The State or forme of their gouernment.

The manner of their Gouernment, is much after the Turkish fashion: which they doe seeme to imitate as neere as the Countrey, and reach of their capacities (in politick affayres) will giue them leaue to doe.

The Russe gouernment tyrannical.

The State and forme of their Gouernment is plaine tyrannicall, as applying all to the behoofe of the Prince, and that after a most open and barbarous manner; as may appear by the Sophismata, or secrets of their Gouernment alterward set down, aswell for the keeping of the Nobility and Commons in an vnder proportion, and farre vneuen balance in their seuerall degrees; as also in their impositions and exactions, wherein they exceed all iust measure, without any regard of Nobilitie or people.

Exaction in Nobilitie ouer the meaner sort.

Furthermore, it giueth the Nobilitie a kinde of iniust, and vnmeasured liberty, to command and exact vpon the Commons and baser sort of people, in all parts of the Realme wherefoeuer they come, especially in the place where theyr Lands lye, or where they are appointed by the Emperor to gouerne vnder him. Allo to the Commons some small contentment, in that they passe ouer their lands (by descent of inheritance) to whither son they will: which commonly they do after our Caual kinde, and dispose of their goodes by gift or Testament, without any controulment. Wherein notwithstanding, both Nobility and Commons are but flouers for the Prince, all running in the end into the Emperors Coffers: as may appear by the practise of enriching his treasure, and the manner of Exactions sette downe in the title of his Customes and Reuennewes.

The Nobilitie and Commons, flouers for the Prince.

Concerning the principall points and matters of State, wherein the Soueraignty consisteth (as the making and amending of publike Lawes, the making of Magistrats, power to make warre or league with any foraine State, to execute or to pardon life, with the right of appeal in all matters, both ciuill and criminall) they doe so wholly and absolutely pertaine to the Emperor and his Councell vnder him; as that hee may be saide to be the Soueraigne Commander, and the executioner of all these. For, as touching any Law or publike order of the Realme, it is euer determined of, before any publike Assembly or Parliament bee summoned, Where besides his Councell, he hath none other to consult with him of such matters as are concluded before had but onely a few Bishops, Abbots, and Friars: to no other end, then to make advantage of the peoples superstitions, euen against themselves which think to be holy and iust, that passeth with consent of their Bishops and Cleargy men, whatsoever it bee.

Of Soueraign power.

For which purpose, the Emperors are content to make much of the corrupt state of the Church, as now it is among them, and to nourish the same by extraordinary fauours and immunities to the Bishops, Seas, Abbeyes, and Fryaries: as knowing, superstition and false Religion best to agree with a tyrannicall State, and to be a speciall meanes to vphold and maintaine the same.

Benefit made by corruption

Secondly, as touching the publike Offices and Magistracies of the Realme, there is none Hereditarie, neyther any so great nor so little in that Countrey, but the bestowing of it, is done immediately by the Emperour himselfe. Inomuch, that the very Diakes or Clerkes in euery head Towne, are (for the most part) assigned by himselfe. Notwithstanding, the Emperor that now is (the better to encrease his Deuotions) referreth all such matters pertaining to the State, wholly to the ordering of his Wiues brother, the Lord Boris Federowich Godoune.

Officers giuen by the Emperour himselfe.

Thirdly, the like is to be saide of the Iurisdiction, concerning matters iudiciall, specially such as concerne life and death. Wherein there is none that hath any authority, or publike Iurisdiction that goeth by descent, or is held by Charter; but all at the appointment and pleasure of the Emperour.

Of iudiciall matters concerning life & death.

And

And the same practised by the Judges with such awe and restraint; as that they dare not determine vpon any special matter, but must referre the same wholly, vpon the Moske to the Emperours Councell. To thew his Soueraignty ouer the liues of his Subiects, the late Emperour Iuan Paskilovich (in his walkes or progresses) if he had misliked the face or person of any man whom hee met by the way, or that looked vpon him; would command his head to be strook off. Which was presently done, and the head cast before him.

begin. Which commonly is vpon Friday, for the religion of that day.

When the day is come, the Cleargymen assemble before, at the time & place appointed, which is called the Stolby. And when the Emperour cometh attended by his Nobility, they arise all, and meete him in an out-roome, following their Patriarch, who blesteth the Emperour with his two fore-fingers, laying them on his forehead, and the sides of his face; & then kisseth him on the right side of his breast. So they passe on into their Parliament house, where they sit in this order. The Emperour is enthronized on the one side of the Chamber. In the next place, not farre from him, at a small square Table (that giueh room to twelue persons or thereabouts) sitteth the Patriarch, with the Metropolitans and Bishops, & certaine of the principall Nobility of the Emperours Councell, together with two Deacons or Secretaries (called Dumny Dyakey) that enact that which passeth. The rest place themselves on Benches round about the Roome, euery man in his rank after his degree. Then is there propounded by one of the Secretaries (who representeth the Speaker) the cause of their assembly, and the principall matters that they are to consider of. For, to propound bills, what euery man thinketh good for the publike benefit (as in other Countries is vsed) the Russe Parliament alloweth no such custome, nor liberty to subiects.

The points being opened, the Patriarch (with his Cleargymen) haue the prerogative, to be first asked their vote, or opinion, what they thinke of the points propounded by the Secretary. Whereto they answer in order, according to their degrees, but all in one forme, without any discourse: as hauing learned their Lesson before, that serueth their turnes at all Parliaments alike, whatsoeuer is propounded. Commonly it is to this effect. That the Emperour and his Councell are of great wisdom, and experience, touching the policies and publike affaires of the Realme, and farre better able to iudge what is profitable for the Common-wealth, then they are, which attend vpon the service of God only, and matters of Religion. And therefore it may please them to proceede. That in stead of their aduise, they will aide them with their prayers, as their duties

ties

ties and vocations do require, &c. To this or like effect, hauing made their answers euery man in his course, vpon standeth some Abbot or Fryar, more bold then the rest (yet appointed before hand, as a matter of forme) and desired the Emperour it would please his Maiesty, to command to be deliuered vnto them, what his Maiesties owne iudgement, and determinate pleasure is, as touching those matters propounded by his Deake?

The forme of the Emperours answer.

Whereto is replied by the saide Secretary, in the Emperours name. That his Highnesse, with those of his Noble Councell (vpon good and sound aduise) haue found the matters proposed, to be very good and necessary for the Common-wealth of his Realme. Notwithstanding, forasmuch as they are religious men, and know what is right; his Maiesty requireth their godly opinions, yea and their censures too, for the approving or correcting of the saide propositions. And therefore desired them againe, to speake their mindes freely. And if they shall like to giue their consents, that then the matters may passe to a full conclusion.

Hereunto, when the Cleargymen haue giuen their consents (which they vse to do without any great pausing) they take their leaues, with blessing of the Emperour: who bringeth the Patriarch on his way so farre as the next Roome, and so returneth to his seate, till all be made ready for his returne homeward. The Actes that thus are passed by the Zabore or Parliament, the Deakeis or Secretaries draw into a forme of Proclamation, which they send abroad into euery Prouince, & head-towne of the Realme, to be published there, by the Dukes & Deakeis, or Secretaries of those places. The Session of Parliament being fully ended; the Emperour inuitheth the Cleargymen to a solemne Dinner. And so they depart euery man to his home.

Of the Nobility, and by what means it is kept in vnder proportion, as is creeble to that State.

The degrees of persons or estates of Russia (besides the Soueraigne State or Emperour himselfe) are these in order. First, the Nobility which is of four sorts. Whercof the chiefe for birth, authority, and reuennue, are called the Vdelney Knazey, that is, the exempt or priuiledged Dukes. These held sometime a fewerall iurisdiction, and absolute authority within their Precincts, much like vnto the States or Nobles of Germany. But afterwards (referring their rights vpon composition) they yielded themselves to this house of Beals, when it began to waxe mighty, and to enlarge it selfe by ouermatching their neighbours. Only they were bound to serue the Emperour in his warres, with a certaine number of horse. But the late Emperour Iuan Paskilovich, Father to this Prince, beeing a man of high spirit, and subtile in his kinde, meaning to reduce his gouernement into a more strickt forme; began by degrees to clip off their greatnesse, and to bring it downe to a lesser proportion: till in the ende, he made them not only his vassals, but his Kolopey, that is, his very villains or bond-slaves. For so they terme & write themselves, in any publike instrument or priuate petition which they make to the Emperour. So that now they hold their authorities, lands, liues and all at the Emperours pleasure, as the rest do.

The cunning of the late Emperour.

The meanes and practise whereby he wrought this to effect, against those, and other of the Nobility (so well as I could note out of the report of his doings) were these, and such like. First, he cast priuate emulations among them, about prerogative of their Titles and Dignities. Wher-in he vied to set on the Inferiours, to preferre or equalle themselves to those, that were accounted to be of the Nobler houses. Where hee made his advantage of their mallice and contentions, the one against the other, by receiuing deuiised matter, and accusations of secret practise and conspiracies, to be intended against his person and state. And so, hauing singled out the greatest of them, and cut them off, with the good liking of the rest; hee fell at last to open practise, by forcing of the other to yield their rights vnto him.

2. He diuided his subiects into two parts or Factions by a generall schisme. The one part he called the Oppressini or Seleit men. These were such of the Nobility and Gentry, as hee tooke to his owne part, to protect, and maintaine them as his faithfull subiects. The other hee called Zemsky, or the Commons. The Zemsky contained the base and vulgar sort, with such Noblemen and Gentlemen as he meant to cut off, as suspected to mislike his gouernement, and to haue a meaning to practise against him. Wherein hee provided that the Oppressini, for number ber and quality of valour, money, armor, &c. far exceeded the other of the Zemsky side, whom hee put (as it were) from vnder his protection: so that if any of the were spoyled or killed by those of the Oppressimi (which he accounted of his owne part) there was no amends to bee sought for, by way of publike iustice, or by complaint to the Emperor.

The distinguishing of the Oppressimi & Zemsky each from others.

The reason of this cruell practise.

The whole number of both parts was orderly registred and kept in a Booke: so that euery man knew, who was a Zemsky man, and who of the Oppressimi. And this liberty of the one part, to spoyle and kill the other, without any helpe of Magistrate, or law (that continued seven years) enriched that side and the Emperors treasury, and wrought that withall, which hee intended by this practise, viz. to take out of the way such of the Nobility, as himselfe misliked: whereof were flaine (within one weeke) to the number of three hundred within the City of Mosko. This tyrannicall practise, of making a generall Schisme, and publike diuision among the subiects of his whole Realme, proceeded (as should seeme) from an extreme doubt, and desperate feare, which he had conceiued of most of his Nobility, and Gentlemen of his Realme, in his warres with the Polonian and Chrim Tartar. What time he grew into a vehement suspicion (conceiued of the ill successe of his affaires) that they practised treason with the Polonian and Chrim. Whereupon he executed some, and deuised this way to be rid of the rest.

And this wicked pollicy and tyrannous practise (though now it be ceased) hath so troubled that Country, and filled it so full of grudge and mortall hatred euersince, that it will not bee quenched (as it seemeth now) till it burne againe into a ciuill flame.

3 Having thus pulled them, and sealed all their inheritance, lands, priuiledges, &c. &c. &c. some very small part, which he left to their name; he gaue them other lands of the tenour of Pomelino (as they call it) that are held at the Emperors pleasure, lying farre off in another Country, and so removed them into another of his Provinces, where they might haue neither fauour, nor authority, not being native nor well knowne there. So that now cheefe of the cheefe Nobility (called Vdel- ney Knazey) are equalled with the rest: saue that in the opinion and fauor of the people they are of more account, and keepe still the prerogative of their place, in all their publike meetings.

Their practise to keepe downe these houses from rising againe, and recouering their dignities, are these, & such like. First, many of their heyres are kept vnmarried perforce, that the stock may dye with the. Some are sent into Siberia, Cazan and Astracan, vnder pretence of seruice, & there eyther made away, or else fall clapped vp. Some are put into Abbeyes, and there themselves Fryars by pretence of a vow to be made voluntary, and of their owne accord, but indeed forced vnto it by feare, vpon some pretended crime objected against them. Where they are so guarded by some of speciall trust, and the Couent it selfe (vpon whose head it standeth, that they make no escape) as that they haue no other hope, but to end their liues there. Of this kinde, there are many of very great Nobility.

These and such like wayes (begun by the Emperor Iuan Vasiliuich) are still practised by the Godonoes, who being aduanced by the manage of the Empreesse their kinswoman, rule both the Emperor, and his Realme, (specially Borris Federovich Godonoe, brother to the Empreesse) & endeavour by all meanes to cut off, or keepe downe all of the best and ancientest Nobility. Whereof diuers already they haue taken away, whom they thought likelest to make head against them, and to hinder their purpose, as Knes Andreas Guraken Bulgakoue, a man of great birth and authority in the Country. The like they haue done with Peter Gollanini (who they put into a dungeon where he ended his life) with Knes Vasiliu Vritich Gollanin, with Andriue Iannovich Suskoy, accounted among them for a man of great wisdom. So this last yeare was killed in a Monastery (whether they had thrust him) on Knes Iuan Petrovich Suskoy, a man of great valour, and seruice in that Country: who about five or sixe yeares since, bare out the sledge of the City Vobsko, made by Stepan Batore King of Polonia, with one hundred thousand men, and repulsed him very valiantly, with great honour to himselfe and his Country, & disgrace to the Polonian. Also Micheta Romanovich manovich, Vnckle to the Emperor by the Mothers side, was supposed to haue died of poyson, or some such like practise.

The names of these Families of greatest Nobility, are these in their order. The first is of Cnes Volademer, which reflect at this time in one daughter a widow, and without childre (mentioned before) sometime Wife to Hartock Magnus, brother to the King of Denmarke, now closed within a Nunnery. The second Knez Melchioskey, thrust into a Friery, and his onely sonne kept from marriage, to decay the house. The third Glimskoy: but one left of his house, and he without children, saue one daughter. The fourth Suskoy, whereof there are foure brethren young men, and vnmarried all. The fifth Hubetskoy. Of this house are foure liuing. The sixth Bulgakoy, now called Guletskey house, whereof are five liuing, but youths all. The seventh Vorallinskoy. Two left of that stock. The eighth Odgoskey. Two. The ninth Telletskey. One. The tenth Taytoue. Three. These are the names of the cheefe Families called Vdelney Knazay: that in effect haue lost all now, saue the very name it selfe, and fauour of the people, which is like one day to restore them againe, if any be left.

The second degree of Nobility.

The second degree of Nobility, is of the Boiars. These are such, as the Emperor honoureth (beside their Nobility) with the Title of Counsellors. The reuennue of these two sorts of Nobles, that rest out of their Lands assigned them by the Emperor, and held at his pleasure (for of their owne Inheritance there is little left them, as was said before) is about a thousand marks a yeare: besides a pension which they receiue of the Emperor, for their seruice in his wars, to the summe of seven hundred Rubbels a yeare, and none about that summe.

The authority of the Empreesse, Brothers, and his large Inheritance.

But in this number, the Lord Borris Federovich Godonoe is not to be reckoned, that is like a Transendent, and in no such predicament with the rest, being the Emperors brother in law, his Protectour for directions, for command and authority Emperor of Russia. His yearly reuennue (in land and pension) amounteth to the summe of 93700. Rubbels and more, as appeareth by the particulars. He hath of inheritance (which himselfe hath augmented in Vasma Dorogoboe, sixe thousand Rubbels a yeare. For his Office of Connick, or Master of the Horse, twelue thousand Rubbels, or Markes, raised out of the Cannishue Slobodoy, or the liberties pertaining to that Office, which are certaine Lands and Townes neere about the Mosko. Besides, all the Meddow and Pasture ground on both sides the banke of the riuer Mosko, thirty versh up the streame, and forty versh downwards. For his pension of the Emperor (besides the other for his Office) fifty thousand Rubbels. Out of the Province or Shire of Vaghta, there is giuen him for a peculiar (exempted out of the Cheerfuld of Pesolskoy, two & thirty thousand Rubbels, beside a rent of Furs, Out of Razan and Sauer, (another peculiar) thirty thousand Rubbels. Out of Ofser and Turtok, another exempt place, eight thousand Rubbels. For rent of Bathhouses and Bathing-houses without the walles of Mosko, fifteen hundred Rubbels. Besides his pomeit, or lands which he holdeth at the Emperours pleasure, which farre exceedeth the proportion of land allotted to the rest of the Nobility.

Allowance for a simple Brother.

One other there is of the house of Glimskoy, that dependeth in land and pension, about forty thousand Rubbels yearly. Which he is suffered to enjoy, because he hath married Borris his Wives sister, being himselfe simple, and almost a Natural. The ordering of him & his Lands are committed to Borris.

The third sort of Nobility.

In the third rancke are the Royanadey, or such Nobles as are, or haue bene Generals in the Emperours warres. Which deliuer the honour of their Title to their posterities also: who take their place above the other Dukes and Nobles, that are not of the two former sorts, viz. of the Vdelney Knazey, nor of the Boiars.

These three degrees of their Nobility (to wit) the Vdelney Knazey, the Boiars, and the Royanadey haue the addition of Vich, put vnto their surname as Borris Federovich, &c. which is a note of honor, that the rest may not vlturpe. And in case it be not added in the naming of the; they may sue the Bestheft, or penalty of dishonour vpon them, that otherwise shall terme them.

The fourth and lowest degree of Nobility with them, is of such as beare the name of Knazey or Dukes, but come of the younger Brothers of those cheefe houses, ses, through many dissent, and have no inheritance of their owne, save the bare name or title of Duke only. For their order is, to delivier their names and titles of their dignities over to all their Children alike, whatsoever else they leave the. So that the sonnes of a Voianodey, or Generall in the fildes, are called Voianodey, though they never saw the fildes, and the sonnes of a Knez or Duke, are called Knazez, though they have not one groat of inheritance or livelyhood, to maintaine themselves withall. Of this sort there are so many, that the plenty maketh them cheape: so that you shall see Dukes glad to serve a meane man, for five or six rubbels or marks a year; and yet they will stand highly vpon their Beshest or reputation of their honours. And these are their severall degrees of Nobility.

The second degree of persons, is of their Sina Boiarskey, or the sons of Gentlemen: which all are preferred, & hold that name by their service in the Emperors wars, being Soldiours by their very stocke & birth. To which order are referred their Diacks or Secretaries, that serve the Emperor in every head towne, being ioyned in Commission with the Dukes of that place.

The last are their Commons, whom they call Monicks. In which number they reckon their Merchants, and their common Artificers. The very lowest & basest sort of this kinde (which are helde in no degree) are their Country people, whom they call Christians. Of the Sina Boiarskey (which are all Soldiours) we are to see in the description of their Forces, and Military prouisions. Concerning their Monicks, what their condition and behaviour is, expect them among the Common people.

The whole Country of Russia (as was saide before) is diuided into foure parts, which they call Chefirds, or Tetrarchies. Every Chefird containeth diuers Shires, and is annexed to a severall Office, whereof it takes the name.

The first Chefird or Tetrarchy beareth the name of Foskoy Chefird, or the Jurisdiction of the Office of Ambassages, and at this time is vnder the chiefe Secretary & Officer of the Ambassages, called Andreas Shaleaque. The standing fee or stipend that he receiue yearly of the Emperor for this service, is one hundred rubbels or marks.

The second is called the Roskradney Chefird, because it is proper to the Roskrade or high Constable. At this time it pertaineth (by vertue of Office) to Bassile Shalcalout, brother to the Chancellors; but it is executed by one Zapon Abramone. His pension is an hundred rubbels yearly.

The third is the Chefird of Pomejinoz, as pertaining to that Office. This keepeth a Register of all Lands given by the Emperor for service, to his Noblemen, Gentlemen, & others, he giueth out & taketh in all assurances for them. The Officer at this time is called Elezar welligine. His stipend is 500. rubbels a year.

The fourth is called Cassansky Dworetz, as being appropriate to the Office that hath the iurisdiction of the kingdomes of Cazan and Astracan, with the other towns lying vpon the Volga, now ordered by one Druzhine Penieleoue, a man of very speciall account among the, for his wisdom, and promptnesse in matters of policy. His pension is 150. rubbels a year.

From these Chefirds or Tetrarchies, is exempted the Emperors inheritance or Vochin (as they call it) for that it pertained (from ancient time) to the house of Bezia, which is the sur-name of the Imperiall blood. This standeth of 36. Townes with their bounds or territories. Besides diuers peculiar iurisdiccions, which are likewise deducted out of those Chefirds, as the Shire of Pogha (belonging to the Lord Borris Felerovich Godanoe) and such like.

These are the chiefe Governours or Officers of the Prouinces, not resident at their charge abroad, but attending the Emperor wherefoever he goeth, and carrying their Offices about with the, which for the most part they hold at Mosko, as the Emperors chiefe Seare.

The parts and practise of these foure Offices, is to receiue all complaints and actions whatsoever, that are brought out of their severall Chefirds and quarters, & to informe them to the Emperors Counsell. Likewise to send direction againe to those that are vnder them in their saide Prouinces, for all matters giuen in charge by the Emperor and his Counsell, to be done or put in execution within their Precincts.

For the ordering of every particular Prouince of these foure Chefirds, there is appointed appointed one of these Dukes, which were reckoned before in the lowest degree of their Nobility, and which are resident in the head townes of the said Prouinces. Whereof every one hath ioyned with him in Commission, a Dyack or Secretary, to assist him, or rather to direct him. For in the executing of their Commission, the Dyack doth all.

The parts of their Commission are these in effect. First, to heare and determine in all ciuill matters within their Precinct. To which purpose, they haue vnder them certaine Officers, as Gubnoy Starets, or Coroners, who, besides the tryall of selfe-murders, are to attach Fellons: as the Soudia or vnder-Iustices, who themselves also may heare and determine in all matters of the same nature, among the Country people of their owne Wards or Bayliwicks: but so, that in case either party dissent, they may appeale, and goe farther to the Duke & Dyack, that reside within the head towne. From whom also, they may remove the matter to the higher Court at Mosko, of the Emperors Counsell, where lie all appeales. They haue vnder them also Sotskoy Starets, that is, Aldermen or Bailiffes of the hundreds.

Secondly, in all criminall matters, as theft, murder, treason, &c. they haue authority to apprehend, to examine, and to imprison the malefactor, & so haue received perfect euidence and information of the cause, they are to send it (ready drawne and orderly digested) vp to the Mosko, to the officer of the Chefird wherevnto that Prouince is annexed: by whom it is referred and propounded to the Emperors Counsell. But to determine in any matter criminall, or to do execution vpon the party offending; is more then their Commission will allow them to do.

Thirdly, if there bee any publike seruice to be done within that Prouince, (as the publishing of any Law, or common order, by way of Proclamation, collecting of taxes, and impositions for the Emperor, mustering of Soldiours, and sending them forth at the day, and to the place assigned by the Emperour or his Counsell) all these and such like, pertaine vnto their charge.

These Dukes and Dyacks are appointed to their place by the Emperour himselfe, and are changed ordinarily at every yeares ende; except vpon some speciall liking or suit, the time be prolonged for a year or two more. They are men of rich felices of no credite, nor fauour with the people, where they gouerne, being neither borne, nor brought vp among them, nor yet having inheritance of their owne there, or elsewhere. Only of the Emperor they haue for that seruice, an hundred Marks a yeare he that hath most, some 50. some but 30. Which maketh them more suspected and odious to the people, because being so bare, and committing fresh and hungry vpon them nightly every year, they racke and spoile the people, without all regard of iustice, or conscience. Which is easily tolerated by the chiefe Officers of the Chefirds, to the ende they may rob them againe, & haue a better booty when they call them to account: which commonly they do at the end of their seruice, making an aduantage of their iniustice, & oppression ouer the poore people. There are few of them, but they come to the End-key or whipe when their time is ended, which themselves (for the most part) do make account of. And therefore they furnish themselves, with all the spoile they can for the time of their gouernment; that they may haue for both turnes, as well for the Emperor, and Lord of the Chefird, as to reserve some good part for themselves.

They that are appointed to gouerne abroad, are men of this quality: saue that in the foure border Townes (that are of greatest importance) are set men of more speciall valor & trust, two in every towne. Whereof one is euer of the Emperors priuy Counsell. These 4. border Townes, are Smolensko, Yabsko, Nouograd, & Cazan, whereof three lie towards the Polonian & Sweden, one bordereth fast off vpon the Chirm Tartar. These haue larger Commission, then the other Dukes of the Prouinces that I spake of before, and may do execution in criminall matters. Which is thought behoouefull for the Commonwealth: for incident occasions that may happen vpon the borders, that are far off, and may not stay for direction, about euery occurrent and particular matter from the Emperor and his Counsell. They are changed every yeare (except as before) and haue for their stipend, 700. rubbels a yeare he that hath most: some haue but foure hundred rubbels. Many of these places, that are of greatest importance, and almost the whole Country, is managed (at this time) by the Gadomes & their Clerks.

The City of Mosko (that is the Emperors seat) is governed altogether by the Emperors Counsell. All matters there (both civill and criminall) are heard and determined in the severall Courts, helde by some of the said Counsell, that reside there all the yeare long.

Onely for their ordinary matters (as buildings, reparations, keeping of their streetes decent and cleane, collections, leuying of taxes, impositions & such like) are appointed two Gentlemen, and two Dyacks or Secretaries, who hold a Court together for the ording of such matters.

This is called the Zemsky house. If any towns-man suspect his servant of theft or like matter, hither he may bring him, to have him examined upon the Pukky, or other torture. Besides these two Gentlemen and Secretaries, that order the whole City, there are Staruys or Aldermen for every severall Company. The Alderman hath his Sotsky or Constable, & the Constable hath certaine Deceksis or Decurions vnder him, which have the oversight of ten households apeece, whereby every order is sooner spide, and the common service hath the quicker dispatch.

The whole number of Citizens (poore and rich) are reduced into Companies. The chiefe Officers (as the Dyacks & Gentlemen) are appointed by the Emperor himselfe, the Staruys by the Gentlemen & Dyacks, the Sotsky by the Staruys or Aldermen, & the Deceksis by the Constables.

This manner of government of their Prouinces and Townes, if it were aswell set for the giving of iustice indifferently to all sorts, as it is to prevent innovations, by keeping of the Nobility within order, and the Commons in subiection it might seeme (in that kinde) to bee no bad, nor vnpolitique way, for the containing of so large a Common-wealth, of that breadth and length as is the Kingdom of Russia. But the oppression and slavery is of open, and is great, that a man would marvel how the Nobility & people should suffer themselves to be brought vnder it; while they had any means to avoid and repulse it: or being so strengthened as it is at this present, how the Emperors themselves can be content to practise the same, with so open iniustice & oppression of their subiects, being themselves of a Christian profession.

By this it appeareth, how hard a matter it were, to alter the state of the Russe Government, as now it standeth. First, because they have none of the Nobility able to make head. As for the Lords of the four Chetfirds or Tetrarchies, they are men of no Nobility, but Dyacks, advanced by the Emperour, depending on his fauour, & attending onely about his owne person. And for the Dukes that are appointed to gouerne vnder them, they are but men of a titular dignity (as was said before) of no power, authority, nor credit, save that which they haue out of the Office, for the time they enjoy it. Which doth purchase them no fauour, but rather hatred of the people, forasmuch as they see that they are set ouer the, not so much for any care to do them right and iustice; as to keep them vnder in a miserable subiection, and to take the sice from them, not once in the yeare (as the owner from the theep) but to poule and clip them all the yeare long. Besides, the authority and rule which they beare, is rent and diuided into many small pieces, being diuers of them in every great Shire, limited besides with a very short time: which giueth them no scope to make any strength, nor to contriue such an enterprize, if haply they intended any matter of innovation.

As for the common people (as may better appeare in the description of their state and quality afterwards set downe) besides their want of armour and practise of war (which they are kept from of purpose) they are robbed continually both of their hearts and money, (besides other meanes) sometimes by pretence of some service to bee done for the common defence, sometimes without any shew at all, of any necessity of Common-wealth or Prince. So that there is no meanes eyther for Nobility or people, to attempt any innovation, so long as the Military forces of the Emperour (which are the number of 8000. at the least in continuall pay) hold themselves fast and sure vnto him, & to the present state. Which needs they must do, being of the quality of Soldiers, and enjoying withall that free liberty, of wronging and spoiling the Commons at their pleasure, which is permitted them of purpose to make them have a liking of the present state. As for the agreement of the Soldiers and Commons, it is a thing not to be feared, being of so opposite & contrary practise much one to the other. This desperate state of things at home, maketh the people (for the most part) to wish for some forraigne inuasion, which they suppose to be the onely meanes, to rid them of the heavy yoke of this tyrannous government.

The Emperors of Russia giue the name of Counsellor, to diuers of their chiefe Nobility, rather for honours sake, the for any use they make of the about their matters of state. These are called Boiarsen, without any addition, and may be called Counsellors at large. For they are fildom or neuer called to any publike consultation. They which are of his special and priuy Counsell indeed (whom he lieth daily and ordinarily for all publike matters pertaining to the State) haue the addition of Dumny, and are named Dumny Boiarsen, or Lords of the Counsell, their Office or sitting, Boarsua Dumna.

Their names (at this present) are these in their order. First, Knez Feodor Iuanowich Meshilosky. 2. Knez Iuan Michailowich Glimsky. 3. Knez Pafili Iuanowich Susky Scopin. These three are accounted to be of greater birth then wisdom, taken in (as may seeme) for that ende, rather to furnish the place with their honours & presence, then with their aduice or Counsel. 4. Knez Pafili Iuanowich Susky, thought to bee more wise then the other of his name. 5. Knez Feodor Michailowich Micheta Romanowich Trowbetsky. 6. Knez Timofey Romanowich Trowbetsky. 7. Knez Andriew Gregorowich Cwarkine. 8. Knez Demetrie Iuanowich Forefine. 9. Knez Feodor Iuanowich Forefine. 10. Knez Feodor Iuanowich Sabarone. 11. Knez Iuan Pafilowich. 12. Knez Iuan Pafilowich. 13. Knez Feodor Demetritowich Shefinow. 14. Knez Feodor Michailowich Trogoniow. 15. Iuan Buteriyuey. 16. Demetrie Iuanowich Godonoe. 17. Boris Federowich Godonoe, brother to the Empreffe. 18. Stephan Pafilowich Godonoe. 19. Gregorie Pafilowich Godonoe. 20. Iuan Pafilowich Godonoe. 21. Feodor Sheremitiow. 22. Andriew Petrowich Clefhenina. 23. Ignatie Petrowich Taisiow. 24. Romain Michailowich Peahy. 25. Demetrius Iuanowich Cheremissen. 26. Romain Pafilowich Alferiow. 27. Andriew Shalacelue.

28. Pafili Shalacelue. 29. Elexzar Wellisoin. 30. Drezheen Penieleone. 31. Zapon Abra moue.

The foure last of these are called Dumny Deiakey, or Lord Secretaries. These are all of the Emperors priuy Counsell, though but few of them are called to any consultation, for that all matters are aduised and determined vpon by Boris Federowich Godonoe, Brother to the Empreffe, with some five or six more, whom it pleaseth him to call. If they come, they are rather to heare, then to giue counsell, and do lo demean themselves. The matters occurrent which are of state, done within the Realme, are informed them (at their sittings) by the Lords of the four Chetfirds, or Tetrarchies. Whereof mention is made in the Chapter concerning the Government of their Prouinces. Who bring in all such letters as they receive from the Dukes, Dyacks, Captaines, and other Officers of the Cities and Castles, pertaining to their severall quarter or Chetfird, with other aduertisements, and informe the Counsell of them.

The like is done by the chiefe Officer of every severall Office of Record: who may come into the Counsel Chamber, & informe them, as occasion incident to his Office doth require. Besides matters of State, they consider of many priuate causes, informed by way of supplication, in very great numbers. Whereof some they entertaine and determine, as the cause or meanes can procure fauour. Some they send to the Offices whereto they pertain, by common course of Law. Their ordinary daies for their sitting, are Mondaies, Wensdaies, and Fridaies. Their time of meeting, is commonly seven a clocke in the morning. If there be any extraordinary occasion, that requireth consultation on some other day, they haue warning by the Clarke of the Counsell, called Dorofy Bulbew, who receiveth order from the Roferd or high Constable of the Realm, to call them together at the time appointed.

For the receiuing of Customes, & other Rents belonging vnto the Crowne, they are appointed diuers vnder Officers, which deliuer over the same into the head Treasury. The first is the office of Drezkerson or Steward of the household. The second is the Office of the Chetfirds:

which I comprehend vnder one, though it be diuided into foure feuerall parts, as was said before. The third is called Bulsha Prechod, or the great Income.

As touching the first, which is the Office of the Steward, it receiueh all the Rents of the Emperours Inheritance, or Crowne Land, which they call Pochin. The Pochin or Crowne land, containeth in it 36. Townes, with the Territories or Hundreds belonging vnto them. Whereof the chiefe that yeeld the greatest rents, are these: Alexandrisca, Corelskey, Ofer, Slobodey, Danielska, Mosalskoy, Chara, Sametka, Srararoufe, Bransue, &c. The Inhabitants or Tenants of these and the other Townes, pay some rent-money, some other rent duties (called Obroky) as certaine Chetfirds, or measures of Graine, Wheate, Rye, Barley, Oates, &c. or of other victuall, as Oxen, Sheepe, Swans, Geese, Hares, Hennes, wilde Fowle, Fish, Hay, Wood, Honey, &c. Some are bound to sowe for the Emperours prouision, certaine Akers of ground, and to make the Corne ready for his vse: hauing for it an allowance of certaine Akers of ground for their owne proper vse.

This prouision for the household, specially of graine ferued in by the Tenants, is a great deale more then is spent in his house, or in other allowance ferued out in liuery, or for the Emperours honour, called Schalouany: for which vse there is bestowed very much, both in graine, an lother victuall. This surplus of prouision is sold by the Steward to the best hand, and runneth into the Emperours treasury.

In the time of Iuan Vasiliowich, Father to this Emperour (who kept a more Princely and bountifull house then the Emperour now doth) this ouerplus of graine, and other Incomes into the Stewards Office, yeelded to his Treasury, nor past 60. thousand rubbels yearly; but rifeeth now by good husbanding of the Steward Gregory Vasiliowich Godonoe, to 230. thousand rubbels a year. And this by the means of the Emperesse, and her kindred, specially (Boris Federowich Godonoe) that account it all their owne, that runneth into the Emperours treasure. Much of this surplage that rifeeth out of the rent prouision, is employed to the payment of the wages of his household Officers, which are very many attending at home, and putuency abroad.

The second Office of receipt called the Chetfirds (being diuided into four feuerall parts, as before was said) hath foure head Officers: which, besides the ordering & gouernement of the Shires, contained within their feuerall Chetfirds, haue this also as a part of their office, to receiue the Tagla and Podat belonging to the Emperour, that rifeeth out of the foure Chetfirds or Quarters. The Tagla is a yearly rent or imposition, raised vpon euery Wite or Measure of graine that groweth within the Land, gathered by Iworne men, and brought into the Office. The Wite containeth 60. Chetfirds. Euery Chetfird is three common buhels, or little lesse. The Podat is an ordinary rent of money, imposed vpon euery Soake, or Hundred within the whole Realme.

This Tagla and Podat bring in yearly to the Office of the Chetfirds a great sum of money: as may appeare by the particulars heere set downe. The Towne and Prouince of Volsko, pay yearly for Tagla and Podat about 18000. rubbels. Nowogrod 35000. rubbels. Torfschoke and Ofer 8000. rubbels. Razan 30000. rubbels. Morom 12000. rubbels. Culmigroe and Dujna, 8000. rubbels. Pologda 12000. rubbels. Cazan 18000. rubbels. Vsiug 30000. rubbels. Rosfoue 50000. rubbels. The City of Mosko, forty thousand Rubbels. Siluerskey, twenty thousand Rubbels. Castrume twelve thousand Rubbels. The total amounteth to foure hundred thousand Rubbels or Markes a year, which is brought in yearly the first day of September, that is reckoned by them the first day of the year.

The third (that is called the Bulsha Prechod, or great Income) receiueh all the Customes that are gathered out of all the principall Townes and Cities within the whole Realme. Besides the fees & other duties, which rise out of diuers smaller Offices, which are all brought into this Office of Bulsha Prechod. The townes of most trade, that do yeeld greatest Customes, are these heere set downe. Mosko, Smolensko, Volsko, Nowogrod Velica, Srararoufe, Torfschoke, Ofer, Taruslaua, Castrume, Nefna Nowogrod, Cazan, Pologda. This Customes out of the great townes is therefore more certaine and easie to be reckned, because it is set and rated precisely, what they shall pay for the custome of the year. Which needs must be paid into the said Office, though they receiue not so much. If it fall out to be more, it runneth all into the Emperours aduantage.

The custome at Mosko for euery year, is 12000. rubbels. The custome of Smolensko, 8000. rubbels. Volsko, 12000. rubbels. Nowogrod Velica, 6000. rubbels. Srararoufe, by salt and other commodities, 18000. rubbels. Torfschoke 800. rubbels. Ofer 700. rubbels. Taruslaua 1200. rubbels. Castrume 1800. rubbels. Nefna Nowogrod, 7000. rubbels. Cazan 11000. rubbels. Pologda 2000. rubbels. The custome of the rest that are Townes of trade, is sometimes more, sometimes lesse, as their traffike and dealings with commodities too and fro, falleth out for the year.

This may be said for certaine, that the three tables of receipts, belonging to this Office of Bulsha Prechod, whē they receiue least, account for thus much, viz. The first table 160000. rubbels. The second table 90000. rubbels. The third 70000. rubbels. So that there cometh into the Office of Bulsha Prechod, at the least reckoning (as appeareth by their Bookes of Customes) out of these and other Townes, & maketh the sum of 340000. rubbels a year. Besides this custome out of the townes of trade, there is receiued by this Office of Bulsha Prechod, the yearly rent of the common Bath-houses, and Cabacks or drinking houses, which pertaine to the Emperour. Which (though it be vncertaine for the iust summe, yet because it is certaine and an ordinary matter, that the Rasse will bathe himselfe aswell within as without) yeeldeth a large Rent to the Emperours Treasury.

There is besides, a certaine mulct or penalty, that groweth to the Emperour out of euery iudgement, or sentence that passeth in any of his Courts of Record in all ciuill matters. This penalty, or mulct is twenty Dingoes or pence, vpon euery rubble or make, and so tenne in the hundred. Which is paid by the party that is conuict by law. Hee hath besides for euery name, contained in the Writts that passe out of these Courts, five Alteens. An Alteen is five pence sterling, or thereabouts. This is made good out of the Office, whence the Writ is taken forth.

Thence it goeth to the Office that keepeth the lesser seale; where againe it payeth as much more to the Emperours vse. This rifeeth commonly to three thousand rubbels a year, or thereabouts. Further also, out of the Office of Roisbonia, where all Felonies are tried, is receiued for the Emperour the halfe part of Felons goods, the other halfe goeth the one part to the Informer, the other to the Officers.

All this is brought into the Office of Bulsha Prechod, or great Income. Besides the ouerplus or remainder, that is faued out of the Land Rents, allotted to diuers other Offices: as namely to the Office called Rosferade, which hath Lands and Rents assigned vnto it, to pay the yearly salaries of the Souldiours, or horsemen, that are kept still in pay. Which in time of peace when they rest at home, not employed in any seruice, is commonly cut off, and paid them by halves, sometimes not the halfe: so that the remainder out of the Rosferade Office, that is laid into the Emperours Treasury, cometh (for the most part) euery year to two hundred and fifty thousand rubbels.

In like sort (though not so much) is brought in the surplus out of the Sirellerskey Offices, which hath proper Lands for the payment of the Sirellers men or Gunners, as well those at Mosko, that are of the Emperours guard (twelve thousand in ordinary) as on the borders, and other garrison Townes and Castles. Likewise out of the Office of Prechase, Shifunoy Nomfloy, which hath set allowance of Lands to maintain the forraie mercenary Souldiours, as Poles, Swedens, Danches, Scots, &c. So out of the Office of Pusharskoy, (which hath Lands and Rents allowed for the prouision of munition, great Ordnance, Powder, Shot, Saltpeter, Brimstone, Lead, and such like) there is left somewhat at the yeares ende, that runneth into the Treasury. All these bring into the Office of Bulsha Prechod, that which remaineth in their hand at the yeares ende. Whence it is deliuered into the Emperours Treasury. So that the whole sum that groweth to this Office of Bulsha Prechod, or the great Income (as appeareth by the Bookes of the said Office) amounteth to 800000. rubbels a year, or thereabouts.

Where lyeth all his monies, jewels, crowns, scepters, plate, and such like, the chests, hutches, and bagges being signed by the Emperours themselves with their owne Seale. Though (at this time) the Lord Borris Federowich Godonoe, his Seale and oversight supplieth for the Emperour, as in all other things. The vnder-Officer at this time, is one Stepan Vasilowich Godonoe, Cousin-germane to the said Borris, who hath two Clerks allowed to serue vnder him in the Office.

His yearly benefite by Furs and other duties.

But besides this reuennue, that is paid all in money to the Emperours Treasury, he receiueth yearly in Furs, and other duties to a great value, out of Siberia, Pechora, Perma, and other places, which are sold or batted away for some forraigne commodities, to the Turkish, Persian, Armenian, Georgian and Bongharian Merchants, that trade within his Countries, besides others of Christendome. What it maketh in the whole (though the value cannot be set downe precisely, as being a thing casuall, as the commodity may be got) it may be guessed, by that which was gathered the last year out of Siberia for the Emperors custome, viz. 466. timber of Sables, fine timber of Matrones, 180. blacke Foxes, besides other commodities.

Of seizures, confiscations, & impositions on Monasteries, &c.

To these may be added their seizures, and confiscations vpon such as are in displeasure, which riseth to a great summe. Besides other their extraordinary impositions, and exactions done vpon their Officers, Monasteries, &c. not for any apparent necessity or vse of the Prince or Common-wealth, but of will and custome: yet with some pretence of a Scythian, that is, grosse and barbarous pollicy (as may appeare) by these few Sophismata, or counterfeit pollicies, put in practise by the Emperours of Russia, all tending to this ende, to rob their people, and to enrich their Treasury. To this purpose this by-word was vsed by the late Emperour Iuan Vasilowich: That his people were like to his beard. The finer shauen, the thicker it would grow. Or like sheepe, that must needs bee shorne once a year at the least: to keepe them from being ouer-laden with their Woolle.

Meanes used to draw the wealth of the Land into the Emperors Treasury.

First.

Of preuent no extortions, exactions, or briberies whatsoever, done vpon the Commons by their Dukes, Diacks, or other Officers in their Prouinces: but to suffer them to go on till their time be expired, and to sucke themselves full. Then to call them to the Prauenish (or whip) for their behavior, and to beate out of them all, or the most part of the booty, (as the Hony from the Bee) which they haue wrung from the Commons, and to turne it into the Emperors Treasury, but neuer any thing back againe to the right owners, how great or euident fouler the injury be. To this end the needy Dukes, and Diacks, that are sent into their Prouinces, serue the turne very well, being changed so often (to wit) once a year: where, in respect of their owne, and the quality of the people (as before was saide) they might bee continued for some longer time, without all feare of in-nouation. For comming still fresh vpon the Commons, they sucke more eagerly: like Tiberius the Emperours flies, that came new still vpon all olde sores. To whom he was wont to compare his Prætors, and other prouinciall Officers.

Secondly,

The whip or dayned for all denyers or contemners.

Secondly.

To make of these Officers (that haue robbed their people) sometimes a publique example, if any be more notorious then the rest; that the Emperour may seeme to dislike the oppressions done to his people, and transerre the fault to his ill Officers.

A Goose ready dressed full of money for a bribe.

As among diuers other, was done by the late Emperour Iuan Vasilowich, to a Diack in one of his Prouinces; that besides many other extortions and briberies had taken a Goose ready dressed full of money. The man was brought to the market place in Mosko. The Emperour himselfe present, made an Oration: These good people are they, that would eate you uppe like bread, &c. Then asked he his Polachies or executioners, who could cut vp a Goose? and commanded one of them first to cut off his legges, about the middest of the shinne, then his armes about his elbows (demanding of him still, if Goose flesh were good meate) in the end to choppe off his head: that he might haue the right fashion of a Goose ready dressed. This might seeme to haue beene a tollerable peece of Iustice (as Iustice goeth in Russia) except his subtil end, to couer his owne oppressions.

Cutting vp of a Goose.

Accunning colour for taxations.

Thirdly.

To make an open shew of want, when any great taxe, or imposition is to wardes. As was done by this Emperour Theodore Iuanowich, by the aduise of some about him, euen at the beginning of his reigne: when being left very rich (as it was thought) by his father, he sold the most of his plate, and stamped some into coyns; that he might seeme to want money. Whereupon presently out came a taxation.

Fourthly.

Superstitious charitie and bountie giuen to Monasteries to a politique end.

To suffer their subiects to giue freely to the Monasteries (which for their superstition very many do especially in their last Wills) and to lay vp their money and substance in them, to keepe it more safe. Which all is permitted them without any restraint or prouiso, as was and is in some Countries of Christendome. Whereby their Monasteries grow to exceeding great wealth. This they doe, to haue the money of the Realme better stored together, and more ready for their hand, when they list to take it. Which many times is doone without any noyfe: the Fryers being content, rather to part from somewhat (as the encrease groweth) then to loose all at once. Which they were made to doubt of in the other Emperours dayes.

A strange practise to get money.

To this end Iuan Vasilowich, late Emperour vsed a very strange practise, that few Princes would haue doone in their greatest extremities. Hee resigned his kingdome to one Felica Knez Simeon, the Emperours sonne of Cazan: as though he meant to draw himselfe from all publique doings, to a quiet priuate life. Towards the end of the year, he caused this new King to call in all Charters graunted to Bishopricks and Monasteries, which they had enioyed many hundred yeares before. Which were all cancelled. This doone, (as in dislike of the fact, and of the misgouerment of the new King) he resumed his Scepter, and so was content (as in fauour vnto the Church and Religious men) that they should renew their Charters, and take them of himselfe: reseruing and annexing to the Crowne so much of their Lands, as himselfe thought good.

Such a practise as hath beene seldom heard of.

By this practise, he wrung from the Bishopricks, and Monasteries (besides the lands which he annexed to the Crowne) an huge masse of money; from some forty, from some fifty, from some an hundred thousand rubbels. And this, as well for the increafe of his treasure, as to abate the euill opinion of his hard gouernment, by a shew of worse in another man. Wherein his strange spirit is to be noted, that being hated of his Subiects (as himselfe knew well enough) yet would aduence such a practise, to set an other in his saddle, that might haue ride away with his horse, whilst himselfe walked by on foote.

Fifthly.

To send their messengers into the prouinces, or Shires where the speciall commodities of their country grow, as furs, waxe, hony, &c. There to forefall and ingrosse, sometime one whole commodity, sometime two, or more, taking them at small prices what themselves list, and selling them againe at an exorbitant

Forefalling and engrossing commodities in a strange manner.

rate

rate to their owne marchants, and vnto Marchants strangers. If they shall refuse to buy them, then to enforce them vnto it.

The like is doone when any commodity, eyther native, or forreine (as cloth of golde, broad-cloth, &c.) thus engrossed by the Emperour, and receiued into his Treasurie, chaunceth to decay, or marre by long lying, or some other casualty. Which is forced vpon the marchants, to bee bought by them at the Emperours price, whether they will, or no.

Not long since was engrossed all the Waxe of the Country; so that no man might deale with that commoditie, but the Emperour only.

Sixtly.

TO take vp and engrosse (in like sort) sometime forreine commodities (as Silkes, Cloth, Lead, Pearle, &c.) brought into his kingdome by Turkish marchants, Armenians, Bougharians, Poles, English, and others. And then to force his Marchants, to buy them of his Officers at his owne price.

Seauenthly.

TO make a Monopolly (for the time) of such commodities as are payed him for Rent, or Custome, and to inhaunce the price of them, as Furrer, Corne, Wood, &c. What time, none must sell of the same kinde of commodity, vntill the Emperours be all sold. By this meanes hee maketh of his Rent, Corne, and other prouision of victuall (as before was sayd) about two hundred thousand rubbells or maketh a year. Of his Rent, Wood, Hay &c. thirrie thousand rubbells, or thereabouts.

Eightly.

IN euery great Towne of his Realme, he hath a Caback, or drinking house, where Aqua vita is sold (which they call Russvine, Mead, Beere, &c.) Out of these he receiueh Rent, that amounteth to a great summe of money. Some yeeld eight hundred, some nine hundred, some a thousand, some two thousand, or three thousand rubbells a year. Wherein, besides the base and dishonorable meanes to encrease his Treasurie; many foule faultes are committed.

The poore labouring man and Artificer, many times spends all from his wife, and children. Some vie to lay in twenty, thirty, forty rubbells, or more into the Caback, and vowe themselves to the pot, till all that be spent. And all this (as hee will say) is for the honour of Hospitalitie, or the Emperour. You shall haue many there, that haue drunke all away euen to the very skinn, and so walke naked (whome they call Naga.) While they are in the Caback, none may call them forth, whatsoeuer cause there be; because he hindereth the Emperours reuenue.

Ninthly.

TO cause some of his Boiars, or Nobles of his Court, (whom he vseth vpon trust) that haue houses in the Mosco, to faime themselves robbed. Then to fend for the Zemski men, or Aldermen of the City, and to command them to finde out the robbery. In default of not finding it, to prauce or seale the Cittie for their misgouernement in eight thousand, nine thousand, or tenne thousand rubbells at a time. This many times is and hath beene practized.

Tenthly.

IN these exactions, to shew their souldierie, sometime they vie very plaine, and yet strange cauillations. As was that of Iuan Vassilovich, father to this Emperour, after this sort. He sent into Permia for certaine loads of Cedar wood, whereof he knew right well, that none grew in that Countrey. The Inhabitants returned answere, they could find none there. Whereupon he ceased their Country in twelue thousand rubbells, as if they concealed the commoditie of purpose. Againe, he sent to the Citie of Astglo, to prouide for him a Colpacke, or measure full of liue Fleas, for a medicine. They returned answer, that the thing was impossible. And if they could get them, yet they could not measure them, for leaping out of their shinnes, seven thousand rubbells for a mule.

By like cauillation, hee extorted from his Nobilitie thirrie thousand rubbells, because he missed of his game, when hee went a hunting for the Hare: as if they hunting and murdering of Hares had bin the cause of it. Which the Nobilitie (as the manner is) praued presently againe vpon the Mousicks, or common people of the Country. This may seem a strange kinde of extortion, by such pleasant cauls, to seee his poore subiects in good fadnesse: but that it agreeth with the qualitie of those Emperours, and the miserable subiection of that poore Countrey.

These, and such like meanes are practised by the Emperours of Russia, to encrease their Treasurie.

The condition of the Commons and vulgar sort of people, may partly be vnderstoode by that which hath already bin sayd, concerning the manner of their gouernement, and the state of the Nobilitie in their owne degrees and places with the ordering of their Prouinces, and chiefe townes of the land. And first touching their libertie, how it standeth with them, it may appeare by this: that they are reckoned in no degree at all, nor haue anie suffrage nor place in their Zabore, or high Court of Parliament, where their lawes and publique orders are concluded vpon. Which commonly tend to the oppression of the commons. For the other two degrees, that is to say, of the Nobilitie, and Cleargie, which haue a vote in the Parliaments (though farre from that libertie, that ought to be in common consultations for the publike benefite, according vnto the measure and proportion of their degrees) are well contented, that the whole burthen shall light vpon the commons, so that they may ease their owne shoulders by laying all vpon them.

Againe, into what seruile condition their libertie is brought, not onely to the Prince but to the Nobles and Gentlemen of the Country (who themselves also are but seruile, specially of late yeares) it may farther appeare by their owne acknowledgements in their supplications, and other writings to any of the Nobles or chiefe officers of the Emperours. Where in they name and subscribe themselves Kolophy, that is to say, their villaines or bondslaves; as they of the Nobilitie doe vnto the Emperour. This may truly be sayd of them, that there is no seruant of bondslave more awed by his Master, nor kept downe in a more seruile subiection, then the poore people are, and that vniuersally, not onely by the Emperour, but by his Nobilitie, chiefe Officers, and Soldiours. So that when a poore Mousicke meeteth with any of them vpon the high way; hee must turne himselfe about, as not daring to looke him on the face, and fall downe, with knocking of his head to the very ground, as hee doth vnto his Idoll.

Secondly, as concerning the lands, goods, and other possessions of the commons, they answer the name, and lie common in deede, without any fence against the rapine, and spoyle, not onely of the highest, but of his Nobilitie, Officers and Souldiers. Besides, the taxes, customes, seizures, and other publike exactions, doone vpon them by the Emperour: they are so racked and polled by the Nobles, Officers and Messengers sent abroad by the Emperour in his publike affaires, especially in the Tammes (as they terme them) and that thorow-fare townes, that you shall haue many villages and townes of halfe a mile, and a mile long, stand all vn-inhabited: the people being fled all into other places, by reason of the extreame vjage, and exactions on them done. So that in the way towards Mosco, betwixt Vologda and Tarnoslavsky, (which is two nineties, after they reckoning, little more then an hundred miles) there are in sight fiftie Darientes or Villages at the least, some halfe a mile, some a mile long (that stand vacant) and desolate without any Inhabitant. The like is in all other places of the Realme, as they that haue trauelled the Countrey, well can report.

The greater oppression ouer the poore Commons, maketh them to haue no courage in following their trades: for that the more they haue, the more danger they are in, not onely of their goods, but of their liues also. And if they haue anie thing, they conceale it all they can, sometimes conveying it into Monasteries, sometimes hiding it vnder the ground, and in woods; as men are wont to doe, where they are in feare of forreine inuasion. Infomuch, that (many times) you shall see them afraid to be knownde to any Bakaren or Gendeian, of such commodities as they haue to sell. They haue become fene sometimes; when they haue layed open their commodities for a liking (as they principall Furrer and such like) to looke still behinde them, and towards euerie doore: as men in some feare, that looked to be fet vpon, and surprized by some enemy. Whereof being asked the cause, it was found to be this, that they haue doubted, least some Nobleman or Sinaboiarsky of the Emperour, had bene in company, and so laide a traine for them, to pray vpon their commodities perforce.

This maketh the people (thogh otherwise hardned to beare any toyle) to giue themselves much to idleness and drinking: as caring for no more, then from hand to mouth. And herof it commeth that the commodities of Russia (as vvas sayde before) as Waxe, Tallow, Hydes, Flax, Hempe, &c.) grow and goe abroad in farre lesse plenty then they were wont to doe: because the people being oppressed and spoyled of theyr gettings, are discouraged from their Labours. Yet this one thing is much to be noted, that in all this oppression, there were three Brethren Marchants of late, that traded together with one stocke in common, that were found to be worth 300000 rubbels in mony, beside lands, cattels, and other commodities. Which may partly be imputed to their dwellings far off from the cite of the Court, viz. in Wichida, a thousand miles from Mosko, and more. The same men were said (by those that knewe them) to haue set on worke all the yeare long, ten thousand men in making of salt, carriages by Cart and Boate, hewing of Wood, and such like; besides five thousand bondslaves at the least, to inhabit & Till their land.

They had also their Physitions, Chirurgions, Apothecaries, and all manner of Artificers of Doutches and others, belonging vnto them. They were said to haue payed to the Emperour (for Custome) to the summe of three and twenty thousand Rubbles a yeare (for which cause they were suffered to enioy their trade) besides the maintaining of certaine Garrisons on the borders of Siberia, which were nere vnto them. Wherein the Emperour was content to vse their purse, till such time as they had gotten ground in Siberia, and made it habitable, by burning & cutting downe woodes from Wichida to Permo, a boue a thousand Verst, and thenooke it all away from them perforce.

But this in the end being enuiud, and disdained, as a matter not standing with their policie, to haue any so great, specially a Mousick: the Emperour beganne first to pull from them by peeces, sometimes twenty thousand rubbels at a time; till in the end, their sonnes that followed were well eased of their stocke, & had but small part of their Fathers substance: the rest being drawne all into the Emperours Treasury. Their names were Iacone, Gregory, and Simon, the sonnes of Onyka.

For the quality of their people otherwise, though there seemeth to be in them some aptnesse to receiue any Art (as appeareth by the naturall wits in the men, and very children) yet they excell in no kinde of common Art, much lesse in any Learning, or littell kinde of knowledge: which they are kept from of purpose, as they are also from all Military practise: that they may be fitter for the seruile condition wherein still they are, & haue neither reason, nor valor to attempt inuouation.

For this purpose also, they are kepte from trauieling, that they may learne nothing, nor see the fashions of other countreies abroad. You shall seldome see a Russe a Traveller, except he be with some Ambassador, or that he make a scape out of his Countrey. Which hardly hee can do, by reason of the borders that are watched so narrowly, and the punishment for any such attempt, which is death if he be taken, and all his goods confiscate. Onely they learne to write, and to reade, and that verie few of them. Neyther doe they suffer any stranger willingly to come into their Realme out of any ciuil Countrey, for the same cause; farther then necessity of vttering their commodities, and taking in of forraigne, doeth enforce them to do.

And therefore not long since, they consulted, about the removing of all Marchants strangers to the border townes, to abide and haue their residency there, and to be more wary, in admitting other strangers (hereafter) into the In-land parts of the Realme; for feare of infection vviith better manners and qualities, then they haue of their owne.

For the same purpose also, they are kept within the bounds of theyr degree, by the Law of their Countrey: so that the sonne of a Mousick, Artificer, or Husbandman,

Fleeing the three brethren

man, is euer a Mousick, Artificer, &c. and hath no meanes to aspire any higher: except (hauing learned to write and reade) he attaine to the preferment of a Priest or Dyacke.

Their Language is all one with the Slauonian, which is thought to haue bene deriued from the Russe tongue, rather then the Russe from the Slauonian. For the people called Selani, are knowne to haue had their beginning out of Sarmatia, and to haue reamed themselves of their conquest Selanos (that is) famous or Glorious, of the word Selana, which in the Russe and Slauonian tongue, significth as much as Glory, or Fame. Though afterwards, being subdued and trod vpon by diuers Nations, the Italians (their Neighbours) haue turned the word to a contrary signification, and teame euery seruant or pezzant, by the name of Selane; as did the Romans by the Getes and Syrians, for the same reason. The Russe Character or Letter, is no other then the Greeke, somewhat distorted.

And because we were speaking of Sarmatia, whence this people seeme to deriue themselves: Some haue thought, that the name of Sarmatia, was first taken from one Sarmates, whom Moses and Iosephus call Afarmathes, sonne to Iocktan, and Nephew to Heber, of the posterity of Sem. But this seemeth to be nothing, but a coniecture, taken from the likeness of the name Afarmathes. For, the dwelling of Iocktans posterity is described by Moses, to haue been betwixt Melcha or Mafius (an hill of the Ammonites) & Sephace, neere to the River Euphrates. Which maketh it very vnlkely, that Afarmathes should plant any Colonies so farre off, in the North, and North-West Countreies.

Concerning their Trades, Diet, Apparel, and such like, it is to be noted where we speake of their priuate behaviour. This order, that bindeth euerie man to keepe his ranke and seuerall degree wherein his forefathers liued before him, is more meete to keepe the subiects in a seruile subiection, and so apt for this and like Common wealths; then to aduance any vertue, or to breed any rare or excellent quality in Nobility or Commons. As hauing no farther reward nor preferment, whereunto they may bend their endeauours, and employ themselves to aduance their estate: but rather procuring more danger to themselves, the more they excell in any noble or principall quality.

CHAP. III.

Thirdly, we discourse on their Politicke and Iudiciall proceeding. Also the Emperours powers for war, and their Salaries: with their Musterling, Munition, and Military prouision. Their Colonies, bordering Friends or Enemies, either in Peace or warre.

Heir Courts of Ciuill Iustice, for matters of Contract, and other of like sort, are of three kinds, the one being subiect vnto the other by way of Appeal. The lowest court (that seemeth to be appointed for some ease to the subiects) is the Office of the Gubny Starust, that significth an Alderman, and of the Sotsky Starust, or Bayliffe of the soake or hundred, whereof I spake before in the ordering of the Prouinces. These may end matters among their Neighbours, within their Soake, or seuerall Hundred, where they are appointed vnder the Dukes and Dyackes of the Prouinces, to whome the parties may remouue their matter, if they cannot be agreed by the said Gubny, or Sotsky Starust.

The second is kept in the head townes of euery Prouince or Shire, by the sayde Dukes and Dyackes, that are deputies to the four Lords of the Chetfrids, as before was sayde. From these foure Courts, they may appeale, and remouue theyr suites to the cheefe Court, that is kept at Mosko, where are resident the officers of the foure Chetfrids. These are the chiefe Iustices or Iudges, euery of them in all ciuill matters that growe within their seuerall Chetfrid or quarter, and may bee either commenced originally before them, or prosecuted out of the inferior Courts of the Shires, by way of appeale.

Their commencing and proceeding in ciuill actions, is on this manner. First, the plaintiffe putteth vp his supplication, wherein hee declareth the effecte of his cause, or wrong done vnto him. Whereupon is granted vnto him arrestis or warrant, which he deliuereth to the Prasfinc or Sergeant, to doe the arrest vpon the party whom hee meaneth to impleade. Who vpon the Arrest, is to put in sureties to answere at the day appointed, or els if indeth at the Sergeants deuotion, to be kept safe by such means as he thinketh good.

The Sergeants are many, & excell for their hard and cruell dealing toward their prisoners; commonly they clappe Irons vpon them, as many as they can beare, to winge out from them some larger Fees. Though it be but for fise pence, you shal see them go with chains on their legges, armes, and necke. When they come before the Iudge, the Plaintiffe beginneth to declare his matter, alter the content of his supplication. As for Attorneys, Counsellors, Procurators and aduocates to plead their cause for them, they haue no such order; but eacrie man is to tell his owne Tale, and pleade for himselfe so well as he can.

If they haue any witnesse or other euidence, they produce it before the Iudge. If they haue none, or if the truth of the cause cannot so well be discerned by the plea, or euidence on both parts; then the Iudge asketh either party (which he thinketh good, Plaintiffe or Defendant) whether he will kisse the Crosse, vpon that which he aougeth, or denieth. He that taketh the Crosse (being so offered by the Iudge) is accounted cleare, and carryeth away the matter. This Ceremonie is not done within the Court or Office, but the party is carried to the Church by an Officer, and there the Ceremonie is done: the money in the meane while hanging vpon a nayle, or else lying at the Idoles feete, ready to be deliuered to the party so soon as he hath kist the Crosse, before the saide Idoll.

This kissing of the Crosse (called Orenjima Chelauania) is as their corporal oath; and accounted (with them) a verie holie thing, which no man will dare to violate, or prophane with a false Allegation. If both parties offer to kisse the Crosse in a contradictory matter, then they drawe lottes.

The better Lotte is supposed to haue the right, and beareth away the matter. So the party convicted is adiudged to pay the debt or penalty whatsoeuer, and withall, to pay the Emperours fees, which is twenty pence vpon enery Mark, as before hath bene noted.

When the matter is thus ended, the party convicted, is deliuered to the Sergeant, who hath a VV rit for his warrant, out of the office, to carry him to the Prasfinc or Righter of Iustice, if presently he pay not the money, nor content not the party.

This Prasfinc or Righter, is a place neere vnto the Office where such as haue sentence passed against them, and refuse to pay that which is adiudged; are beaten with great Cudgels on the shins, and calves of the legges. Euery fornoone from eight to eleauen, they are let on the Prasfinc, and beate in this sort till the monie be payed. The afternoone & night time, they are kept in Chains by the Sergeant: except they put in sufficient sureties, for their appearance at the Prasfinc at the houre appointed. You shal see ffortie or fiftie stand together on the Prasfinc: all on a rowe, and their shins thus beuadged and beasted euery morning, with a pittous cry.

If after a years standing on the Prasfinc the party will not, or lacke wherewithall to pay his Creditour, it is lawfull for him to sell his Wife and Children, either outright, or for a certaine rearme of yeares. And if the price of them doe not amount to the full payment, the Creditour may take them to be his bondslaves for yeares, or for euer, according as the valew of the debt requireth.

Such kinde of suites as lack direct euidence, or stand vpon coniectures and circumstances, to bee weighed by the Iudge, draw of great length, and yelde great aduantage vnto the Iudge and Officers. If the suite be vpon a bonde or bill, they haue for the most part good & speedy iustice. Their Bondes or Billes, are drawne in a very plaine sort, after this tenour.

I Iuan Vasile, haue borrowed of Alpha-nasse Demento, the summe of one hundred Rubbles of goine money of Mosko from the Krossenes (or hallowing of the Water) until the Saburney Vassilshenes (or com-

Subscribed. This bill haue I written Gabriel Iacouesin, in the yeare 7096. The witnesse and debter (if he can write) endorse their names on the back side of the Bill. Other signing or sealing haue they none.

When any is taken for a matter of crime (as treason, murder, theft, and the like) he is first brought to the Duke and Diacke, that are for the Prouince where the party is attached, by whom he is examined. The manner of examination in such cases, is all by torture, as scourging with whips made of sinnewes or whieleather (called the Pudkey) as big as a mans finger, which giueth a fore lath, and entereth into the flesh; Or by tying vnto a spitte, and roasting at the Fire. Sometimes, by breaking and wresting one of their ribs with a payre of hot Tonges, or cutting their flesh vnder the nayles, and such like.

The examination thus taken, withall the proofes and euidences that can be alledged against the party, it is sent vppe to the Mosko, to the Lord of the Chetfird or Fourth part, vnder whome the Prouince is, and by him is presented vnto the Councell Table, to be read and sentenced there, where onely iudgement is giuen in matter of life and death, and that by euidence vpon information, though they neuer saw nor heard the party, who is kept still in prison where the Facte was committed, & neuer sent vp to the place where he is tried. If they find the partie guilty, they giue sentence of death according to the quality of the facte, which is sent downe by the Lord of the Chetfird, to the Duke and Diacke to be put in execution. The prisoner is carried vnto the place of execution, with his hands bound and a wax candle burning held betwene his fingers.

Their capitall punishments, are hanging, heading, knocking on the head, drawing, putting vnder the sic, setting on a stake, and such like. But (for the most part) the prisoners that are condemned in summer, are kept for the winter, to be knocked on the head, and put vnder the Ice. This is to be understood of common persons. For theft and murder, if they be committed vpon a poore Mosk by one of Nobilitie, it is not lightly punnished, nor yet is he called to any account for it. Their reason is, because they are accounted their Kolophey or bond-slaves.

If by some Sinaboirskoy, or Gentleman Souldiour, a murder or theft bee committed, peradventure he shall be imprisoned at the Emperours pleasure. If the manner of the fact bee very notorious, hee is whipped punishment, and this is commonly all the punishment that is inflicted vpon them.

If a man kill his owne seruanc, little or nothing is saide vnto him, for the aforesaid reason: because he is accounted to be his Kolophey or bondslave, & so to haue right ouer his very head. The vtmost is some small mulct to the Emperour, if the party be rich: and so the quarrell is made rather against the purse, then against the iniustice. They haue no Written Law, saue onely a small booke; that containeth the time and manner of their sitting; order in proceeding, and such other iudiciall formes and circumstances, but nothing to direct them, to giue sentence on right or wrong. Their onely Law is their Speaking Law, and that is the pleasure of the Prince, and of his Magistrates & officers. Which sheweth the miserable condition of this poore people, that are forced to haue them for their Law and direction of Iustice; against whose iniustice & extreme oppression, they had neede to bee armed with many good and strong lawes.

The Souldiers of Rufsia are called Sinaboirskoy, or the sonnes of Gentlemen, because they are all of that degree, by vertue of their Military profession. For euery souldier is a Gentleman, and none are gentlemen, but onely the foldiers, that take it by descent from their Ancestors; so that the son of a Gentleman (which is borne a souldier) is euer a Gentleman, and a Souldier withall, and professeth nothing els but Military matters. When they are of yeares able to beare Armes, they come to the office of Rasfede, or great Constable, and there present themselves, who entereth their names; and alloteth them certayne lands to maintain their charges; for the most part, the same that their fathers enjoyed.

For the Lands assigned to maintaine the Army, are ever certaine, annexed to this office without improoving, or detracting one foot. But that if the Emperour haue sufficient in wages, the rooms being full so farre as the land doth extend alreadie; they are many times deferred, and haue nothing allowed them, except some one portion of the land be diuided into two. Which is a cause of great disorder within that country: when a souldier that hath many children, shall haue sometimes but one entertained in the Emperours pay. So that the rest having nothing, are forced to liue by vniust and wicked thiftes, that tend vnto the hurt and oppression of the Moniſick or common sort of people. This inconuenience groweth, by maintaining his forces in a continuall succession. The whole number of his souldiers in continuall pay, is this. First, he hath of his Dwaraney, that is, Pensioners, or garde of his person, to the number of 15000. horsemen, with their Captaines and other officers, that are alwayes in a readinesse.

Of these 15000. horsemen, there are three sorts or degrees, which differ alwel in estimation; as in wages, one degree from another. The first sort of them, is called Dwaraney Bulshay, or the company of head Pensioners, that haue some an hundred, some fourscore Rubbels a yeare, & none vnder seventy. The second sort are called Serdancy Dwaraney, or the middle ranke of Pensioners. These haue sixty, or fifty rubbels by the yeare, none vnder forty. The third and lowest sort are the Dyat Botanskey, that is, the lowest Pensioners. Their salary is thirty rubbels a yeare for him that hath most, some haue but siue and twenty, some twenty, none vnder twelue. Whereof the halfe part is paid them at the Mosko, the other halfe in the felds by the Generall, when they haue any warres, and are employed in seruice. When they receiue their whole pay, it amounteth to 55000. rubbels yearly.

And to this their wages, besides Lands allotted to euery one of them, both to the greater and the lesse, according vnto their degrees. Whereof he that hath least, hath to yeeld him twenty Rubbels or Markes by the yeare. Besides these 15000. horsemen that are of better choise (as beeing the Emperour owne gard, when himselfe goeth to the wars, not vnlike the Roman souldiers cald Prastoriani) are an hundred & ten men of speciall account for their Nobility and trust, which are chosen by the Emperour, and haue their names registered, that find among them for the Emperours warres, to the number of 65000. horsemen, with all necessaries meete for the wars, after the Russe manner.

To this end they haue yearly allowance made by the Emperour for themselves, & their companies, to the summe of 40000 rubbels. And these 65000. are to repaire to the field every year on the borders towards the Chrim Tartar (except they be appointed for some other seruice) whether there be warres with the Tartars, or not.

This might seeme (peraduenture) somewhat dangerous for some state, to haue so great forces vnder the command of Noblemen, to assemble euery yeare vnto one certaine place. But the matter is so framed, as that no danger can growe to the Emperour, or his state by this means. First, because these Noblemen are many, to wit, an hundred and ten in all, & changed by the Emperour, so oft as he thinks good. Secondly, because they haue their liuings of the Emperour, being otherwise but of very small renenue, and receiue this yearly pay of 40000. rubbels, when it is presently to be paid forth againe vnto the souldiers that are vnder them. Thirdly, because (for the most part) they are about the Emperours person, being of his counsell either speciall, or at large. Fourthly, they are rather as paymasters then Captaines to their companies, themselves not going forth ordinarily to the warres, save when some of them are appointed, by speciall order from the Emperour himselfe: so the whole number of horsemen that are cuer in a readines, and in continuall pay, are 80000. a few more or lesse.

If he haue neede of a greater number, (which seldom falleth out) then he entertaineth of those Sindobarskey, that are out of pay, so many as he needeth: and if yet he want of his number, hee giueth charge to his Noblemen (that hold lands of him) to bring into the felds (euery man) a proportionable number of his Seruants, (called Kolophey) such as Till his Lands, with their Furniture, according vnto the full and iust number, that hee intendeth to make vpp. The which seruice beeing done, done, presently lay in their Weapons, and returne to their seuerall occupations againe.

Of Footmen that are in continuall pay, he hath to the number of 12000. all Gunners, called Strefley. Whereof 5000 are to attend about the City of Mosko, or any other place where the Emperour shall abide, and 2000. (which are called Stremney, Strefley, or Gunners at the stirrop) about his owne person, at the very Court or house where himselfe lodgeth. The rest are placed in his garrison towns, till there be occasion to haue them in the field, and receiue for their fallery or stipend euery man seven rubbels a yeare, besides twelue measures, a piece of Rye, and Oates. Of mercenary Souldiours, that are strangers (whom they call Nimſchoy) they haue at this time, 4300. of Poloniens: of Chirchaffes (that are vnder the Poloniens) about foure thousand, whereof 3500. are abroad in his garrisons: of Doutches Scots about 150. of Greekes, Turkes, Danes and Sweadens, all in one band, an 100. or thereabouts. But these they vse onely vpon the Tartar side, and against the Siberians: as they doe the Tartar Souldiours (whom they hire sometimes but onely for the present) on the other side against the Polonian and Sweden: thinking it best policie, so to vse their seruice vpon the contrary border.

The chiefe Captaines or Leaders of these Forces, according to their names and degrees, are these which follow. First, the Voiaud or Bulshait, that is, the Great Captaine, or Lieutenant Generall vnder the Emperour. This commonly is one of the four houses of the chiefe Nobility of the Land: but so chosen otherwise, as that he is of small valour, or practise in Martiall matters, being thought to serue that turne so much the better, if he bring no other parts with him, save the countenance of his Nobility, to be liked of by the Souldiours for that, and nothing else. For in this point they are very wary, that these two (to wit) Nobility, and power meete not both in one, specially if they see wisdom with all, or aptnesse for policy.

Their great Voiaud or Generall at this present in their warres, is commonly one of these foure: Knez Feodor Iuanovich Methiskosky, Knez Iuan Michailo-

wich Glinskoy, Cherechaskoy, and Trombetskoy, all of great Nobility, but of very simple quality otherwise: though in Glinskoy (as they say) there is somewhat more then in the rest. To make vp this defect in the Voiaud or Generall, there is some other ioynd with him as Lieutenant Generall, of farre lesse Nobility, but of more valour and experience in the warres then he, who ordereth all things that the other countenanceth. At this time their principall man, and most viued in their warres, is one Knez Demetrie Iuanovich Forſkine, an ancient and expert Captaine, and one that hath done great seruice (as they say) against the Tartar and Polonian. Next, vnder the Voiaud and his Lieutenant Generall, are foure other, that haue the Marſhalling of the whole Army diuided among them, and may be called the Marſhalles of the field.

Euery man hath his quarter or fourth part vnder him. Whereof the first is called the Prava Polsky, or right wing. The second is the Leuy Polsky, or left wing. The third is Rafſny Polsky, or the broken band, because out of this there are chosen to send abroad vpon any suddaine exploit, or to make a refuse or supply, as occasion doth require. The fourth is Storeſhonoy Patsky, or the warding band. Euery one of these foure Marſhals haue two other vnder them (eight in all) that twice euery weeke at the least, must muster and traine their seuerall wings or bands, and hold and giue iustice for all faults, and disorders committed in the Campe.

And these eight are commonly chosen out of the 110. (which I spake of before) that receiue and deliuer the pay to the Souldiours. Vnder these eight are diuers other Captaines, as the Gulaway Captaines of thousands, five hundreds, and one hundred. The Peyde Setskoy, or Captaines of fifties, and the Decetskiet, or Captaines of tens.

Besides the Voiaud or Generall of the Army (spoken of before) they haue two other that beare the name of Voiauda: whereof one is the Master of the great Ordenance (called Naradns Voiauda) who hath diuers vnder Officers, necessary for that seruice. The other is called the Voiauda Gulaway, or the walking for mustering

When warres are towards (which they faile not of slightly euery yeare with the Tartar, and many times with the Polonian and Sweden) the foure Lordes of the Chetvirs send forth their summons in the Emperours name, to all the Dukes and Dyackes of the Prouinces, to bee proclaimed in the head Townes of euery Shirre: that all the Sinobarsky, or sonnes of Gentlemen, make their repaire to such a border where the seruice is to be done, at such a place, and by such a day, & there present themselves vnto such and such Captaines.

When they come to the place assigned them in the Summons or Proclamation, their names are taken by certain Officers, that haue Commiffion for that purpose, from the Roserade or High Constable, as Clarke of the Bands.

If any make default and faile at the day, he is mulcted, and punished very seuerely. As for the Generall and other chiefe Captaines, they are sent thither from the Emperours owne hand, with such Commiffion and charge, as hee thinketh behoouefull for the present seruice. When the Soldiours are assembled, they are reduced into their Bands and Companies, vnder their severall Captaines of tentnes, fifties, hundreds, thousands, &c. and these Bands into foure Polskeys or Legions (but of farre greater numbers then the Romanie Legions were) vnder their foure great Leaders; which also haue the Authority of Marshalls of the field, as was saide before.

The horse-
mans turne.

Concerning their Armour, they are but slightly appointed. The common Horseman hath nothing else but his Bow in his case, vnder his right Arme, and his Quier and Sword hanging on the lefte side: except some few that beare a Case of Dags, or a Laucelin, or short staffe along their Horse side. The vnder Captains will haue commonly some piece of Armour besides, as a Shirt of Male, or such like. The Generall, with the other chiefe Captaines and men of Nobility, will haue their horse very richly furnished, theyr Saddles of Cloth of Golde, their Brides faire bossed and tasselled with Golde and Silke Frindge, besudded with Pearle & precious Stones: themselves in very faire Armour, which they call Bullatney, made of faire shining Steele yet covered commonly with cloth of Golde, and edged round with Ermin Furre, his Steele Helmet on his head, of a very great price, his Sword, Bow and Arrows at his side, his Speare in his hand, with another fayre Helmet, and his Sheitapera or Horsemans Scepter carried before him. Their Swords, Bowes, and Arrows, are of the Turkish fashion. They practise like the Tartar, to shoote forwards and backwards, as they faye and retyre.

The Generall
and chiefe Captaines.

The Strelsy or Foote-man, hath nothing but his peece in his hand, his striking Hatchet at his backe, and his Sword by his side. The stocke of his peece, is not made Calieuer-wise, but with a plaine & straight stocke (somewhat like a Fowling peece) the barrel is rudely and vnartificially made, very heavy, yet thoothert but a very small Bullet.

The footmans
turne.

As for their prouision of victuall, the Emperour alloweth none, eyther for Captaine or Soldiour, neither prouideth any for them, except peraduenture some corn for their money. Euery man is to bring sufficient for himselfe, to serue his turne for foure moneths, and (if neede require) to giue order for more to bee brought vnto him to the Campe, from his Tenant that tilleth his land, or some other place.

Prouision
of victuall.

One great helpe they haue, that for Lodging and Dyet, euery Kusse is prepared to be a souldiour before-hand. Although the chiefe Captaines, and other of account, do carrie Tents along with them, after the form and fashion of ours, with some better prouision of Victuall then the rest; they bring with them commonly into the Campe for Victuall, a kinde of dried Bread (which they call Sucharie) with some store of Meale, which they temper with water, & so make it into a Ball, or small lump of Dough, called Tollockno. And this they eat raw in stead of Bread. Their meat is Bacon, or some

some other flesh or fish dried, after the Dutch manner.

If the Russe Souldier were as hardie to execute an enterprize, as hee is harde to beare out toyle and trauaile, or were otherwise as apt and well trayned for the warres, as hee is indifferent for his lodging and dyet, he would farre exceed the Soldiours of other parts. Whereas now, hee is farre meane of courage, and execution in any warlike seruice. Which commeth partly of his feeble condition, that will not suffer any great courage or valour to grow in him. Partly for lacke of due honour and reward, which he hath no great hope of, whatsoeuer seruice or execution hee doe.

Of their marching, charging,
and other martiall discipline.

The Russe trusteth rather to his number, then to the valor of his Soldiours, or good ordering of his forces. Their marching or leading is without all order, save that the foure Polskey or Legions (whereinto their army is diuided) keepe themselves vnder their Ensignes, and so thrust all on together in a hurrie, as they are directed by their Generall. Their Ensigne is the image of Saint George. The Bulgha Dworany or chiefe Horsemen, haue euery man a small Drumme of Brasle at his Saddle-bow, which hee striketh when hee giueth the charge, or onfet.

Horsemens
drummes.

They haue Drummes besides of a huge biggenesse, which they carrie with them vpon a boord layde on foure horses, that are spured together with Iron Chaines, euery Drumme hauing eyght Beaters or Drummers, besides Trumpets, and Shawmes, which they found after a wilde manner, much different from ours.

The Horse-
mans manner
of charging.

When they giue any Charge, or make any inuasion, they make a great hallowe or shoute altogether, as lowde as they can, which with the sound of their Trumpets, Shawmes, and Drummes, maketh a confused and horrible noyse. So they set on first discharging their Arrows, then dealing with their Swordes, which they vse in a brauery to shake, and brandish ouer their Heades, before they come to strokes.

The foot-
mans charge

Their Footmen (because otherwise they want order in leading) are commonly placed in some ambush, or place of advantage, where they may most annoy the enemy, with least hurt to themselves.

If hee a set battaile, or if any great inuasion bee made vpon the Russe borders, by the Tartar; they are sette within the running or moouing Castle (called Besa, or Gulay gorad) which is carried about with them by the Voisnoda gulanay (or the Walking Generall) whome I spake of before. This Walking or moouing Castle is so framed, that it may be set vp in length (as occasion doth require) the space of one, two, three, foure, fve, six, or seuen miles: for so long will it reach. It is nothing else but a double wall of VVoode, to defend them on both sides, behinde and before; with a space of three yards or thereabout, betwix the two sides: so that they may stand withint it, and haue roome enough to charge and discharge their peecees, and to vse their other weapons.

The walking Castle.

It is closed at both ends, & made with loope holes on either side, to lay out the nose of their peece, or to push forth any other weapon. It is carried along with the army whersoever it goeth, being taken in to peecees, and so layde on Cartes spured together, and drawn by horse that are not tene, by reason that they are covered with their carriage, as with a shelle or pent-houfe.

When it is brought vnto the place where it is to be vsed (which is denifed & chosen out before by the Walking Voisnoda) it is planted, so much as the present vse requirith, sometime a mile long, sometimes two, sometimes three, or more: Which is loone done without the helpe of any Carpenter, or instrument: because the Timber is so framed to clasp together one peece within another: as is easily vnderstood, by those that know the manner of the Russe building.

The planting of the walking Castle.

In this Castle standeth their Shot well fenced for advantage, especially agaynst the Tartar, that bringeth no Ordinance, nor other VWeapon into the Field with him, save his Sword, and Bowe and Arrows. They haue also within it diuerse fildes peecees, which they vse as occasion doth require. Of peecees for the fildes, they carry no great store, when they war against the Tartar: but when they deale with the Polonian (of whose forces they make more account) they go better furnished with all kind of munition, and other necessarie prouisions. It is thought, that no Prince of Christendome, hath better store of munition, then the Russe Emperour. And it may partly appeare by the Artillerie house at Mosko, where are of all sortes of great Ordnance, all Brasie peeces, very faire, to an exceeding great number.

The Russe Soldiour is thought to be better at his defence within some Castle, or Towne, then hee is abroad at a set pitched fildie. Which is euier noted in the practise of his warres, and namely, at the siege of Volsko, some few yeares since: where he repulsed the Polonian king, Stephen Batore, with his whole Army of an hundred thousand men, and forced him (in the end) to giue ouer his siege, with the losse of many of his best Captaines and Soldiers. But in a set fildie, the Russe is noted to haue the worke of the Polonian and Sweden.

If any behaue himselfe more valiantly then the rest, or doe any speciall peece of seruice, the Emperour sendeth him a peece of Gold, stamped with the image of Saint George on horse-backe. Which peece they hang on their lleeces, and set in their Caps. And this is accounted the greatest honor they can receiue for any seruice they do.

The Russe Emperours (of late yeares) haue very much enlarged their Dominions & Territories. Their first Conquest after the Dukedome of Mosko (for before that time they were but Dukes of Volodemer, as before was sayde) was the Cittie, and Dukedome of Novogrod on the West and North-West side: which was no final enlargement of their Dominion, & strengthening vnto them for the winning of the rest. This was done by Iuan, great Grand father to Theodore now Emperour, about the yeare 1480.

The same began likewise to encroach vpon the Countreys of Lituania and Lithuania, but the Conquest onely intended, and attempted by him vpon some part of those Countreys, was pursued and performed by his sonne Basileus, who first of all wan the Cittie and Dukedom of Plesko, afterwards the City and Dukedom of Smolensko, and many other faire Townes, with a large Territory belonging vnto them, about the yeare 1514.

Their victories against the Lettos or Lithuanians, in the time of Alexander their Duke, hee achieved rather by aduantage of ciuill diffentions and treasons among themselves, then by any great pollicie or force of his owne. But all this was lost againe by his sonne Iuan Vasilowich, about eight or nine yeares past, vpon composition with the Polonian King Stephen Batore; whereunto he was forced by the aduantages which the Pole had then of him, by reason of the foyle hee had giuen him before, and the disquietnesse of his owne state at home. Onely the Russe Emperour, at this time, hath left him on that side his Country, the Cities of Smolensko, Vitobsko, Cheringo, and Beala Gurod in Lithuania. In Lithuania, nor a Towne, nor one foote of ground.

When Basileus first Conquered those Countreys, hee suffered the Natiues to keepe their possessions, and to inhabit all their Townes, onely paying him a Tribute, vnder the government of his Russe Captaines. But by their Conspiracies & attempts not long after, he was taught to deale more surely with them. And for coming vpon them the second time, hee killed and caried away with him, three parts of foure, which he gaue or solde vnto the Tartars that serued him in those wars, & (insted of them) placed there his Russes, so many as might ouer-match the rest, with certaine Garrisons of strength besides. Wherein, notwithstanding this ouersight was committed, for that (taking away with him the Vpland or Countrey people (that should haue tild the ground and might easily haue bene kept in order without any daung'r, by other good policies) hee was driuen afterwarde manie yeares together, to victuall the Countrey (especially the great Townes) out of his owne Countrey of Russia, the foyle lying there in the meane while waste and vntilled.

The like fell out at the port of Narue, in Lithland, where his sonne Iuan Vasilowich desired, to build a Towne and a Castle on the other side the Riuer, (called Iuangogrod) to keepe the Town and countrey in subiection. The Castle he caused to bee so built and fortified, that it was thought to bee inuincible. And when it was finished, for reward to the Architect (that was a Polonian) hee put out both his eyes, to make him vnable to build the like againe. But hauing left the Natiues all within their owne Countrey, without a bating their number or strength; the Towne and Castle (not long after) was betrayed, and surrendered againe to the King of Sweden.

On the Southeast side, they haue got the Kingdomes of Cazan, and Astracan. These were wonne from the Tartar, by the late Emperour Iuan Vasilowich, Father to the Emperour that now is: the one about 35. the other about 33. yeares agoe. Northward out of the Countrey of Siberia, he hath laide vnto his Realme, a great bredth and length of ground, from wichida to the Riuer of Obba, about a thousand miles space: so that hee is bold to write himselfe now, The Great Commander of Siberia.

The Countries likewise of Permia & Pechora, are a diuerse people & language from the Russe, ouercome not long since, and that rather by threatening, & shaking of the Sword, then by any actual force: as being a weak and naked people, without meanes to resist.

That which the Russe hath in his present possession, he keepeth on this fort. In his foure cheefe border townes of Volsko, Smolensko, Astracan, and Cazan, he hath certaine of his Counsell, nor of greatest Nobility, but of greatest trust, which haue more authority within their Precincts (for the countenancing & strengthening of their government there) then the other Dukes that are set to gouerne in other places, as was noted before, in the manner of ordering their Prouinces. These he changeth sometime euery yeare, sometime euery second or third yeare, but exceedeth not that time; except vpon very speciall trust, and good liking of the party, and his seruice: least by enlarging of their time, they might grow into some familiarity with the enemy (as some haue done) being so far out of sight.

The Townes besides are very strongly fenced with Trenches, Castles, & store of munition, and haue garrisons within the, to the number of two or three thousand a peece. They are stored with victuall (if any siege should come vpon them) for the space of two or three yeares before hand. The foure Castles of Smolensko, Volsko, Cazan and Astracan, hee hath made very strong to beare out any siege: so that it is thought that those Townes are impregnable.

As for the Countreys of Pechora and Permia, and that part of Siberia, which hee hath now vnder him, they are kept by as easie meanes, as they were first got, viz. rather by shewing, then by vling of Armes. First, he hath stored the Countrey with as many Russes as there are Natiues, & hath there some few Soldiours in garrison, enough to keepe them vnder. Secondly, his Officers and Magistrates there, are of his owne Russe people, and he changeth them very often, viz. euery yeare twice or thrice; notwithstanding there be no great feare of any inuasion. Thirdly he diuideth them into many small gouernments, like a staffe broke in many small pieces: so that they haue no strength being seuered, which was but little neyther, when they were all in one. Fourthly, he prouideth that the people of the Countrey haue neyther Armour, nor money, being taxed and pilld so often as he thinketh good: without any meanes to shake off that yoke, or to releue themselves.

In Siberia (where he goeth on in pursuing his Conquest) hee hath diuers Castles and Garrisons, to the number of fixe thousand Soldiours of Russes and Polonians, and sendeth many new supplies thither, to plant and inhabit, as he winneth ground. At this time besides, he hath gotten the Kings Brother of Siberia, allured by certaine of his Captains, to leaue his owne Countrey, by offers of great entertainment, and pleasant life with the Russe Emperour, then he had in Siberia. He was brought in this last yeare, and is now with the Emperour at Mosko well entertained.

This may be said of the Russe practise, wherefoeuer he ruleth, either by right of Inheritance, or by Conquest.

First, hee bereaueth the Countrey of Armour, and other meanes of defence, which hee permitteth to none, but to his Boiarstie onely.

Secondly, he robbeth them continually of their money and commodities, and leaueth them bare, with nothing but their bodies and liues, within certaine yeares compass.

Thirdly, hee renteth and diuideth his Territories into many small pieces, by seuerall gouernments: so that none hath much vnder him to make any strength, though he had other opportunities.

Fourthly,

Fourthly, he governeth his Countries by men of small reputation, and no power of themselves, and strangers (in those places) where their government lyeth.

Fifthly, he changeth his Governours once a year ordinarily, that there grow no great liking, nor intellence betwixt the people and them, nor acquaintance with the enemy, if they lie towards the Borders.

Sixthly, hee appointeth in one and the same place aduicary Governours, the one to be as Controller of the other, as the Dukes and Diacks: where (by meanes of their enuies and emulations) there is lesse hurt to be feared by their agreement, and himselfe is better informed what is done amiffe.

Seuenthly, he sendeth many times into eury Province secret Messengers (of speciall trust about him) as intelligencers, to pry and hearken out what is doing, and what is amiffe there. And this is ordinary, though it be sudden, and vnkowne what time they will come.

Their neighbours with whom they haue greatest dealings and intercourse, both in peace and warre, are first the Tartars: Secondly the Polonians, whom the Russe calleth Laches, noting the first Author or Founder of the Nation, who was called Laches or Laches, whereunto is added Pol, which signifieth People, and so is made Polaches, that is, the People or Possessors of Laches: which the Latines (after their manner of writing) call Polinos. The third are the Swedens. The Polonians and Swedens are better knowne to these parts of Europe, then are the Tartars, that are farther off from vs (as heeing of Asia) and diuided into many Tribes, different both in name and government one from another.

The greatest and mightiest of them is the Chrim Tartar, (whom some call the Great Cham) that lyeth South, & Southward from Russia, and doth most annoy the Country by often inuasions, commonly once every year, sometime entreting very farre within the inland parts. In the year 1571. he came as far as the Citie of Mosko, with an Army of two hundred thousand men, without any battaile, or resistance at all, for that the Russe Emperor (then Iuan Vasiliowich) leading forth his Army to encounter with him, marched a wrong way: but (as it was thought) of very purpose, as not daring to adventure the Field, by reason that he doubted his Nobility and cheefe Captaines, of a meaning to betray him to the Tartar.

The Citie hee tooke not, but fired the Subburbs, which by reason of the buildings (which are al of Wood, without any Stone, Brick or Lime, faw certaine out-rooms) kindled so quickly, and went on with such rage; as that it consumed the greatest part of the City, almost within the space of foure houres, being of thirty miles or more of compass. Then might you haue seene a lamentable spectacle: besides the huge and mighty flame of the City all on light fire, the people burning in their houses and streetes, but most of all, of such as laboured to passe out of the gates, farthest from the enemy; where meeting together in a mightie throng, & so pressing every man to prevent another: wedged themselves so fast within the gate and streetes neere vnto it, as that three ranks walked one vpon the others head, the vppermost treading down those that were lower: so that there perished at that time (as was saide) by the fire & the pteale, the number of eight hundred thousand people, or more.

The Chrim thus having fired the City, and fed his eyes with the sight of it all on a light flame returned with his Army, and sent to the Russe Emperor a Knife (as was said) to stick himselfe withall: vbraying this losse, and his desperate case, as not daring cyther to meete his enemy in the field, nor to trust his friends nor subiects at home. The principall cause of this continuall quarrell betwixt the Russe and the Chrim, is for the right of certaine border parts, claimed by the Tartar, but possessed by the Russe. The Tartar alleadgeth, that besides Astracan, and Cazan (that are the ancient possession of the East Tartar) the whole Country, from his bounds North and Westward, so farre as the Citie of Mosko, and Mosko it selfe, pertaineth to his right. Which seemeth to haue bin true, by the report of the Russes themselves, that tell of a certaine homage, that was done by the Russe Emperour (every year) to the Great Cham or Cham, the Russe Emperour standing on foote, and feeding the Chrim Horse (himselfe sitting sitting on his back) with Oates out of his owne Cap, instead of a Boule or Manner, and that within the Citie of Mosko. And this homage (they say) was done till the time of Rasleus, grandfather to this man. Who surprizing the Chrim Emperour by a stratagem, done by one of his Nobility (called Iuan Demetrowich Belschey) was content with this ranfome, viz. with the changing of this homage into a tribute of Fures: which afterwards also was denied to be paid by this Emperours Father.

Hereupon they continue the quarrell, the Russe defending his Country, & that which he hath won, the Chrim Tartar invading him once or twice every year, sometime about Whariontide, but oftner in Haruest. What time, if the great Cham or Chrim come in his owne person, hee bringeth with him a great Army of an hundred thousand, or two hundred thousand men. Otherwise, they make short and sudden roads into the Country with lesser numbers, running about the list of the border, as wilde Geefe flie, invading and retiring where they see aduantage.

Their common practise (beeing very populous) is to make diuers Armies, and so drawing the Russe to one, or two places of the Frontiers, to invade at some other place, that is left without defence. Their manner of fight, or ordering of their Forces, is much after the Russe manner (spoken of before) saue that they are all horsemen, and carry nothing else but a Bowe, a sheafe of Arrowes, & a faulchon sword after the Turkish fashion. They are very expert horsemen, and vfe to choose as readily backward, as forward. Some will haue a horsemans staffe like vnto a boare spear, besides their other weapons. The common Soldiour hath no other armour then his ordinary apparell, viz. a blacke sheeps skine, with the wooll side outward in the day time, and inward in the night time, with a cap of the same. But their Moskoy or Noblemen imitate the Turke both in apparell and armor. When they are to passe ouer a Riuer with their Army, they yee three or foure horses together, and taking long Poles or pieces of wood, binde them fast to the tayles of their horses: so sitting on the Poles they drive their horse ouer. At handy-strokes

(when they come to ioyne battaile) they are accounted farre better men then the Russe people, fierce by nature, but more hardy and bloudy by continuall practise of warre: as men knowing no parts of peace, nor any ciuill practise.

Yet their subtilty is more then may seeme to agree with their barbarous condition. By reason they are practise to invade continually, and to robbe their neighbours that border about them; they are very pregnant, and ready witted to devise stratagems (vpon the sudden) for their better aduantage. As in their war against Beala the fourth King of Hungary, whom they invaded with fife hundred thousand men, and obtained against him a great victory. Whence (among other) hauing slaine his Chancellor, called Nicholas Schinick; they found about him the Kings priuy Seale. Whereupon, they deuised presently to counterfeit Letters in the Kings Name, to the Citties and Townes next about the place, where the field was fought; with charge, that in no case they should conuey themselves and their goods out of their dwellings, where they might abide safely without all feare of danger, and not leaue the Country desolate, to the possession of so vile and barbarous an enemy, as was the Tartar Nation, tearing themselves in all reprochfull manner.

For, notwithstanding he had lost his carriages, with some few straglers that had marched disorderly; yet hee doubted not but to recouer that losse, with the assistance of a notable victory, if the Tartar durst abide him in the field. To this purpose, hauing written their letters in the Polish Character, by certaine young men whom they tooke in the field, and signed them with the Kings Seale; they dispatched them forth to all the quarters of Hungary, that lay neare about the place. Whereupon the Hungarians, that were now flying away with their goods, wiues, and children, vpon the rumour of the kings ouerthrow, taking comfort by these counterfeit Letters; staid at home. And so were made a prey, being surprized on the sudden by the huge number of these Tartars, that had compassed them about before they were aware.

When they besiege a Towne or Fort, they offer much Parley, and send many flattering flattering messages to perswade a surrender, promising all things that the Inhabitants will require: but being once possessed of the place, they vse all manner of hostility, and cruelty. This they do vpon a rule they haue, viz. That Iustice is to be practised but towards their owne. They encounter not lightly, but they haue some ambush, whereunto (hauing once shewed themselves, and made some short conflick) they retire, as repulsed for feare, and so draw the enemy into it if they can. But the Russe being wel acquainted with their practise, is more wary of them. When they come a routing with some final number, they set on horsebacke counterfeit shapes of men, that their number may seeme greater.

When they make any onfet, their manner is to make a great shout, crying all out together, Olla Billa, Olla Billa, God help vs, God helpe vs. They contemne death so much, as that they chuse rather to die, then to yeeld to their enemy, & are seene (when they are slaine) to bite the very weapon when they are past striking, or helping of themselves. V where in appeareth, how different the Tartar is in his desperate courage, from the Russe and Turke. For the Russe Souldier, if he begin once to retire, putteth all his safety in his speedy flight. And if once he be taken by his enemy, he neither defendeth himselfe, nor intreateth for his life, as reckning straight to die. The Turke commonly, when hee is past hope of escaping, falleth to entretrie, and casteth away his weapon, offereth both his hands, and holdeth them vp, as it were to be tied: hoping to saue his life, by offering himselfe bondslave.

The cheefe booty the Tartars seeke for in all their wars, is to get store of captiues, specially yong boies and girles, who they sell vnto the Turkes, or other their neighbours. To this purpose they take with them great Baskets, made like Bakers Panniers, to carry them tenderly, and if any of them happen to tie, or to be sick on the way, they dash him against the ground, or some tree, and so leaue him dead. The Souldiours are not troubled with keeping the Captiues, and the other booty, for hindring the execution of their wars; but they haue certaine bands that intend nothing else, appointed of purpose to receiue and keepe the Cap-tities and the other prey.

The Russe borders (being vsed to their inuasions lightly euery year in the Summer) keepe few other Cattell on the border parts, save Swine onely, which the Tartar will not touch, nor drue away with him: for that he is of the Turkish religion, and will eate no Swines flesh. Of Christ our Saviour, they confesse as much as doth the Turk in his Alkaron, viz. That he came of the Angell Gabriel, & the Virgin Mary, that he was a great Prophet, & shall be the Iudge of the world at the last day. In other matters likewise, they are much ordered after the manner and direction of the Turke: hauing felt the Turkish Forces, when hee wonne from them Acow, and Cissa, with some other townes about the Euxine, or Blacke Sea, that were before tributaries to the Chrim Tartar So that now the Emperor of the Chrimis (for the most part) is chosen some one of the Nobilitie, whom the Turke doth commend: whereby it is brought now to that passe, that the Chrim Tartar giueth to the Turke the tenth part of the spoile, which he getteth in his wars against the Christianians.

Heerein they differ from the Turkish Religion, for that they haue certaine idoll puppets, made of silke, or like stuffe, of the fashion of a man, which they fasten to the doore of their walking houses, to bee as Ianusses or keepers of their house. And these Idols are made not by all, but by certaine religious women, which they haue among them, for that and like vses. They haue besides, the image of their King or Great Chan, of an huge bignesse, which they erect at euery stage, when the Army marcheth: and this euery one must bend and bow vnto as he passeth by it, be hee Tartar, or stranger. They are much giuen to witchcraft, and ominous coniectures, vpon euery accident which they heare or see.

In making of marriages, they haue no regard of alliance or consanguinity. Onely with his Mother, Sister, and Daughter, a man may not marry, and though hee take the woman into his house, and accompany with her; yet hee accounteth her not for his Wife, till he haue a childe by her. Then he beginneth to take a dowry of her friends, of Horse, Sheep, Kine, &c. If the bee barren, after a certaine time, he turneth her home agayne.

Vnder the Emperour they haue certayne Dukes, whom they call Morfeis, or Dumymorfeis: that rule ouer a certayne number of teene thousand, twenty thousand, or forty thousand a peece, which they call Hordis. When the Emperour hath any vse of them to serue in his wars, they are bound to come, and to bring with them their Souldiers to a certayne number, euery man with his two horse: at the least, the one to ride on, the other to kill, when it cometh to his turne to haue his horse eaten. For their chiefe vitaille is horse flesh, which they eate without bread, or any other thing with it. So that if a Tartar be taken by a Russe, hee shall be sure lightly to finde a horse legge, or some other part of him hanging at his saddle bowe.

This last yeare, when I was at the Mosco, came in one Kiriach Morfeis, Nephew to the Emperour of the Chrimis that now is (whose father was Emperour before) accompanied with 3. hundred Tartars, and his two wiues, whereof one was his brothers widdow. Where being entertained in very good sort (after the Russe manner) he had sent vnto his lodging for his welcome, to bee made ready for his supper and his companies, two very large and fatte horses, ready slayed on a sledde. They preferre it before other flesh, because the meate is stronger (as they say) then beefe, mutton, and such like. And yet (which is maruell) though they serue all as horsemen in the warres, and eate all of horse flesh, there are brought yearly to the Mosco, to be exchanged for other commodities, thirty or fortie thousand Tartar horses, which they commonly call Cones.

They keepe also great herds of kine, and flockes of blacke sheepe, rather for the skines and milke (which they carrie with them in great bottles) then for the vse of the flesh, though sometimes they eate of it. Some vse they haue of Rice, Figges, and other Fruits. They drinke milke of warme blood, and for the most part, carde them both together. They vse sometimes (as they doe trauell by the way) to let their horses blood in a veine, and to drink it warme, as it cometh from his body.

Townesthey do plant none, nor other standing buildings, but haue walking houses, which the Latines call Veil, built vpon wheeles, like vnto a Shepherds cottage. These they draw with them whither soeuer they goe, druing their cattail with them. And whē they come to their stages, or standing place, they plant their Cart-houses very orderly in a ranse: and so do make the forme of the firectes, and of a large towne. And this is the manner of the Emperour himselfe, who hath no other seate of his Empire, but an Agora, or towne of wood, that mooueth with him whither soeuer he goeth. As for the fixed and standing buildings vsed in other Countries, they say they are vnwholesome and vnpleasant.

They beginne to moue their houses and cattail in the Spring time, from the South part of their Country towards the North parts. And so druing on till they haue grafed all vp vnto the farthest part Northward, they returne backe agayne towards their South Country (where they continue all the winter) by ten or twelue miles a stage: in the meane while, the grasse being sprang vp againe, to serue for their cattail as they returne. From the border of the Sholcan towards the Caspian Sea, vnto the Russe frontiers, they haue a goodly Country, specially on the South and South-east parts, but lost for lacke of tillage.

Of money they haue no vse at all, and therefore prefer Brasse and Steele before other mettalls, especially bullate, which they vse for Swords, Knives, and other necessaries. As for Golde and Siluer, they neglect it of very purpose, (as they do all tillage of their ground) to be more free for their wandering kinde of life, and to keepe their Country lesse subiect to inuasions. Which giueth them great advantage against all their neighbours, euere inuading, and neuer being inuaded. Such as haue taken vpon them to inuade their Country (as of olde time Cyrus and Darius Hystaspis, on the East and Southeast side) haue done it with very ill successe, as we finde in the Stories written of those times. For their manners, when any will inuade them, to allure and draw them on, by flying and reculing (as if they were afraid) untill they haue drawne them some good way within their Country. Then, when they beginne to want vitaille, and other necessities (as needes they must where nothing is to bee had) to stoppe the passages, and enclose them with multitudes. By which stratagem (as wee read in Laonicus Chalcocondylas in his Turkish story) they had well nigh surprized the great and huge Army of Tamberlaine; but that he retired with al speed he could, towards the River Tanis, or Don, not without great losse of his men, and carriages.

In the story of Pachymetius the Greeke (which hee wrote of the Emperours of Constantinople from the beginning of the Reigne of Michael Palaeologus, to the time of Andronicus the elder) I remember he telleth (to the same purpose) of one Nogais, a Tartarian Captaine vnder Cazan, the Emperour of the East Tartars (of who the City and Kingdome of Cazan may seeme to haue taken the denomination) who refused a Present of Pearle & other Jewels, sent vnto him from Michael Palaeologus: Asking (withall) for what vse they serued, and whether they were good to keepe away sicknesse, death, or other misfortunes of this life, or no? So that it seemeth, they haue euer (or long time) bene of that minde, to value things no further, then by the vse, and necessity for which they serue.

For person and complexion, they haue broad and flat visages, of a tanned colour into yellow and blacke, fierce and cruell looks, thin haired vpon the vpper lip, and pit of the chin, light and nimble bodied, with short legges, as if they were made naturally for Horsemen: whereto they practise themselves from their childhood, si dome going afoote about any businesse. Their speech is very sudden and loud, speaking as it were out of a deep hollow throat. When they sing, you would thinke a Cow lowed, or some great bandog howled. Their greatest exercise is shooting, wherein they traine vp their children from their very infancy, not suffering them to eate, till they haue shot neere the marke within a certaine scantling. They are the very same, that (sometimes) were called * Scythia Nomades, or the Scythian Shepheards, both by the Greekes and Latines.

Some thinke, that the Turkes tooke their beginning from the Nation of the Chirm Tartars. Of which opinion is La- onicus Chalcocondylas the Greeke Historiographer, in his first Booke of his Turkish story. Wherin he followeth diuers very probable coniectures.

The first, taken from the very name it selfe, for that the word Turke, signifieth a Shepherd, or one that followeth a vagrant and wilde kinde of life. By which name these Scythian Tartars haue euer bin noted, being called by the Greekes, Skithas Nomades, or the Scythian Shepheards.

His second reason, because the Turkes (in his time) that dwelt in Asia the lesse, to wit, in Lydia, Coria, Phrygia, and Cappadocia, spake the very same Language that these Tartars did, that dwelt betwixt the River Tanis or Don, and the Country of Sarmatia, which (as is well knowne) are these Tartars called Chirms. At this time also, the whole Nation of the Turks differ not much in their common speech from the Tartar Language.

Thirdly, because the Turke and the Chirm Tartar agree so well together, as well in Religion, as matter of Trafficke, neuer invading, or injuring one another: saue that the Turke (since Laonicus his time) hath encroached vpon some Towns vpon the * Euxine Sea, that before pertained to the Chirm Tartar.

Fourthly, because Orcagies sonne to Oguzalpes, and (Father to Ottoman, the first of name of the Turkish Nation) made his first rides out of those partes of Asia, vpon the next borderers, till he came towards the Countreys about the Hill Taurus, where he ouercame the Greekes that inhabited there: and so enlarged the name and territory of the Turkish Nation, till he came to Euboea and Attica, and other partes of Greece. This is the opinion of Laonicus, who liued amongst the Turkes, in the time of Amurath, the fixte Turkish Emperour, about the year 1400. when the memory of their originall was more fresh: and therefore the likeliest hee was to hit the truth.

There are diuers other Tartars that border vpon Russia, as the Nagies, the Cheremifens, the Morduites, the Chircassies, & the Shalcans, which all differ (in name, more then in Regiment, or other condition) from the Chirm Tartar, except the Chircassies, that border South-West, towards Lithuania, and are farre more ciuill then the rest of the Tartars; of a comely person, person, and of a stately behaviour, as applying themselves to the fashion of the Polonian. Some of them haue subiected themselves vnto the Kings of Poland, and professe Christianity. The Nagies lyeth Eastward, and is reckoned for the best man of warre among all the Tartars, but very sauage and cruell aboue all the rest.

The Cheremifens Tartars, that lye betwixt the Russe and the Nagies, are of two sorts, the Lugauiy (that is of the Valley) and the Nagoruy, or of the hilly Countrey. These haue much troubled the Emperours of Russia. And therefore they are content now to buy peace of them, vnder pretence of giuing a yearly pension of Russe commodities, to their Morfeis, or Dumymorfeis, that are cheefe of their Tribes. For which also they are bound to serue them in their wars, vnder certaine conditions. They are saide to be iust and true in their dealings: and for that cause they hate the Russe people, whom they account to bee double, and false in all their dealings. And therefore the common sort are very vnwilling to keepe agreement with them, but that they are kept in by their Morfeis, or Dukes for their pensions sake.

The most rude and barbarous is counted the Morduit Tartar, that hath many selfe-fashions, and strange kindes of behaviour, differing from the rest. For his Religion, though hee acknowledge one God, yet his manner is to worshipsse for God, that liuing thing, that hee first meeteth in the mornings, and to sweare by it all that whole day, whether it be Horse, Dogge, Cate, or whatsoever else it bee. When his friend dieth, he killeth his best Horse, and hauing flayed off the skinn, he carrieth it on high vpon a long Pole, before the corpes to the place of buriall. This hee doth (as the Russe saith) that his friend may haue a good Horse to carry him to Heauen: but it is likelier to declare his loue towards his dead friend, in that he will haue to die with him the best thing that he hath.

Next to the Kingdome of Astracan, that is the farthest part Southeastward of the Russe Dominion, lyeth the Shalcans, and the Countrey of Media: whether the Russe Merchants trade for raw silkes, syndon, saphion, skins, and other commodities. The cheefe Townes of Media where the Russe tradeth, are Derbent (built by Alexander the great, as the Inhabitantes say) and Zimachia, where the staple is kept for rawe silkes. Their manner is (in the Spring time) to reuiue the silke-worms (that lye dead all the Winter) by laying them in the warme Sun, and to halten their quickning, that they may sooner goe to worke) to put them into bags, and so to hang the vnder their childrens armes. As for the Worme called Chrimifin (as wee call it Chrymson) that maketh coloured silke: it is bred not in Media, but in Affrya. This trade to Derbent & Zimachia for raw silkes and other commodities of that Countrey, as also into Persia, and Baugharia, downe the River Volga, and through the Caspian Sea, is permitted a swell to the English, as for the Russe Merchants, by the Emperors last Graunt, as appeareth. Which he accounteth for a very special fauour, and might proue indeed very beneficiall to all kinde of Merchants, if the trade were well and orderly vfed.

The whole Nation of the Tartars, are vterly void of all learnings, & without written Law: Yet certaine rules they haue, which they hold by tradition, common to all the Hoards; for the practise of their life. Which are of this sort.

First, To obey their Emperour and other Magistrates, whatsoever they command about the publike seruice.

2. Except for the publike behoofe, enery man to be free, and out of conuolment.

3. No private man to possesse any Lands, but the whole Countrey to be in common.

4. To neglect all dauntinesse and variety of meates, and to content themselves with that which commeth next to hand, for more hardnesse, and readinesse in the executing of their affaires.

5. To weare any base attire, and to patch their clothes, whether there be any neede or not: that when there is neede, it be no shame to weare a patche Coate.

6. To take, or steale from any stranger whatsoever they can get, as being enemies to all men, saue to such as will subiect themselves to them.

him that first taketh him, except such Mar-chants, and other as haue the Tartar Bull, or Passport from them.

The Permians and Samoites, that do lie from Russia, North and Northeast, are thought likewise to haue taken their beginning from the Tartar kinde. And it may partly be ghesied by the fashion of their countenance, as hauing all broad and flat faces, as the Tartars haue, except the Chirchasse.

The Permians are accounted for a very ancient people. They are now subiect to the Russe. They liue by hunting, and trading with their furs, as doth also the Samoyt, that dwelleth more towards the North Sea.

The Samoyt hath his name (as the Russe saith) of eating himselfe: as in times past, they liued as Cannibals, eating one an other. Which they make more probable, because (at this time) they eat all kinde of rawe flesh, whatsoever it be, even the very carion that lyeth in the ditch. But as the Samoites themselves will say, they were called Samoi, that is of themselves, as though they were Indigena, or poore people bred vpon that very soile, that neuer changed their seate from one place to another, as most Nations haue done.
They are subiect, at this time, to the Em-perour of Russia.

I talked with certine of them, & finde that they acknowledge one God; but represent him by such things as they haue most vse and good by. Therefore they do worship, the Sunne, the Ollen, the Losh, and such like. As for the storie of Slata Baba, or the Golden Hagge, (which I haue read in some Maps and Descriptions of these countries, to be an Idole, after the forme of an old woman) that being demanded by the Priest, giues them certaine oracles, concerning the successe, and euent of things; I found it to be but a very Fable.
Onely in the Prouince of Obdaria, vpon the Sea side, neare to the mouth of the great riuer Obda, there is a Rocke, which naturally (being somewhat helped by imagination) may seeme to beare the shape of a ragged woman, with a child in her armes (as the Rocke by the North Cape the shape of a Fryer) where the *Obdorian Samoit*es vse much to resort, by reason of the commoditie of the place for fishing: and there sometime (as their maner is) conceiue and practise their force-ries, and ominous coniecturings, about the good or the bad speede of their iour-neys, fishings, huntings, and other such like.

They are clad in Seale skins, with the haire side outwards downe, as low as the knees, with their breeches and neatherstocks of the same, both men and women.
They are all black haired, naturally beardlesse. Therefore the men are hardly discerned from the women by their lookes, saue that the women weare a locke of haire downe along both their eares. They liue (in a manner) a wilde and a savage life, rouing still from one place of the countie to another, without any propriety of house or land, more to one then to an other.
Their leader or director in euery company, is their Papa or Priest.

On the North side of Russia next vnto Corelia, lyeth the Countrey of Lappia, which reacheth in length from the farthest poynt Northward, (towards the North Cape) to the farthest part Southeast (which the Russe calleth Sweetnesse or Holy nose, the Englishmen Cape Grace) about 345. verst or miles. From Sweetnesse to Candelox by the way of Verlega (which meatureth the breadth of that countrey) is 90 miles, or thereabouts. The whole Countrey (in a manner) is either Lakes or Mountains, which towards the Sea side are called Tondra, because they are all of hard and craggy rocke, but the in-land partes are well furnished with woods growing vpon the hilles sides, the Lakes lying betweene. Their dyet is very bare and simple. Bread they haue none, but feed onely vpon fish and towle. They are subiect to the Emperour of Russia, and the two Kings of Sweden and Denmarke, which all exact tribute & custome of them (as was said before) but the Em-perour of Russia beareth the greater burden, and exact of them farre more then the rest. The opinion is that they were first tearmed Lappes, of their briefe and short speech. The Russe diuideth the whole nation of the Lappes into two sorts.
The one they call Norwemansky Lapy, that is, the Norwegian Lappes: because they be of the Danish Religion. For the Danes & Norwegians they account for one people. The other that haue no Religion at all, but liue as brute and Heathenish

CHAP. IIII.

Fourthly, concerning Ecclesiasticall Offices and Orders; The Rites and Sacraments observed in the Moscouian Church: with their Marriages and other Ceremonies beside.

Concerning the government of their Church, it is framed altogether after the manner of the Greeks, as being a part of that

Church, and neuer acknowledging the iurisdiction of the Latine Church, vsur-ped by the Pope. That I may keepe the better measure in describing their Ceremonies, then they in the vsing the (wherein they are infinite) I will note briefly.

First, what Ecclesiasticall degrees, or Offices they haue, with the iurisdiction & practise of them.

Secondly, what doctrine they holde
in matter of Religion.

Thirdly, what Leiturgy, or forme of seruice they vse in their Churches, with the manner of their administering the Sacraments.

Fourthly, what other strange Ceremonies, and superstitious deuotions are vied among them.

Their Offices, or degrees of Churchmen, are as many in number, and the same in a manner (both in name and degree) that were in the Westerne Churches.
First they haue their Patriarch, then their Metropolitans, their Archbishops, their Pladikey or Bishops, their Protopopes or Arch-Priests, their Popes or Priests, their Dar-cons, Fryars, Monks, Nuns, and Eremites.

Their Patriarch, or chiefe director in matter of religion vntill this last year, was of the City of Constantinople (whom they called the Patriarch of Sio) because, being driven by the Turke out of Constantinople (the seat of his Empire) he remoued to the Isle Sio, sometimes called Chio, and there placed his Patriarchall See. So that the Emperors & Cleargy of Russia, were wont yearly to send gifts thither, people, without God in the world, they call Dikey Lapy, or the wilde Lappes.

The whole Nation is vterly vnlearn-ed, hauing not so much as the vse of any Alphabet, or Letter among them. For practise of witchcraft and forcery, they passe all Nations in the world. Though for the enchanting of Ships that sayle along their Coast (as I haue heard it reported) and their giuing of windes, good to their friends, and contrary vnto other, whom they meane to hurt by tying of certaine knots vpon a Rope (some what like to the tale of Aolus his winde-bag) is a very fable, deuised (as may seeme) by themselues, to terrifie saylers for com-ming neare their Coast. Their Weapons are the long Bow, and hand-gonne, wherein they excell, as well for quicknesse to charge and discharge; as for nearnesse at the marke, by reason of their continual practise (whereunto they are forced) of shooting at wilde Fowle.

Their manner is (in Summer time) to come downe in great companies to the sea side, to Wardhusse, Cola, Regor, &
the bay of Vedagoba, and there to fish for Cod, Salmon, and But-fish, which they sell to the Russes, Danes, and Norwegians, and now of late to the English men, that trade thither with cloth, which they exchange with the Lappes and Corelians for their Fish, Oyle, & Furs, whereof also they haue some store. They hold their Mart at Cola on S. Peters day: what time the Captaine of wardhusse (that is resident there for the king of Denmark) must be present, or at least send his deputy to set prices on their stockfish, traine oile, furs, and other commodities: as also the Russe Emperors Customer, or tribute taker, to receiue his custome, which is euery paid before any thing can be bought or solde.

When their fishing is done, their manner is, to draw their Carbasses, or Boates on shore, and there to leaue them with the keele turned vpwards, till the next spring tide. Their trauaile too and fro, is vpon sleds, drawne by the Ollen Deere: which they vse to turne a grazing all the Summer time, in an Island called Kilden (of a very good soyle, compared with other parts of that Countrey) and towards the Winter time, when the Snow beginneth to fall, they fetch them home again, for the vse of their sledde.

and to acknowledge a spirituall kinde of homage, and subiection due to him, and to that Church. Which custome they haue held (as it seemeth) euer since they professed the Christian religion. Which how long it hath bene, I could not well learne, for that they haue no story or monument of Antiquity (that I could heare of) to shew what hath bene done in times past within their Countrey, concerning either Church or Commonwealth matters.

Onely I heard a report amongst them, that about three hundred yeares since, there was a marriage betwixt the Emperour of Constantinople, & the kings daughter of that Countrey: who (at the first) denied to ioyne his daughter in marriage with the Greeke Emperour, because he was of the Christian Religion. Which agreeth well with that which I find in the story of Laonicus Chalcocondyles, concerning Turkish affaires in his fourth booke: where he speaketh of such a marriage, betwixt Iohn the Greeke Emperour, and the Kings daughter of Sarmatia.

And this argueth (out of their own report) that at that time, they had not receyued the Christian Religion: As also, that they were conuerted to the faith, and withall peruerued at the very same time, receyuing the doctrine of the Gospel corrupted with superstitions euen at the very first, when they took it from the Greeke Church, which it selfe then was degenerate, and corrupted with many superstitions and fowle errors, both in Doctrine & Discipline: as may appeare by the storie of Nicephorus Gregoras, in his eight and ninth bookes.

But, as touching the time of their conuersion to the Christian faith, I suppose rather, that it is mistaken by the Ruffe story, that which I find in the Polonian story, the second Booke, the third chapter: where is sayde, that about the yeare 990. Vladimir Duke of Russia, married one Anne, sister to Basilus and Constantinus brothers, and Emperours of Constantinople. Whereupon the Ruffe receyued the Faith and profession of Christ. Which, though it be somewhat more ancient then the time noted before out of the Ruffe report; yet it falleth out all to one reckning, touching this point, vizin what truth and sincerity of doctrine the Ruffe receyued the first stamp of religion: forasmuch as the Greeke church (at that time also) was many waies infected with error and superstition.

In the yeare 1588. came vnto the Moscow the Patriarch of Constantinople, or Sio, called Hieronimo, being banished (as I sayd) by the Turke, as some other reported, by the Greeke Clergy deputed. The Emperour being giuen altogether to superstitious deuotions, gaue him great entertainment. Before his coming vnto Mosko, he had bin in Italy with the Pope, as was reported there by some of his company. His errand was, to consult with the Emperour, concerning these points.

First, about a league to passe between him and the King of Spaine, as the meekest Prince to ioyne with him in opposition against the Turke. To which purpose also Ambassages had passed betwixt the Ruffe and the Perfian. Likewise from the Georgians to the Emperour of Russia, to ioyne league together, for the inuading of the Turke on all sides of his dominion: taking the aduantage of the simple quality of the Turke that then was. This treatie was helped forward by the Emperours Ambassador of Almaigne, sent at the same time to sollicite an inuasion on the partes of Polonia, that lyeth towards Russland, and to borrow money of the Ruffe Emperour, to pursue the warre for his brother Maximilian against the Suedens son, then King of Poland.

But this consultation concerning a league betwixt the Ruffe & the Spaniard (which was then in some forwardnesse, and already one appointed for Ambassage into Spaine) was defeated, by means of the ouerthrow giuen to the Spaniard king by her Maiesty, the Queen of England the last yeare before. Which made the Ruffe Emperour and his Counsell, to giue the sadder countenance to the English Ambassador there at that time: for that they were disappointed of so good a policy, as was this coniunction, supposed to be betwixt them and the Spaniard.

His second purpose (whereto the first serued as an introduction) was, in reuenge of the Turke and the Greeke Clergye, that hadde thrust him from his seate, to treat with him about the reducing of the Ruffe church vnder the Pope of Rome. Wherein it may seeme, that coming lately from Rome, hee was fetterpon by the

the Pope, who hath attempted the same many times before, though all in vaine: and namely in the time of the late Emperour Iuan Vasilowich, by one Anthony his Legate. But thought this (belike) a far better meane to obtaine his purpose, by treaty and mediation of their owne Patriarch. But this not succeeding, the Patriarch fell to a third point of treaty, concerning the resignation of his Patriarchship, and translation of the Sea from Constantinople, or Sio, to the City of Mosko. Which was so well liked, and entertained by the Emperour (as a matter of high religion and policy) that no other treaty (specially of forraign Ambassages) could be heard or regarded, till that matter was concluded.

The reasons wherewith the Patriarch perfwaded the translating of his Sea to the City of Mosko, were these in effect.

First, for that the Sea of the Patriarch was vnder the Turke, that is enemy to the faith: And therefore to be removed into some other Countrey of Christian profession.

Secondly, because the Ruffe Church was the onely naturall Daughter of the Greeke at this time, and holdeth the same Doctrine and Ceremonies with it: the rest being all subiect to the Turke, and fallen away fro the right profession. Wherein the subtil Greeke (to make the better market of his broken ware) aduanced the honour that would grow to the Emperour, and his Countrey: to haue the Patriarchs seate, translated into the chiefe City, and seate of his Empire. As for the right of translating the Sea, and appointing his successour; hee made no doubt of it, but that it pertained wholly vnto himselfe.

So the Emperour and his Counsell, with the principall of his Clergy, being assembled at the Mosko, it was determined, that the Metropolitane of Mosko, should become Patriarch of the whole Greeke Church, and haue the same full authority and iurisdiction, that pertained before to the Patriarch of Constantinople, or Sio. And that it might be done with more order and solemnity, the 25. of January, 1588. the Greeke Patriarch, accompanied with the Ruffe Clergy, went vnto the great Church of Precheste, or our Lady, within the Emperours Castle (hauing first wandered through the whole City in manner of a procession, and blessing the people with his two fingers) where he made an Oration, and deliuered his resignation in an instrument of writing, and to layd downe his Patriarchall staffe. Which was presently receiued by the Metropolitane of Mosko, & diuers other ceremonies vsed about the inauguration of this new Patriarch.

The day was holden very solemne by the people of the City, who were commanded to forbear their works, and to attend this solemnity. The great Patriarch that day was honored with rich presents sent him from the Emperour & Emperesse, of Plate, Cloth of Gold, Furs, &c. carried with great pompe through the streets of Mosko, and (at his departing) receiued many gifts more, both from the Emperour, Nobility, and Clergy. Thus the Patriarchship of Constantinople, or Sio, which hath continued since the Council of Nice is now translated vnto Mosko, or they made beleeue, that they haue a Patriarch, with the same right and authority that the other had. Wherein the subtle Greeke hath made good aduantage of their superstition, & is now gone away with a rich booty into Poland, whither their Patriarchship be currant or not.

The matter is not vnlke to make some Schisme betwixt the Greeke and Ruffe Church, if the Ruffe hold this Patriarchship that he hath so well payed for, & the Greekes elect another withall, as likely they wil, whither this man were banished by the Turke, or deputed by order of his owne Clergy. Which might happen to giue aduantage to the Pope, & to bring ouer the Ruffe Church to the Sea of Rome (to which ende peraduenture hee deuised this stratagem, and cast in this matter of Schisme among them) but that the Emperours of Russia knew well enough, (by the example of other Christian Princes) what inconuenience would grow to their State and Countrey, by subiecting themselves to the Romish Sea. To which ende, the late Emperour Iuan Vasilowich was very inquisitive of the Popes authority ouer the Princes of Christendome, and sent one of very purpose to Rome, to behold the order and behaviour of his Court.

With this Patriarch Hieronimo was driuen out (at the same time by the great Turke) one Demetrio, Archbishop of Larissa: who went into England, and pretended the same cause of their banishment by the Turke (to wit) their not admitting of the Popes new Kalender, for the alteration of the year. Which, how unlikely it is, may appear by these circumstances.

Reasons of good & great likelihood.

First, because there is no such affection, nor friendly respect, betwixt the Pope and the Turkes; as that he should banish a subject, for not obeying the Popes ordinance, specially in a matter of some sequell, for the alteration of times within his owne Countries.

Secondly, for that he maketh no such scruple in deducting of times, and keeping of a iust and precise account from the incarnation of Christ: whom hee doth not acknowledge, otherwise then as I noted before.

Thirdly, for that the said Patriarch is now at Naples in Italy, whither (it may be guessed) he would not have gone within the Popes reach, and so neare to his nose, if he had been banished, for opposing himselfe against the Popes Decree.

The Patriarch
Iurisdiction.

This Office of Patriarchship now translated to Mosko, beareth a superior authority over all the Churches, not onely of Russia, and other the Emperors dominions; but throughout all the Churches of Christendome, that were before vnder the Patriarch of Constantinople, or Sio: or at least, the Russe Patriarch imagineth himselfe to haue the same authority. He hath vnder him (as his proper Diocesse) the Prouince of Mosko, besides other particulars. His Court or Office is kept at the Mosko.

The Metro-
polites.

Before the creation of this new Patriarch, they had but one Metropolit, that was called the Metropolit of Mosko. Now for more state to their Church, and new Patriarch; they haue two Metropolites, the one of Novogrod called, the other of Rostow. Their Office is, to receiue of the Patriarch, such Ecclesiasticall Orders, as he thinks good, & to deliuer the charge of the ouer to the Archbishops: besides the ordering of their owne Diocesse.

Archbishops.

Their Archbishops are foure: of Smolensko, Casam, Polsko, and Pologda. The parts of their Office is all one with the Metropolites: saue that they haue an vnder iurisdiction, as Suffraganes to the Metro-polites, and superiors to the Bishops. The next are the Pladikeis, or Bishops, that are but fixe in all: of Crutuska, of Resan, of Ofser, and Torshock, of Collo-menska, of Volodener, of Sudalla. These haue every one a very large Diocesse: as diuiding the rest of the whole Country among them.

Bishops.

The matters pertaining to the Ecclesiasticall iurisdiction, of the Metropolites, Archbishops, and Bishops, are the same (in a manner) that are vied by the Clergie in other parts of Christendome. For, besides their authority ouer the Clergie, and ordering such matters as are mere Ecclesiasticall; their iurisdiction extendeth to all testamentary causes, matters of marriage, and diuorcements, some pleas of iniuries, &c.

Ecclesiasticall
Iurisdiction.

To which purpose also they haue their Officials, or Commisaries (which they call Batarsen Pladitsky) that are Lay-men of the degree of Dukes, or Gentlemen, that keepe their Courts, and execute their iurisdiction. Which, besides their other opprobriations ouer the common people, raigne ouer the Priests: as the Dukes and Diaks do ouer the poore people, within their Precincts.

Their Gentlemen, Commissaries.

As for the Archbishopspe or Bishop himselfe, he beareth no way in deciding those causes, that are brought into his Court. But if hee would moderate any matter, he must do it by entreaty with his Gentleman Officiall. The reason is, because these Batarsky, or Gentlemen officials, are not appointed by the Bishops, but by the Emperour himselfe, or his Council, and are to giue account of their doings to none but to them. If the Bishop can entreat (at his admission) to haue the choise of his owne Officiall, it is accounted for a speciall great fauour. But to speake it as it is, the Clergie of Russia, as well concerning their lands and reuenues, as their authority and iurisdiction; are altogether ordered and ouer-ruled by the Emperour, and his Council, and haue so much, and no more of both as their pleasure doth permit them.

The Emper-

tlemen Officials and not

shopp.

They haue also their assistants or feuerall Councils (as they call them) of certaine Priests that are of their Dioces, residing within their Cathedrall cities, to the number of foure & twenty a peece. These aduise with them, about the speciall and necessary

Auistance of

necessary matters belonging vnto their charge.

Concerning their rents and reuenues to maintain their dignities, it is somewhat large. The Patriarches yearly rents out of his lands (besides other fees) is about three thousand Rubbels or Maikes. The Metropolites and Archbishops, about two thousand and five hundred. The Bishops some a thousand, some eight hundred, some five hundred, &c. They haue had some of them (as I haue heard say) ten or twelue thousand rubbels a year; as had the Metropolit of Novograde.

The habite of their Clergie
men.

Their habite or apparrell (when they shew themselves in their Pontificalibus, after their solempnest manner) is a Miter on their heads, after the Popish fashion, with Pearle and precious stone, a Cope on their backs, commonly of Cloth of Gold, embroidered with Pearle, and a Crossers staffe in their hands, layed ouer all with plate of siluer double gilt, with a Croffe or Shepherds crook at the vpper end of it.

Their ordinary habite.

Their ordinary habite otherwise, when they ride or go abroad, is a hood on their heads of blacke colour, that hangeth downe their backs, and standeth out like a Bongeace before. Their vpper garment (which they call Reis) is a gowne or Mantle of blacke Damaske, with many lisse or gardes of white Satin laid vpon it, euery gard about two fingers broad, and theye Crossers staffe carried before them. These followe after, blessing the people with their two forefingers, with a maruelous grace.

The election of byshops

The election, and appointing of the Byshops and the rest, pertaineth wholly to the Emperour himselfe. They are chosen euier ouer of the Monasteries: so that there is no Byshop, Archbishop, nor Metropolit, but hath bene a Monke, or Fryer before. And (by that reason) they are, and must all bee unmarried men, for their vow of Chastity, when they were first shorne. When the Emperour hath appointed whom he thinketh good, hee is inuested in the Cathedrall Church of this Diocesse, with many ceremonies, much after the manner of the Popish inauguration. They haue also their Deanes, and their Arch-deacons.

The learning and exercise of the Russe Clergie.

As for preaching the word of God, or any teaching, or exhorting such as are vn-

der them; they neither vse it, nor haue any skill of it: the whole Clergie being vtterly vnlearned, both for other knowledge, and in the worde of God. Onely their manner is twice every year, viz: the first of September (which is the first day of their year) and on S. Iohn Baptists day to make an ordinarie speech to the people, euery Metropolit, Archbishop and Byshop in his Cathedrall Church, to this or the like effect.

That if any be in malice toward his neighbor, he shall leave off his malice: If any haue thought of treason or rebellion against his Prince, he beware of such practise: If he haue not kept his fasts and Foyes, nor done his other duties to the holy church, he shall amend that fault, &c.

And this is a matter of forme with the vttered in as many words, and no more (in a manner) then I haue here set down. Yet the matter is done with that grace & solemnity, in a pulpit of purpose set vpe for this one Act; as if he wer to discourse at large of the whole substance of diuinity. At the Mosko, the Emperour himselfe is euier present at this solempne exhortation.

As themselves are voyde of all manner of learning, so they are wane to keepe out all means that might bring any in: as fearing to haue their ignorance and vngodlinesse discovered. To that purpose they haue perwarded the Emperours, that it would breed inuouation, and so daunger to their State, to haue any nouelty of learning come within the Realme. Wherein they say but truth, for that a man of spirit and vnderstanding, holpen by Learning and liberal education, can hardly endure a tyrannicall government.

Some yeares past, in the other Emperours time, there came a Presse & Letters out of Polonia, to the City of Mosko, where a Printing-houise was set vp, with great liking and allowance of the Emperour himselfe. But not long after, the house was set on fire in the night time, & the Presse and Letters quite burnt vp, and (as it was thought) by the procurement of the Clergie men.

Their Priests, whome they call Papases are made by the Byshops, without any great trial for worthinesse of gifts; before they admit them, or ceremonies in their admission: saue that their heads are shorn

(not shauen, for that they like not) about an hand bredth or more in the Crowne, and that place annoiued with Oyle by the Byshop: who in his admission putteth vpon the Priest, first his Surplese; and then setteth a white crosse on his brest of silke, or some other matter, which hee is to weare eight dayes, and no more: and so giueth him authority to say and sing in the Church, and to administer the Sacraments.

They are men vtterly vnlearned, which is no maruell, forasmuch as their makers, the Byshoppes themselues (as before was sayde) are cleere of that qualitie, & make no farther vse at all of any kinde of Learning, no not of the Scriptures themselues, saue to reade and to sing them. Their ordinary charge and function, is to say the Liturgie, to administer the Sacraments after their manner, to keepe & decke their Idols, and to doe the other Ceremonies vsuall in their Churches. Their number is great, because their Townes are parted into many small Parishes, without any discretion, for deuiding them into competent numbers of households, and people for a iust Congregation: as the manner in all places where the meanes is neglected, for increasing of knowledge, and instruction towards God. Which cannot well be had, where by means of an vnequall partition of the people, and parishes, there followeth a want and vnequality of stipend, for a sufficient Ministry.

For their Priests, it is lawfull to marry for the first time. But if the first Wife dye, a second he cannot take, but he must lose his Priesthood, and his liuing withal. The reason, they make out of that place of Saint Paul to Timothy, 1.3.2. not well vnderstood, thinking that to bee spoken of diuers wiues successively, that the Apostle speaketh of alone and the same time. If he will needes marry againe after his first Wife is dead, hee is no longer called Papa, but Rospapa, or Priest Quondam. This maketh the Priests to make much of their Wiues, who are accounted as the Matrones, and of best reputation, among the Women of the Parish.

For the stipend of the Priest, their manner is not to pay him any tenths of come, or ought else: but hee must stand at the devotion of the people of his owne Parish, and make vp the Incomes towards his maintenance, so well as he can, by offerings, shrifts, marriages, burials, dirges, and prayers for the dead and the liuing (which they call Moluita.) For, besides their publike seruice within their Churches, their manner is, for euery private man to haue a prayer saide for him by the Priest, vpon any occasion of businesse whatsoeuer, whether he ride, goe, sayle, plough, or whatsoeuer else hee doeth. Which is not framed according to the occasion of his businesse, but at random, being some of their ordinary and vsuall Church prayers. And this is thought to be more holy and effectuall, if it be repeated by the Priests mouth, rather then by his owne.

They haue a custome besides to solemnize the Saints day, that is Patron to their Church once euery yeare. What time all their neighbours of their Country, & parishes about, come in to haue prayers saide to that Saint, for themselves, and their friends: and so make an Offering to the Priest for his paines.

This Offering may yeeld them some ten poundes a yeare, more or lesse, as the Patron or Saint of that Church is of credit and estimation among them. The manner is on this day (which they keepe anniuersary for the Priest) to hyre diuers of his neighbour Priests to helpe him: as hauing more Duties to dresse for the Saint, then hee can well turne his hand vnto.

They vse besides to visite their parishoners houses, with holy Water, and Per-fume, commonly once a quarter: and so hauing sprinkled and besented the good man and his Wife, with the rest of their household and household-stuffe, they receyue some deuotion (more or lesse) as the man is of ability. This and the rest laid together, may make vp for the Priest towards his maintenance, about thirtie or fourty Rubbels a yeare: whereof he payeth the tenth part to the Byshoppe of the Diocese.

The Papa or Priest is knowne by his long tuts of hayre, hanging down by his eares, his gowne with a broad Cape, and a walking staffe in his hand. For the rest of his habite, he is apparelled like to the common fort. When he saith the Liturgie or seruice, within the Church, he hath on him his Surplese, and sometimes his Cope, if the day be more solemne. They haue besides their Papae or priests, they Churnapapae (as they call them) that is, Blacke Priests; that may keepe their benefices, though they bee admitted Friars withall within some Monasterie. They seeme to be the very same, that were called Regular Priests in the Popish Church. Vnder the Priest, is a Deacon in euery Church, that doth nothing but the office of a Parish Clarke. As for their Protopapae, or Arch-priests, and their Arch-deacons (that are next in election to bee their Protopapae) they serue only in the Cathedral Churches.

Of Friars they haue an infinite rabble, farre greater then in any other Country, where Popery is professed. Euery Citie, and good part of the Country, swarmeth full of them. For they haue wrought (as the Popish Friars did by their superstition and hypocrisie) that if any part of the Realme be better and sweeter then others; there standeth a Friery or a Monasterie, dedicated to some Saint.

The number of them is so much the greater, not only for that it is augmented by the superstition of the country; but because the Friars life is the safest from the oppressions and exactions which fall vpon the Commons. Which causeth many to put on the Friars weede, as the best Armour to beare off such blowes. Besides such as are voluntary, there are diuers that are forced to sheare themselves Friars, vpon some displeasure. These are for the most part of the cheefe Nobility.

Diuers take the Monasteries as a place of Sanctuary, and there become Friars, to avoid some punishment, that they had deserved by the lawes of the realme. For if he get a Monastery ouer his head, and there put on a Coule before hee be attached, it is a protection to him for euery against any Law, for what crime soeuer: except it be for treason. But this Prouifio goeth withall, that no man commeth there (except such as are commanded by the Emperour to be receyued) but he giueth them Lands, or bringeth his stocke with him, and putteth it into the common Treasury. Some bring a thousand Rubbels, and some more. None is admitted vnder three or foure hundred.

The manner of their admission is after this sort. First, the Abbot strippeth him of all his secular or ordinary Apparell. Then he putteth vpon him next vnto his skinn, a white Flannell shirt, with a long garment ouer it downe vnto the ground, girded to him with a broad leather belt. His vppermost Garment is a Weede of Garras or Say, for colour and fision, much like to the vpper weed of a Chimney-sweeper. Then is crowne shorne a hand bredth, or more, close to the vertic skin, and these or the like words are pronounced by the Abbot, while hee clipeth his haire.

As these haire are clipped off, and taken from thy head: so now wee take thee, and separate thee cleane from the world and worldly things, &c.

This done, he annoiueteth his crowne with oyle, and putteth on his Coule: and fo taketh him in among the Fraternitie. They vow perpetuall chastity, and abstinence from flesh.

Besides their Landes (that are verie great) they are the greatest Marchants in the whole Country, and deale for all manner of commodities. Some of their Monasteries dispend in Lands one thousand, or two thousand Rubbels a yeare. There is one Abbey called Troits, that hath in lands and tees, the summe of an hundred thousand Rubbels, or markes a yeare.

It is built in manner of a Castle, walled round about with great Ordinance planted on the Wall, and containeth within it a large bredth of ground, and great variety of building. There are of Friars within it (besides their Officers and other seruants) about seven hundred. The Emperesse that then was, had many Vowes to Saint Sergius, that is patron there: to intreat him to make her fruitfull, as hauing no children by the Emperour her Husband. Lightly (euery yeare) she went on Pilgrimage to him from the Mosko, on foote, about foure score ordinary miles, with five or sixe thousand women attending vpon her, all in blew Liueries, and foure thousand souldiers for her Guard. But S. Sergius hath not yet heard her prayers, though (they say) hee hath a speciall gift and faculty that way.

Author & a Ruffe priest.

Fryars, may be known by their Byshops, that are the choise men out of all their Monasteries. I talked with one of them at the City of Pologda, where (to trie his skill, I offered him a Ruffe Testament, and turned him to the first chap. of S. Mathew's Gospell. Where he began to read in very good order.

I asked him first, What part of Scripture it was that he had read? Hee answered, that he could not well tell. How many Euangelists there were in the New Testament? He saide he knew not. How many Apostles there were? Hee thought there were twelue. How he should be faued? Whereunto he answered me (with a peece of Ruffe Doctrine) that hee knew not whether hee should be faued, or no: But if God wold Postbaptize him, or gratifie him so much, as to saue him, so it was; he would be glad of it: if not, what remedy? I asked him. Why he shoud him selfe a Fryer? Hee answered, because hee would eate his bread in quietnesse and peace.

This is the learning of the Fryars of Russia, which though it be not to be measured by one, yet partly it may be gessed (by the ignorance of this man) what is in the rest.

ted there.

They haue also very many Nunneries, whereof some may admit none but Noblemen's Widdowes and Daughters, when the Emperour meaneth to keepe them vnmarried, from continuing the blood or stocke, which hee would haue extinguished. To speak of the life of their Fryers and Nunnes, it needs not, to those that know the hypocrisie and vncleanesse of that Cloyster-broode. The Ruffe himselfe (though otherwise addicted to all superstition) speaketh so fowly of it, that it must needs gain silence of any modest man.

Eremites called boy-men, like to Gym-nosophytes.

Besides these, they haue certaine Eremites (whome they call Holy men) that are like to those Gymnosophytes for their life and behauiour: though farre vnlike for their knowledge and Learning. They vse to goe stark naked, faue a clowte about their middle, with their hayre hanging long and wildly about their shoulders, and many of them with an iron collar, or chaine about their neckes or middle, euen in the very extremity of Winter.

These they take as Prophets, and men of great holinesse, giuing them a libertie to speake what they list, without any controulment, though it be of the very highest himselfe. So that if he reprove any openly, in what sort focuer; they answer nothing, but that it is Pogracum, that is, for their finnes. And if any of them take some peece of sale ware from any mans shop, as he passeth by, to giue where hee list; hee thinketh himselfe much beloued of God, and much beholding to the holy man, for taking it in that sort.

Prophets and men of great sanctity.

Of this kinde there are not many, because it is a very hard and cold profession, to goe naked in Russia, especially in winter. Among other at this time, they haue one at Mosko, that walketh naked about the Streetes, and inuayeth commonly, against the State and Government, especially against the Godmothers, that are thought at this time, to bee great Oppressors of that Common-wealth.

Another there was, that died not many yeares agoe (whom they called Bafileo) that would take vpon him to reprove the olde Emperour for all his cruelty, and oppressions done towards his people. His body they haue translated (of late) into a sumptuous Church, neere the Emperors house in Mosko, & haue Canonized him for a Saint. Many miracles he doth there (for so the Fryers make the people to beleene) and many Offerings are made vnto him, not only by the people, but by the cheefe Nobility, and the Emperour & Emperesse themselves, which visite that Church with great deuotion.

Bafileo the Eremit

But at my being at Mosko, this Saint had ill lucke in working his miracles. For a lame man, that had his limbes restored (as it was pretended by him) was charged by a woman that was familiar with him (being then false out) that he halted but in the day time, and could leape merrily when he came home at night. And that he had intended this matter six yeares before.

all day and night long, as in triumphe of the myracles wrought by Bafileo their S. J. to ring for what foitly; and hath wrought no little discredit vnto this Miracle worker.

There was another of great account at Plesko (called Nichola of Plesko) that did much good, when this Emperors Father came to sacke the Towne, vpon suspicion of their reuolting and rebellion against him. The Emperour, after he had saluted the Eremit, at his lodging, sent him a reward. And the Holy man, to requite the Emperour, sent him a peece of raw flesh, being then their Lent. Which the Emperour seeing, bid one to tel him, that hee marvelled, that the Holye man would offer him flesh to eat in the Lent, when it was forbidden by order of holie Church. And doth Enasko (which is as much to say as lacke) thinke (quoth Nicola) that it is vnlawfull to eat a peece of beafts flesh in Lent, & not to este up so much mans flesh, as he hath done already?

So, threatening the Emperour, with a prophesie of some harde aduenture to come vpon him, except hee left murthering of his people, and departing from the Towne, hee saued a great many mens lues at that time.

This maketh the people to like very well of them, because they are as Papists to note their great mens fautes, that no man else dare speake of. Yet it falleth out sometime, that for this rude liberty which they take vpon them (after a counterfeyte manner) by imitation of Prophets, they are made away in secret: as was one or two of them, in the last Emperours time, for being ouer-bolde in speaking against his government.

Their morning seruice they call Zaustana, that is, Mattins. It is done in this order.

The Priest entereth into the Church, with his Deacon following him. And, when hee is come vnto the middle of the Church, hee beginneth to say with a lowd voyce: Blaslauey Vladika, that is, Blesse vs heavenly Pastor, meaning of Christ. Then he addeth, In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the holy Ghost, one very God in Trinity: and Apody Pomeley, Or, Lord haue mercy vpon vs, Lord haue mercie vpon vs, Lord haue mercy vpon vs, repeated three times.

This done, he marcheth on toward the Chancell or Sanctum Sanctorum (as they vse to call it) and so entereth into the Scharfuey Dnere, or the heavenly doore: which no man may enter into, but the Priest only. Where standing at the Altare or Table (set neere to the vpper wall of the Chancell) hee sayeth the Lordes prayer, and then againe Apody Pomeley, or Lord haue mercy vpon vs, Lord haue mercie vpon vs, &c. pronounced twelue times. Then prayed be the Trinity, the Father, the Son, and the holy Ghost, for ever and ever. Next after, the Priest addeth the Psalmes for that day, and beginneth with, O come let vs worship and fall down before the Lord &c. and therewithall himselfe, with the Deacons, and people, all turn themselves towards their Idols or Images that hang on the Wall, and (crossing themselves) bow downe three times, knocking their heads to the very ground. After this, hee readeth the ten Commandements; and Athanasius Creede, out of the Service booke.

The heavenly and Images.

This being done, the Deacon that standeth without the heavenly doore or Chancell, readeth a peece of a Legend, out of a Written Booke (for they haue it not in Print) of some Saints life, Miracles, &c. This is diuided into many parts, for every day in the yeare, and is read by them with a plaine singing Note, not vnlike to the Popish Tune, when they sung their Gospels.

After all this (which reacheth vnto an houre, and an halfe, or two howers of length) he addeth certaine set Collectes, or prayers vpon that which he hath read out of the Legend before: and so endeth his Service. All this while stande burning before their Idols, a great many of Wax Candles (whereof some are of the biggenesse of a mans waste) vowed, or enjoyed by penance, vpon the people of the Parish.

About nine of the clocke in the Morning, they haue another Service, called Obeiana (or Compline) much after the order of the Popish Service, that bare that name. If it be some high or Festiual day, they furnish their Service besides, With Blesed be the Lord God of Israel &c. and We praise thee, O God &c. sung with a more solemn and curious note.

Their euening Service.

Their Evening Service, called Vecherna, where the Priest beginneth with Blissay Vlasika, as hee did in the morning, and with the Psalmes appoynted for the Vecherna. Which being read, he singeth, My soule doth magnifie the Lord, &c. And then the Priest, Deacons, and People, all with one voyce sing, Alpody pomelui, or Lord haue mercy vpon vs, thirty times together. Whereunto the boyes that are in the Church, answer all with one voice, rowling it vp so fast, as their lips can goe; Verij, Verij, Verij, Verij, or Praise, Praise, Praise, &c. thirty times together, with a very strange noyse. Then is read by the Priest, and vpon the Holy-dayes sung the first Psalm, Blessed is the man, &c. And in the end of it, is added, Alleluia, repeated ten times.

Thenext in order, is some part of the Gospel read by the Priest, which he ends with Alleluia, repeated three times. And so having said a Collect in remembrance of the Saint of that day, he ends his evening Service.

All this while, the Priest stands above at the Altare or high Table, within the Chancel, or Sanctum Sanctorum, whence hee neuer moueth all the Service time. The Deacon or Deacons (which are many in their Cathedrall Churches) stand without the Chancel by the Scharfuey Dvners, or heavenly dore: for within they may not be seene all the Service time, though otherwise their office is to sweep, and keepe it, and to set vp the waxe candles before their Idoles. The people do stand together (the whole Service time) in the Church, and some in the Church porch: for Piew or Seate they haue none within their Churches.

The Sacrament of Baptisme they administer after this manner: The child is brought to the Church (and this is done within eight dayes after it is borne:) If it be the child of some Noble man, it is brought in a rich Sled or Waggon, with chaires and cushions of cloath of Golde, and such like sumptuous shew of their best furniture. When they are come to the Church, the Priest standeth readie to receiue the child within the Church-porch, with his tub of water by him. And then beginneth to declare vnto them, that they haue brought a little Infidell to be made a Christian, &c. This ended, he teacheth the witness, that are two or three, in a certayne set forme out of his Booke (what their duty is,) in bringing vp the child after he is baptized, viz. That hee must bee taught to know God, and Christ our Saviour. And because God is of great Maiestie, and we must not presume to come vnto him, without Mediators (as the manner is when we make any suite to an Emperour, or great Prince) therefore they must teach him what Saints are the belis, and chiefe mediators, &c. This done, he commaundeth the diuell in the name of God (after a conspiring manner) to come out of the water: and so after certaine prayers, he plungeth the child ouer head and eares. For this they holde to be a poynt very necessary, that no part of the child be left vndipped into the water.

The words that beare with them the forme of Baptisme, vnticed by the Priest, when he dippeth in the child, are the very same that are prescribed in the Gospel, and viced by vs, that is, In the name of the Father, and of the Sonne, and of the Ghost. For that they should alter the forme of the words, and say, by the holy Ghost, as I haue heard they did, following certaine heretikes of the Greeke Church, I found to be untrue, as well by the report of them that haue bene often at their Baptismes, as by their Booke of Leiturgie it selfe, wherein the order of Baptisme is precisely set downe.

When the child is baptized, the Priest layeth Oyle and Salt tempered together vpon the fore-head, and both the sides of his face, and then vpon his mouth, drawing it along with his finger ouer the child's lippes (as did the Popish Priests) saying withall, certaine prayers, to this effect: That God will make him a good Christian, &c. All this is doone in the Church porch.

Then is the child (as being now made a Christian, & meet to be receiued within the Church doore) carried into the Church, the Priest going before, and is there presented to the chiefe Idoll of the Church, being layd on a cushion before the feet of the Image, by it (as by the mediator) to be commended vnto God. If the child be sicke, or weake (specially in the Winter) they vse to make the water luke warme. After Baptisme, the maner is to cut off the haire from the child's head and haining wrapped it within a peece of wax, to lay it vp, as a relike or monument in a secret place of the Church.

This is the manner of their Baptisme, which they account to be the best & perfectest forme. As they do all other parts of their religion, receiued (as they say) by tradition from the best church, meaning the Greeke. And therefore they will take great paines to make a Profelitte or Conuert, either of an Infidell, or of a forraign Christian, by rebaptizing him after the Russe manner.

When they take any Tartar prisoner, commonly they will offer him life, with condition to be baptized. And yet they perswade very fewe of them to redeme their life so: because of the natural hatred the Tartar beareth to the Russe, and the opinion he hath of his falshood and iniustice. The yeare after Mosko was fired by the Chrim Tartar, there was taken a Dionysius, one of the chiefe in that exploit, with 300. Tartars more: who had all their liues offered them, if they would be baptized after the Russe manner. Which they all refused to do, with many reproches against those that perswaded them. And so being carried to the riuer Mosko, (that runneth thorough the City) they were all baptized after a violent manner: being thrust downe with a knocke on the head into the water, through an hole made in the Ice for that purpose.

Of Lieslanders that are Captiues, there are many that take on them this second Russe baptisme, to get more libertie, and some what besides towards their liuing, which the Emperour ordinarily vseth to giue them. Of Englishmen (since they frequented the country) there was neuer any found, that so much forgot God, his faith, and country, as that he would be content to be baptized Russe, for any respect of feare, preferment, or other means whatsoever: save onely Nichard Relph, that following before an vngodly Trade, by keeping a Caback (against the order of the country) and being putte off from that Trade, and spoiled by the Emperours Officers of that which he hadde, entered himselfe into the Russe profession, and so was rebaptized, liuing now as much an Idolater, as before he was a rioter and vnthrifty person.

Such as thus receiue the Russe baptism, are first caried into some Monastery, to be instructed there in the doctrine and ceremonies of the Church. Where they vse these ceremonies.

First, they put him into a new & fresh suite of apparrell, made of the Russe fashion, and set a Coronet, or (in Sommer) a garland vpon his head.

Then they annoint his head with oile, & put a wax candle light into his hand: & so pray ouer him foure times a day, the space of vii. daies. All this while hee is to abstaine from flesh and white meats.

The seuen dayes being ended, he is purified and washed in a Bath-stoue, and so the eighth day he is brought to the church, where he is taught (by the Friars) how to behaue himself in presence of their idols; by ducking down, knocking of the head, crossing himselfe, and such like gestures, which are the greatest part of the Russe religion.

The Sacrament of the Lords Supper, they receiue but once a year, in their great Lent time, a little before Easter. Three at the most are admitted at one time, and neuer aboue. The manner of their communicating is thus. First, they do confesse themselves of all their sins, to the Priest (whome they call their ghostly Father.) Then they come to the Church, and are called vp to the Communion table, that standeth like an Altar, a little remooued from the vpper end of the Church, after the Dutch manner.

Heere first they are asked of the Priest, whether they be clean, or no: that is, whether they haue neuer a sinne behinde that they left vnconfessed. If they answer, No, they are taken to the table. Where the Priest beginneth with certain viduall prayers, the Communicants standing in the meane while with their armes folded one within another, like penitentiaries, or mourners. When these prayers are ended, the Priest taketh a spoone, and filleth it full of Claret Wine. Then he putteth into it a small peece of bread, and tempereth them both together, and so deliuereth them in the Spoon to the Communicants, that stand in order, speaking the viduall words of the Sacrament, Eate this, &c. Drink this, &c. both at one time without any pause.

After that, hee deliuereth them againe bread by it selfe, and then wine carded together with a little warme water, to represent blood more rightly (as they thinke) and the water wishall, that flowed out of the side of Christ. Whiles this is in doing, the Communicants vnfolde their armes. And then folding them againe, follow the Priest thrice round about the Communion Table, and so returne to their places againe. Where hauing faide certaine other prayers, hee dismisseth the Communicants, with charge to be merry, and to cheere vp themselves for the fewen dayes next following. Which being ended, he enioyneth them to fast for it as long time after. Which they vnto observe with very great deuotion, eating nothing else but bread and salt, except a little cabbage, and some other heare or roore, with water or quasse mead for their drinke.

This is their manner of administering the Sacraments. Wherein what they differ from the institution of Christ, and what ceremonies they have added of their owne, or rather borrowed of the Greekes, may easily be noted.

Their cheefe errors in matter of faith, I finde to be these.

First concerning the word of God it selfe, they will not reade publicly certain Bookes of the Canonickall Scripture, as the Bookes of Moses; specially the foure last, Exodus, Leuiticus, Numeri, and Deuteronomie, which they say are all made disauthenticke, and put out of vse by the coming of Christ; as not able to discern the difference betwixt the Morall, and the Ceremoniall law.

The Bookes of the Prophets they allow of, but reade them not publicly in their Churches, for the same reason; because they wer but directers vnto Christ, and proper (as they say) to the Nation of the Iewes. Onely the booke of Psalmes they haue in great estimation, and sing & say them daily in their Churches.

Of the new Testament they allow, and reade all except the Revelation: which therefore they read not (though they allow it) because they vnderstand it not, neither haue the like occasion, to know the fulfilling of the propheties contained within it, concerning especially the Apostasie of the Antichristian Church, as haue the Westerne Churches. Norwith-

standing they haue had their Antichristes of the Greek Church, and may find their own falling off, and the punishments for it (by the Turkish inuasion) in the propheties of that Booke.

Secondly (which is the fountain of the rest of all their corruptions both in Doctrine and Ceremonies) they holde with the Papists, that their Church Traditions are of equall authority with the written word of God. Wherein they prefer them selues before other Churches: affirming, that they haue the true and right traditions, deliuered by the Apostles to the Greek Church, and so vnto them.

3. That the Church (meaning the Greeke, and specially the Patriarch & his Synod, as the head of the rest) haue a soveraigne authority to interpret the scriptures, and that all are bound, to hold that interpretation as sound and authenticke.

4. Concerning the diuine Nature, and the three persons, in the one substance of God, that the Holy ghost proceedeth from the Father onely, and not from the Sonne.

5. About the office of Christ, they hold many fowle errors, and the same (almost) as doth the Popish Church; namely, that he is their sole Mediator of redemption, but not of intercession.

Their cheefe reason (if they be talked withall) for defence of this error, is, that vnapt and foolish comparison, betwene God and a Monarch or Prince of this world, that must be sued vnto by Mediators about him: wherein they giue special preferment to some aboue others, as to the blessed Virgin, whom they call Preche-ster, or vndeified: & S. Nicolas, whom they call Scorapomnick, or the Speedy helper, & say, that he hath 300. Angels of the cheefe, appointed by God to attend on him. This hath brought them to an horrible excess of idolatry, after the grossest and prophane manner; giuing vnto their Images, all Religious worship of Prayer, Thanksgiuing, Offerings, and Adoration, with prostrating and knocking their heads to the ground before them, as to God himselfe. Which because they doo to the picture, not to the portraiture of the Saint, they say they worship not an Idol, but the Saint in his image, & so offend not God. Forgetting the commendment of God, that forbiddeth to make the image image or likenesse of any thing, for any religious worshipp or vse whatsoever. Their Church walles are very full of them, richly hangd and set forth with Pearle & stone vpon the smooth Table. Though some also they haue embossed, that sticke from the boord almost an inch outwards. They call them Chudoudites, or their miracle workers: and when they provide the to set vp in their churches, in no case they may say that they haue bought the image but exchanged money for it.

6. For the meanes of Iustification, they agree with the Papistes, that it is not by faith onely, apprehending Christ, but by their workes also. And that Opus operatum or the worke for the worke sake, must needs please God. And therefore they are all in their numbers of Prayers, Fastes, Vowes, and offerings to Saints, Almshouses, Crossings, and such like, and carrie their numbering beads about with them continually; as well the Emperor and his Nobility, as the common people, not onely in the Church, but in all other public places, specially at any set or solemne meeting, as in their Fasts, Law Courtes, common consultations, entertainment of Ambassadors, and such like.

7. They say (with the Papistes) that no man can be assured of his saluation, till the last sentence be passed at the day of judgment.

8. They vse Auricular confession, and thinke that they are purged (by the verie action) from so many sins as they confesse by name, and in particular to the Priest.

9. They do hold three Sacraments, of Baptisme, the Lords Supper, and the last anoynting or unction. Yet concerning their Sacrament of extreame Vnction, they hold it not so necessary to saluation, as they doe Baptisme; but thinke it a great curse and punishment of God, if any dye without it.

10. They thinke there is a necessitie of Baptisme, and that all are condemned that dye without it.

11. They rebaptize as many Christians (not being of the Greeke church) as they conuert to their Russe profession: because they are diuided from the true Church, which is the Greeke, as they say.

12. They make a difference of meates and drinckes, accounting the vse of one, to be more holy then of another. And therefore in their set fasts, they forbear to eat flesh, and white meates (as we call them) after the manner of the Popish superstition: which they observe so strictly, and with such blind deuotion, as that they will rather die, then eat one bit of flesh, egges or such like, for the health of their bodies in their extreme sicknesse.

13. They hold marriage to be vnlawful for all the Clergy men, except the Priests only, and for them also after the first wife (as was said before.) Neither do they well allowe of it in Lay-men after the second marriage. Which is a pretence now vied against the Emperours onely brother, a child of six yeares old: Who therefore is not prayed for in their Churches, as their maner is otherwise for the Princes blood, because he was borne of the first marriage, and so not legitimate. This charge was giuen to the Priests by the Emperor himself, by procurement of the Godones: who make him beleue, that it is a good policy, to turne away the liking of the people from the next successor.

Many other false opinions they haue in matter of Religion. But these are the chiefe, which they hold partly by meanes of their traditions (which they haue received from the Greeke Church) but specially by ignorance of the holy Scriptures. Which notwithstanding they haue in the Polonian toong (that is at one with theirs, some few words only excepted) yet few of them read them with that godly care which they ought; to doe: neyther haue they (if they would) bookes sufficient of the Olde and New Testament for the common people, but of their Leiturgie onely, or Booke of common Service, whereof there are very great numbers.

All this mischeefe cometh from the Clergie, who being ignorant and godlesse themselves, are exceedingly warie, to keepe the people (likewise) in their ignorance and blindness, for they liuing and bellies sake: partly also from their manner of Governement selected among them: which the Emperours (whom it specially behooueth) like not to haue changed by any inuocation, but to retaine that Religion that best agreeth with it. Which notwithstanding it is not to be doubted, but that hauing the word of God in some sort (though without the ordinary meanes, to attaine to a true sense and vnderstanding of it) God hath also his number among them. As may partly appeare, by that which a Ruffe at Moske said to a follower of an Ambassador, speaking against their Images and other superstitions: That God had given vnto his Country light to day, and might give it to morrow (if he pleased) to them.

As for any inquisition or proceeding against me for matter of religion, I could heare of none: saue (a few yeares since) against one man and his wife, who were kept in close prison, the space of 28. years, till they were ouer-growne into a deformed fashion, for their hayre, nailes, colour of countenance, and such like, and in the ende were burned at Moske, in a small house set on fire. The cause was kept secret, but like it was for some part of truth, in matter of religion: though the people were made to beleue by the Priests and Fryars, that they held some great & damnable heresie.

The manner of making and solemnizing their Mariages, is different from the manner of other Countries. The man (though he neuer saw the woman before) is not permitted to haue any sight of her all the time of his wooing: which he doth not by himselfe, but by his Mother, or some other ancient woman of his kin or acquaintance. When the liking is taken (as well by the Parents, as by the parties themselves, for without the knowledge and consent of the parents, the contract is not lawfull) the fathers on both sides, or such as are to them in stead of Fathers, with their other chiefe friends, haue a meeting and conference about the dowry, which is commonly very large, after the ability of the Parents: so that you shal haue a Market-man (as they call them) giue a thousand Rubbels, or more with his daughter.

As for the man, it is neuer required of him, nor standeth with their custome, to make any ioynter in recompence of the dowry. But in case he haue a child by his Wife, she enioyeth a third deale after his decease. If he haue two children by her, or more, shee is to haue a courttesie more, at the discretion of the husband. If the husband depart without issue by his wife, shee is returned home to her friends without any thing at all, saue onely her dowry: if the husband leaue so much behinde him in goods. When the agreement is made concerning the Dowry, they signe bonds one to the other, as well for the payment of the dowry, as the performing of the marriage by a certain day. If the woman were neuer married before, her father and friends are bound (besides) to assure her a maiden. Which breedeth many brabbels and quarrels at law, if the man take any conceit, concerning the behauiour and honesty of his wife.

Thus the contract being made, the parties begin to send Tokens the one to the other; the woman first, then afterward the man, but yet see not one another till the marriage be solemnized. On the eue before the marriage day, the bride is carried in a Collimago, or Coach, or in a sled (if it be Winter) to the bridegroomes house, with her marriage apparrell and bedstead with her, which they are to lye in. For this is euer provided by the bride, and is commonly very faire, with much cost bestowed vpon it. Heere shee is accompanied all that night by her mother, and other women: but not welcommed, nor once seene by the bridegroome himselfe.

When the time is come to haue the Marriage solemnized, the Bride hath vpon her a kinde of hood, made of fine knitworke or Lawne, that couereth her head, and all her bodie down to the middle. And so accompanied with hir friends and the bride-groome with his, they goe to Church all on horsebacke, though the Church bee neere hand, and themselves but of very meane degree.

The wordes of contract, and other ceremonies in solemnizing the marriage, are much after the order, and with the same words that are vsed with vs: with a ring also giuen to the Bride. Which being put on, & the wordes of contract pronounced: the Brides hand is deliuered into the hand of the Bridegroom, which standeth all this while on the one side of the Altar or Table, and the Bride on the other. So the marriage knot being knit by the Priest, the Bride commeth to the Bridegroom (standing at the end of the Altar or Table) and fallest downe at his feet, knocking her head vpon his shooe, in token of her subiection & obedience. And the Bridegroome againe caletteth the lappe of his Gowne or vpper garment, ouer the Bride, in token of his duty to protect and cherish her.

Then the Bridegroom and Bride, standing both together at the Tables end, cometh first the father, and the other friends of the Bride, and bow themselves downe low to the Bride-groome: and so likewise his friends bow themselves to the Bride, in token of affinity and loue, euer after, betwixt the two Kindreds. And withall, the father of the Bridegroom, offereth to the priest a loafe of bread; who deliuereth it straight againe to the father, and other friends of the Bride, with attestation before God and their Idols, that he deliuer the Dowry wholly and truly at the day appointed, and hold loue euer after, one Kindred with another. Whereupon they breake the loafe into peeces, and eate of it, to testifie their true and sincere meanings, for performing of that charge, and thenceforth to become as graines of one Leate, or men of one Table.

These Ceremonies being ended, the Bride-groome taketh the Bride by the hand, and so they goe on together, with their friends after them, towards the Church porch. Where meet them certaine with pots and cups in their hands, with Meade and Ruffe Wine. Whereof the Bride-groome taketh first a Charke, or little cuppe full in his hand, and drinketh to the Bride: who opening her hood or vaille belowe, and putting the Cup to her mouth vnderneath it (for being seene of the Bride-groome) pledgeth him againe.

Thus returning altogether from the Church, the Bride-groome goeth not home to his owne, but vnto his Fathers house, and the likewise to hers, where cyther entertaine their friends apart. At the entering into the house, they vse to sling Corne out of the windowes vpon the Bridegroom and Bride, in token of plenty and fruitfulnessse to be with them euer after.

When the Euening is come, the Bride is brought to the Bride-groomes Fathers house, and there lodgeth that night, with her vaille or couer still ouer her head. All that night, shee may not speak one word (for that charge shee receiue by tradition from her mother and other matrons her Friendes) that the Bride-groome must neither heare, nor see her, till the day after the marriage. Neither three dayes after, may she be heard to speake, saue certaine few words at the Table, in a set forme, with great manners and reuerence to the Bride-groome. If these be haue her selfe otherwise, it is a great prejudice to her credite and life euer after: and will highly bee disliked of the Bride-groome himselfe.

After the third day, they depart vnto their own house, and make a feast to both their friends together. The marriage day, and the whole time of their Festiual, the Bride-groome hath the honor to be called Moloday Knez, or young Duke, and the Bride Moloday Knezzy, or yong Dutchesse.

In liuing with their wiues, they shew themselves to be but of a barbarous condition: vsing them as seruantes rather then wiues. Except the Noble-women, which are, or seeme to bee of more estimation with their husbands, then the rest of meaner sort. They haue this fowle abuse, contrary to good order, and the word of God it selfe, that vpon dislike of his wife, or other cause whatsoever, the man may go into a Monastery, & sheare himselfe a Fryer, by pretence of deuotion, and so leaue his wife to thurst for her selfe so well as she can.

The other Ceremonies of their Church, are many in number: especially, the abuse about the signe of the Crosse, which they set vp in their high-ways, in the tops of their Churches, and in euery doore of their houses, signing themselves continually with it on their foreheades & breasts, with great deuotion, as they will seeme by their outward gesture and behauiour. Which were much lesse offence, if they gaue not withall, that Religious reuerence and worshippe vnto it, which is due vnto none but God onely, and vsed the dumbe shew and signing of it, instead of Thanksgiuing, and of all other duties which they doe owe vnto God.

When they rise euery day in the Morning, they goe commonlie in the sight of some Steeple, that hath a crosse made on the toppe of it: and so bowing themselves towards the crosse, they signe themselves withall on their foreheades and breasts. And this is their thankgiuing to God for their nights rest, without any word speaking, except peradventure they say, Alpody Pomelny, or, Lord haue mercy vpon vs.

Sitting downe to meate.

When they sit downe to meate, and rise againe from it, the thankgiuing to God, is the crossing of their fore-heads and breasts. Except it be some few that adde peradventure, a word or two of some ordinary prayer, impertinent to that purpose.

Oath for deciding contro- uersies.

When they are to giue an oath, for the deciding of any controuersie at law, they do it by swearing by the Crosse, and kissing the feete of it, making it as G O D, whose name onely is to be vsed in such triall of Iustice.

Entering in- to houses.

When they enter into any house (where euer there is an Idoll hanging on the wall) they signe themselves with the crosse, and bow themselves to it.

At beginning worke.

When they beginne any worke, be it little or much, they arme themselves first with the signe of the crosse. And this commonly is all their prayer vnto God, for good speede of their businesse. And thus they serue God with crosses, after a crosse and vaine manner: not vnderstanding what the Crosse of Christ is, nor the power of it. And yet they thinke all strangers Christians, to be no better then Turkes, in comparison of themselves (and so they will say) because they bow not themselves, when they meete with the Crosse, nor signe themselves with it, as the Russe manner is.

Holy water.

They haue holy water, in like vse and estimation as the Popish Church hath. But herein they exceed them, in that they doe not onely hallow their holy water stockes, and tubs full of water; but all the Riues of the Country once every year.

Hallowing of Riues.

At Mosko it is done with great pompe & solemnity: the Emperour himselfe being present at it, with all his Nobility, marching through the streets towards the Riuer of Moskua, in manner of procession, in this order as followeth. First goe two Deacons, with banners in their hands, the one of Precheisse (or our Lady) the other of S. Michael, fighting with his Dragon. Then follow after, the rest of the Deacons and the Priests of Mosko, two and two in a ranke, with coaps on their backs, and their Idols at their breasts, carried with girdles or slings, made fast about their necks. Next the Priests, come their Bishops in their pontificalibus: then the Fryars, Monks and Abbots: and after, the Patriarchs in very rich attire, with a ball, or sphere on the top of his myter, to signify his vniuersality ouer that Church. Last commeth the Emperour, with all his Nobility. The whole traine is of a mile long, or more.

Order obser- ued at the Riuer.

When they are come to the Riuer, a great hole is made in the yce, where the market is kept, of a rod and a halfe broad, with a stage round about it to keepe off the people. Then beginneth the Patriarch to say certaine prayers, and coniueth the diuell to come out of the water: and so casting in salt, and censing it with frankincense, maketh the whole Riuer to become holy water. The morning before, all the people of Mosko vse to make crosses of chawke ouer euery doore, & window of their houses: lest the diuell being coniuert out of the water, should flye in to their houses.

After the ce- remonies are ended.

When the ceremonies are ended, you shall see the black gard of the Emperours house, & then the rest of the Towne with their pails and buckets, to rake off the hallowed water for drinke, and other vses. You shall also see the women dippe in their children ouer head and eares, and many men and women leap into it, some naked, some with their clothes on, when some man would thinke his finger would freeze off, if hee should: but dippe it into the water. When the men haue doone, they bring their horses to the riuer, to drinke of the sanctified water; and so make them as holy as a horse. Their set day for this solemnne action of hallowing their riues, is that we call Twelfe day. The like is doone by other Bishops, in all parts of the Realme.

Horse drinke of the holy water on Twelfth day.

Their maner is also to giue it to their sicke, in their greatest extremitie; thin- king that it will eyther recouer them, or sanctifie them to God. Whereby they kill many, through their vnreasonable superstition, as did the Lord Borris his onely sonne, at my being at the Mosca: whom he killed (as was sayd by the Physicians) by powring into him colde holy water, and by presenting him naked into the Church, to their Saint Easileo, in the colde of the Winter, in an extremitie of sicknesse.

They

The Image of Christ in processions.

They haue an Image of Christ, which they call Neruchi, (which signifies as much as Made without hands) for so their priests (and superstition withall) perfwades them it was. This in their processions, they carry about with them on high vpon a pole, enclosed within a Pixe, made like a Lanthorne, and doe reuerence to it, as to a great myserie.

Brewing with holy water.

At euery brewing, their manner is like- wise, to bring a dish of their woort to the Priest, within the Church: which being hallowed by him, is poured into the brewing, and so giueth it such a vertue, as when they drinke of it, they are seldom so sober. The like they doe with the first fruites of their come in Haruest.

Palme Sundaye ceremonye by ancient tra- dition.

They haue an other ceremony vpon Palme Sundaye of ancient tradition: what time the Patriarch rideth through the Mosko, the Emperour himselfe holding his horse bridle, and the people crying, Hosanna, and spreading their vpper garments vnder his horse feete. The Emperour hath of the Patriarch for his good seruice of that day, 200. rubbles of stand- ing pension. Another Pageant they haue much like vnto this, the weeke before the Natiuitie of Christ. When euery Bishop in his Cathedral Church, setteth forth a shew of the three children in the Queen. Where the Angell is made to come fly- ing from the roofof the Church, with great admiration of the lookers on, and many terrible flashes of fire, are made with rozen, and gun-powder, by the Chaldeans (as they call them) that runne about the rowne all the Twelue dayes, disguised in their Players coats, and make much good sport for the honour of the Bishops Pa- geant. At the Mosca, the Emperour him- selfe, and the Empreffe neuer faile to be at it, although it be but the same matter played euery year, without any new in- uention at all.

Another ce- remony be- fore Christ- masse.

Besides their fasts on Wednesdayes, and Fridayes throughout the whole yere, (the one, because they say Christ was sold on the Wednesday, the other, because he suffered on the Friday) they haue foure great Fasts, or Lents euery year. The first, (which they call their great Lent) is at the same time with ours. The second, about Midsummer. The third, in Haruest time. The fourth, about Hallowntide: which they keepe not of pollicie, but of Fasts, beside foure seuerall Lents, and at what times they are.

meete superstitions.

In their great Lent, for the first weeke, they doe eate nothing but Bread and salt, and drinke nothing but water, neyther meddle with any matter of their vocati- on, but intend their shriuing and fasting only.

They haue also three Vigils or Wakes in their Lent, which they call Stokania, and the last Friday their great Vigd, as they do call it. What time the whole parish must be present in the Church, and watch from nine of the clocke in the Euening, vntill sixe in the Morning, all the while stand- ing, except when they do fall downe, and knocke their heads to their Idoles, which must be an hundred and seauentie times, iust, through the whole night.

About their burialls also, they haue many superstitions and prophane cere- monies: as putting within the finger of the corpses, a Letter to Saint Nicholas, whom they make their chiefe Mediator, and (as it were) the Porter of Hea- uen gates, as the Papists doe theyr Peter.

In Winter time, when all is covered with snow, and the ground so hard fro- zen, as that no spade, nor picke-axe can enter; their manner is not to bury their dead, but to keepe the bodies (so many as die all the Winter time) in an house, in the suburbs, or out-parts of the towne, which they call Bolsedom, that is to say, Gods house: where the dead bodies are piled vp together, like billets on a wood- stacke, as hard, with the frost, as a verie stone, till the Spring-tide come and dis- solveth the frost; what time euery man ta- keth his dead friend, and committeth him to the ground.

They haue besides, their yeares and moneths mindes, for their friends depar- ted. What time they haue prayers laide ouer the graue by the priest; who hath a penny ordinary for his paines. When a ny dyeth, they haue ordinarie women mourners, that come to lament for the dead party: and stand howling ouer the body, after a prophane, and heathenish manner (sometimes in the house, some- times bringing the body into the backe- side: Asking him what he wanted, and what he meant to die?) They bury theyr dead, as the party vsed to goe, with coate, hose, bootes, hatte, and the rest of his appar- rel.

Vigils or Wakes they haue three.

Burialls, and their superstitious cere- monies at them.

No buriall in the winter.

Buriall accord- ing as they were liuing.

Many

Many other vaine and superstitious ceremonies they haue, which were long and tedious to report. By these it may appeare, how farre they are fallen from the true knowledge and practise of Christian Religion: hauing changed the Word of God, for their vaine traditions, and brought all to externall, and ridiculous ceremonies, without any regard of spirite and truth, which God requires in his true worship.

CHAP. V.

Lastly, an Oeconomical discourse of the Emperours Court; his Familie and Household affaires: And more priuate behaviour of the people.

Of the Emperours domestike or priuate behaviour.

The Emperours ghostly father

His priuate praier, and the manner how it is performed in ceremonies

He Emperours priuate behaviour, so much as may be, or is meete to be knowen, is after this manner: Hee riseth commonly about foure of the clocke in the morning. After his apparelling and washing, in cometh his ghostly father, or priest of his chamber, which is named in their tongue, Oretz Duhoona, with his Crosse in his hand, wherewith he blesteth him, laying it first on his fore-head, then vpon his cheekes, or sides of his face, and then offreth him the end of it to kisse. This being doone, the clauke of the crosse (called Chresby Deyack Propery) bringeth into his chamber a paynted Image, representing the Saint for that day. For euery day with them hath his seuerall Saint, as it were a patron for that day. This he placeth among the rest of his Image gods, wherewithall his Chamber is decked, as thicke almost as the wall can beare, with Lampes and wax Candles burning before them. They are very costly and gorgeously decked with pearles and precious stones. This Image being placed before him, the Emperour begins to crosse himselfe after the Russe manner; first on the fore-head, then on both sides of his breast, with Ajbody Pameluy, Pameluy mena hospody, sacroy mena grefnick Syhodesius: which is as much to say, as, Helpe mee O Lord my God, Lord comfort mee, defend and keepe mee a sinner from doing euill, &c. This he directeth towards the Image or Saint for that day, whom he nameth in his prayer, together with our Lady (whom they call Precheste) Saint Nicholas, or some other, to whom he beareth most deuotion, bowing himselfe prostrate vnto them, with knocking his head to the very ground. Thus he continueth the space of a quarter of an houre or thereabouts.

Then cometh againe the ghostly father, or chamber priest, with a silver boile full of holywater, which they call in Russe, Sveta Voda, and a sprinkle of Basill (as they call it) in his hand, and so all to be sprinkled first the Image gods, and then the Emperour. This holy water is brought fresh euery day from the Monasteries, farre and neere, sent vnto the Emperour from the Abbot or from the Priour, in the name of the Saint, which is patrone of that Monastery, as a speciall token of good will from him.

These deuotions being ended, he sendeth in to the Emperesse, to aske whether she hath rested in heath, &c. And after a little pause, goeth himselfe to salute her in a middle roome betwixt both their chambers. The Emperesse lyeth apart from him, and keepeth not one Chamber, nor Table with the Emperour daily, saue vpon the eue of their Lents, or commo Fasts: what time she is his ordinary guest at bed and board. After their meeting in the morning, they go together to their priuate Church or Chappell, where is saide, or sung a morning Seruice (called Zaurana) of an houre long or thereabouts. From the Church he returneth home, & stretch him downe in a great Chamber, to be seene and saluted by his Nobility, such as are in fauour about the Court. If he haue to say to any of the, or they to him, then is the time. And this is ordinary, except his health, or some other occasion alter the custome.

About vaine in the morning, he goeth vnto another Church within his Caste: where is sung by Priests and Choristers, the high Seruice (called Obedina or Complin) which commonly lasteth the space of two houres: the Emperour in the meantime, talking commonly with some of his Councell, Nobilitie, or Captains, whi: h haue to say to him, or hee to them. And the Councell likewise conferre together among themselves, as if they were in their councell house. This ended, he returneth home, and recreateth himselfe till it be dinner time.

Hee is serued at his Table on this manner; First, euery dish (as it is deliuered at the Dresser) is tasted by the Cooke, in the presence of his high Steward, or his Deputy. And so is receiued by the Gentlemen waiters (called Shilshy) and by them carried vp to the Emperours Table, the high Steward going before. There it is receiued by the Sewer (called Erafinoy) who giueth a taste of euery dish vnto the Taster, and so placeth it before the Emperour. The number of his dishes for his ordinary seruice, is about seauentie; dressed somewhat grossely, with much garlike and salt, much after the Dutch manner. When he exceedeth, vpon some occasion of the day, or entertainment of some Ambassador, he hath many more dishes. The seruice is sent vp by two dishes at a time, or three at the most, that hee may eate it warme: first the baked, then the rostie meates, and last of all, the brothes. In his dining Chamber is another Table: where sit the chiefe of his Nobility that are about his Court, and his ghostly father, or Chaplaine. On the one side of the Chamber standeth a Cubbard, or Table of Plate, very fayre and rich, with a great cesteine of Copper by it, full of yce and snow, wherein stand the pots that serue for that meale. The taster holdeth the cup that he drinketh in all dinner time, and deliuereth it vnto him with a say, when he calleth for it. The manner is to make many dishes out of the seruice, after it is set on the Table, and to send them to such Noblemen and Officers, as the Emperour liketh best. And this is counted a great fauour and honour.

His sleeping after dinner.

His euening recreation, or betweene meales.

After dinner, he layeth him downe to rest, where commonly hee taketh three houres sleepe, vntill hee doe employ one of the houres to bathing or boxing. And this custome for sleeping after dinner, is an ordinary matter with him, as with all the Russes. After his sleepe he goeth to Euenlong (called by them Vechna:) and thence returning (for the most part) recreateth himselfe with the Emperesse till supper time, with iesters, and dwarfes, men and women, that doe tumble before him, and sing many songs after the Russe manner. This is his common and vniuersall forme of recreation betweene his meales, wherein he most delighteth.

One other speciall recreation, is the fight with wilde Beares, which are caught in pittes, or nets, and are kept in barred Cages for that purpose, against the Emperour bee disposed to see the pastime. The fight with the Beare is on this sort: The man is turned into a circle walled round about, where hee is to quire himselfe so well as hee can; for there is no way to flee out. When the Beare is turned loose, he cometh vpon him with open mouth. If at the first push hee misse his ayme, so that the Beare doe come within him, he is in great danger. But the wilde Beare being very fierce, hath this quality, that giueth aduantage to the Hunter. His manner is, when he assaileth a man, to rise vp right on his two hinder legges, and so to come roaring with open mouth vpon him. And if the Hunter then can push right into the very breast of him betweene his fore-legges (as commonly he will not misse) telling the other end of the Boare-speare at the side of his foot: and so keeping the pike still towards the face of the Beare, hee speedeth him commonly at one blowe.

Fight with Beares, by men put to them.

The manner to kill the Beare.

But many times these Hunters come short, and are eyther slaine, or miserably torne with the teeth and talents of the fierce beast. If the party quiret himselfe well in this fight with the Beare, he is carried to drinke at the Emperours Seller doore, where he drinketh himselfe drunke for the honour of Hopodare. And this is his reward, for aduenturing his life for the Emperours pleasure.

To maintaine this pastime, the Emperour hath certaine Huntsmen, that are appointed for that purpose, to take the wilde Beare. This is his recreation commonly on the Holy-daies. Sometimes he spendeth his time in looking vpon his Goldsmiths and Jewellers, Taylors, Embroyderers, Painters, and such like, and so goeth to his supper. When it draweth towards bed time, his Priest saith certaine prayers; and then the Emperour blesteth and crosseth himselfe, as in the morning, for a quarter of an houre or thereabouts, and so goeth to his bed.

The Emperor that now is (called Theodore Iusnowich) is for his person of a mean stature, somewhat lowe and grosse, of a fallow completion, and enclining to the droopie, hawk nosed, vnsteady in his pace, by reason of some weaknesse of his limbs, heauy and vnactive, yet commonly smiling almost to a laughter. For quality otherwise, simple and slowe witted, but very gentle, and of an easie nature, quiet, mercifull, of no martiall disposition, nor greatly apt for matter of pollicy, very superstitious, and infinite that way. Besides his priuate deuotions at home, hee goeth euery weeke commonly on pilgrimage to some Monastery, or other that is nearest hand. He is of 34. yeares old, or thereabouts, and hath reigned almost the space of fixe yeares.

Of the Emper-
ors priuate,
or household
Officers, Master of the Horle,

The chiefe Officers of the Emperors household, are these which follow. The first is the Office of the Boisren Confeſſors, or Master of the Horle. Which containeth no more then is expressed by the name, that is, to be Ouerseer of the horle, and not Magister equitum, or Master of the horsemen. For hee appointeth other for that seruice, as occasion doth require (as before was said.) He that beareth that Office at this time, is Boris Federowich Godonoe, Brother to the Emperresse. Of Horle for seruice in his wars (besides other for his ordinary vses) hee hath to the number of ten thousand, which are kept about Mosko.

The next is the Lord Steward of his household, at this time, one Gregory Vasilowich Godonoe.

The third is his Treasurer, that keepeth all his monies, jewels, plate, &c. now called Stepan Vasilowich Godonoe.

The fourth his Controller, now Andreas Petrovich Clesimine.

The fifth his Chamberlaine. He that attendeth that Office at this time, is called Eikema Bisabroza Pafelinschay.

The sixth his Tasters, now Theodore Alexandrowich, and Iuan Vasilowich Godonoe.

The seuenth his Harbengers, which are three Noblemen, and diuers other Gentlemen that do the Office vnder the. These are his ordinary Officers, and Offices of the chiefeit account.

Of Gentlemen beside that waite about his Chamber and Person (called Shifley Strapley) there are two hundred, all Noblemens sonnes.

His ordinary Guard is 2000. Hagbutters, ready with their pieces charged; and their march lighted, with other necessary Furniture continually day & night: which comenot within the house, but waite without in the court or yard, where the Emperour is abiding. In the night time, there lodgeth next to his bedchamber, the chiefe Chamberlaine, with one or two more of best trust about him.

A second chamber off, there lodge fixe other of like account, for their trust and faithfulness.

In the third Chamber lie certaine yong Gentlemen, of the two hundred, called Shifley Strapley, that take their turnes by forties euery night.

There are Groomes besides, that watch in their course, and lye at euery gate and doore of the Court, called Eshoppick.

The Hagbutters or Gunners, whereof there are two thousand (as was saide before) watch about the Emperors lodgings, or bed-chamber by course two hundred and fifty euery night, and two hundred and fifty more in the Court yard, & about the Treasure house.

His Court or House at the Mosko, is made Castle-wise, walled about with great store of faire Ordenance planted vpon the Wall, and containeth a great breadth of ground within it, with many dwelling houses. Which are appointed for such as are knownne to be sure and trusty to the Emperour.

The priuate behaviour and qualitie of the Russe people, may partly bee vnderstoode, by that which hath bene sayde concerning the publique state and viage of the Countrey. As touching the naturall habite of their bodies, they are, for the most part, of a large life, and of verie fleshy bodies; accounting it a grace to be somewhat grosse and burley, and therefore they nourish and spread their beards, to haue them long and broad. But, for the most part, they are very vnwieldy and vnactive withall. Which may be thought to come, partly of the Climate, and the numbnesse which they get by the colde in winter, and partly of their dyet, which is most of rootes, onions, garlike, cabbage, and and such like things that breed grosse humours, which they vse to eate alone, and with their other meates.

Their dyet is rather much then curious. At their meales they beginne commonly with a Chark, or small cuppe of Aqua vita, (which they do call Russe wine) and then drinke not till towards the end of their meales, taking it in largely, and all together, with kissing one another, at euery pledge. And therefore, after dinner there is no talking with them, but euery man goeth to his bench to take his after-noones sleepe, which is as ordinary with them as their nights rest. When they exceed, and haue varietie of dithes, the first are their baked meates (forrosse meates they vse little) and then their portage and broaths. To drinke drunke, is an ordinary matter with them euery day in the week. Their common drinke is Mead, the poorer sort vse water, and thin drinke called Quasse, which is nothing else (as wee vse to say) but water turned out of his wittes, with a little branne meathed with it.

This dyet would breede in them many diseases, but that they vse bath-stoues, or hot-houses, in stead of all physicke, commonly twice or thrice euery weeke. All the Winter time, and almost the whole Summer, they heate there Peaches, which are made like the Germane Bathstoues, & their Potlads like Ovens, that so warme the house, that a stranger at the first shall hardly like of it. These two extremities, specially in the Winter of heate within their houses, and of extreme colde without, together with their dyet; maketh them of a darke and fallow complexion, their skinnies beeing tanned and parched both with cold and with heate: specially the women, that (for the greater part) are of faire worse complexions, then the men. Whereof the cause I take to be their keeping within the hot-houses, and busying themselves about the heating & vsing of their bathstoues, and peaches.

The Russe, because that he is vsed to both these extremities of heate and of colde, can beare them both a great deale more patiently, then strangers can doe. You shall see them sometimes (to season their bodies) come out of their Bathstoues all on a froth, and fuming as hot almost as a Pig at a Spit, and presently to leape into the Riner starke naked, or to poure colde water all ouer their bodies, and that in the coldest of all the Winter time. The women, to mend the bad hue of their skins, vse to paint their faces with white and red colours, so vifibly, that euery man may perceiue it. Which is made no matter, because it is common, and liked well by their husbands: who make their Wives and Daughters ordinary allowance, to buy them colours to paint their faces withall, and delight themselves much, to see them of fowle women, to become such faire Images. This parcheth the skinnie, and helpeth to deforme them when their painting is off.

They apparell themselves after the Greeke manner. The Noblemans attire is on this fashion.

First a Tyffia, or little night-cappe on his head, that couereth little more then his crowne, commonly very rich, wrought of silke and gold thred, and set with pearle and precious stones. His head he keepeth shauen close to the very skin, except he be in some displeasure with the Emperour. Then hee suffereth his hayre to grow and hang downe vpon his shoulders, couering his face as vgly and deformedly as he can.

Ouer the Tyffia, hee weareth a wide Cap of blacke Foxe (which they account for the best Fur) with a Tiara or long bonnet put within it, standing vp like a Persian or Babylonian Hat.

About his necke (which is seene all bare) is a collar set with pearle and precious stones, about three or foure fingers broad.

Next ouer his shirt (which is curiously wrought, because he strippeth himselfe into it in the Summer time, while he is in the house) is a Shepan, or light Garment of silke, made downe to the knees, buttoned before: and then a Caslan or a close coate buttoned, & girt to him with a Persian girdle, whereat hee hangs his kniues and spoone. This commonly is of cloth of gold, and hangeth downe as low as his anckles.

Ouer that he weareth a loose garment of some rich silke, furred and faced about with some gold Lace, called a Ferris.

Another ouer that, of Chamlet, or like stuffe, called an Alkaken, sleeued and hanging lowe, and the cape commonly brooched brooched and set all with pearle.

When he goeth abroad, he casteth ouer at these, which are but sleight (though they seeme to be many) another garment called an Honoratkey, like to the Alksben, faue that it is made without a collar for the necke. And this is commonly of fine cloth, or Camells haire.

His buskins, which he weareth in stead of hose, with linnen folds vnder them in stead of boot-hose, are made of a Persian leather called Saphian, embroidered with pearle. His vpper stockes commonly are of cloth of gold.

When he goeth abroad, hee mounteth on horse backe, although it be but to goe to the next doore; which is the custome and maner also of the Boiarskey, or gentlemen.

The Boiarskey or gentlemen attire is of the same fashion, but differe in stufte; and yet he will haue his Caslan or vnder-coate sometimes of cloth of golde, the rest of cloth or silke.

The Noble woman (called Chyna Boiarskema) weareth on her head, first a hall of some soft silke (which commonly is red) and ouer it a frontlet, called Obroja of white colour.

ouer that, her Cap (made after the coife fashion of cloath of golde) called Shapka Zempka, edged with some rich furre, and set with pearles and stones. Though they haue of late begunne to disdain embroidering with pearles about their caps, because the Diacks, and some Merchants wiues haue taken vpe the fashion.

In their eares they wear eare-rings (which they call Sargee) of two inches or more in compasse, the matter of golde set with Rubies, or Saphires, or some like pretious stone.

In Sommer they goe often with kerchiefs of fine white layne or Cambricke, fastened vnder the chinne, with two long tasselles pendent. The kerchiefe spotted and set thicke with rich pearle.

When they ride or goe abroad in rainy weather, they vse to wear white hats with coloured bands, called by them Scapa Zemskey.

About their neckes they wear collers of three or foure fingers broad, set with rich pearle and pretious stones.

Their vpper garment is a loose gowne

(called Opephen) commonly of Skarlet, with wide loose sleeves, hanging downe to the ground, buttoned before with great gold buttons, or at the least, siluer and gilt, nigh as bigge as a walnut. Which hath hanging ouer it fastened vnder the cappe, a large broad cape of some rich Furre, that hangeth downe almost to the middes of their backs.

Next vnder the Opephen or vpper garment, they wear another, called a Leitnick, that is made close before with great wide sleeves, the cufte or halfe sleue vp to the elbowes commonly of cloath of golde: and vnder that a Ferris Zemsky, which hangeth loose buttoned throughout to the very loote.

On the hand-wreasts they wear very faire Bracelets, about two fingers broad of pearles and precious stones. They goe all in Buskins of white, yellow, blew, or some other coloured leather, embroidered with pearle. This is the attire of the Noble woman of Russia, when she maketh the best shew of her selfe. The gentlewoman's apparell may differ in the stufte, but is all one for the making or fashion.

As for the poore Mousick, and his wife, they goe poorly clad. The man with his Odnoratkey, or loose gowne to the small of the legges, tied together with a lace before, of course white or blew cloth, with some Shube or long waist-coate of Furre, or of sheepe-skinne vnder it, and his furred cappe, and buskins.

The poorer sort of them haue their Odnoratkey, or vpper garment, made of Cowes haire. This is their winter habite. In the sommer time, commonly they doe wear nothing but their shirts vpon their backs, and buskins on their legges.

The woman goeth in a redde or blew gowne, when she maketh the best shew, and with some warme Shube of Furre vnder it in the winter time. But in the sommer, nothing but her two thirts (for so do they call them) one ouer the other, whether they be within doores, or without.

On their heads, they wear caps of some colored stufte, many of veluet, or of cloth of gold; but for the most part, kerchiefs. Without eare-rings of siluer, or some other metall, and her crosse about her necke, you shall see no Russian woman, be she wife, or maide.

Their wits and capacities.

As touching their behaviour, and quality otherwise, they are of reasonable capacities, if they had those meanes that some other Nations haue, to traine vp their wits in good nurture and learning. Which they might borrow of the Polonians, and other their neighbors: but that they refuse it of a very selfe pride, as accounting their owne fashion to be farre the best. Partly also (as I sayd before) for that their manner of bringing vp (voyd of all good learning, and ciuill behaviour) is thought (by their governors) most agreeable to that State, and their maner of gouernement. Which the people would hardly beare, if they were once ciuilled, and brought to more vnderstanding of God, and good policie.

This causeth the Emperours to keepe out all meanes of making it better, and to be very wary for excluding of all peregrinitie, that might alter their fashions. Which were lesse to be disliked, if it set not a print into the very mindes of his people. For, as themselves are very hardly and cruelly dealt withall by their chiefe Magistrates, and other superiours; so are they as cruell one against another, especially ouer their inferiours, and such as are vnder them. So that the basest and wretchedest Christian (as they call him) that stoupe and croucheth like a dogge to the Gentleman, and licketh vp the dust that lieth at his fecte, is an intollerable tyrant, where he hath the aduantage.

Cruelty of the Russe people.

By this meanes the whole Countrie is filled with rapine, and murder. They doe make no account of the life of a man. Yee shall haue a man robbed sometime in the very streets of their Townes, if hee goe late in the evening: and yet no man to come forth out of his doores to rescue him, though he heare him cry out. I will not speake of the strangeness of the murders, and other cruelties committed amongst them, that would scarcely be beleued to be doone amongst men, especially such as professe themselves to be Christians.

Vagrant begging poore.

The number of their vagrant and begging poore is almost infinite; that are so pinched with famine and extreme neede, as that they doe begge after a violent and desperate manner; with, Giue me, and cut mee; Giue mee, and kill mee; and such like phrales. Whereby it may be ghesied, what they are towards strangers, that are so vnnatural and cruell towards their owne. And yet it may be doubted whether is the greater, the crueltie, or intemperancie that is vsed in that Countrie. I will not speake of it, because it is so foule and not to be named. The whole Countrie ouerfloweth with all sinne of that kinde. And no maruell, as hauing no law to restraine whoredomes, adulteries, and like vnclannesse of life.

Intemperance

As for the truth of his word, the Russe (for the most part) maketh small regard of it: so he may gaine by a lie, and breach of his promise. And it may be said truly (as they know best that haue traded most with them) that from the great to the small (except some few that will scarcely be found) the Russe neyther beleueth any thing that another man speaketh, nor speaketh any thing himselfe worthy to be beleued.

No care of word or promise.

These qualities make them very odious to all their neighbours, especially to the Tartars, that account themselves to be honest and iust, in comparison of the Russe. It is supposed by some, that doe well consider of the state of both Countreies, that the offence they doe take at the Russe gouernement, and their manner of behaviour; hath bene a great cause to keepe the Tartar still heathenish, and to mislike (as hee dooth) of the Christian profession.

The Russe odious to his neighbours.

ridiculous (although it bee maintayned in vulgar opinion) that venoms or poysons should be limited to a certaine time, by empoysoners. For, how can it be so, seeing Physicall medicines, euen such as are most profitable, whose vertue (in knowledge thereof, is limited to the composition and quantitie of the dose) cannot be apprehended, but by long and frequent experience? And that being knowne, doth not yet leaue vs any certaine act, but conjectural: wherefore, I cannot see by what reason, an empoysoner should gaine a prefixion of time, for the efficacie of his poyson. For, it is not lawfull to make triall, without danger, nor without punishment: euen as if the action of Physicall receipts, should be experimented vpon healthfull persons.

Triall of poysons made on Dogs, Hogs,
Birds, &c.

It may be alledged, and I am of the same opinion too, that they approue their poysons vpon beasts, as Dogges, Swine and Birds, and that thereby they constitute rules to themselves; hauing obserued diuers times of death, according to the nature of the poysons. As if the natures of men, (being the most temperate of all creatures) and the other were not verie farre different. Besides, it is much more easie, that a precise and certaine houre of euent and successe, should happen vnto beasts, then to men. For, creatures deprived of reason, haue very little diuersitie (in their kinde) betwene them, feeding on one and the same pasturage, and being not addicted to sundry studies, and occupations: from whence enlieth, that euen by and of the same things, beasts endure (almost) passions alike.

sity betwene

But for men, although they agree together in kinde, yet notwithstanding they are so different, as seldom or neuer, shall we find two together of like nature in face: but are diuerse in complexions, conditions and occupations or professions, and no one like other among a thousand. Vndoubtedly, I am of the minde, that in the kinde of man, there is as many differences among particulars, as there is diuersities of kinde among all other creatures. And therefore, it ought to be helde altogether abusive, and noway firme, and such conjecture of empoysoners; as is very easie to be proued, and made plaine to euery vnderstanding: and vpon this hopefull perswasion, wee will fall presently to our business.

Many haue thought and held, that Theophrastus (a very graue and approued Philosopher) was the Author of this opinion, because he wrote thus of Aconitum. It is said to be compounded in such sort, that it can kill at a certaintime: as namely, within two monthes, three monthes, sixe monthes, a whole yeare, and sometimes in two yeares. And some affirme, that such people shall die more miserably, then if they could haue refused longer time. For their bodies will inuapure by little and little, perishing in a daily languishing: where as such as die suddenly, haue the more easie death.

Theophrastus
a learned Philosopher, his opinion of Aconitum.

But the authoritie of Theophrastus, or of our selves, can moue nothing in this matter; considering, that he wrote this, more vpon others opinion, then his own, as the words themselves doe euidently testifie. And if any one desire to know the cause of this periwation, hee shall meete with a two-folde answer thereto. The first is, the subtle crastinesse of men, who flatter and fondly play with their owne vices. For how many may be found, that can not so patiently endure, when they are reprobued in some euill, happening by an exterrall accident; as if one should tell them, that it receiued originall by a bad temperature of their body, or of their owne intemperance? For, admit that nothing could be faide, to be the cause of the first constitution, and therefore (by consequent) the reproofe of this imperfection concerned him nothing: yet notwithstanding, because it is our owne nature, we will conceale and couer it, yea, and fauour it beyond measure. So that if there happen any fault on the behalfe of our imperfection, we stand most in feare to be thereof reprobued. And hence it enlieth, that we more gladly yeelde agreement, to haue the cause from some exterrall occasion, then of any interior.

dited in this case.

Examples in this case are very manifest, euen in such as haue least knowledge, being ignorant in good Arts and Sciences, transported by simple iudgement of weakeloue. As aged, and the most part of weakewitted people doe, to whom nothing admissible can be spoken; yneffe it be referred to some Saint, or poyson closely giuen, or to the witching lookes of some old woman: whence proceeded the complaint whereof Virgill speaketh.

For there mult needes be probable lying, that either instantly, or soone after the poyson is giuen, or continued in the surest manner; if any length or respite of time can be giuen thereto.

The second answer and elucidation of the second
case.

The other cause of this opinion, is the depraued interpretation of Astronomical Theoremes or Speculations. For the prooffe whereof, Astrologers constitute (which is true) the diuers manners or passions of inferior bodies, to be from the diuers coniunction, opposition and interchanged aspect of the superiour. From hence, the ignorant vulgar take occasion, to ground and establish the varietie of effects, euen vpon the least differences that can be obserued in the celestiall bodies. As when they constitute some one plant, to haue power and efficacie against feaues; provided, that it be gathered before Sunne rising. This is an error spread too farre abroad. For, not onely from these differences (triuiall, light, and of no account at all) men commonly construct the diuersitie of effects in their kinds: but also would haue the accidents of those effects to be diuers, for the selfe same reason; euen as is the time to manifest the efficacie of poyson. The folly (in this point) further related by Theophrastus, he sayth: That death happeneth in as short a time, as a Plant is to be gathered. Let vs seeke then for a true solution of this Probleme, by reason rather then the testimonies of any. Which we may most commodiously doe (if I abuse not mine owne iudgement) by beginning with the definition of venome or poison; to the end it may be the easier vnderstood, what the matter is that vttereth our instant disputation.

A definition of poison or venome, and what it is vtterhood to be

The operation of poyson
in their owne
nature.

We properly call venome or poyson, whatsoever being receiued into the body, doth so fight against the body, as it is not to be surmounted; but contrariwise, doth so alter the body, as the body it selfe alters in diuer. In all venoms there are two especiall differences: for, eyther they are enemies to humane nature, by reason of their manifest qualitie; or else they are aduerses thereto in their whole substance. Moreouer, some may kill quickly, others more tardily, euen of their owne proper nature. Such kill suddenly, and in fewest daies and houres, which are immediately carried to the profunditie of the harte. Such venoms are extremely hot, and (for the most part) corrosiue or putrefactive; the Greeks call them Sepiuiques, endued with most subtile parts. For, colde and grosse venomes are more ydle, and insinuate into the veines and arteries more slowly.

Some there are, which infect and kill the body, by their onely vapour or insubtile exhalation. Others, that holde the prime place of atrocitie and malignitie. As certaine poisons artificiall, which haue so subtile a vertue, as being but rubbed or annointed vpon the stirups, will pierce throw the booties of the Rider, euen till it attaine to the naked soale of his foote, and from thence ascendeth vp into the body, by the fourspirales or ouertures of the skinnie, and so corrupt all the members. Bridles and Saddles of horse may also be infected, and afterwards, inducted by natural heat into the arteries and veins of the rider entering by the pores in his hands and thighes. As in like manner, Garments, Beds and Coverings may be poysoned. To these venoms may be referred, such as kill only by sight, smell, or being but tasted onely (without swallowing or letting downe) suddenly destroying a man, without any the least lingering.

Of some that destroy soone
then other.

Poysoning
men, stirups, bridles & saddles for horses, garments,
beds, &c.

All venomes or poysons bring present death with them, so as there remains not any time of respite, for succor to save the poore mans life, but he dies. I vnderstand, that such poysons are in frequent vse among the Turkes, and such other nations. Groffer venoms or poisons do differ from these, as being slower in performing their action; but in the end burne very strongly, bite, eat, torment, & (by their lingering) beget the greater strength & cruel violence.

Now there is not onely a difference of efficacie, in poisons of diuers kinds, but also there happens to them as great a varietie of respites, to hurt according to their constitution and temperature, by whom they are taken. For some feeble the harme sooner or later then other; some are overthrowne thereby, others escape. Because many times it comes so to passe, that the poisons power is mitigated & overcome, by the very complexio of him that hath receiued it, else, that it is so strong of it selfe, as it needeth no other counterpoyson to vanquish it. So falleth it out with them that dwell in pestilent aires, & others that talie made by

are attained with the plague: some of them being sicke, chance to die suddenly, others later, and other (in the end) escape.

If it be so, it seemes then altogether ridiculous to affirme, that it is possible to give a poyson, which (at a day prefixed, & at a certaine time of that day) shall cause the parties death, & that the condition of the poyson is so to doe. To which error I may well referre another, fauouring of the same taste, and which we have long since ouerthrowne, to wit: That medicines take the beginning of their mutation or changing from our heate. Whence it ensueth, that being grossely pressed, they produce their effects the later. But if I should consent to them herein, yet notwithstanding, they can neuer come to approve their affirmation, vnlesse it be captiously. For if any man argue thus: This drugged discovereth his power later then this; therefore he will doe it at a certaine time. The argumentation is false, and Aristotle calleth it Elenchus non consequens: Euen as if a man should say, A Goate is a Beast, therefore a Goate is an Asse. For, To do a thing late, and to do a thing at a certaine time, are of diuers kindes, and differ from doing a thing in some time.

Heereby it appeareth, that these great Professours haue no other eye, but onelie on the conditions of the poysons, as in this poynt it is very euident, for we heare no distinction of bodies: but onely pretence of the poyson, whereunto they onely attribute the limitation of time, and not to any complexion in the parties. Obseruation hath bene made, that poyson hath bene giuen at a Feast or Banquet to diuers persons, all in one houre, (when friends haue merrily met together, without suspicion of any such villanie) whereof some dyed suddenly, others died within some few dayes after, and some felt no anguish at all, yet every one received a like quantitie.

The like we see to happen daily in purgative medicines, which being giuen to diuers persons (euen all alike in measure, and all alike in preparation) they worke vpon some bodies very suddenly, others more slowly, others very hardly, and vpon some nothing at all. Moreover, the vacuities of some men is with much ease, others with great difficultie, grievously grinding or cutting, and frequent debility of the heart. What need is there then of alleading many men, when vpon one and the same man, one and the same medicine cannot produce the same effects?

Seeing then, that according to the diuers and vnparallelled complexion, & conformation of the body, we see such things to happen, for the most part; and besides, that the iust temperature of euery particular man is no way to be comprehended: how then shall any one man dare to say, how long time naturall heate shall resist or withstand poyson? Say I admitted, that some one man should be so expert an empoysoner, that he could weigh (in a certainty of iudgement) the power of his poyson, euen as exquisitely as he weigheth muske in the Ballance: yet notwithstanding, I will neuer graunt, that he can as exactly limite poyson, for the nature of him that is to receiue it: but he will faile somewhat of the end, or of the time by him propoosed. For, Physicke it selfe is held to be a Science, grounded but vpon coniectures, concerning what is to be prescribed for euery man, in the proper quantitie and qualitie of meetest remedies. For, no man knoweth how to write or speake iustly or properly, as Galen saith in the third book of his Methods. And alittle after: In the Arte of Physicke (saith he) there is no writing or remedie, but may bee named in his kinde: but that which cannot be spoken, written, nor entirely appointed or ordained, is the quantitie for euery one.

Hee repeateth this same matter many times, and to the purpose ensuing, as enstrueting, that euery man hath his peculiar curing, and that the naturall propriety is vnspokeable and incomprehensible of an exact Science. Vulgar Physicians call it Idiosyncrasis, the naturall propriety, as Galen saith. And because all confesse, that it cannot be comprehended; they attribute the true Art of Physicke to Aesculapius & Apollo. For the principle, and foundation (as it were) of perfect, compleate, & infallible Physicke (which Galen calls; The true Arte of Medicine) is the particular knowledge of Naturals. Wherupon he makes this addition. If I knew how to acknowledge iustly, the nature of each one in particular: I should verily thinke to be such a one as Aesculapius, and to know as much in my understanding. But because it is not to be doone, I am determined to exercise my selfe

The complexion and temperature of all men is incomprehensible, neither can poysons worke in one and the same manner vpon them.

Physicke a Science grounded but on coniecture.

Galen in lib. vi. super pta.

so much, to come so neere him as a man may, and to exhort others therein to follow mine example.

If Physicke then be coniectural, and not certaine in the party that prepareth or appointeth remedies to euery body, & the issue is not to be seene, but finally by a long obseruation and experience; who can perswade himselfe herein concerning poysons? For, if in the Art of physicke, Experience is dangerous, as the wise & learned Hippocrates well aduise vs: it is easie to conceiue, how vnertain the prooue of poysons are, because it is not lawfull to experiment their vertue, both without danger and punishment also, as whole medicines in diuersitie of persons.

And whatsoeuer hath bin obserued vpon brute Beasts, as I formerly saide, is very vnapt for any accommodation to a man, because the natures of men and beasts are greatly differing, as namely by this prooue: that Stares feede safely vpon Hemlocke, and Quales on Helleborus, which are both physicke and poyson to vs. From these reasons then we may collect finally, that the Arte (if it may be termed an Arte) or coniectures of empoysoners, is to be esteemed very erroneous, and of slender firmnes: considering, that one selfe same poyson, produceth his action, sometimes quickly, and sometimes slackly; and that not so much by any reason in it selfe; as by the nature and complexion of the body, widenesse or narrownesse of the passages, strength or weaknesse of naturall heate; and the plenty or scarcity of semblable excrements, & diuers other meanes.

For the power of poyson remaineth sometimes vaine and fruitlesse, or mightily rebated, according to such bodies, as haue their faculties of the soule stout and strong, by reason of an excellent good temperature. And Galen thinketh, that the building and composition of the body, is the cause why Hemlocke killeth a man, & nourisheth Stares. Whereto he addeth, the strength and vigour of heate, diminishing and subtilizing, in regard he is perswaded that it happeneth so, that colde poysons better and sooner doe declare their force, when they are giuen to hotte natures. Which may appeare a Paradoxe to many: but hauing bin made most euidently apparant by the said author, I dare let the prooue passe vpon my credite, because his experience is warrantable.

As for the nature of excrements, they weaken the actions of poysons, being repugnant to their qualities. For if there be any abundance of phlegme in the entrails, the power of hot poyson will be greatly rebated: and on the contrary, hot moysture hasteneth the action of such a poyson. Likewise, ouer-copious chollier stoppeth and breaketh the stupefactive venome receiued, whereas phlegme fauoreth it. And all that these wicked empoysoners do know, is nothing else, but what poysons onely kill, by euident condition of their qualities, and that they hurt with all their subtilance. Such are they as kill by corrupting or corrosion, which must haue time to enforce their mallice (as Galen saith) whereas other do weaken themselves by their tardying. For they do all putrifie in time, & so much the more, as the place is moister and hotter.

Such then as worke by putrifying, time doth augment their action: because they encrease the corruption, and in regard they cease not to corrupt themselves; reciprocally they corrupt and rot the body. From whence ensueth, that death is caused long time after: especially such poysons as are of grosse and earthy subtilance. Thus you may see, what empoysoners haue learned by long obseruation.

First, they know how to distinguish venomes, which kill by their insigne and notorious qualities, from other that cause death by their whole subtilance.

Secondly, that they naturally bring to any man whatsoeuer, a most sudden harme, and yet doe not discover their vigour, but vpon longer time.

Thirdly, that (of both the two kindes) they kill either sooner or later (without any respect to the body) according as they haue the most, or the least quantitie.

Fourthly, they can deale in such sort, that all poysons shall be tempered according to their owne pleasure, and make them sweeter or sharper, because they should kill the sooner or slower, which is without any secret or myracle of nature.

We vually exercise the same cunning, in purgative drugges, setting an edge on such as are dull and slowe, and giue them as spurs to further purpose: and contrariwise, wee retaine ouer-hasty penetration in the other, by mingling with them, such as are naturally more slacke & tardy. But that a man should limit the effects of poysons, to a certaine day, and to a point or moment named; we hold to be meerly absurd and ridiculous, because the nature of each man cannot be perfectly knowne (as we haue before sufficiently declared) from whence proceedeth the most vncertaine terme or time of euery poyson, for procuring the death of a man. For euery naturall action meeteth with diuers effects, according to the diuers disposition, as well of that which worketh, as of that which suffereth. And this happeneth, not onely by reason of euident qualities, but also of hidden and proper: whence also it enſueth, that the thing which doth this man a great deale of harme, may bee as profitable to another.

Pedro de Albano (whom some call the Reconciler, or Peace-maker) where hee explicated this question, propoundeth: That he may do it, who hauing certainly knowne the continuance of a mans life, by the measure and quantity of his radical humour: may giue him a poyson, that shall consume in ten yeares space. From hence he collecteth, some men may bee poysoned, that droope and dry away daily (vulgarly termed in Italian, Herbati et Strigati) and so it may bee ordered sometimes, that poysoning may bee limited. But that it is to be presupposed by Astrologie, I hardly thinke to be euer diuined.

I confesse, that all such as are seene to droope and decay by little and little, being empoisoned, haue a long affliction: but yet there is no certaine time when those men shall bee taken hence. Pliny speaketh of no time knowne more certaine of death, then vs of the Sea Hare (a venomous fish) bringeth, where he saith: Such men as (in eating) feede poyson, and by the first signe perceiue the poyson: shall dye in as many houres after, as the Hare hath liued. Now, who shall diuine the age of the Hare, to the ende, that the appointed hour of death, may be fore-tolde thereby?

And yet if I did admit that, that a man did know how many dayes the Hare hath liued: I can neuer grant (for all that) that all men shall dye at one and the same time; because one and the selfe-same poyson, worketh diuersly, according to the diuerſity of mens bodies, as it hath bene more then sufficiently proued. So that it had bene much more truly faide (as the same Pliny after addeth) The poyson can haue no certainty of time, according as Licimus Mater also saith.

CHAP. VII.

Of diuers erroneous and idle opinions, conceined in fantastike braines, and verily beleued, as if they were sound truths.

People erre in many matters, concerning diuers creatures (haply not inuented of them selues) but held by elder and precedent intimation, as little also apprehended or vnderſtoode by them; but, perhappes, meerer fictions of their owne braines, vpon some appearing probable reasons. As wise and worthie Poets, who haue entrusted bad and bestiall men, to the imitation of vertue, by witty fables and pleasant inuentions, which euer hath bene, and still is permitted as lawfull in them, euen as the discipline is allowed to Painters, as Hora. to stifieth, saying:

*Poets and Painters equall power containe,
To say or do, what best shall like their braine.*

As for Painters, we see that they figure an Angell in the forme of a Youth, clothed with a garment of Starres, bare headed, and hauing wings like a Bird. And the Soule of man is represented like to a young Infant, stark naked. The diuell, co haue hornes, and a dreadfull taile: And yet neuertheless, these are but spirites without bodies, and cannot carry the resemblance of any visible creature.

In the like manner, Hell, which is but a place, is figured with a hideous gaping throat: Death, being but a priuation of life, is resembled by the Anatonized bones of a dead man, carrying a Scythe in his hand. Loue, which is but a passion and accident, not subsisting any way of it selfe; is painted and presented like a naked childe, and blind, wearing wings, a Bow, and a Quier furnished with Arrowes, The Winds, which are but a moued agitated Ayre; are figured with mens heads, hauing their Cheekes hugely swolne, euen as we see one founding of a Trumpet.

As for Astrologers, though they want paintings, whereby to enſtruct ignorant people: yet haue they demonstrations likewise, and presentation is made of the twelue Signes of the Zodiack (which are but certaine Starres) yet disposed into diuers figures, as one of a Ramme, another of a Bull, the third of two twinned infants, &c. And so the images of heauen which are out of the Zodiack; one in forme of a Beare, another of an Eagle, others in riuers, in an Harpie, Dogge, Dragon, &c. And next the Planets, which are but stars, as Saturne, Iupiter, Mars, Mercurie, and Venus; these beare the forme of personages, in diuers habites and countenances: but the Sun and Moone are otherwise shewne and distinguished.

Painters also haue euermore denoted the figure of a Starre with fine rayons or beames, thereby exprefſing their twinkling splendour: although all the Starres do not sparkle in that manner; and well we know beside, that they are all round in figure, without points or corporeall beams. As for the Elements, they figure the fire (which is invisible) like vnto our artificiall fire, which is not much amisse to the purpose. The Ayre cannot be painted, no more then heauen, cleare and transparent bodies; but yet they are represented by a blew or azure colour. Water is figured by Waues, and the Earth in shape of a Globe, rounde as a Ball.

Of Creatures, they counterfeyte some fabulously: as the Salamander, which is no such thing as it is painted; nor the Dolphin likewise, as it is presented in Armes and Deuices; Nor the Flower de Luce, as it is commonly knowne to euery one. And the Heart, be it of a man, or of other creature, it is of no such shape as Painters giue it.

The Pellicane is figured, with her charpe Beake turned vpon hir brest, which she launceth therewith, to make hir blood yssue forth, for the nourishing of hir yong ones, euen to the price of her owne life, dying thereby: And yet we see and know that the Pellican hath her beak edgelesse, flat, and broad; iustly like in fashion vnto the Apothecaries Sparule or Slice, as being no way able to wound her brest. Also, the Greeke worde [Pellican] signifying an Axe or Coopers Adge or Ads, plainly declareth that her Beake is flat, & as it should be.

Moreover it is sayde, that the Sire or Hee-Bird, beareth the yong ones, euen as with blowes on the face, or (as we vse to say) boxes on the eare, vntill they are almost dead; and then the Dam woundeth her brest, to reuene them with her blood: blowes commonly are giuen with flat, and not pointed things.

The Phoenix, being painted burning her selfe in a fire, prepared purposely for her; is much more fabulous. But all these things are lawfully permitted to Painters and Poets (as we faide before) vpon some good respect and secret reason, needlesse to be reported here; making men onely but of certaine erroneous opinions, which the vulgar holde for sure and most certaine, and which are the more excusable, because many great Philosphers and ancient Physitians, haue defended the like opinions.

1. Of the Viper.

I thath bin a very ancient opinion, that the Viper ioyneth with her male, by receyuing his head in at her mouth (through defect of other genitall partes) and that the female by the delight shee feelth, locketh her teeth so fast together, as thereby the biteth off her males head, and so conceyueh. Afterwards, when the time for delivery cometh, the yong ones hauing no other yssue, and (euen as it were) to reuenge the death of their Father: bite and teare the belly of their mother, whereby she dyeth. Here is the reason why it is faide of a Posthumus, of whome the mother dieth in deliuerance, He is like the Viper, that neuer seeth his father nor mother. This hath sometime serued as an Emblem with this device or motto, Quod tibi fieri non vis, alteri ne feceris.

All this is false, and fauored by many, but badly; that being well vnderſtoode which Aristotle hath said. The Viper (saith he) is conceined of Egges which she hatcheth

in her belly, and become little vipers: they come forth all formed, being deposed of the membrane or thinnie skinne, which containeth them within the wombe; and that is their secondine. But the later-most (moored with impatience) bite and teare that membrane, to issue forth the more hastily. For the damme or mother bringeth above twenty, and yet delivereth but one daily; which maketh the him-most impatient, and constraineth them angrily to gnawe the tunicle or membrane; but neither the mothers sides or belly, as is vainely imagined.

Many may be deceived also, concerning the originall and etymologie of the word, as if Vipera were to say, Quasi vi patiens: whereas it is (indeed) of Vicum patiens. For there is not any Serpent, that produceth her broode or young alive, or living, but the Viper. Others lay egges, which (out of the belly) are converted into Serpents.

2. Of the Beaser, called Caster also.

The naturall understanding of the Beaser.

It is vulgarly helde, that this beast teareth away his testicles with his owne teeth, when he perceiveth himselfe to be pursued by Hunt-men: having a kind of knowledge naturally, that they seeke him only for them. Whereupon some thinke, that this name of Caster was given him: because he geldeth himselfe, and so (by consequence) becometh chaste.

Which is meereley false, for, as Diocorides wrote long since; hee can by no means reach or touch his stones. Those are onely two tumours, which (by yeares) comes to him, & are as impostums, full of fatte matter or suppuration, called Cystoriam, which also hee can not teare away. And he is not teamed Caster, of gelding, or of chastitie; but of the Greeke word Gaster, which signifieth a Belly, because he is full punched, and this is nothing else, but by changing the letter G into C. Read hereupon the most learned History of M. Rondellius, of Fishes, in the last chapter of the second Tome.

3. Of the Salamander.

Great error is there also, concerning the true nature of this creature, which is said to live in the fire, and hath power to extingvish it. From which coniecture, was taken the device of great King Francis, the first of that name (father of Arts and Sciences) Nutrisco, & extingo: I feed and extingvish.

Diocorides hath very learnedly delivered the contrary, and Galen also saying: That the Salamander can resist the fire for some time; but it burneth, by carrying any long while therein. Nevertheless, it were better to hold with Aristotle, in saying; That the Salamander is not burned in the fire, but walkes aloft upon it, extingvish both the flame and coales.

Experience, which is more strong then all authorities of the wisest in the world, teacheth vs, that this is a matter no way to be credited. As for the figure of the Salamander, the portraiture thereof also is meereley fabulous, and contrived by Painters, who have thrust such an imagination upon it; making thev also of it, to be a farre greater Beast then it is. It is like to the smaller sort of Lizzards, which frequent the walles in Languedoc, named Langroles, and in Dauphine Larmises. But the Salamander is somewhat greater, marked with many spots. His body is full of a white moysture, and thicke like Milke, which issueth forth by the pores of the skinne, pressing it neuer so little. Which milke or moysture is so colde, that the Salamander may (for some time) withstand the fire, but yet not long, without burning, roasting and dying, as we have many times made good triall of. Farre is it from quenching the fire, or much lesse living in it: like as the Chameleon liueth by the ayre; and I judge both alike in truth: albeit I neuer saw any Chameleon alive to make proofe of.

4. Of the Shee-Bear.

It is said also, that the produceeth a peece of flesh, not having the forme of any creature: and afterward shee heket it in such manner, that thereby onely shee giueth it both fashion and forme. This is but a kinde of hyperbolicall speaking, for to say truly, the yong one is very vnihtly after the birth, being all couered with foame or frosh, and in such a quantity, as it seemeth indeede but a lump of flesh, without any distinction of parts. The Dam or Mother cleaseth it immediately thereof, by licking al the filth away; wher-

by (not long after) it appeareth in the true shape of a creature. So may we see a W helpe (or a yong Lambe newly yeaned) much muddied and besmeared at the first, as it is hardly knowne at the prime view: but when the Damme hath doone her louing and naturall Office, then all the parts are plainly seene and distinguished.

CHAP. VIII.

A vulgar Question: What Language a child shall speake, that neuer heard any speech. That a man or woman borne dumb, is necessarily deafe. As also, hee that is Nurst among dumbe people, And not, on the contrary, that one dumbe by Nature, should be deafe: And whence it ensueth, that a man is so tardie, in knowing howe to speake.

Vulgar people beleue, and hold it as a thing most assured, that a man should naturally speake the Language of Adam, if he neuer learned any other speech from his infancy; euen as if hee had bene nurshed by a dumbe Woman, among dumbe people, or in a Desert utterly vnihabited of people, where neuer any speech had bene heard.

Herodotus declareth in his second book, that Psammeticus, a King of the Aegyptians, was delicious (on a time) to make proofe hereof, to the end, that he might iudge thereby, what was the most auncient and naturall Language, of all them that were spoxen in the world. He caused two Children to bee nurshed in a Forrest, where neuer any voyce of man was, or could be heard. After two yeeres were past, and they being brought before the King, sometimes they could pronounce this Word Bec, which in the Phrygian tongue, signifieth Bread. Whereupon some gathered, that the Phrygian was the first language of man.

But as Saint Augustine saveth, these children might haue learned the Word Bec (and so retained it) of Goats, among which they were nourished. For, as hee sheweth in his worke of the quantitie of the Soule; all manner of speaking is by hearing, and by imitation. Notwithstanding, in his Booke of the Citie of God, hee thinketh and beleueth, that before the confusion of Tongues (which happened at the building of the Tower of Babel) the Hebrew Language was naturally to all. As if words were an action proceeding from naturall instinct, or the simple and proper motion of the soule: euen as if they had power in themselves (and of themselves, with some naturall inclinations) to bring forth in euidence and effect speech, without any enstrueting. Such knowledge is to sucke, to cry, mourne, laugh, mouing hands and feet, & when strength serueth, to go.

The Goate, Lambe, Chicken, and other such like creatures, so soone as they are bred and brought forth, bring themselves to the teates, knowing naturally, that there is their nourishment. Beeing grown greater, they make choise (among a thousand diuers plants) such as best digest and agree with their complexion. They bleate and cackle, euen from their production, which answereth to the cries of children: and this is done without teaching, or any enstrueting, or so much as example or imitation.

Man hath the like actions and representations, euen as other creatures, simply naturall of his owne, and without any apprenticeship. But the worde or Speech, which is a voyce significative, expressing the conceptions of a reasonable Soule: they proceede onely and wholly from a Science or Discipline, which is comprehended by the means of hearing. So that it is impossible, that any one being deafe, from his birth, and persevering in the same deafeenesse, should euer knowe how to speake, although that his tongue, and other parts thereto appointed, are most exquisitely compoed and ordained, as none more formally can be any way de-fired.

What then shall wee say of him that neuer heard any thing? Speech is a Discipline, no lesse then that of Musick: both the one and the other, are apprehended by hearing. From whence it cometh, that a childe (in what place soeuer it is nourished and brought vp) apprehendeth eth and retaineth the same vulgar Language (which some rearme Vernacle or Maternall) whatsoever it be, either Hebrew, Greeke, Latine or Barbarisme; one is as easie to him as another. For, in hauing nothing by naturall impression, he is indifferent to all: like as the colour of white receiueth all other tinctures, and some kinde of water all fauours; and so in the like comparisons.

Adam could neuer haue spoken any naturall language of his owne, no more then we: but God inspired him with an vnderstanding soule, capable of such a language as pleased him: As he did like- wise to Eue; and their first children learned to speake by them, euen as ours now do of vs.

Heere wee are to know, that from the corruption of our first Parents transgression, we haue and hold all our naturall conditions and inclinations, and namely, the very greatest imperfection that can be, of enclining more vnto euill then good, more truly rearmed Original sinne. But as concerning speech or speaking, we haue it not but by aptitude & habilitie, euen as all other disciplines or en- structions.

That which is truly naturall of our soule, is enchaired or carraied into a body of such quality, temperate and completion, as man ought to haue for his perfection. For the sonde nicenesse of birth, is like the infant in his first yeare, vnapt to reason, by the imperfection of his body, and likewise as they, who by accident of sicknesse, or passion of minde (as Loue and idle disturbances) become weakly brained, foolish, fottish, lunaticke, and mad. In all which imperfections, the soule is euermore her owne, remaining still in her integrity: and yet (neuertheless) cannot exercise her reason, by not hauing the body at her command.

Aristotle enstrueth (to singular good purpose) That our soule is ignorant of all things, and like vnto a new Table, newly polished and prepared, wherein nothing hath bene depicted or engrauen, when it was infused into the body of man, but sent downe from Heauen as we beleue. Shee hath no- thing but simplicity, sincerity, purity, facility and conuenience, with inclination and aptitude to euery Arte and Science, and to all knowledge of things diuine and humane (which is the true definition of Philosophy) Always referred and excepted, those faculties and actions, necessarily required in a liuing soule, as those in Beasts; which our soule exerciseth in the body from the very beginning, and before the infant is borne, without doctrine or discipline (as already hath bene related).

Doctrine is not requisite in her, but for Artes and Sciences, hauing nothing in her, whatsoever diuine Plato layeth to the contrary, affirming; That the reasonable soule hath knowledge of all things, when it cometh into the body: but being plunged and swarmed in the great humidity of the body, it forgetteth all. Like to him that becometh obliuious, or (asthey say in Greeke) sicke of a Leihargie, in regard of the Phlegmaticke humour which drowneth his braine. But afterward, in such measure, as the body loseth this great humidity, and drieth it selfe by little and little: the Soule also recouereth it selfe by paucity of degrees, and comprehendeth all things demonstrated and thewne vnto her, as in remembering and acknowledging her selfe, and not in learning any nouelties.

This was the opinion of good olde Plato, which maketh well for such as firme, that wee haue some certainty of Language, which came from our first Parents, Adam and Eue: and that wee should (in time) speake the very same, if the other, which wee ordinarily heare in our houses, did not preoccupaie it. But in truth, our soule neyther knoweth, or holdeth (of it selfe) any Language, nor is affected or giuen to any one in particular: but enclined equally, and is indifferent to all tongues, and in so good manner, as one hindereth not another, which (perhaps) a naturall tongue would, if it had any at all. At leastwise, some flippes or branches would be remembered thereof, as in such, that could not altogether forget the accents, or the prolations, with some certaine words and phrases of their mother-tongue.

The reasonable soule then, hauing not any language of it selfe, is very proper and apt to comprehend, and well to expresse by sound and entire instruments, all diuersity of tongues. As it is recorded of King Antibridates, to haue so happy a memory; that he could well and properly speake two and twenty diuers Languages.

By nature, we haue no more simply then a voice, common to all other creatures, that breathe, and different onely in them, by and according to their kindes. For every animall hath a proper voice, which grossely signifieth his affections or passions: Which is no way knowne how to be expressed (saith Ammenius vpon Aristotle) or represented by letters or syllables, no more then the sundry murmures of the Sea, and of the Windes. Euen so, man in his prime or first moneths, when hee lieth simply as a beast, hath nothing but a voice onely, before hee learns to speake: whereof being deprived, he is said to be dumb, although he hath not lost his voice. Whereof Aristotle speaketh very notably in his Problems: That Man onely is dumb.

Speech then is nothing else, but to fashion and articulate the voice naturally, by addition of a vocall consonance, in the composing and enterlacing, for the expressing of significant words, which explicate, and (as a man may say) do infan- tely and produce the conceptions of man: which are infinitely more diuers, and in farre greater number, then those of other Creatures, exempted of reason and discourse. And therefore it greatly behooueth, that a man should know extraordinarily, how to diuersifie his voice, for answering to that which the great capacity of his spirit containeth.

An infant collecteth and assemblith diuers conceptions in his vnderstanding, and the words which he heareth (accompanied with some actions) strue to make signification of all: which he comprehendeth by little and little, and then retaineth by frequent reiteration. Afterward, when his tongue is growne more firme and able; hee strueth to represent that which he hath retained, by imperfect fumbling, and at the ende of a little long apprenticeship, speaketh like to a young Parrot, after a long time spent in listening. For otherwise, as well the one as the other, would haue but his branches or flippes, which is the naturall voice, without any other signification; then of certaine affections or passions, as we haue already said.

Lets now obserue that which Aristotle saith, in his Historie of Creatures. Those creatures which speake, haue voyce also: but all such as haue voyce, speake not. For, such as are deaffe by nature, are also dumb: where- by they may yet render a voyce, but not speake one word. And in his Booke of the Sen- ces, and their organs, where he maketh a comparison of such as are blind and deaffe borne, he saith, Deaffe and dumbe are as accidents, which necessarily follow one another. Alfo Alexander Aphrodisiens produceth in his Problems, that being demanded, why men borne deaffe, should be dumbe likewise; answereth familiarly, They can neuer speake that which they neuer heard.

For better confirmation of this matter, we must necessarily adde that which Aristotle writeth in the same place before al- leged, concerning the Voyce, and the singing of Birdes, which is in part simply naturall, and in part of some intelligence and learning as his owne amongst them. For, I will not heere inferre, that some man may reach a Bird, to tune another Song beside her owne: and the instru- tion of the dammes (both he and she) to their young ones. Whereby we may easily comprehend, that if Birdes haue one natu- rall song (which is the voyce common to all their kinde) and another taught or apprehended in time of continuing with their owne: that they could not so keepe and enioy, as if they had bin immediatly seperated, and taken out of the nest. Euen so in like manner, an infant to be frequented with all people that speake, and (by their meere conuersation) instructed to speake; would else haue none other but his owne naturall voyce, as at the instant of his birth, and bringing into the world.

The voice (saith Aristotle) displaeth, what difference is made to be among the languages of Beasts & Birdes, euen among them of one and the same kinde, in diuers places. Let the Partridge in sundry Countries (eue for example, hauing diuers notes; for some chutcke or iouke, and others clacker or chirpe. And there are diuers smaller Birdes, which chaunt no such notes as their Dams doe; but being taken out of their Nests, are quite changed from paternall education: and so learne the tunes of other enstru-cted Birdes, or of mens voices: iming themselves to their notes, customs and manners. Sometime it hath bene obserued in a Nightingale, that taught her Targen to her young ones, and so gave them imitation to diuers songs. For, speech cannot come of nature, as the voyce doth: but is to be attained by study and discipline. Thus you may perceiue also, why men make use of diuers Languages, albeit they are like to one another in voyce, &c.

The conclusion
on what men borne dumbe are deafe also

Me-thinks this should seeme prooue enough, that speech is a thing properly learned by the means of hearing, from whence it ensueth inuitably, that such as are deafe borne, & they that neuer heard any speech (without being deafe) are dumbe by consequent, except (by succession of time) they doe enioy hearing, and their eares be vnstoppt; as we haue diuers times obserued, and made practise of, by children that haue not spoken before seauen or eight yeares.

What difference
there is betweene the speech of Infants & that of Birds,

Now I come (in passing along) to touch a point not impertinent to our purpose, to wit: What difference there is in the speech, which an Infant learneth of himselfe, from that of a Parrot, a Starling, a Pyea, Larke, a Linnet, a Thrush, a Raven, a laye, and such like, as they haue learned. Very certaine it is, that as their soules are different, euen so is their Language: in regard that a child vnderstandeth what he speaketh, and would speake so and so, or better if hee could, to explicate and make his conceptions vnderstood: whereas on the contrary, a Bird hath not any intelligence of the signification of whatsoever it prattleth. So that, if a Bird demanda, or answere sometime (prouing to purpose) it is by hap or aduenture, and not ordinary; except it bee suggested, remembered, or else expressly made to speake it.

Whatsoever
Birds practise, is quite without any intelligence.

Moreover, a Bird will alwaies adde some crosse thwarting word or other, which argueth sufficiently, that it hath not any intelligence at all. Whereupon it hath bin commonly said, that whoeuer speaketh, and knoweth not what he speaketh, prattleth like a Parrot. So a simple man may learne some folly, or vnfitting words, in the Germane Poliss, or any other vnkowne tongue to him, and ignorantly vse it as a salutation, and be derided for his labour: like others, that thinking to bee reputed learned, will vse many Latine sentences and phrases, quite contrary to their owne meaning in the speaking.

It remaineth now to know, seeing the natural dumbe man is deaffe by consequent: if likewise the man dumbe by nature (by reason of some defect in his tongue, or in other parts requisite for speaking) bee also deaffe consequent? Laetantius Firmianus, in his Booke of the workes of God, would haue it to bee so: but being too grosse an Anatomist (as is easily comprehended by his reasons) hee is not in this point to be credited. Alexander Aphrodisienses, in the place before alledged, seemeth to say no: but he buildeth vpon no good foundation, when he saith; That there is a paire of nerves, which come from the Braine, one portion whereof goeth to the tongue, and the other to the eares. And that by this means, the affections of the tooing and of the eares, doe easily communicate themselves together. Also, forasmuch as that one of the said portions may bee offended and corrupted, without the other: it happeneth also, that a man may become deaffe by some disease, and yet (on the contrary) not be dumbe.

But his supposition holdeth no place in this point, no more then the reasons of some moderne men; following Pedro de Albano, termed the Peace-maker, saying; That the sixt likeness in the Nerves of the Braine, which mooueth the tongue, is firmly allied to the fift likeness, which serueth for hearing. For, as I will neuer grant, that defect of speech followeth deafenesse, by any consent or sympathy of the tooing with the eares, but only through want of enstruction, which should be receiued by the eares: so can I not consent, that by the vice or incongruity of those parts dedicated to speaking, hearing should any way be offended.

In the acte also there is no likelyhood or coherence, considering that those parts worke not, eyther for the integrity, nor for the construction of the eares, & lesse for the enstruction of hearing, who (for herselfe) hath no neede of any teaching, no more then the sight, or any of the exteriour senses. And as for them, they require nothing else, but to be free and open, without any impeachment or hinderance, and that their object should bee neere, within a certaine distance. Why then, we see and heare naturally, without any doctrine or discipline. Seeing then, that hearing neyther taketh or apprehendeth any thing of the verbal instruments, nor of words themselves (as concerning her owne simple action to heare) he that is dumbe from his birth, by the imperfection of his tongue, shall not be deafe in that respect: no more, then as if from a braue discouraging man, the tooing should bee torne out of his head. And it hath bene commonly obserued, that such as haue their tongues cut or slit, haue heard neuer a iot the lesse in that regard, neither found any defect in their hearing.

If it be true then, that the instruments of speech, conferre not nor communicate particularly with the eares, and that speaking worketh nothing with hearing, as (on the contrary) hearing doth, and is necessaric for speech; it ensueth plainly, that the dumbe by nature, shall neuer heare in that respect (supposing, that the organ of the eare or hearing, is no way therein interferred. And that the deafe by birth, must be dumbe necessarily: although in his tongue, and those other parts, requisite for speech, there is not any defect at all. Obserue then I praye, that in all this purpose, I speake of birth and of Nature, indifferently, to signifie the deale or dumbe from the beginning. And I name the dumbe from birth, not he that cannot speake (for so wee should bee all dumbe) but hee that is not any way apte to speake.

Arif. in lib. 11.
Prob. 58. & 60.

In the voyce
of beastes, are few or no letters at all.

Let vs come now to the third point. From whence it proceedeth, that a man hauing so prompt and able a spirite, that hee comprehendeth all thinges in small compasse of time; is yet (notwithstanding) so slow and tardie in knowing howe to speake, and articulate his voyce. Whereas on the contrary, beastes & other creatures, immediately, or soone after their production, haue their voyce absolute & perfect, euen as well and fully, as euer they shall haue.

Arifotle in his Problemes, maketh answer hereto, saying; The voyce of man hath great diuersities in it; other creatures expresse no Letters at all, or very fewe, (as two or three onely) and without Consonants, which, ioyned with Vowels, make the worde. Speech (saith he) is not sly and simply of the voyce, but is perfected and accomplished of the affection or condition of the voyce, by signification; and the affections of the voyce, they are the letters. Children therefore, before they know how, or can pronounce letters, expresse their passions (no other wise then as beastes do) by a natural voyce and no way taught or instructed, which is common to all infants, of any country whatsoeuer. But yet speech is different in Towne and Towne, nay, in one and the same Towne or City, by reason of the voyce artificially distinguished, thorough the great diuersity of letters coupled, and interlaced of infinite kinds; whereof proceedeth diuers words, signifying an infinity of things. Seeing then, that there are so many manners or fashions of speaking, and that (of five or six letters) may bee made fifty feuerall words, and al differing the one from the other: wee may easilie thereby vnderstand, why an infant formeth his voyce so late, in regard of beastes, who haue their voyces merely simple, & (as Alexander Aphrodisienses sayth) most natural of all creatures.

For, whatsoeuer is extremely diuers, & must be diuersified by many differences, cannot bee attained in any short space of time. Be it in regard of the soul, which apprehendeth the science of speaking; or be it in the tooing, which ought to expresse it, & requirith time also, both to break and enable the words in their vttering, as we vse to say of the hand, for instruments of Musick. Whereupon he that is dumbe, beginneth at the first to mumble and stutle in the mouth, being not able to make a sound of all the Letters, nor to pronounce words with any hability; onely by reason of the tongues softnes, whereas her rudenesse requirith a new labour.

There is another doubt vpon the same purpose, & which is much more vncleare to explicate, & Arifotle propoundeth it in his Problemes. From whence it cometh, that some infants begin to speake before due age, & whom commonly the words are formed, and after they haue wel expressed some words, become dumbe again, and return to the first condition, until the ordinary terme and time of speaking; Many haue held this to be prodigious; & especially, when it is told them, that some haue spokē at the very point of their birth. Questionles, it is very rare, and hardly to be credited: and yet it may well happen by natural reason, as thus. An infant, at the same instant it heareth, it vnderstandeth, & then it may speake. But ordinarily hearing goeth far before vnderstanding, & vnderstanding likewise precedeth speaking: the instrument for speech and words; is not (as yet) of such temperature as is convenient for explicating those things which the spirit hath conceived.

On the contrary, some speake much sooner then they knowe how to vnderstand (as we haue already saide of Parrats and other Birds that prattle) counterfeiting such words as they heare: vntill time conuenient for them both, that is to say, ability to vnderstand and speake. Such children then, to whom the obiects of hearing make much sooner impression in the soule, then the instrument of Speech knowes how to perfect: it happeneth to them sometimes, that after they haue vnderstood diuers things, suddenly they pronounce them. And especially after they sleepe, when the spirits haue made themselves more copious; they haue the more strength and impetuous vigour, to moue the tongue in distinct manner. But this endureth not, neither can be of any long continuance; but the infant will returne to his first dumbnesse againe.

In like manner, sometimes wee shall finde our selues so disposed as (without thinking thereon) words and sentences will meerey flow in our mouths: whereof againe (at other times) we shall be so delayed and hindered, as wee can scarcely, or with any easie possibility, expresse things well knowne and familiar vnto vs. Euen so it may come to passe, that an infant (shall speake something, and afterward his tongue returning to the first ordinarie condition: he becommeth dumbe, vntill the vttermoost time of his perfection and strength.

It is a contrary case, in an infant that becommeth dumbe by deafnesse, after he hath spoken some gibbridge or prittie prattle, yea spoken intelligibly; as we haue heard credibly reported, concerning all the male children of M. Anthony Butin (a famous Apothecary in Tolosa, dwelling at the signe of the three Kings) fro which his daughters were exempted. They all spake, till about the age of foure years, & afterward became deafe in such sorte, as they could not heare any noyse; and so (by little and little) ceased to speake. This hapned, in regard that their hearing continuing no longer, they did easie forget the little Language, which they had learned in their first yeares. As an infant (indeed) is very obliuious, by reason of his great humidity; and particularly the saide Butins children, who were verie rheumaticke. And so hauing no longer means of continuance, to apprehend and speake by hearing, they became dumbe. As any one, who hath learned some few French or Dutch words, through want of continuing conference in those Languages, forgets the little he had before. Or hee that discontinueth his Grammer, or from other Science, or playing on Instruments of Musick, easily forgetteth all by want of vse.

These and such like accidents hapning daily, confirme our first proposition, in fauour whereof, we haue thus largely discoursed. For, if one may become dunib, by reason of deafnesse, which happeneth by accident, & after he could speake who will make any doubt at all, but that the deafe by birth, must needes be incurably dumbe?

I will adde heereto a very notable accident, which maketh some-what to this purpose: of some, that by a Vvounde or hurt, or some sicknesse beside of the braine: haue wholly lost remembrance of all things, yea euen of speech, which they learned againe by little and little, like as children do, hauing hearing at their command, and the instruments of speech no way engaged. Graue men, and woorthie of faith, doe testifie, to haue seene some wounded in the head, from one side to the other, and euen in the eye (whereof M. Rondeletius relateth an History in his practise, and the appendix to the 21. Chapter) who forgot so much as their owne names, and were faine to bee taught all things, euen like yong children. So came they wholly to the first condition of an infant from birth: except vulgar speech, which yet some of them retained. But other impressions of their tongues became estranged, concerning Artes and Sciences learned before, and things which they had formerly both seene and knowne; all quite defaced out of their soules, by the inundation and raine of the harme.

CHAP. I.

Of the Kingdom of Ireland: The Antiquity, Original, and first Inhabitation thereof, according to the confirmation of the best approved Authors.

IN the yeare of the world 1525, the holy Patriarch Noah, began to admonish the people, of vengeance to follow, for their wicked liues and detestable crimes; and hee prepared to builde the Arke, as thereby foreshewing to his kinsfolke and friends, the vniuersall Flood or Deluge that was to ensue, and wherewith the whole face of the earth should be couered within few yeares, except amendment grew from them in short time; all which he did before the Flood, one hundred and sue and twenty yeares. But when euery man seemed to neglect his worthe admonitions; Neece to Noah, who was named Cesara, hearing this dreadful prophesie of her Vnckle, and doubting least it would come to passe: indeed, determined (with certain friends of hers) to seek their fortune in some forraigne Region. Perswading her selfe, that if she could find a Country neuer inhabited, and consequently vnspoiled with sin: the generall sentence of Gods wrath would not there take effect.

Hereupon, rigging a Nauy, shee committed her selfe to the seas, flying forth full: length the arriued in Ireland, with three men only, and fifty women; hauing lost the residue of her company, by misfortune of sundry shipwrackes, sustayned in that her long and troublesome voyage. The names of the men were these, Bibhi, Lagria, and Fintan. The coast where shee first set foote on land, and where also she lyeth buried, was cald Auiculara Littus. The Shipping name of shore. The Stones, wherein the memory hereof was precluded from violence of the Waters, haue bene seene of some, as they themselves haue reported, but how truly I haue not to say.

Within forty daues after her coming on Land there, the vniuersall Floude came, and ouer-floued all that coast, as well as the other parts of the worlde, But whereas this tale bewrayeth it selfe (too manifestly) to bee an vntueth, if time and other circumstances be thorowly examined; I will stand no longer about the prooff or disproofe thereof. Onely this is sufficient (I thinke) to bring it out of credite, to consider: that the Art of Navigation or sayling, was vnkowne to the world, before the vniuersall Deluge, and no part inhabited, except the continent of Syria, and thereabout.

But to let passe such a forged tale, with the record thereof engrauen in a Stone, (a deuice borrowed, as some thinke, from Iosephus) it shall bee sufficient for the glory of the Irish nation in their Antiquity, to graunt, that Ireland was discovered and peopled by some of Noahs kindred, euen as the first Islands of the Worlde (if they will needs haue it so, as the likelihood is great) according to (which is set forth in their histories. and his posteritie (imboldened by Nabhs example) aduentured by ship, to commit themselves to passe the seas, and to search out the unknowne corners of the world, and so finding out diuers isles in the west parts of the world.

There was (say they) in that retinue, one of the same progeny named Bartolennus, or Batholennus, who, encouraged with the late attempt and successe of Nimrod, kinsman to Ninus (then newly intruded vpon the Monarchy of Assyria) searched to farre west-intending to attaine to some gouernement, where he might rule without any partner in authoritie; till at the length, Fortune brought him and his people vpon the coast of Ireland. Heere hee seled himselfe with his three sonnes Lanquinnus, Salanus and Ruthurgus, right achiue and stout Gentlemen, who, seaching the Land from side to side, and from end to end, left remembrances of their names, in certaine notable places, and named after themas Lingvine, Stragrus & mount Salanus, since named Saint Dominicks hill, and Ruthurgus his Poole. Little is remembered of Bartolennus, sauing that in short space (with many hands working at once) he ridde and made payne a great part of the Countrey, ouer-growne with woods and thickets.

Thus became Ireland inhabited by this people, vnder the gouernement of the three Sonnes to Bartolennus, and their offspring, for the space of three hundred yeares. Together with Bartolennus, arrived in Ireland certain vngodly people of Nimrods race, woorthily tearmed Giants, as those that (in bodily shape) exceeded the common proportion of other men, and vsed their strength to gaine soueraigntie, and to oppresse the weak with rapine and violence. That lineage (Chams brood) did grow, in short while, to great numbers, and alwaies endeuoured themselves (wherefoeuer they came) to beare the rule ouer others. One cause thereof was their bodily strength, answerable to their hugeness of stature; another, the examples of Cham or Zoroastres the Magician, & Nimrod, grandfather to Ninus. Whiche two persons (in themselves and progenie) were renowned through the world as victorious Princes, ruling ouer two mighty Kingdomes, Agypt and Assyria.

A third cause also there was, namely, they repined at the blessings bestowed on Sem and Iaphet, thinking it necessary to withstand all lawfull rule and deminion: lest the curse of slavery (prophecied by Nabhs) should light vpon them, as at the length it did. Whereupon, rebelliously withdrawing their obedience, from their lawfull Gouernours heere in Ireland, and taking head; they set vp a King of their owne fashion, and maintayning his estate to the oppression of the subiects, by bringing them into continuall bondage. The successe was variable on both sides, betweene the lawfull Gouernours and these vipers, with daily riling and skirmishes, so much to the grieffe of them, who conered to liue in quiet order vnder their rightfull Princes: that they determined, with the chance of one generall battell, either whole to subdue those proud rebellious tyrants, or else, to end their liues in freedome, and so be rid of further misery.

But first, whereas there had growne certayne debates and enmities amongst themselves, whereby they had weakened their owne forces, they held it not amisse, to make peace together, before they put their whole state in hazard of one battell against the Giants: concluding therefore an agreement, & ioyning in league (with promise) to assist each other in subduing the common enemy. Growing to assemble their power, out of all partes of the land, and coming to ioyne battell with the Giants; after they had fought fiercely together for the space of certayne houres: victorie enclined to the rightfull part, so that the lawfull Kings preuailing against the vsurping tyrants, great slaughter was made on the whole broode of that mischieuous generation. For the Kings, meaning to free themselves from all danger in time to come, vsed their happy victorie with too great crueltie, which after turned to their owne confusion. For, sparing neyther man, woman, nor childe that came in their way, for mere despise, & fuller satisfying their intended reuenges; they vouchsafed not to bury the carcases of their slaine enemies, but cast them out like a sort of dead dogs; through the noyfull stench whereof, such an infectious pestilence ensued in all places, only thotow the ayres corruption, as few escaped with life, besides such as got away by Sea.

the Irish, that one of the Giants named Rauius, chancing to be preferred from this mortalitie, liued 2041 yeares, which is more then twise the age of Methusalem. By this man (say they) Saint Patrick was informed, concerning the whole estate of the Countrey, and afterwards, (vpon request) having received Baptisme of the sayd Saint Patrick: hee decessed in the yeare after the birth of our Saviour. foure hundred and thirty, as in the Irish historie hath bene very vniadually written. But, letting that passe, wee finde it recorded, That an infinite number of Giants were slayne and destroyed, in manner as hath been already related: yet some got themselves into lurking Caves and Dens, and kept closely there, till lacke of food caused them to come forth, and make shift for sustenance. When, perceiving no resistance, because the Land was (in a manner) left desolate; they waxed bolder, and when they vnderstoode how matters had passed: they seled themselves in the best parts of the Countrey, easily subduing the poore silly soules that remayned, and so reuincing their lineage, they became lords of the whole Land, keeping the same in subiection, three score yeares together.

Among the sons of Iaphet, we read in Genesis, that Magog was one, who planted his people in Scythia, neare Tanis, from thence, about the yere of the world, 2317 Nemodus, with his foure sonnes, Starnus, Garbanelles, Annius and Fergusius Captaines ouer a faire companie of people) were sent into Ireland: who passing by Grecia, and taking in such as were desirous to seeke aduentures with them; at length they landed in Ireland, inhabited the Countrey, and multiplied the Land, although not without continuall warre, which they helde with the Giants two hundred and sixteene yeares. At the end of which tearme, the Giants preuailing, chased them thence agayne, so that they returned into Syria. This was about the yeare after the Creation (as by their account it should seeme) two thousand foure hundred thirtie three; from which time, the Giants kept possession of the Land (without forraigne inuasion) till the yeare two thousand seauen hundred and foureteene. But yet all that time, they were not able to frame a Common-wealth: for, falling still at variance among themselves, and measuring euery thing by might, feidiously they vexed one another.

Which coming to the knowledge of the Grecians, it moued five brethren, sonnes to one Dela (being notable Seamen and skillfull Pilots) to rigge a Naue, & to attempt the conquest of this Land. These were all of the neereft posteritie to Nemodus, and named Gandius, Genaminius, Sagandus, Ruthernius and Slaminus. When all things were ready, and their companies assembled: they put to Sea, and landed at the length in Ireland; where finding the power of the Giants greatly weakened, by their owne quarrells and ciuile dissensions; with the more ease did they come to the end of their owne purpose, winning the whole Countrey, and vtterly extirpating that bloodie generation, deadly enemies to mankind: diuiding also the Land into five parts, and in each of them they severally reigning. Furthermore, to satisfie all sides, and auoyde contention; they concluded to fixe a Meare-stone in the middle point of Ireland, to which each of their kingdomes should extend; so that they might be equally partakers of the comodities, found within the Countrey soile.

These brethren also are supposed, to haue inuented the distribution of Shires into Cantreds, euery Cantred or Barony to containe one hundred towne-ships. At length, desire of soueraigntie, set the five brethren at variance, and greatly hindered their growing wealth. But Slaminus, getting the vpper hand, and bringing his foure brethren to a lowe ebbe: tooke on him as chiefe about his other brethren, intruding round about the Meare-middle Stone, for the space of certayne miles, which plot of ground (in time) obtayned the priuilege and name of one intire part, and now maketh vp the number of five parts (into which Ireland is sayd to be diuided) and is called Ath, and in Latine Media; taking this name (as some haue supposed) because (in respect of the other) it contained but the moiety of Cantreds, viz. sixteene; whereas each of the other Cantreds comprehended 32. a peccet: or else, because it lyeth in the middle of the land. This part Slaminus ioyned as a surplussage (ouer and about his inheritance) to the Monarchy; which part (notwithstanding) grew after to be a severall kingdom.

The Britan-

enjoyed the quiet possession of Ireland.

Thirty yeares the Monarchy yet continued in this order; but finally, Slanius departed this life, and was buried in a Mountaine of Meth, which till nowe (as they say) beareth name after him. Then the Princes, subiect to him, began to stomacke the matter, and denied their obedience to his successor: whereupon ensued continuall Warres betwene them, which (in long time) could never be fully ceased. In the necke of these troubles also, there arrived in Ireland a new Army of Scythians, who made claime vnto the Land (by a title of right) which they pretended from their fore-father Nemadus: and so taking and making parts, they set all in such a ypporre, that haucke was made on each side hostilely, in most miserable manner.

To be short, they spent themselves, in pursuing one another with such outrage: that they began to grow careless, what Nations or Soldiers they receyued to their ayde, either to keepe vp, or beate downe a side. By which occasion, the Brittaines also slept in among them, procuring Brennus the brother of Belinus to direct his course thither with the same Navy, which he had made ready to passe ouer into Gallia, now called France, to the ayde of Segwine, then King of the Allobroges, that invaded the Countreyes of Saoy and Daulphinay.

But his enterprize into Ireland tooke small effect, though there were other Kings of the Brittaines, that got dominion there: in somuch that Gurguntius, or Gurguntius, the sonne of Belinus, accounted Ireland (among other his dominions) to belong to him by lineall descent. Notwithstanding, the British Princes neuer enjoyed the quiet possession thereof, longer then they held it by maine force; but were often repelled, and put to the worse with seeking after it, finding there little other gaine then stripes, whereof they carried away good store. But now to come to the Spaniards, that lastly (vnder the conduct of foure Captaines) passed into Ireland, from Biscaye, and inhabited that Island: it shall not be impertinent (following the order obserued) to speake somewhat of their originall, that it may the better appeare, from whence the Irish nation had their first beginning.

In the yeare of the world, 2436. after the vniuersall flood, 870. while the Israelites serued in Egypt, Gathelus the sonne of one Nelus, a great Lord in Grecia, vpon disfaour was exiled his country, with a number of his factious friends and adherents. This noble Gentleman, beeing very wise, valiant, and well spoken: gotte honourable entertaine of Pharao, turnamed Orus. And afterward departing that Countrey, trauesed the seas, and landing first in Portugall, after some bickerings with the inhabitants: at length, yet hee got (by their consent) a portion of the Countrey, lying by the bankes of the Riuer, anciently called Munila, and nowe Mondego, where (shortly after) he began to builde a City, first named Brachara, but now Barçelo, as Hector Boetius affirmeth.

After this, when the people vnder Gathelus began to encrease in power; thorough perswasion of the Spaniards they neighbours, they remoued into Gallia, where they also builded a City, named Brizantium, which is now called Coruna. Finally, when they grew into such a huge multitude, that Gallia was not able to sustaine them; Gathelus, with a certain number of them, passed ouer into Ireland and there grew into such estimation with the barbarous people, that for his knowledge especially in Languages, hee was highly honoured. For he not onely enriched and beautified the Irish tongue; but instructed them in letters also: he fought vp their Antiquities, and likewise practised their youth in warlike exercises, after the manner of the Greekes and Egyptians, from whence he was descended.

To conclude, hee was so acceptable and welcome to them, that (to gratifie such a worthy benefactor) they agreed to call the Island Gathelus, and after his wife Scotia. This is one opinion, but yet incredible, not onely to Humphrey Lluid, but also to other learned men, and diligent searchers of Antiquities; by reason of the sundry arguments of improbability, as well in the miscount of yeares, as other vnlikelhoods found therein, when the circumstances come to be duly examined, thoroughly weighed, and well considered. Yet certaine it is, that Ireland was anciently named Scotia, and the people Scots, as by diuers old writings it may be sufficiently proued: albeit, by what occasion it took first that name, or from whence they came, it is yet doubted. But to proceede with the History, as we finde it. The residue of Gathelus his people, which remained in Spain, founded the City of Bayon, in the Confinnes of Galicia, and replenished the Sea coastes of Spain, with store of inhabitants. And wel-neere about two hundred yeares, after their first arrivall there (when they were againe persecuted with multitudes of people) they began to fancie a new voyage: but whether at that time, or some other els, they crossed ouer into Ireland, is altogether vncertaine.

Notwithstanding, sure it is, that in the dayes of Gurguntius, King of the Brittaines, the cheefe Governour of Bayon, with four Brethren Spaniards, two of which are said to be Hibernus and Hermion, not the sonnes (as some thinke) of Gathelus (as Hector Boetius affirmeth) but some other perhaps, that were descended of him; who vnderstanding that diuers of the western Isles were empty of inhabitants: assembling a great company of men, women, and children, embarked with the same in three score great vessels, and directing their course Westwarde, hovered a long time on the Sea, about the Isles of Orkeney. At length, they met (by good hap) with Gurguntius, then returning from the conquest of Denmarke (as in the British history it appeareth) whom they besought in consideration of their want of victuals and other necessities (being such, as they were no longer able to endure the Sea, being cumbered with such store of women and children) to direct & appoint them some place, where they might inhabit: promising to hold the same of him, and to become liege-people to him and his heires for euer.

Gurguntius aduising with himselfe hereon, remembered, with what trouble he held the Irish in subiection, & conceiuing hope that these strangers might either subdue, or wholly destroy that vnruly generation; accepted & took those oathes of the Spaniards with hostages, & furnishing them & their ships, with all needfull things; set them ouer into Ireland, where, assisted with such Brittaines as Gurguntius had appointed to go with them for their guides: they made a conquest of the whole country, & leded themselves joyfully therein.

Some write, that Ireland was (before that present) void of all inhabitants: but yet they agree, that these Spaniards were guided thither by the Brittaines, & vnder such conditions as before is recited. Vnderby it appeareth, that the kings of Britain had an elder right to the realm of Ireland, then by the conquest of K. Henry 2. which title they euer maintained, & sometimes prevailed in pursuit thereof, as in the daies of K. Arthur, to whom the Irish (as in diuers histories is remembered) acknowledged their due subiection, with payme of their tribute, & making their appearance at the city, called in the British tongue, Caeir Lheon. Whereunto, when their free assent, the submission of their Princes, with lawfull conquest & prescription are annexed, an inuincible title must needs be enforced.

But now to our purpose. The Spaniards substantially assisted with the Brittaines, settled themselves, and diuided their seats in quarters; the foure Brethren reigning severally apart in sundry portions, with good quietnesse, and encrease of wealth: vntill pride & ambition armed two of them, against the other two; as Hibernus and one of his brethren, against Hermion and his Brother. In this dissension, Hermion slew his brother Hibernus: of whom, at the same time (as some hold) the country was named Hibernia. Although some are of opinion, that it tooke name of Iron, by plentifull Mines of that kinde of Metall, wherewith the land abounded: & so those Authors of Antiquity, which call it Ierna, name it more aptly after the speech of the inhabitants, then others which call it Hibernia.

Proceede wee now to Hermion, who to auoyde the ill opinion of men, by attaining thus to the Soueraignty, making his way through his brothers blood most vnaturally, and in an vnhappy Ciuill Warre: purged himselfe to his subiects, that neither maliciously, nor contentiously, but for his necessarie defence and safety, hee had borne Armes against his brethren. And to witnesse, how farre he was from all desire to rule alone: hee appointed certaine Captaines, as Kings, to rule (vnder him) severall Countreyes: referring to himselfe but one fourth part, and the portion of Meth, allotted to the Monarchy, for the better maintenance of his estate.

Ireland diuided into five Kingdomes: And one four-raigne Ruler ouer the rest.

These parts appointed fourth in this wife, at length grew to five Kingdomes, Leinster, Connaght, Ulster, and Mounster diuided into two parts, and sometime to more, by vsurping and compounding among themselves: but euer, one was chosen to bee chiefe Soueraigne Monarch ouer them all. Thus it seemeth certainly, that the Spaniards of the North parts of Spain, inhabiting about the Countries of Biscay and Gallicia, came and peopled Ireland (as both their owne Histories, & the British do agree wholly) but from whence they came first, to inhabit those Countries of Spain, cannot by me be aouched. For no other Writers (but such as haue registred the Scottish Chronicles) make mention of Gabriel his coming thither, with Scots his Wife, and their people, as by the said Chronicles is pretended.

An hundred and thirty cheefe Kings from Hermion to Laogirius.

An hundred and thirty cheefe Kings are reckoned of this Nation, from Hermion to Laogirius, the sonne of Nealus Magnus; in whose time, that holy esteemed man, S. Patricke conuerted them to Christianity. But now, while the Irishmen liued in some tollerable rest & order, vnder their feuerall Kings; one Rodericke, a Scythian Prince (with a small company of men, being weather-driuen about the Coasts of Britaine) was by chance cast vpon the thore of Ireland. These were Picts, and the very first that had bin heard off in those parts (as some good Authors haue recorded) a people (euen from their cradle) naturally addicted to contention, land-leapers, mercilesse, fierce and hardy. They being brought & presented to the Irish King, desired Interpreters; which being granted them; Roderick their chiefe Commander and Leader, made this request for him and his, as followeth.

The Oration of Roderick, King of the Picts, to the King of Ireland.

Or as degenerate, or falling from the courage of our Ancestours, but following our felues to Fortunes conuise; we are become to craue of Ireland (as humble suppliants) who neuer before this present, haue embased our felues to any other Nation. Behold Sir King, and regard vs well: no light occasion causeth these lustie bodies to stoop. Scythians we are, and Picts of Scythia; no small portion of glory remaineth in these two names. What shall I speake of the civill warres, that hath expelled vs from our native homes, or rip up olde Histories, to moue strangers to bemoane vs? Let our seruants and children discourse thereof at lesure. Our instant motion is, to grant vs some time of abode in your Land, for which effect & purpose, our vrgent necessity beseecheth your fauour: A King, of a King, and men of men, are to craue assistance.

Princes can well discern and consider, how neere it toucheth their honour and reputation, yea, and their owne surety, to behold and releue the state of a King, decayed by treason. And manifest it is to all men of reasonable consideration, that nothing more befcometh the nature of men, then to be moued with compassion: yea, euen (as it were) to feele themselves hurt, when they heare and vnderstand of other mens calamities. Admit then (we beseech you) and receive among yee, these few scattered remnants of Scythians. If your roomes be narrow, we are not many: If the soile of your Country be barren, we are borne and inured to hardnesse: If you live in peace, wee are at your command as subiects: If you warre, we are ready to serue you as Soliaiers. We demand no Kingdome, no State, no pompous triumph in Ireland. We are here alone, and haue left such vanities behinde vs with our enemies. Howsoeuer you esteeme of vs, we shall content our felues therewith, and learne so to frame our likings to yours: as calling vnto minde, what we haue bene, not what we are.

Great consultation was had about the request of these strangers, & many things debated to and fro. In conclusion, the Irish gaue forth for answer, the opinion of their Antiquaries, such as were skillfull in olde Histories, & graue sayings of their Elders. Whereby they gathered, that it could not be expedient for the, to accept the Scythians into their Land; because commixture of Nations in any Realme, bringeth quarrels. Moreover, the multitude of their owne Inhabitants was such, that roome in the whole Ile was scarce able to receiue them: and therefore those few new commers, being placed among Dreadfull he deliuereth of what country they are, and what manner of people in the Country.

Princes can best iudge how to succour and releue one another in these.

Misery is very apt in making theues of great humilation.

In doubtfull cases it is alwayes good to consult with deliberation & aduice mong for many ancient Inhabitants, might quickly breed disturbance to bring all out of ioynt, neuerthelesse, they returned them this answer.

The Answer of the Irish King, to the Oration made by King Rodericke.

WE haue considered on your request, as also those extremities vrging thereto: And though we may not conveniently receiue you among vs; yet shall you finde vs ready in furthering ye to our neighbours. Not farre hence lyeth the great Ile of Britaine, in the North-part whereof (being vnde of Inhabitants) your manhood and pollicie may purchase roome, to place your felues at your ease. We shall appoint Captaines to guide you thither, and wee shall assist yee with our Forces in that Countrey. Make ready your Shippes, that you may passe thither with all convenient speed.

Wise men prevent their owne perils by putting the to others, so the Irish persuaded the Picts to place themselves in Britaine.

Marius, other wife called Auiragus King of the Britains slew King Roderick.

The Britains scorned to marry their daughters with the Picts lyth, and (by entreaty) obtained Wives from them, with condition, that if the Crowne should hap to fall in contention, they should yeelde thus much to the prerogative of the woman: that the Prince should bee elected rather of the blood Royall of the Female kinde, then of the Male. Which order (saith Beda) the Picts were very well knowne to keepe vnto his time.

Heere I could enter into a long, various and fruitfull discourse, concerning great combutions, warres and bloody contentions, happening (for a very long time) betweene the Irish, Picts and Scots: but being impertinent to my intended purpose, and little beneficiall to the Reader; I will first describe the parts and diuisions of Ireland into Shires and Counties, and then proceed to shew, how it receiued the Christian faith at the first.

Ireland became diuided into foure Regions; Leinster East; Connaght West; Ulster North; Mounster South: And into a fift plot, defalked from euery fourth part, yet mearing on each part, called thereof Media, Meeth, comprizing as well East Meeth, as West Meeth. Leinster butteth vpon England; Ulster vpon the Scottish Islands, which face with the Hebrides, scattered betweene both the Realmes: wherein (at this day) the Irish Scot, Successour of the elder Scythians, Picts or Red-shanke dwell th. Each of these fiue, where they are frame-able to ciuility, & answer the Writs of the Princes Courts; are sundred into Shires or Counties in this manner.

In Leinster lyeth the Counties of Dublyn, Kildare, Weisford or Gneisford, Catherlach, Kilkenny, the Counties of Leife and Ophalie, called the Kings and Queenes Counties: these two were so named by Parliament, in the Reignes of Phillip and Mary, hauing Shire-Townes concordant, as Phillips Towne, and Mary-Borough.

Connaght hath the County Clare. Ulster, the Counties of Louth, Downe, Antrim, one moiety of the Towne of Droghedagh (for the rest is in Meeth) and Carrigfergus.

In Mounster lyeth the Counties of Waterford, Limerike, Corke, the County Pallantine of Tipperary, Kerie, & the Crosse of Tipperarie. In clatter time, Mounster was diuided into East Mounster, Ormond, West Mounster, Desmond, South Mounster, and Tuomeund. Now the reason why Ireland was thus diuided, you haue heard already, by the five brethren arriving there, valiant and Martiall Gentlemen; Gandius, Genandius, Sagundus, otherwise named Gargandus, Ratheragus or Ratheranus and Slanius.

Another diuision of Ireland into the English Pale, and the Irish.

There was also another diuision of Ireland, into the English Pale, and Irishory. For, when Ireland was subdued by the English, diuers of the Conquerours planted themselves neere vnto Dublin, and the confines thereto adioyning, and so enclosing and impaling themselves (as it were) within certaine lists and territories; they forced away the Irish. Inſomuch, as that Country became neere English, and thereof it was termed the English Pale: which (in ancient time) stretched from Dundalk to Catherlagh or Kilkenny. But afterward, what by the slackneſſe of Marchers, and encroaching of the Irish enemy, the ſcope of the English Pale became greatly impaired, being cramped and caught into an odder corner of the Country, named Fingall; with a parcell of Meeth the Kings Land, the Countreies of Killare & Louth, which parts were applyed cheefely with good husbandry, and taken for the richest and chieftest ſoyles in Ireland. But Fingall eſpecially (from time to time) was alwayes ſo addicted to the chiefe points of husbandry; as that they became nicknamed by their neighbors (for their continual drudgery) Collonnes, of the Latine word Coloni, wherunto the clipp English word Clowne, ſeemeth to be anſwerable.

The company of the English Pale.

Fingall excell'd in husbandry.

Collonnes of Fingall clownes.

Fingall, and why it was ſo named.

The great civility in ancient times among the impaled dwellers.

The word Fingall counteruaileth in English, the race or ſepte of the English or ſtrangers, becauſe they were ſolyteized off that part of the Iſland, grying with their Talents that warre enſt to firmly; that from the Conqueſt, to this day, the Irish enemy could not rouse the thence. The Inhabitants of the English Pale, haue beene (in olde time) ſo much addicted to their civility, and ſo farre ſequestred from barbarous ſauagenneſſe; that their onely mother tongue was English. And truly, ſo long as theſe impaled dwellers, did ſunder themſelves (alwell in land, as in language) from the rude Irish rudeneſſe was day by day ſupplanted in the Country, civility engrafted, good lawes eſtabliſhed, loyalty obſerued, rebellion ſuppreſſed, &c. in the ende, the coine of a young English was like to thoſe in Ireland. But when their poſterity became not altogether to wary in keeping, as their Anceſtors were valiant in conquering; the Irish language became free denized in the English Pale.

This canker tooke ſuch deepe roote, that the body, which before was whole and ſound: became ſeſtered by little and little, and (in a manner) wholly putrified. And not only this parcel of Ireland grew to that civility; but Water alſo, and the greater part of Mounſter. Albeit, of all other places, Waterford, with the territory baied, and percloſed within the River called the Pill, was ſo quite eſtranged from Irishory (which was rare in thoſe dayes) that it a trauailer of the Irish, had pitcht his foote within the Pill, and ſpoken Irish; the Waterfordians would command him forthwith, to turne the other ende of his tongue, and ſpeake English, or elſe to bring his Troughman with him. But afterward, they ſo acquainted themſelves with the Irish, making a mingle-mangle of both languages, that (commonly) the Inhabitants of the meaner ſort, grew to ſpeake neither good English nor good Irish.

Wee come now to declare, in what manner Ireland came to receiue the chriſtian faith: And finde, that immediately after Chriſts time, Saint James the Apoſtle & other, trauailing into theſe West parts; did firſt enſtruct the Irish people, and teach them the glad tydings of the Goſpel. So that diuers among them, euen then were chriſtened, and beleueed: but not in ſuch numbers (as may be thought) wherby it ſhould be ſaid, that the Country was generally conuerted. Notwithſtanding, the Scottiſh Chronicles deaueouch, that in the dayes of Finmacne their King, who departed this life in the year of our Redemption, 358, Ireland was conuerted to the faith, by this meanes.

A woman of the Pictiſh blood (ſay they) chanced in thoſe dayes to ſerue the Queene of Ireland; which woman herſelfe being a Chriſtian, firſt enſtructed her Queene and Miſtriſſe, in the faith & true points of Chriſtianity, & the Queene her Husband the King, who conuerted the whole Irish Nation. Howbeit, by the report of the Irish Writers themſelves, this ſhould not ſeeme altogether true.

The hereſie of Pelagius had great decayed Chriſtian faith in the West parts of the world.

For they affirmed, that their Country was rather ſtill eſteemed as one of the vn-chriſtend Iſles, till about the yeare of our Lord, foure hundred twenty and ſix: when Celeſtine, the firſt of that name, gouerned the See of Rome, who, on conference had with his Cleargie, touching the reſtoring of the Chriſtian faith in the West parts of the world (greatly there decayed by the hereſie of Pelagius) vnderſtood that Ireland alſo, by reaſon of diſtance from the heart of Chriſtendome, and rudeneſſe of the Nation; had receiued little fruit at all of true Religion, a thing much to be lamented.

Paladius made offer to go into Ireland, and therupon was conſecrated Biſhop.

Among other, that then were aſſembled to treat of thoſe matters, was one Paladius, Arch-deacon of Rome, who offered his charitable trauaile, towards the conuerſion of thoſe lands, whither it ſhould pleaſe them to appoynt him to goe. Celeſtine knowing the ſufficiencie of the man, conſecrated him Biſhop, authorized his journey by Letters vnder his Scale, furniſhed him wants, and aſſociating to him, ſuch religious perſons and others, as were thought neceſſary to aſſiſt him: deliuered vnto him the Bible with great ſolemneſſe, and other monuments, in furtherance of his good ſpede, for ſo long and tedious a iourney.

Paladius landed in the north of Ireland, and conuerted many to the Faith.

At length hee landed in the North of Ireland, from whence he hardly eſcaped (with life) into the Iſles adioyning, where he preached the Goſpell, and conuerted no ſmall number of Scots to the Chriſtian faith and beleefe; purging alſo that part which was chriſtened, from the infection of the Pelagians, as in the Scottiſh hiſtorie more at large appeareth. He was required by the Scots, that dwell in Britaine, to leaue the Iſles, and come ouer to them, there to enſtruct the people in the way of true ſaluation: to the which (with the Popes licence) he ſeem'd willing enough. And the biſhop of Rome, the more readily conſcended thereto, becauſe at that inſtant time, when Paladius was to depart: one Patrick attended at Rome, ſuing for licence to be ſent into Ireland.

Patrick ſent into Ireland, and Paladius appointed to go into Scotland.

The Pope therefore graunted, that Paladius might paſſe ouer to the Scottes in Britaine, and appoynted Patrick to goe (with authoritie from him) into Ireland, where, vpon his arriual, hee found the people ſo well bent to heare his admonitions (contrary to their accuſtomed forwardneſſe) that a man would haue imagined, vpon ſight of their readineſſe; that the Land had beene referred for him to conuert. And becauſe it pleaſed God, to beſtow ſuch an vniuerſall benefite on the Land, by his meanes; wee thought good (by following our Author herein) to touch ſome part of the courſe of his life.

This Patrick, in Latine called Patricius, was borne in the Marches betwene England and Scotland, in a Towne by the Sea ſide, named Eiburne, whoſe fathers name was likewiſe called Calphurnius, a Deacon, and ſonne to a Prieſt: his Mother, named Concher, was liſter to S. Martine, that famous Biſhoppe of Tours in France. Patrick (of a childe) was brought vp in learning, and well enſtructed in the faith, beeing much giuen to deuotion. The Irishmen (in thoſe daies) aſſiſted with ſome Scots and Pictiſh, were become arch-Pirats, greatly diſquieting the Seas about the Coaſts of Britaine, and vſed to ſacke little ſmall Villages, that lay ſcatteringly along the ſhore, and would leade away the Inhabitants captiue home into their Country. And as it chanced, Patrick being a Lad of ſixteen years olde, and a Scholler then in ſecular learning: was taken among other, and became ſlaue to an Irish Lord called Macbuſaine, from who (after the terme of ſixe yeares) he redeemed himſelfe, with a piece of gold, which he found in a clod of earth, that the ſwine had newly turned vp, as he followed the in the time of his captiuitie, beeing appointed (by his Maſter) to take charge of them, and keepe them.

And as affliction (commonly) maketh men religious; the regard of his former education, had ſtamped in him ſuch remorſe and humility, that beeing thenceforth weaned from the world: hee betooke himſelfe to contemplation, euer lamenting the lacke of grace and truth in that Land. And withall not deſpairing, but that (in continuance of time) ſome good might be wrought vpon them; hee learned the Language perfectly. And, alluring one of that Nation, to beare him company for exerciſe ſake; hee departed thence, and got him into France, euer hauing in his minde, a deſire to ſee the conuerſion uerion of the Irish people, whose babes yet vnborne, seemed to him in his dreaming, from forth their mothers wombs, to call for Christendome.

In this purpose, he fought out his vnkle Martine, by whose meanes he was placed with Germanus the Bith. of Auxerre, continuing with him as Scholler or Disciple for the space of fourtie yeares: all which time hee bestowed in the studie of holy Scriptures, Prayers, and such godly exercises. Afterwards, being renowned through the Latine Church, for his wisdom, vertue and learning: hee went to Rome, bearing Letters with him in his commendation from the French bishops vnto Pope Celestine, to whom hee vntered his whole minde and fecrer vow, which long before hee had conceived as touching Ireland. Celestine inuested him Archbishop and Primate of the whole Island, set him forward with all fauor he could deuise, bringing him and his disciples onward to their Countrey.

In the 23 yeare of the Emperour Theodosius the younger, being the yeare of our Lord, 430. Patrick landed in Ireland, and because he spake the tongue perfectly, and withall, being a reuerend personage in the eyes of all men; many listened and gaue eare to his preaching. And the rather, because (as some Writers haue recorded) he confirmed his Doctrine with diuerse miracles. But especially those men regarded his words before all others, that had some taste of the Christian Faith before, cyther by the coming into those partes of Paladius and his Disciple one A'niu, an Irish Bishop, or otherwise by some other. For, it is to be thought, that continually there remained some spak of knowledge of Christianity, euer since the first preaching of the Gospell, which was shortly after Christs Ascension, by S. James as before is mentioned. But in continuance of time, Patrick wonne the better part of that kingdome to the faith of Christ.

Laigerius son to Nealus the great Monarch, albeit he receiued not the Gospell himselfe; yet he permitted all that would to embrace it. But because he refused to be baptised, and apply to his doctrine; the Bishop denounced against him a curse from God accordingly, but yet tempered with mercy and iudgement, as thus: That during his life he should be victorious: but after him, neither should the kingdome stand, nor his lineage inherit. Thence he tooke his way to Conill, lord of Connagh, who honorably receiued him, and was conuerted with all his people; sending him afterward to his brother Lozen, king of Leinster, who he also conuerted. In Mounster he found great friendship, by the means of an Earle there, called the Earle of Daris, who honored him highly, & gaue him a dwelling place in the East Angle of Armagh, called Sorta, where he erected many Celles and Monasteries, both for religious men and women. He trauelled 30. yeares in preaching through the land, planting Bishops and Priests in conuenient places, whose learning and conuersation, by the speciall grace & fauor of God, established the Faith in that rude nation. Other 30. yeares he spent in his prouince of Armagh, among his brethren placed in those houses of Religion, which by his meanes were founded. So he liued (in all) about 122. yeares, and lyeth buried in Downe.

Now, concerning the chiefe cities and townes of Ireland, we are first to speake of Dublin, termed the beaurie and eye of Ireland. I find it recorded, that about the yere 155. three noble Easterlings, being brethren, arrived in Ireland, whose names were Auellanus, Sitaracus and Tuorus. Auellanus being the eldest brother, built Dublin; Sitaracus, Waterford and Tuorus, Limericke. Of the founder Auellanus, Dublin was termed Auellana, and after, by corruption of speech, Eblana, and so Palomus calleth it. Some termed it Dublin, other, Dublinia, many Dublinum, but Authors of better skill name it Dublinium. This citie, as it is not inferior for Antiquity to any in Ireland, so in pleasant situation, gorgeous buildings, multitude of people, martiall Chivalry, obedience and loyalty, abundance of wealth, largeness of hospitality, in manners and ciuilitie, it is superiour to all other cities and townes in that realme: whereupon it is commonly called, the Irish or yong London. The Charter of this citie is large, King Henry the 4. gaue it the Sword, in the yere 1409. and was ruled by a Maior and two Bailiffes: which were changed into Sheriffs, by a Charter granted by king Edward the sixth, 1547. But it appeares by the ancient Seale of this citie called Signum prepositurae, that the Citie hath (in elder times) bene gouerned

Waterford was founded by Sitaracus, in the yere 155. being a Citie properly builded, and very well compact. Both yong and old there are giuen to thriving, free from factions: the men deale in trafficke, the women in spinning & carding; and as they distill the best Aqua vite, so they spinne the cheefest Rugges in Ireland.

Of this Citie Waterford it is written, to haue continued loyall to the Crowne of England, that it is not found registred (in the Conquest) to haue bin stained with the smallest spot of treason, notwithstanding the sundry assaults of traiterous attempts. And therefore the Cities Armes are deckt with this golden word: Intacta manet.

Limericke, called in Latine Limericum, was builded by Tuorus, about the very same yere of 155. coasting on the Sea, hard vpon the River Sennan; whereby are most notably seuered Mounster and Connagh, the Irish name this Citie, Loumneagh, and therefore in English it is called Limericke.

Corke, in Latine Corcium or Corracium, the fourth Citie of Ireland, happily planted on the Sea: their Hauens being a Hauens royall. On the land-side they were so encumbered with euill neighbours, the Irish Out-laws, that they were faine to watch their gates hourly, to keepe them shut at seruice times, and at meales. And from Sun to Sun, not to suffer any stranger to enter the Citie with his weapon, but to leane it at a Lodge appointed.

Drogheda, accounted the best Towne in Ireland, and truly not farre behinde some of their Cities: the one moiety of this Towne is in Meeth, the other planted on the further side of the water, lyeth in Ulster.

There ranne a blinde Prophecie of this Towne, that Rosse was, Dublin is, Drogheda shall be the best of the three.

Rosse, a Hauens Towne in Mounster, not farre from Waterford, seeming to haue bene (in ancient time) a Towne of great port, whereof sundry and probable coniectures are giuen, by the olde Duchies, which are now a mile distant from the Walles of Rosse: betwene which walles and ditches, the reliques of the ancient Walles, Gates, and Towers (placed betweene both) are to bee scene vnto this day.

Weisford, a Hauens Towne not farre from Rosse, where of no great matters are recorded: but only that it is to be esteemed by all the English posterity planted in Ireland, as a Towne that was the first Fortresse and Harbour, of the English Conquerors, doing them (from time to time) many great and acceptable seruices.

Kilkenny, the best vpland, or (as they term it) the properest dry Towne in Ireland, is diuided into the high Towne, and the Irish Towne. The high Towne was builded by the English, after the Conquest, and had a parcell of the Irish Towne vnto it, by the Bishops grant, made vnto the Founders vpon their earnest request. Robert Talbot, a worthy Gentleman, in the yere one thousand foure hundred, enclosed with walles the better part of this Towne.

Thomas Towne, a proper Towne builded in the County of Kilkenny, by one Thomas Fitz-Antony, an Englishman: thereof the Irish call it Ballie mac-Andin, that is, The Towne of Fitz-Antony. But because the Reader may perceiue, in what parts of the Countrey the Cities and cheefe Townes stand, I haue set them downe in this order.

Drogheda, Curragh-fargus, Downe, Armagh, A'plasse, Clogher, Muncipian, Doonnegaulle, Karreg mac Raffe, Nerrie, Carlingford, Ardee, Downe-falke, Louth, Dublin, Buhradrie, Liske, Swords, Tushagard, Lions, Newcastle, Rathconle, Oughtraide, Natts, Clane, Minnab, Kilcocke, Rathmunn, Kildare, Llanane, Casfle-Towne, Phillips-Towne, May-borough, Kilcullen, Castle-Martin, Thistleclermet, Kilca, Athie, Catherlagh, Leighelen, Gauranne, Thomas Towne, Eneish ke, Casfle, Callanet, Kilkenny, Knockstefor, Rosse, Glennelle, Weisford, Ferner, Fidderd, Enisford, Talbotown, Wicklow, Acklols, Waterford, Lismore, Doonagarron, Yoghill, Corke, Limericke, Kilmallocke, Alonana, Gallogie, Anrick, Loughbrigh, Clare, Toome, Stagagh, Rosse comman, Arlowme, Trimme, Droghadblenne, Rathlouth, Nanunee, Dooge, Scrine, Taragagh, Kilmeeles, Doonboine, Greenocke, Dulceke, Alotigare, Fowra, Konghene, Kilkenny, Meinagagh, Delunne.

Patrick*, that conuerted the Country) to the Archbishoppricke of Armagh, who is called Primas totius Hibernie, and the Archbishop of Dublin, Primas Hibernie. Which custome was since confirmed by Engelmus the third, in Anno 1148. or 1152. Who lent withal three other palles of Archbishopps to be placed, one at Dublin, one at Cashill, and the last at Twene.

To these were Suffraganes in right, nine and twenty, and they all to the Primas of Armagh. Vnder whose Prouince are the Bishops of Meeth and Derren, Ardach, Kilmore, Cloghere, Downe, Coner, Clenknos, Raboo, Dromore.

CHAP. II.

A briefe Discourse, how those parts and Countries, commonly called, The New World, were first found: Also by whom, and what things were there found, and seen, and brought away thence.

Caruall sayling on the Spanish Seas, where fell a tempest, coming so impetuously from the East, the Windes growing still so crosse and contrary; that at length it was transported into an unknowne Country,

The Windes and Weather will be Commanders at Sea.

which neuer was in any Cardes for Navigation. Staying there longer time, then was or could be allowed for returnings, no more remayned living then the Pilote or Maister, and three or foure Mariners beside: who also falling sicke, by extremitie of hunger and tedious labour, dyed also at a Port some few daies distance from thence.

But the Pilote, whose name was Andaluza, dyed in the house of one Christopher Columbus, a native of Cuzcuero, (as some others say) of Albizolo, a small village on the river of Genes, neare to Sauona. With this Columbus remayned all the Pilotes goods of the sayd Caruall, and especially the Papers and Memories of that whole voyage, reporting the height of the lands, which by them had beene discovered, and found. Some say, that the sayd Andaluza trafficked in Canaria and Madera, when this long and farall navigation happened.

Others also tearme him a Biscane, which dealt with England and France: and some repute him a Portuguese, that went and came from Myrrha or India. Others againe report, that the said Caruall went into Portugall, or to Madera, and other Islands; but none doe assure any thing for certaine. It is no maruell then, if Authors do disagree in many points, concerning things happening, or found by graue Antients, and that the Inuencers of them are not to be knowne; when our selues are ignorant of matters, within the compasse of so small time since, for finding the Occidentall or Westerne Isles (which we call the New-found World) and which was a matter so signall, nouell, and remarkable.

But all agree together, that this Andaluza dyed in the house of the sayd Christopher Columbus; who hauing (at the first) bene a Saylor or Mariner, had practised in diuers parts of the world. Afterward, hee learned diligently the measure of the two Tropiques, of the Equator, and of the Clymates, prouing an expert Maister, in making Cardes to sayle by. And to be informed concerning the Meridional coasts of Affrica, and of other places where the Portugalls had sayled: he went into Portugall, to the end he might make his Cardes the better, and there he married. Or, as some say, in the Ile of Madera: where it may be credited (as most likely) that he dwelt when the said Caruall coasted there; and the Patron or Pilote thereof lodged in his house, where he recounted to him the voyage he had made, and the new lands by him discovered: to the end that Columbus might set them downe in his Cardes, wherein he was further entrusted by him.

It is generally supposed, that Columbus was a learned man, a good Geographer, very singularly experienced in Astronomy and Cosmography; and that he laboured to finde the land of the Antipodes, and El Rico Cango de Marco Polo. Moreover, he was often heard to say, that (necessarily) by good coniectures, there was another world, which extended it selfe towards the West: whereof Plato, Seneca, and many other Authors, both Greek and Latin, did leaue to Cosmographers some good and considerable arguments. Also, that he had read many good ancient Authors, who, in the place where they discourse on the great Atlantick Isle, make mention of a land unknowne and concealed, more great then Asia or Affrica. And especially Aristotle, writing, that certaine Merchants of Carthage, sayling in those parts of Gibraltar, towards the West & South, after many dayes, found a great Island inhabited, with Ruers navigable.

But, after all this so diuersly deliuered, on the behalfe of Columbus, it is most certaine, that he was not learned, but of good iudgement and vnderstanding, and receiving notice of these new Lands, by the means of Andaluza; he conferred with diuers learned and iudicious men, concerning what had aunciently bene written of other lands and worlds. And the sayd Columbus, wanting means to bring to passe what he so earnestly desired, because he was poore; stood in neede of some farre greater fauour, whereby hee might discover those lands.

Perceiving then, that the King of Portugall was hindered by his enterprize of Affrica, & navigation into the East, which he had then in readines, and that the king of Castile was busied about the warre of Granada: he sent his brother, named Bartholomew, to Henry the seauenth, king of England, a very rich and potent Prince, (who had at that present time no warres or troubles) to furnish him with fauour and shippes apt and fit for the enterprize, promising to bring him home from those unknowne Islands (and in final time) y^e valuable treasures. But Bartholomew returning thence without any resolution; he began to negotiate with Alphonso the fifth King of Portugal: of whom he could neither have favour nor money, to finde such wealth as he had promised; because the Bishop of Evora, and one Master Roderick, men greatly experienced in Cosmography, contrariet him therein, confidently assuring; that there could not bee in the West any such gold or treasure, as Columbus spake of.

Being much dismayed and out of comfort (yet his heart encouraging him still, with hope of a happy and successful adventure) and being imbarqued at Lisborne: hee set thence to Paly de Moguera, where he spake with Alphonso Pinzono, a Pylot well skild in the arte of Navigation: there also he discovered his secret to John Perez, a Fryar Minor, in the Convent of S. Frances de la Rubida, a most excellent Cosmographer. These men encouraged him to follow his enterprize, counselling him further, to impart the businesse to Henry, Duke of Medina Sidonia, and then to Loarick, Duke of Medina Calia, who, in his Port of S. Maria, had good and commodious meanes to provide Shipping, and people apt for such a businesse. But these two Dukes helde this Voyage and Navigation, for no other then as a dreame or phantasma; even as the Kings of England and Portugall did. In regard whereof, the poore grey Fryar advised him to goe to the Court of the Catholique King, and (on his behalfe) wrote to Fryar Ferdinando de Talaneta, Confessor to the Queene.

Columbus followed this aduice of the Fryar, and came to the Court of Castile, in the yeare 1486. and (by written petition) presented both his sight and demand, to King Ferdinand and Queen Elizabeth, who made no great account thereof; as having their mindes troubled, for expelling the *Moor*es out of Granada. He grew then to speake with some, that had neerer eare about the King, and were of most employment with his Maiessty, to negotiate in affaires of importance. But because he was a stranger, meanly habited, and without any other credit, then being commended by a poore Fryar Minor: he was no way beleened, and much worse listened vnto; whereat Columbus grew very greatly displeased.

Alphonso Quintanilla, Great Chamberlaine or Treasurer to the King, kept him in his house, and dieted him at his owne table, taking great delight to heare him talke of such things, as he made promise of in unknowne Countries. By the helpe of this Great Treasurer, Columbus found the meanes to haue access to audience with Gonzales de Mendoza, arch-Bishop of Toledo, and Cardinall, who had great credit and authority with their Maiessties. This Lord brought him to the Kings presence, and, after the case was well examined and understood (notwithstanding all was esteemed vaine and false, which Columbus had spoken off in the beginning) yet hope was giuen him of expedition, and employment in his voyage of Navigation, to those Islands unknowne, so soone as the King had taken order for the war of Granada, which then lay heavily on his hand.

Columbus, vpon this answer, began to mount his hopes farre higher then before, and was then graciously both heard and esteemed of all the Courtiers, who laughed and made a mockery of him at the first. After the surprisall of Granada, he prevailed so successfully, that the Catholique King consented vnto his requests, for passage into those unknowne parts: assigning vnto him in gift, the tenth part of the Rents and Royall tributes, in all the Lands found and conquered: but without prejudice (notwithstanding) to all rights belonging to the King of Portugal. And because the King was then vnprovided of money for this expedition; Lodowick, Secretary for his accounts, lent him seuentene thousand Ducats: by meanes whereof, Columbus armed & furnished three Caruells at Paly de Moguera, and in them fitted 120. men, diuall Mariners as Soldiers.

Of one, hee made Martino Alphonso Pinzono the Guide and Conductor. Of the second, Francesco de Vincento Aeneis, Brethren to the said Martino. And himselfe was Captain and Commander of the greatest Caruell among them; taking also with him his Brother Bartholomew, who (in like manner) was very practicke and well experienced on the Seas. Paly

Paly he set forward on Friday, being the third day of August, and held on his voyage betweene the West and South, passing by Gomera, one of the Canary Islands, where he stayed for a small refreshing; & thence onward, followed the directions giuen him in the papers and memories of deceased Abulhuza.

Having sayled eight dayes, he espied so much grasse or Herbage, as if it seemed to be a Meadow; whereof (at first) he & all grew doubtfull, although there was no danger at all, and backe they would haue returned, but that they saw diuers Willow trees a farr off, which gaue an euident and most certaine signe, that some Land must needs be neere.

On the morrow following, which was the eleuenth day of Nouember, in the yeare 1492, Rodericke de Triana, began to cry out aloud, Land, Land: at which words, all ran to see whether they were true or no; and having likewise discovered that it was firme Land, they beganne to praise GOD, and sung Te Deum Laudamus, mourning euen with great excess of ioy, and proud of a hopefull proceeding.

The first land which they saw, was Guanahany, one of the Iles Lucayas, situated betweene Florida and Cuba, where suddenly they went on shoare, and there tooke possession of the New world. From Guanahany they went to Barucon, the Port of Cuba, & there tooke some Indians, and returning backe to the Isle of Haiti, cast anchor in the Port, which Columbus called Porte Royall. There hastily they were faine to land againe; because the chief Caruell smote against a rocke, and began to rift; but yet no person was in perill. When the inhabitants of the Isle saw the Spaniards come on shoare so speedily, and with their Armes: they fled from the sea side vnto the Mountaines, imagining them to bee the Carybes or Canibales, that came to assault them.

After them ran the Spaniards, as hastily as they might, and yet could take none but one woman, vnto whom they gaue Bread, Wine, and Confittes, as also a smocke, and other Garments, because she was naked, and so sent her away after the rest. She went and told her country people, how kindly they had bin vsed, shewing them the gifts bestowed vpon her:

which caused them presently to come downe againe to the Sea side, to speake with the Spaniards, without any understanding on either side, otherwise then by signes, euen as dumbe folke vse to do. They brought Birds, Bread, Fruits, Gold, and other things, to giue in exchange for Ballads, Beads, Glasses, Needles, Sizers, Pinnes, and other such like things, to the no little ioy and comfort of Christopher Columbus, who saluted, embraced, & reuerently entreated the Lord of that land, being of his people called Cachico. & gifts passed betwene one another, in signe of loue and amity.

The Indians brought boats of their owne, wherein to bellowe the goodnes of the cheefe Caruell that was broken, and brought them on Land with the Spaniards, so louingly, euen as if they hadde dwelt all their life time among them: falling downe in reuerence to the Crosse, and beating themselves on the breasts, like vnto Christians.

Now Columbus, thinking no time soon enough for his returne to Spaine, with newes to the Catholique King, of what he had seene and done, prevailed so wel with the prompt and sodaine consent of Cachico, and the assistance of his subjects: as to build a Castle of Wood and Earth; wherein hee left eight and thirty Spaniards, vnder the charge of Captaine Rodrigo d'Arna, of Cordona: to the end, that during his voyage, they might learne the Language and secrets, both of the Nation and Countrey. And this was the first inhabiting of the Spaniards in the Indies.

The Castle being finished, Columbus tooke with him tenne Indian men, forty Parrats, many Tortoises, Conies, and other strange things, farre differing from ours in forme and nature, as testimonies of the places where hee had found them. He brought aboard also into his ships, all the Golde which the people of the countrey had giuen him, in exchange of those toys and trifles which hee returned for them. And, after hee had taken leaue of his friendly Companions, appointed to remaine there in his absence, as also of Guacanari (for so was the Cachico or King of that Countrey named) who was verie sorry and loath, that hee should depart thence, he sent away with two Caruells, wherein

The Catholike King and queene were then at Barcellona, whither Columbus went to see them; and although it was a long way, and he had many things to carry: yet notwithstanding, they were all conveyed with him by Land, and hee was welcomed vnto the Court with great Honour. Infinite people flocked about him, to see the things which hee brought from the New-found Worlde, which were of extraordinary wealth and riches, beside the strange men, of such colour and habit, as neuer hadde the like beene seene before. Some sayde, that hee had found the Navigation, concealed from the Carthaginians. And others affirmed it, to be that which Plato had written of to bee lost by fortune, and by an ouer-great quantity of mudde or slime increasing in the Sea. Some other helde another opinion, saying, That that which Seneca had foretold was now accomplished, speaking in his Tragedy of Medea after this manner. The time will come, that (manie yeares hence) New worldes shall be found, and that their Toile could not bee the furthest part of the earth.

gedy Medea.

Finally, Columbus entered the Court of Spaine, the third day of April, a yeare after he had departed thence, presenting to their Maiesties, the Golde and all things else which he had brought from the New World; whereat the King, Queene, and all then present, marvelled not a little, to see such rare things, all (but the gold) nouell and vnaccustomed vnto theyr sight. They highly commended the Parrats, being of many goodly colours; some of an extraordinary shining green, others of a liuely red or Vermillion colour, intermixed with many other of choise splendour, little or nothing at all resembling them that were brought from other places. The Conies were small, having their eares and tayles like vnto Rats, and their colour grizeld. Also they greatly praised the Cockes of those Countreies, being farre more beautifull then Pea-cockes, wondering besides, that those Countreies yielded no other Corne, and no other bread was gett felde on there, but such as

Very attentive was the King, to heare what a worthy Relation Columbus made, wondering greatly, that the people shold haue no Habite, Learning, Mony, Iron, Corne, Wine, neyther any Animall which was greater then a Dogge, nor Shippes or Boates of any bignesse. And much was his patience moued, when he heard him tell, that they did eate one another, being all Idolaters. But hee promised, that if God pleased to blesse him with life and health: he would free them from that horrible inhumanity, and root Idolatrie out of those Lands, that could bee reduced vnder his dominion and power. In like manner, hee extended great fauour and courtesie to Columbus, commanding that he should sit down before him, because (according to the custome of Spaine) the Gentlemen and other attendants, stand alwayes in the Kings presence, for greater honour to the Royall authority.

Moreover, he confirmed his grant and priuiledge, concerning the tenth part of reuenues in the said Lands, giuing him the title and Office of Admirall of the Indias, and made his Brother Bartholomew Lieutenant or vice-Admirall to him. All which beeing done, a Courrier or Poaste was dispatched vnto Rome, with letters concerning the New-found lands, to his Maiesties ambassadors, whom (but some few months before) he had sent to congratulate Pope Alexander the fixt, at his new creation, and (on his behalfe) to do him obeyance. Which letters of full and further information, they deliuered to his Holinesse; he not a little reioycing at these good newes, as the like did all the Roman Court. In regard whereof, the holy Father, with consent of the whole Colledge of Cardinals, made a new donation to the Kings of Castile and Leon, of all the Isles and firme landsthat should be found in the West: with charge to send Preachers thither, for conuersion of the Infidels.

When the Catholike King had receyued this ioyfull answer from the Pope, he sent Christopher Columbus againe, with more store of people, for further trafficking in this New-found World, and for vtter destruction of Idolatry, and adoration giuen to false Gods. For the better furtherance hereof, by John Fonsequedo, Deane of Sinell, he sent eight Caruelles, making him President of those countries. He sent also twelue Priestes, of vertuous life, and good learning, with Friar Bartolo Catellano, of the order of S. Benedict, who went to be Vicar-Generall for the Pope: to the end, that those Ecclesiasticall persons might preach the word of God, conuertyng the people to the Faith of Iesus Christ, and do all things appertaining to the conuersion of soules.

The King caused also (at his own charge) to be bought some store of Horses, Kine, Sheepe, Goates, Swine, and Affes, that breed might there ensue of them. Great store also was sent of Wheate, Barly, and Graine of all kindes to sowe; with Slips, Sprigs of Vines, Sugar Canes, and Plants of sweete fruites, as also Chalk and Lime to build withall. In breefe, they carried diuers other things for the like needefull vses; entertaining into this seruice 1500. Proceeding on in his voyage, & much more neere to the Equinoctiall then hee did before in his first passage, he came to arrive and take landing in an Island, which he termed by the name of Desire, and without any staying there, won the Port D'Argent, in the Isle called Hipaniola. Passing on thence to Porte Royale, where he had left the eight and thirte Spaniards, who were all slaine by the Indians, because they had lustfully forced their wives and done them many outrages besides. Columbus being displeased hereat, yet shewing no outward discontentment, immediately commanded his Malons & other men to fall to worke, for the building of a Towne, which (in honour of the Queene) he named Isabella.

Hee sent likewise many Parrats, very faire and goodly, and certaine Indian Caribes, being such as fed on the flesh of men, bred and born in the Island of Ajay, which hee called Santa Cruz, and hee himselfe, went with three Caruels more, to finde out other Lands: where he found Cubo on the South-side, and Lianianca, with other small Isles in diuers parts.

At his returne backe, he found many Spaniards dead and sicke, and some that hadde carried themselves scarily home with their companions: whereof he commanded some to bee hanged, and others to be well beaten, that had giuen forth euill speeches of him. By means whereof, he had some talke with the Vicare to the Pope, who had written to the King; accusing Columbus of cruelty and countenance: which caused his Maiestie to send thither his Chamberlain Iohn de Agnado, who sent Columbus into Spaine prisoner, to render an account of his behaiour to the King.

Greatly did the King both commend and thanke him for his good ſenſe, and knowing, that hee had doone no more then iuſtice, declared him to be abſolved of all imputations layed vnto his charge, furniſhing him with eight ſhippes, for the finding out of other Countries: two whereof Columbus ſent before with victualles and munition, and with the other three ſhippes, himſelfe ſet away from Saint Luca de Barrameda, about the end of the month of Maie, in the year of our Lord God, one thouſand foure hundred ninctie and ſeauen. And becauſe fame and rumour of Indian treaſure did ſpread it ſelfe, exciting diuers Pirates of France to make voyages abroad: hee went to Madera, and from thence hee ſent three ſhippes, by the right way, for the Iſland called Hipaniola, with three hundred baniſhed men; and with the other three ſhippes, he went vnto the Iſle of Cape de Verde, to make his voyage very neare to the Aequinoctiall, arriving at the laſt in a great Countrey of firme land. On hee went coaſting three hundred leagues, beyond the Cape with full ſayle, and thwarting the Sea, came to Saint Dominico, a towne belonging to his brother Bartholomew, where hee was receiued to be gouernor, as was contained in his Letters of priuiledge and grant, which the King Catholique had made vnto him, and which hee brought thither with him. Albeit hee were much diſpleaſed thereat, and his brother Bartholomew did not greatly like it: becauſe (in his abſence) till now, he had the care and managing of all affaires.

Columbus hauing taken on him the gouernement, and made many enterprizes againſt them of the Countrey, finding out many other Iſlands beſides; grew to be enuied by the Spaniards, and in ſuch fort, that a man named Roldan Simenes (a great Potefſtate or Iudge) mutined againſt him, and threeſcore and ten men more, all leagued and coniuſed againſt him, who forſaking Columbus, went to Siracusa, and wrote infinite euilles of him and his brethren to the King. His Maieſtie, beeing not a little moued, that matters ſhould be thus combuſtious in the Indies, and the Queene raking it very heauily: ſuddenly ſent Franceſco de Bonadello, a knight of good repute, to be gouernour in thoſe parts, and giuing him authoritie, eyther to puniſh or imprifon the faultie.

This man came to the Iſland of Hipaniola, and foure Caruells with him, in the year, one thouſand foure hundred ninctie and nine; and after hee had made inquisition in the Citie of Dominico, he ſent Chriſtopher Columbus, with Bartholomew and Diego his brethren, all priſoners to Spaine, with yron fetters on their feete. Being landed at Cadez, they were deliuered, by Commiſſion ſent from the King, and commanded to appeare at the court. Columbus readily obeyed thereto, and could ſo well ſhape his excuſes (mingled with teares and ſighes very paſſionately) that the King hauing heard him, and knowing his fidelitie, ſent him againe (three yeares after) with foure Caruells, to diſcouer more new Countries, and this was in the year of our Lord God, 1502. or thereabouts.

Columbus being come to the Iſland of Hipaniola, and arriving neare to the riuer Ozama, Nicholas de Onanda Gouernour of the Iſle, would not ſuffer his entrance into the Citie of Saint Dominico, whereat Columbus being much diſtaſted, ſent in to tell him: That if he might not come into the citie, which he himſelfe had cauſed to be builded; he would goe finde out another Port, where he might be in better affurance. So parting thence, and couering to ſearch the Straits, for paſſing beyond the Aequinoctiall, which he had promiſed the King to doe: hee drew directly towards the Weſt, withall, turning to the Cape of Niguerra, following till the Meridionall coaſt, returning then to Cuba, and aliter to Lianues, where hee loſt two Gallies, and with two other hee went to diſcouer new lands. But not without great haimes and perils endured before, for ſome of his followers grew ſicke, and certaine other Spaniards made warre vpon him.

Franceſco de Porras, Captaine of one Galley, and Diego, brother to Columbus, hauing taken certayne ſmall Barkes, went towards the Iſle of Hipaniola: where the Natiues and Inhabitants ſeeing them, would admit them to haue no victuals, but laide trappes and raines to kill them. Whereuppon, Chriſtopher Columbus calling ſome of them to him, reproued their lacke of kindneſſe and charity, entreating them to ſell him ſome victuals; aduiſing them further, that except they did ſuccor them, all they in the Iſland ſhould dye of the plague. And to giue them a ſigne as witneſſe of his words, he tolde them, that ſuch a day it would come to paſſe; as they ſhould ſee the Moone whollie as red as bloode, and quite contrarie to her former condition.

Afterwardes, when they behelde the Moone Ecclipted, at the ſame houre of the day, as Columbus had foretolde (not knowing any rules of Aſtologie) they verily beleued his words. And, craving pardon of him, deſired him not to be offended with them; & brought him what victuals he could deſire. By this meanes, Columbus hauing gotten the victorie againſt thoſe Spaniards, gaue a name vnto the Port, calling it Porta S. Gloria.

Returning home afterward into Spain, to yeelde an account of all that hee had done, being arrived at Vallyadolid; a ſickenneſſe ſeized on him, whereof hee dyed in May in the year, 1506. and was entred at Seuill, in the Monaftery of the Charter-houſe Monkes. During his life time, he was a man very patient in all his Trauails, and in foure voyages which hee made into the Indies, both founde and conquered many Countries, viterly vnknowne before: beſide, hee builded a great part of the Towns and Caſtles in the Iſle of Hipaniola, purchaſing great renowne, by bringing to end many actions, ſo well deſerving glory and fame; that his name can neuer be forgotten, or Spaine ceaſe to ſpeake, in giuing him ſuch true honour as hee worthily merited.

He had two Sonnes, Don Diego, who was married to Madam Maria of Toledo, daughter to Don Ferdinando, great Commandadore of Leon; and Don Ferdinando, who was neuer married, but hee had a Library, conſiſting of more then twelue thouſand Volumes, and which (at this

As for King Ferdinand, he dyed in the year of our Lord, one thouſand five hundred and fixteene, hauing reigned fortie and two yeares, in the two kingdomes of Caſtile and Aragon: Queene Elizabeth his wife dyed before him, in the year of our Lord God, 1604.

Before wee cloſe vp this Diſcourſe of the New-found World, it ſhall not varie much from the matter, to ſpeake of a ſtrange opinion, among the people there naturally liuing, concerning the firſt men that euer were in the world, and likewiſe of the generall Flood or Deluge, as I doe finde it ſet downe by the worthy Gentleman of France Anthony du Perdier, lord of Vaprinaz, in this manner.

Among the Inhabitants of the VVeſt Indies, or New world, a common and generall receiued opinion was embraced with them, that (at the beginning of the world) from the Septentrionall or Northerne partes, there came a man called Con, or Conon, who had no bones in his whole body, and therefore went verie quicke and lightly, much ſhortening the wayes, abating the hills and mountaines, and raiſing the lowe-layd vallics, onelic with his word and will, and named himſelfe to be the ſonne of the Sunne.

This man filled the earth with men and women, which he produced, giuing vnto them diuers fruites, and other things neceſſary for humane life. But by a diſpleaſure hee receiued from them, hee conquered the earth (which hee before had freely giuen them) into a drie and barren ſandy, and tooke away the raine alſo, that it ſhould neuer more ſhowe downe, nor moiſture any place. Yet, as pitying their miſery, he left them riuers onely, to the end, that they might conſerue themſelues, in watering the grounds by theyr owne paine and labour.

At length came one Pachama, who was like-wiſe ſonne both to the Sunne and Moone, and (hauing expelled or baniſhed Conon) conquered thoſe men into Carres, and afterward created other men. The people tooke this man to be a God, and ſo he was generally reputed: vntill the Chriſtians came into thoſe countries, hauing erected a very good Temple vnto him, him, neare to Lima, it being the most renowned in all those lands: because of extraordinary deuotion there vsed, in regard of Oracles and Answers, which euells gaue to Priests and Sacrificers there dwelling in diuers places. The Spaniards carried away all the golde and siluer (in won-derfull heapes) out of this Temple, and all the Oracles and Visions ceased, diuine prayers hauing bene sayd there, the Sacraments administred, and the Crosse placed where the Idolles stood, which could no mean maruell and feare among the Indians.

Moreover they sayd, that at a certaine time it rained so extremely, that all the lowe grounds and lands were drowned, and all the world likewise: except such as could hide themselves within some caues, which were among the high mountaines, hauing little doores or mouthes of entrance, and closed so fast to them, as no water could gaine the least passage in,
and therein also they had store of fooode and beasts. Afterwards, when they felt the raine and water to be somewhat passed ouer, they sent forth two dogges, which returned all wet and befeined:
whereby they iudged that the waters were not (as yet) wholly thrinke and gone away.

Within some while after, they put forth many dogges together, which returned in againe, drie and sleeke as when they went abroade. And by this meanes they conceived, that the waters were quite spent; and so came forth againe to dwell vpon the earth: where they greatest paine and trauell was to kill infinite Serpents, which the mightie extre-mitie of muddie and thine had engendred euery where.

They beleene an end of the world; but that a great drowning shall goe before it, and that the Sunne and Moone (which they all adore and reuerence) shall loose themselves. And, vpon this occasion, they make cries and lamentations when-soever the Ecclypses happen: but especially them of the Sunne, as fearing then, that the Sunne, they, and all the whole World, shall be quite consumed and destroyed together.

CHAP. III.

Of the Excellencie and Dignitie of Marriage: with many singular and worthy examples, tending to that purpose.

Concerning our present argument, wee haue had a chapter already in our former Volume, declaring ve-rie much good matter to that effect, but yet still, desiring this addition or supplement; in regard, that nothing can be sayd too much in the honour of Marriage. This holy institution of Marriage, was made in the earthly Paradise before sinne, in the time of Innocencie, when as God said to our first Parents, Bring forth fruit, and multiply, and fill the earth. But it was not brought to effect, vntill the offence by them committed, and for which, they were expelled out of the terrestriall Paradise: as Saint Ierome hath obserued in his Booke against Iovinian.

After the vniuersall Deluge, God gaue command to the good Patriarch Noah again; To encrease and multiply, which is the principall occasion, wherefore Marriage was ordayned, and hath euer since bene so generally recommended: that it hath bene, and is permitted to aged and decipite people (free from all power of encreasing, and out of hope of any linage)
to marry: which yet is expedient for them (if I might say so) to the end, that they may passe their age the more ioyously, as in the kinde company of husband and wife, receiuing pleasure, solace, consolation, and comfortable seruices each to other. Euen as hereof we haue an example by Dauid, who (in his very olde age) tooke a yong maidento wife, as namely, Abigail the Shunamite, with whom hee ordinarily lay, and shee slept in the bo-some of the King, warming and comforting him, and yet the King knew her not carnally.

What more holy, chaste, assured, and acceptable societie can be amongst men, then that of the husband and wife? Oh, how heauenly an harmony, when the one is as the other, two bodies, one soule, one spirit, one will, and one mutual consent sympathizing in two bodies: The sole married man and his wife, eny not one another, but loue infinitely together, each depending vpon the other, thee reposing in him, and he in her: euen as one selfesame flesh, one and the same concord, alike equally in all things, and all but one:

One ioy, one sorrow, one wealth, one po-uerty, one gaine, one losse, and one selfe same dignitie. They are alwayes companions of one selfe same bed, one and the same table. Therefore they shall be two in one flesh (said God) and not three, or many.

God would by no meanes haue in the Ark of Noah, to be any more women then men, to the end that they should all be as one sole woman. In briefe, the loue of the husband to the wife, and of the wife to her husband, surpasseth that of father and mother to their children, of children vnto the father; and that which brothers and sisters ought to haue together. And like as the Ring which the husband (euen as God) puts on the finger of his Spouse or Wife (as the soule to the Church) ought to be of golde, and round, as gold, being the most excellent of all metals: euen
so this coniugal loue excelleth all other, and ought to continue perpetually. And as Propertius saith: Omnis amor magnus, sed apertus in coniuge maior. Enery loue is great, but in wedlocke it appeareth to be much greater.
For, Father, Mother, Children, Brethren, Sisters, Cousins and Friends, all these are the workes of Fortune: but the Husband and the Wife are Mysteries of Almighty GOD: And man had his Wife, and Wife had her Husband, before there was eyther Father, Mother, or Children.

The fruits of Marriage are of Almightie GOD, and not of Nature, from whence it ensueth, that children borne out of Marriage, that is to say, Bastards, are called Naturall onely, but they which proceede of lloyall Marriage, are sayd to be Legitimate. And therefore, the opinion of Lawyers, is, That a childe borne out of marriage, hath no certaine father, but we may well say, a bad or lewd mother. He (say they) is the Sonne of the people, or else the Sonne of no body, that is the Sonne of an unmarried woman. Onely marriage then (which Baldus calleth, The principle, origi- nall and foundation of Mankind) maketh Children and Heires certayne, augmenteth kindred, engendereth amitie among Allies, reuerence and pleaseth God.

Holy Marriage was so pleasing to the Author thereof, that he would haue his only Sonne, to be borne of a married woman, and although it was his will,
to be borne of a Virgine, without the feede of a man; yet was it not without the honour of Marriage. For it pleased him, to proceed from a Mother married, yet pure neuertheless, exempt from any carnall fouling: elected to be the Arke of the Testament, the Bush not burning, and the Violl of golde to containe the celestiall Manna; as well to declare the wonders of his infinite power, as to make that sacred estate so much the more honorable. Wrethes the preference of the same son of God himselfe, at the marriage of Cana in Galile, where expressing his gracious loue & furtherance; he conuerted water into wine;
by an especial and extraordinary miracle.

Moreover, there is not the name of any house or stocke, but (without a woman) it would be quite extinct, neither kindred perpetuated, family increased, or a Common wealth continue in intire condition, or a ny Empire hold, without such help which the first founders of the Romaine Empire approved; for, they hauing no wives, desired the Daughters of the Sabines, their neighbors, but they would not gratifie the.
Wherevpon, they followed a waye of stealth of 683, of them; which procured a mighty & mortall warre, betwixt the Romans and the said Sabines: albeit Romulus well foresawe, that his Empire could not last, without women. For, the City being composed of houses, and the Common-wealth of chofen Princes, both domesticks and familiars, how shall he gouerne a City, that hath not learned what is to gouerne a priuate house? The Philosopher Socrates testified, to haue learned more morall Philosophie of women, then euer he could naturall, of Ismaxoras and Archelaus.

Assuredly, Marriage giues exercitation to morall Philosophie; there is a domesticall Common-wealth conioyned therewith, and in it selfe. For the gouernement whereof, a man may easily experiment the power of wisdom, temperance, pie-tie, & al other vertues; whereby louing his wife, enstructing his children, ruling his family, protecting his goodes, ordering his house, and encreasing his race; the yeares of his life, will pace on the more happily. Whereas on the contrary, hee that seeketh to spend his life time without being married; is miserable, and worthe to be abandoned of all men.

For this cause, Lycurgus made a Lawe to the Lacedemonians, that all such as had attained vnto the age of eight and thirty yeares, without enioying women in marriage, should be banished in some time, from all publique playes, spectacles and pastimes, iudging them as vnworthie, to be seene there amongst other in an open assembly. And in winter, they were led out naked, in the common view of the people, because they should be outraged and abused by words and exclamations of euery one, detested as vnworthie the name of men. And themselves enioyned to confesse, that they suffered these afflictions iustly, as hauing scorned and despised that religion: whereof they were preuicacious, and disobedient to the ordinance of Nature.

As concerning the Romans, they were not altogether so strict and seuer, & yet ordained, that such as had liued without marriage till their olde age: should be condemned in payment of a great summe of money to the publike Treasury, according to their quality and facultie. Plato appointed in his lawes, that such men as were not married, should enioy no honor estate, or publike dignity: but to be more charged with fines and mulcts, then any of the other Citizens.

A young man of Lacedemon, would not arise out of his place in the publike Theater, to gae way and honour to a valiant ancient Capitaine (neuer married) named Callidus, who was come thither to see the pastimes. And the Capitaine growing offended at the arrogancy of the young man because hee disdained him in that manner, gaue him some words of heat and choler, whereto the young man returned him this answer. O Callidus, thou hast not (as yet) begotten, neither occasioned the birth of any one that being now at mine age, and unmarried as thou art, may arise hereafter to giue me place, and therefore no other esteeme is to be made of thee. The Romanes in the time of Q. Metellus Consul, established many famous and worthy priuileges for newe married persons, and for such as had three sons, as may be seen in the Digest, of such as had ten. And our greatest Diuines, let downe twelue causes, the which hinder a man from marriage, and doe yet dissuall marriage, although it be consummated & children procreated. As namely error, con ition, yow, parentage, sin, to wit, of adultery or murder, diuerity & difference in religion, violence, prophanes in Priesthood, or profession of a false religio, bond and promise of contrary marriage, as being otherwise contracted, honestly, affinity, and inhability. All these twelue, are bars and hinderances to marriage, according as Cardinall Cicerone hath comprehended them in these verses.

Error, conditio, votum, cognatio, crimen, Cultus disparitas, via, or do, ligamen, bonestas
Si sis affinis, si forte corre nequibus:

I haue a great desire to discourse particularly on euery one of these causes, if I had not such a multitude of other matters to speake of: let therefore (for this time) suffice that which hath bin said. And for such as are louers of Poetrie, I referre them to the renowned Poet Scauala de S. Marthia, partly turned and imitated out of the fift booke of Marcellus Palingenius, a Latine Poet, in his Zodiack of Life, where he singeth elegantly in the praise of Marriage.

CHAP. III.

Of Partharites, King of the Lombards, who being pursued by Grimoald, fledde first to Cacanus, King of the Auarians or Huns, afterwards into France. And in the end ofter many beaues and troubles from Trauayls; was (with great honor and renowne, seated in his owne kingdome.

Partharites was sonneto Albert King of the Lombards, who (after the death of his father) reigned at Myllaine; and Gondebert his brother, at Paulia. A strife and quarrell, growing betwene the two Brethren, Gondebert sent Garibald, Duke of Thurine, towards Grimoald, Duke of Beneuentum, a verie generous Capitaine and Commander, requiring his assistance against Partharites, with tolemme promise, of giuing him his Sister in marriage. But Garibald intending treason to his Lord and Master, perswaded Grimoald, to come and possesse the kingdome to his owne vse, which (thorow discord betwene the two brethren) was growne to weake estate, and verie neare vpon vpon vtter ruine.

When Grimoald vnderstood this, hee gaue ouer his Dukedome of Beneuentum to his sonne, creating him there as absolute Duke, and, with the greatest forces he could get together, prepared his iourney for Paulia: and in all cities and towns as he passed along, begot himselfe store of friends, for his better helpe in obtaining the kingdome. Being come to Paulia, and entring into priuate conference with Gondebert: by close practise and intelligence with Garibald, Gondebert was slaine at a Banquet, and he made possessor of the kingdome. No sooner did Partharites heare these sad tydings, but, leauing faire Rhodolinda his wife and Queene, and a young sonne of his (both confined by Grimoald to Beneuentum for close custody) fled secretly away, making his recourse to Cacanus, King of the Auarians or Hunnes.

Grimoald hauing made sure his Kingdome at Paulia, and vnderstanding, that Partharites secured his safetie with Cacanus: sent Ambassadors to him, to let him know, that if hee kept Partharites in his kingdome, no long peace should continue betwene him and the Lombardes, but he must expect a King as his enemy. According to this Ambassage, the King of the Auarians called Partharites to him in secret, desiring him, that he would wander whither himselfe pleased: because (thorow his meanes) the Auarians might not fall into the hatred of the Lombardes. And so, vpon a royall, sad and mutual interchange of wofull lamentations on eyther side; the two kings parted, as might haue moued pity in Marble to behold it.

Partharites, frustrated now of all helpe and comfort, returning into Italie againe: purposed his repaire to his enemy Grimoald, confiding on his kingly clemencie, because he was left destitute of any other succour. And being come neare to the City of Lody, he called to a Gentleman of his, named Vaulphus, in whom his intimate trust wholly consisted, sending him before, to acquaint Grimoald with his coming, and to deale iustly for his safetie. Vaulphus presented himselfe before the new-made King, vsing such wife and honourable language to him, concerning Partharites his King and Maister, making recourse to his royall mercie, and trusting onely in his goodness; that he would freely submit himselfe to him, if he (with the like benignitie) would vouchsafe to embrace him.

So effectually did Vaulphus deliuer his message, and Grimoald (eyther in pride or pleasure) accept it: that hee promised and swore vpon his faith, no displeasure should any way be dole to the King his maister, he might come when he would, & builde securely vpon his faith. Vaulphus, hauing brought backe this answer to Partharites, hee went and presented himselfe before Grimoald, meerey prostrate at his feete, who took him vp graciously, & in most friendly manner kissed him: where vpon, Partharites beganne thus: Sith I am your humble vassalle and seruant, and knowing you to be most Christian, and a faithfull louer of pietie: though I might liue safe among Pagans, yet, building vpon your mildnesse and mercy, I am come, and heere yeeld my selfe at your feete.

Grimoald vsing his accustomed oathes, promised him, saying, By him that made me to be borne, seeing you haue put your selfe into my power, you shall suffer no harme any way whatsoeuer; but I will take such order, that you shall liue well and honorably. So he commanded him a conuenient lodging, with entertainment answerable to his qualitie, and all things afforded to him in plentifull maner. Partharites being departed from the King, to such place as was appoynted for him; it came to passe, that the people flocked and resorted daily thither (hauing formerly knowne & honoured him) earnestly desiring to see and salute him.

But see how ready euill tongues are to commit mischief, diuers flatterers and audacious Informers, obseruing the peoples kind greetings to Partharites: reported it in such maner to Grimoald, that they incensed him very strangely, perswading him, that if he did not the sooner procure the death of Partharites, hee would bee shaken out of his kingdom, yea, and lose his life likewise; for Partharites lodging seemed now, rather to be a Court then his. Grimold being a man over-casie in beleefe, and led away with the least persuasions; became so confounded with zealousie and distrust, that (neuer remembering his solemn oaths and promises) he fell into an extraordinary rage, and in extremity of heate and choller, swore the death of innocent Partharites, wanting nothing but aduice and meanes, how it might both safely and sodainly bee effected.

Now, because it grew somewhat late, and on the morrow the deed must needs be done; he caused (that Evening) great store of delicate meates and wines to bee sent to Partharites, purposely to make him drunke: that being overcome with eating and drinking, and all his senses possessed with drowlinesse, hee might haue the lesse care of his health, and so his life be the sooner betrayed. But a Gentleman who before had serued the father of Partharites, and brought him these lunkers from the King: stooping his head lowe beneath the table, as doing him reuerence and embracing his knee, secretly revealed to him, how Grimold had concluded his death, and that this nightes iouial drinking supper, must be a solemn induction thereto.

Heereupon, Partharites immediately, (but very covertly) gaue order vnto his Cup beater and Taster, to fill and bring him no other drinke all supper while, but some small quantities of water onely, and in his priuate silver Bowle. So that the Courtiers (who were sent to keepe him company) quaffing and carowing many healths of the King to Partharites, desiring him still to pledge them in like manner, as thereby expressing his loue to the King: Partharites accepted all their fearefull charges, protesting all honor and reuerence to Grimold, rowling vp cup after cup as readily as they, seeming as merrie as any of them all, and yet drank nothing else but water. Supper being ended, and the Courtiers returning back to the King, reported the iocund behavior of Partharites, and how forward still he was in turning off his owne Bolle, as readily as they did theirs, and neuer refused to pledge his Highnesse health, thinking him to be very faire spent with wine. Vnderneath Grimold heartily reioycing, merrily saide; Alas poore silly Drunkard, little thinkest hee, that the Wine and his blood will be mingled on the earth to morrow together, in despite of all the friends he hath.

The same night, he sent strong guards to watch about the house where Partharites was lodged, because he should haue no meanes to escape, nor any friends com to giue him assistance. But the poor harmlesse Prince, when supper was past, and all the Courtiers departed thence (remaiyning alone in his Chamber, & none with him but Vnulpus, and a Page that vsed to waite nextest about, to helpe his Garmets both off and on, they being both his faithfull seruants, and in whom he reposed most confidence:) hee discovered plainly to them, how peremptorily his death was concluded on by Grimold, and what a strong watch was set round about his lodging, so that now their poor Lord and Masters life must needs perish by his treachery.

Vnulpus hauing a prompt and readie witte, louing his Lord dearly, & caring for no danger to himselfe, lo hee might set him free from perill: by means of certaine Blankets belonging to a bedde, and a Beares skinne which he found there in his chamber by chance, so substantially hee disguised Partharites, that it was impossible to distinguish him from a meere Country Boore or Pezant, and his countrefeiting drunkenesse, made the matter to seeme the more likely. Vnulpus had gotten a good Faggot-stick, and pretending sweating, with beating that drunken Rascall (for so, and sometimes worse hee commonly called him) tumbled him first downe the staires, and lastly out of doores, labouring still as if hee had giuen many fore blowes. Which when the Guardes there attending perceyued, they demanded of Vnulpus, what was the matter? Hee answered, saying: Here is a drunken slaue, who while the Lordes were heere at Supper with Partharites, hath secretly gotten in, and stolne himselfe starke drunke; keeping such a terrible noise, that my Lord (who is as drunk as mee) I feare can take no rest, and by no meanes would I haue him to bee disturbed.

No doubt at all made the Guardes of Vnulpus his words, but laughing, to see the slaue belabored so lustily, suffered him to driue him on before him, bidding him beate still, and spare him not. While the Guardes stood laughing at this merry ielt, no man needed to bid them make hast, & Partharites being quickly got out of sight, Vnulpus returned to the lodging, which made the Guardes the more confidently perswaded, and secured the King from all pursuite. Moreouer, after the Kings departure in that manner, the faithfull Page kept the doores lockt vp fast, till Vnulpus was returned againe: where they two onely remained in the chamber, praying for their Kings prosperous successe; who arrived that night at the Towne of Aste, and from thence (passing the mountaines) went into France.

On the morrow morning, messengers came from the King, to bring Partharites to the Pallace, and beating at the doore, the Page spake out at the windowe, saying: Good Gentlemen forbear, his Maestie hath drunke somewhat hard, is very sleepey, and therefore I pray ye trouble not his rest. Whereunto they in modest yielding, went and reported the same to Grimold, who well liked that he should sleepe so long: yet sent them againe in all haste, and howsoever (awake or asleep) to bring him away with them. The Souldiers, earing to displease the king, came and knockt earnestly at the doore; but being intreated by the Page, as afore said, they boldly broke the doore open, & seeking for Partharites in his bed, found him not, which made them to demand, what was become of him; & the Page said, he was fled.

Presently were Vnulpus and the Page seized on, and haled furiously to the Pallace, where being brought before the king, with vnappalled countenance, they tolde, that the King had escaped with life, discovering the manner truly how, and dreading no infiction for the fact. When Grimold had aduisedly considered on their faith and loyalty, hee called them severally againe before him; wishing hee suddenly another faithfull Page, exhorting him earnestly, to keepe his loyalty to his Lord Partharites, promising to recompence him worthily for it. Vnulpus afterwards was brought againe before him, and the king greatly commending both his wisdom & honesty, demanded, whether he would chuse to liue with him in good grace and acceptance, or follow Partharites in the extremity of his fortunes? whereto Vnulpus said, with an oath, that he would rather chuse to die with Partharites, yea for meynes whatsoever; then liue any where else, with all the pleasures and delights that the world could giue him.

The same demand was also made to the Page, & his answer was the like in effect: whereon the King highly extolling their vnparalleled loyalty, prayed them both, to commaund whatsoever his Court afforded, & go in all safety to seek their master. Provided of all things they could desire or carry with them, and securitie granted for their safe passage; they set onward to France, in a longing desire to meete with Partharites; as soone after they did, to great ioy and comfort on euery side. But first, newes being abroad, that Grimold had vnited peace with Dagobert King of France: it made Partharites fearful of some cloie ambushes to be layed for him, & so he might be sent backe to Grimold againe; which made him forlake France, & to ship himselfe for England: all which calamities happened to him, before his two faithfull seruants could any where finde him.

Being on the Sea all together, and (in hope of good successe) boord for England, they had not past a full league from land: But Partharites heard a voyce, seeming to come directly from the shoare where hee took shipping, demanding in this manner: Speake there, is Partharites in the ship or not Partharites replied without pausing: *Is he is it that calleth Partharites? I am that most unhappy man, and (blessed be heauen) heere I am. Tell him then (answered the voyce) his native Country calles him home, and further he may not goe; for, within three dayes, Grimold is dead. Partharites amazed at this strange accident, required fauor to be landed with his seruants againe; but could neuer know him that tolde those tidings of *Grimold*s death, which made him verily perswaded, that it was no mortal man, but his owne good Angell, that thus entrusted him, after his passing thorow so many miseries.*

Partharites returning home againe, to wardes his owne native Country, hee was no sooner arrived at the limites of Italy, but hee met there with a goodly com-

pamy of Lombards, with Laurell wreathes on their heads, and Palme branches in their hands, who purposely attended there for his coming, and so conducted him joyfully to Paula; from whence, the Sonne of Grimald being expelled, he was there (by generall consent) created absolute King of the Lombards, within three moneths after the death of Grimald. He dispatched Posaits to Beneuentum, in quest of Isolfin his Queene and Wife, as also his sonne Cambert. And being a man pious, Catholique, a great observer of Iustice, and charitable to the poore; so soon as he was quietly seated in his kingdome, he builded a goodly Monastery, neere unto the River Thesina, in which sometime he had concealed himselfe, when he was enforced from place to place; dedicating the Temple to Gods service, and in honour of S. Agatha the Virgin & Martyr, planting therein many religious virgins, and endowing it with great liberality of rents and revenues. His Queene also, after her many troubles, and long separation from her husband, erected the Church of our Lady without the walles, bestowing infinite rich and precious ornaments thereon. And at length, Partharicus (having reigned eighteen yeares) changed this mostall life for a better, to the great griefe of his loving Subjects the Lombards.

Nor may we heere omit to say somewhat of Garibald, Duke of Thurine, the beginner of this poore Princes calamities. He having intiguated (as hath bin related) Grimald, Duke of Beneuentum, to murder Gondebert, King of the Lombards, treacherously: within no long while after, a certaine meane man, of little or no respect at all, comming to the City of Thurine, and vnderstanding, that Garibald would be in the cheefe Church on Easter day neere ensuing; stood on the steps of the Font for baptisme, leaning carelessly on his left arme, by a collome of the Tabernacle, being at the very entrance into the Church, having a weapon ready drawne vnder his Cloake. So soone as Garibald came to see neere him; he (not fearing all the traine about him) suddenly ran the Rapier quite through his body, that instantly he fell downe dead. Such as attended Garibald, being somewhat amazed at so vnexpected an accident, pursuing the murderer, could fasten no hold on him, vntill they had slaine him, with many weapons being in his body at once. So, although he lost his life; yet courageously he reuenged the iniurious act, committed on Gondebert his Lord & Master.

CHAP. V.

What manner of men those were and are, that be called Doctors of Sorbonne, or Sorbonnists.

Am sure there are many, that neuer saw the goodly, rich, populous, commonious, and well governed City and Vniuersity of Paris; and yet diuers that haue seene it, or read the Antiquities thereof, may perhaps be ignorant, what kinde of men they are, that beare the title or name of Doctors of Sorbonne. For all other Doctors are honoured by those Citties names, wherein they received their degrees: As Doctors of Louuaine, of Poitiers, of Doway, of Theolosa, of Montpelier, of Paula, of Bologna, of Twinge, of Fribourge, and so of diuers other. But the Doctors in diuinity of Sorbonne, beare their name, not of the City where they received their licences and degrees Doctorall; but of the place peculiarly. A matter which hath much amazed many, & raised doubt in diuers other, that neuer had the happinesse to visit Paris; in which respect, I purpose to set down the true originall thereof, how, and vpon what occasion it came so to passe.

It is to be vnderstood, as I haue elsewhere said, that the course of nature will sooner faile; then people be any other but as their Princes are, as Cassiodorus saith. King Leuis, ninth of that name, reigning King in France, whereas other Princes deuied (euen as to this day many do) how to build Palaces & vnprofitable houses, for pride, luxury and prodigality: this holy & religious King caused Churches to be erected, Hospitals, Abbayes, Colledges, & other places of piety in imitation of whom, many of his Subjects, & other strangers did the like.

Amongst other, there was a Diuine of the Kings house, his Almoner, and one of his Preachers, who was thought to be provided of some good Benefice; yet neyther enriched his kindred, or spent his revenues in vanities, as too many churchmen now aduise vs to doe. This good man was called Master Robert de Sorbonne: but to relate further, of what Nation hee was, or of what Family, hath scarcely (as yet) bene discovered by any. In briefe, amouled in great pietie, and by the example of his King; hee bought a place, which usually was called in Laine, Locum Termarum C. Ajaris, that is to say, The place of Casars Bathes. And it is sayd, that Julian, Nephew to the Emperour Constantine, Governour of the Gauls, caused those Bathes to be builded, and the Lodgings of Clany, which then were without the City of Paris, and as places of pleasure: according as we read in some Epistles, which Julian wrote to them of Antioche. The said Julian was afterwards Emperour, surnamed the Apostata by the Christians. And then, such as pretended to the Imperial Crowne, termed themselves Casars: as now at this day, such as are designed Emperours after him liuing, are called Kings of the Romaines.

In this place there is apparance, that there the Casars Bathes were, as euidently may be discerned, by the channells of hewne stone, which were found in the yeare of our Lord God, one thousand five hundred forty and foure, at the gate of Saint James, when Bastions and Rampires were then made, to resist the forces of Charles the first, Emperour, who was entred into France with a mighty army. Which gutters or conduits of water, were continued from the village of Arceuell (so named, in regarde of Arches builded of Bricke, as yet to this present are to be seene; or of the Latine compounded word Aqua ductio) and reaching into Paris. Those conduits of water serued well for those Bathes, and were needfull now to be renewed, to water the higher parts of the Vniuersitie of Paris (which haue great neede thereof) if my maisters the Escheniers, would therein employ their paines.

As already hath bene sayd, this place was builded to bathe or wash the Romain

Emperours, Consulls, Proconsulls, and such like, and was bought by the said Master Robert Sorbonne, in the yeare of our Lord, one thousand two hundred thre-score and foure. If you desire to know, to whom (as then) that place appertyned; I must therein confesse mine ignorance, although I haue made good search in the euidences, belonging to that place of Sorbonne, & elsewhere (specifying large rents & reuenues thereto belonging, yet much enlarged by the bounty of K. Lewis 9. king of France, and others, calling it only Sorbonne) and finding it appoynted, to maintain a certayne number of Doctors, who should reade publicly in Diuinitie; and also of Bacheliers to study, there to be lodged and maintained. Whereupon, from that time to this present, the Professors, Bacheliers, and other Students in this Colledge, did endeavour themselves to indolistrously, and became so capable; as there is hardly any other Colledge throughout all Christendome, wherein may be found men so ready and exact in Diuinitie, as they are that belong to this Sorbonne Colledge.

The Students in this House, are not (as commonly else where) young men, but wel stept in yeares; because they haue read publicly, enstructing the course of Philosophie, which is performed in three yeares, in regard there are as many parts, which are Loycke, Physicke and Metaphysicke. And many times some such are there, that haue made three courses, which are nine yeares, and employed by them in publique Lectures; before they will adventure to study or reade publickly in Diuinitie; and therefore it is no matter of maruell, that there should continually be such singularly learned men in that Colledge.

The Doctors and Bacheliers, our & beside their being great Philosophers, are likewise very skilfull in humane learning, and vnderstand the tongues, Greeke, Latine and Hebren, speaking them (for the most part) eloquently. They are held in such reputation, that (commonly) they deale in the great st difficulties, and in all Ecclesiasticall occasions, their aduice is wholly vsed; the Colledge being reputed as one of the best Bulwarks to the Romain Catholique Church, and so accounted through Christendome.

CHAP. VI.

That the Law of the Emperour Seuerus, and that of Solon, for promoting any one to Office and Authority in the Common-wealth (being first informed, of a mans life & good manners) was much better then those of the Venetians, Florentines, Genewaves, and Lucanes; examining after the time of their Jurisdiction is past.

He Emperour Seuerus, the eighteenth, reigning in the yeare of Iesus Christ, 196. albeit that he was no Christian; yet (after the example of Christianity) would ordinarily say: That it was great shame, to bee lesse carefull of the life of a Governour, or one that exerciseth the place of iudgement; then the Christians were, in the quality of their Shepherds and Watchmen ouer their Flocks. For they obserued a kinde of Siquis, or a Bill fixed vpon Poasts, wherein were set downe the names of such as aspired to any Ecclesiasticall dignity, and examined their liues and behaviour with strictest severity. In the very same manner, this good Emperour, when hee intended to provide any man for the government of a Prouince, or place where iudgement was to be vsed, or whatsoeuer else appeared requisite: would first set vp publicke Placards, or Bills of inscription, in diuers places about the City, to the ende, that if any notorious vice were knowne, or criminall cause deseruing open detection, in such as were named in those publicke Placards: it was lawfull for all men, to accuse or set downe their blemishes & incapacities, that no wicked or vnworthy person, might be advanced to such degree of eminency. Thus euery one, and all in generall were permitted to accuse; but yet on penalty of life, if it should be proued to be scandall or calumniation, and thereupon, an especiall Law was ordained and enrouled expressly.

In my poore opinion, this Law seemeth much more honest and equall, then those those now adayes in vs, with the Venetians, Florentines, Genewaves, and Lucanes, who after the time of a mans Office is expired, or, that the limitation of his gouernment ceaseth: do then make enquiry, to cause him render an account of his administration, and then proceed against him according to his demerits. A wicked Magistrate, and publike Concessionary or extortioner, by giving a piece of bread to dogs barking at him, so to stop their mouths: may thus salue his thefts, and other depredations of his vile life.

It is much more expedient, to prevent a disface, then to tarry till it come, & then to expulse it: notwithstanding, it is better late, then neuer, to the ende (at the least) that feare of search and syndication, may retaine Officers within compasse of their duty.

And yet the ordination of Solon (methinks) was farre better, whereby the liues of Officers was to be examined, both before and after their authority, as we read in the lawes set downe by Demoisthenes. For by examining the life and manners of such, as couet or seeke after degrees of Offices, Benefices, Knighthood, exemptions, immunities, gifts and rewards, if they appeare to bee foule or deformed: not onely they may be reiected, but also directly (in iustice) punished, & rewards distributed to honest persons, according to the merit of euery man. And by an hermonious proportion, the purse shold be giuen to the most faithfull; Armes to the most valiant; Iustice degree to the vp-rightest; censure to the enurest; painfull trauaile to the strongest and best able; Prelacy to the most learned and deuoutest. And yet neuerthelesse, carrying respect to Nobility, wealth, age, and the power of euery one, as also the quality of their charges and offices: for it were very ridiculous, to make a Iudge a Warriour, a Prelate a common Lawyer, or a Soldiour to manage cases of conscience.

Now for the better comprehension of our purpose in this Chapter, it is to be obserued, that Alexander Seuerus neuer was a Christian: but a worthy man otherwise, and when he made that Edict. As being desirous to place good Magistrats, to gouerne in the Romaine Commonwealth vnder his Empire (finiding it full of exacting Officers) in imitation of the Christians; euen (as it is saide) in the second time of the Primitive Church. And when (for any particular Church) any need appeared of a Bishoppe, a Priest, a Deacon, or some other Officer; the Christians (in those times) fixed vp their Placards, setting downe the name of him or them, that sought to haue such office and dignity: they did it to such ende, that if any vice were knowne in him or them; objection might bee made against the pretendant, so to debout him of his requisition and sute.

And questionlesse, great need there was, that this policy should bee obserued among the Christians; for the Pagans & Idolaters then (being their capitall enemies) sought nothing more, then some subiect or argument, whereby to inuene and caluminate the Pastors and Prelates among the Christians, onely to make the odious to the people. And they that were promoted vnto Ecclesiasticall Offices in those dayes, had no other stipend or reward, but only some collection of Corne and other matters, among the Christians of the Churches then, to make them garments, and maintaine them poorely enough, being provided of those places, & oftentimes their best assurance was most cruell martyrdome. And that which made men then desirous of Ecclesiasticall advancements, was not (as now adayes) to deriue thence large benefits & reuennues: for then, there were not any foundations ordained, neyther were any tenths leuied for or from them. But the Pastours then, in a most sacred kinde of charity, coueted to instruct the ignorant, and confirme in faith, intimidate, affrighted and disperfed Christians, persecuted by the Romanes and other Princes, onely for the Christian faith, and to encourage them for suffering martyrdome, according as Ensebius (who liued in those times) hath written at large.

As for the estates of the Venetians, Genewaves, Lucanes, and others now exercised in Italy, they are not during life, as it is in France: wherein yet it is not much amisse, to haue information of them, vpon the expiration of their charges, to cause terror in their offices successors, for best carriage and behavior in their dutie, least a further inquisition come vpon them. In France, estates and offices are exercised, during during life of the party in possession: but yet with caution, that if he commit any vnbecoming acte, to bee instantly dismis- sed, and (oftentimes) death ensueeth there- upon. But before any man may bee so ad- uanced, the Statutes of France haue enioyned, that good information must be made, concerning the life and manners of the party to enioy it; before such per- sons as his Maieesty, or other soueraigne Iudges shall appoint.

The Kings of Spainne, cause information of life and behaviour, of any that aime at degrees and offices, before they are ad- mitted to them. And moreover, at every five yeares end, sometime in more, and in lesse compasse of yeares very often; se- cret enquiries & informations are made, of all Officers in every Seigneury: as in all the Spaines, the Kingdomes of Na- ples, Sicily, Milaine, the lower Countreies of Germany, the County of Bourgongne, the Duchy of Luxembourg, and other, & namely of the places where they exercise their Offices. And if the King do finde, that they mis-behaved themselves; his Countcell deposeeth them, appointing o- ther in their places, of whom (likewise) the life and conuersation is well ques- tioned. Sometimes they are put to death, but very rarely, and many times deposed, yet without note of infamy: only giuing them to vnderstand, that the King is not well contented with their seruice. Heere is also to be vnderstood, that information cometh not onely against Officers of Iustice, as Advocates, Procurators, Preg- notaries, Iudges soueraigne and subalter- nate: but likewise against Ecclesiasticks, and men of warre. By which means, every one is compelled to containe himselfe within compasse of duty; and beside, the estates & offices are not vendible.

CHAP. VII.

Of the reason and cause, why both some Princes, and also some Common-wealths, haue alwayes prosperously flourished in the times of warre, and in peacefull dayes haue runne to decay and ruine.

Although I discourse in this Chapter, that some Princes and Commonwealths haue bin very happy and succes- full, in times of wars and molestations; and contrariwise, in times of peace haue become vicious, running on to ruine and delolation: yet I neither will, or do there- by inferre, that warre is to bee esteemed more necessary then peace. But I will shew the causes whereby (not all Com- mon-wealths, nor all Princes in generall) yet many liued more vertuously & happi- ly in the times of war, then in their easier dayes of peace. And that so soone as they came to enioy peace; they fell into ruine, vtterly losing all their greatnesse & splen- dour. Euen like vnto Iron, which not be- ing vsed or handled, or whereof no fre- quent employment is made; rusteth and consumeth of it selfe. And this ensued by no other occasion, but only through ne- gligence and want of respect, that when they enioyed the Sunny daies of peace; no discrete order was taken, for instituti- on of good life and pollicie, and how to make vse (as men ought to doe) of such sweet tranquillity.

Before I come to approue my say- ings by examples, I would first make a briefe relation, concerning the actions of men of warre; to demonstrate, that it is (almost) vtterly incredible, that any good nesse can deriue it selfe from war. For, who is a greater enemy to the peacefull man, then the furious Soldior? To the milde, meeke countriman, then the bloo- dy Warriour? To the Philosopher, then the fierce Capitaine? To the wife, then fooler? Because the greatest delight and felicity of warriors, is, to forradge Coun- tries, rob the husbandmen, burne Towns and Villages, to massacre good men, to giue all licence to the wicked, to besiege, batter, force and ransacke houses, to kill olde and young, to spare no age or sexe, to rauish Wiues and Virgins, to bathe their hands brutishly in innocent blood, to make a spoile of sacred things, to ru- inate Temples, to blasphem the Name of God, to trample (vnder their foule feet) all right both diuine and humane. These are the fruites of warre, highly ac- ceptable and pleasing to fiery-eye Sol- diors, abhominable to good men, & de- testable before God. Needlesse is it to amplify with words, that which hath bin too well seene and felt in ouer-many pla- ces, whose very memory hath startled the soules of them in best safety, and made their haire stand on ende, that thought themselves of boldest resolution.

If then the case stand thus, and that war hath so many discommodities and mis- chiefs waiting vpon it: how can any good ensue from it?

Further wee are to vnderstand, that when Soldiours are guided by Captaines voide of iudgement, vnderstanding and vertue: all the forenamed evils and mis- chiefs are ordinarily committed. But if they haue a vertuous Commander, hee will carry himselfe so much the more mo- destly. And like as greatnesse of cou- rage & magnanimity, is a bright flaming Beacon, leading the way to all other ver- tues, and exalteth Princes vnto the very highest point of honor: euen so it is ver- tue (only) likewise, that most discoura- geth the hearts of enemies, be they neuer so potent or powerfull warriors, and (oftentimes) gaineth the victory, without a blow deliuered on either side.

Heereof I intend to set downe some examples, that in the Roman Common- wealth, and in the times of their warre, there was greater store of vertuous minded men, then when they liued in peace and quietnesse. First let vs remember Furius Camillus, who hauing sent backe the chil- dren, which the Schoole-Master had brought into his Campe, to make them bondslauies to the Romanes; conquered the City without one blow smitten, which neuertheless was very strong, and well furnished with all warlike munition.

And Fabritius, hauing sent the Physitian to king Pyrrhus, that had promised to poi- son him, and refused the moiety of his Kingdome: although he was one of the very pooreste Roman Gentleman, and caused the prisoners ransome to be paid, which Pyrrhus had freely deliuered, not suffering the meaneest of them to stand beholding to so great a King. And Scipio, who (without any paine) conquered a great part of both the Spaines: by send- ing a lady of rare beauty to her husband, the Prince of Celiberia, according to the example of Cyrus. These so generous and vertuous actions, tooke away all courage from enemies, to make war any longer against such magnanimous peo- ple; who neither could conquer, nor yet be conquered, by bafe or vnbecoming behaviour.

And yet this was much better made knowne, after the great day at Cannas, when Hanniball had put eight thousand prisoners to their ransome, at an hundred Crownes each man, and one bearing cre- dite for another: hoping vndoubtedly, that the Romanes hauing lost so many men, would not be slacke in paying their ransome. But it was flatly forbidden (by the Senates especiall decree) that not one prisoner of them al should be redeemed. Whereat Hanniball (saith Polybius) was so amazed, as all his courage quite for-ooke him. Whereas on the contrary, the Romanes secured their state the bet- ter, which was fiersly shaken, and vtterly abandoned (as it were) of all friends and confederates. For the iudgement of the Senate was wise and honourable, because Hanniball, hauing so much Ro- mane blood spilt at his pleasure, thought to empty their Treasury of money, and draw eight hundred thousand Crownes from them; which they rather chose to spare, then to redeeme the very scum and cowards of all the Roman Army. Vpon, and thence forward, euery one took a resolution to conquer or dye, & so be- came dreadfull and inuincible. And like as their hearts neuer failed them in their greatest losses; so were they neuer conquered by arrogancy in their victo- ries. And therefore, in the time of war, the Romanes more exprest their great- nesse in courage, then in peace they could do.

Charles the eight of that name, King of France, in the voyage which hee made into Italy, to conquer the Kingdomes of Naples and Sicily, they belonging to him, as he pretended: at the surprizall of a Ci- ty, a very goodly Lady was brought vnto him, whom he would not touch; but sent her away (and great gifts with her) to her husband. By this acte of chastity he sped so well, that most part of the Townes and Cities as he passed along, brought their keyes vnto him, and conquered (the more easily) the Kingdomes hee laide clayme to. And yet neuertheless, this King had Ladies (sometimes) at command in his owne Court, albeit very secretly.

So long as Caius Marius followed war, he performed many braue and vertuous exploits therein, largely encreasing (with great Provinces) his Country and Common-wealth of Rome. As having conquered Murthe, King of the Numidians, and made an absolute furerder of his Kingdome to Rome: hee likewise vanquished the Cymberians in Gaul, and the Germanes that were entred into Italy, and seauen times was he made Confull, euen in iust regard of his great deseruings. But when he ceased from being a Warriour, adding himselfe to idlenesse, and desir- ing to liue in peace: aspiring by his ambition to tyranny, he caused about tenne thousand Citizens to dye wretchedly, & ended his owne life in miserable exile. And the very same did Sylla, who was esteemed one of the most fortunate men in his time; who in a ranged battaile, ouerthrew Mithridates neere to Charones; and his Lieutenant at another time after, not farre from Athens. He vanquished also the Medes, and the Dardaniens or Trojans; he put Carbo to flight, & droue him quite out of Italy; winning the battaile likewise against Marius; and so long as he followed the warres, liued most nobly and vertuously. But being returned home to his house, and liuing there in peace; hee became a tyrant and butcher of the Citizens; so that (in one day) he commanded nine thousand of them to be slaine, promising a certaine stipend or wages, to any one that brought him a Romane Citizens head.

While Pompey managed Armes, and was a braue Commander in Armies; hee was esteemed the most vertuous man the liuing. For he restored the Kingdome of Numidia to Masinijsa, which Hiarbas had vsurped from him. He vanquished Sertorius, King of Portugall, ending also the most dangerous warre of the Pyrats, and ouercame Mithridates, King of Pontus, confraining him to slay himselfe. He warred in the Northerne parts, conquered Albania, Morea, the Henoches, Cappia, Hiberia, and afterwards (in the East) surmounted the Parthians, Arabians, and subiected Iudea beside. But afterward, the Romane people hauing no longer warre, and he returning home to his abiding, grew enuious against his kinsman Cesar, and as by the precedent warres, the Romane Empire had attained vnto vspeakable greatness: so by peace it impayed too much, onely through ciuill warre, engen-dred among themselves. In which respect, many people and Kings shooke off the yoke, wherein they stood tributaries to the Romanes, and so their Empire (by little and little came to decadence.

Great Alexander, so long as hee continued warre in the East, hee was accounted most valiant and temperate. And hauing vanquished Darius, finding none other to resist against him, he grew to such insolence; that he would be often drunk, & made himselfe so contemptible, as he became despised of his owne people, his friends and kindred, who caused him to dye by poison, hauing scarcely attained to the age of thirty yeares.

So long as the Lacedemonians had braue warlike Kings and Capitaines, and found them employment in warres, eyther whether it were for defence of their owne Country, or for conquering others, such men as were Agesslaw, Agis, Archidamus, Brasidas, Damodidas, Euricratidas, Temistocles, Callistratidas, and more such like beside; they daily prospered in all attempts they vnderooke. But so soone as they had conquered the Athenians, & pillaged and polled their City vnder Lysander, and had filled their purses with money, making no more account or care of war: the sweet ease and goodnesse of the time then seized on them, & concerning both exercise and military discipline, they became quickly ruined. For, from all former times of antiquity, they commonly employed painfull diligence, rather by stratagems and pollicies of warre to conquer their enemies, then by power: which was more commended in Archidamus, then any other vertue else. They alwayes shunned peace, not as disallowing it to be good; but because it continually enticed them to too many vices. For the Lacedemonian Lawes ordained, that men might walke through the City in the night time without light; because a Soldiour, most often being in war, might (by all meanes) march against his enemy, and at all houres as occasion presented it selfe, eyther by day or night. Patient also they were in all externall iniuries, as raines, windes, heats, frosts, mysts, and in greatest hungers; being euermore constantly resolu'd, eyther to conquer, or dye in the field. Which extremities, could not be exercised by slothfull people, or liuing in peace.

The

Idlenesse and negligence was the ruine of Great Alexander.

Through sloth and idlenesse, the Lacedemonians vicerly ouerthrew themselves.

* A Noblesse of Sparta, son to Telis that would adventure any danger whatsoever for his Countries safety.

The Grecian Philosophers banished out of Rome, and the reason why.

A poet banished out of Lacedemon for writing against warre.

The gods of the Lacedemonians were painted armed, and those of the Greekes effeminately.

The French nation entred into long continued sedition, onely by peace.

The Romans, in those times, when they were not corrupted with forces of foren nations, banished all the Grecian Philosophers, and would not admit any knowledge of letters among them, but for their vse; and no lesse hated they the professors of questionary sciences, then their books. They would not practise or learne anie thing, but to know how they might best bee obedient to Magistrates, and endure the hardest travels in battels, to liue or die. A Thesalian being demanded, who were the worst conditioned people in his country, answered; Such as had withdrawn themselves from Military labour and discipline.

A poet, named Archilochus, being come to dwell in Lacedemon, was banished presently thence, being knowne to haue written: That it was much better to forsake the Target and Armes, then to die in warre. Among the Lacedemonians, it was an especiall obseruation, to figure all the Images of their gods and goddesses armed, holding lances in their hands, as signifying themselves to be warriors: Because they reputed nothing to be more vile & infamous, then idlenesse and vnarmed peace, being no way fo goodly in appurance, as Military vertue: and therefore they paynted their gods in such forme, as themselves alwayes wished to be. Contrariwise, the Grecians Theology instructed them; to figure their gods, idle, peaceable, and lying all along. And it seemed, that the Lacedemonians had good reason fo to do, because they imagined, that all our actions should be conformable to those of the gods: for, in painting the shapes of the gods effeminately, and so to follow them in like qualities; is to be pernicious, and vnprofitable to the Common-wealth.

So soone as Henry, second of that name king of France, had contracted peace with the Emperor, the Kings of Spain and England, with all the princes of Italy, and with the countries of high and lower Germany, they all being enemies to him: he was verry shortly after slaine in a iousting, with a spie of a lance, entring in at the sight of his Beauer. All the great Capitaines of France esteemed vertuous among all other Nations, in times of peace, fell to killing one another, keeping neither faith nor promise, but proditoriously massacring their very best friends: feining assemblies about the State affaires: some vnder colour of marriages; others, by pretended feasts and banquets, proceeding on so far in this wicked courte, till they killed eiey king, yea & sought to murder his successor. In briefe, they leagued themselves daily one against another, and some against the State, growing into such factious and treacherous coniuurations, that the French were thought to be a most barbarous kind of people. All which had hapned, but thorough discontinuing exercise of Armes against ancient enemies, and calling them in, to depoyl them of their goods. Like as the ancient Gauls formerly did, who in meere enuy one to another, and hauing giuen ouer the exercise of Armes, one part called in the Romanes, and another the Almanes or Germanes, who were their vetter ruine in the end. And so they became tributaries, who were wont to bee the onely terror of the Romanes, Grecians, Spaniards, yea, and likewise of the Germanes.

Seeing then it cometh so to passe, that some Princes, and likewise some Common-wealths (as appeareth by our passed Discourse) attained to much honor, and order their affaires better in their forms of warre, then in the calmer seasons of peace; and because it is not possible that warres should continually endure, but Peace must, and will haue some time of liway and diminution: Let vs now see, if there be not as good meanes of vertuous containment, as well in the dayes of peace as of warre; doubtlesse it may be done more commodiously, and the waies of compassing it I will briefly declare.

First of all, when there is no more occasion, for employing men of warre in a Kingdome or Common-wealth: aduice is to be had, what Princes, friends or confederats of strangers, haue any need of men of such martiall qualitie, and thither to send them in their assistance, with charge of returning from thence agayne, when they shall bee summoned thereto. Not onely shall the State or Common-wealth be thus disburthened of paying such wages: but also of such celebrates, as ordinarily doe follow men of warre, the more safely to commit their thefts and villanies, without checke, law, or punishment.

In like manner did Charles the fifth of that name, and King of France, who having taken truce with the English, Narrians, and Britains, being entreated by Henry of Castile, the Bastard, who made warre vpon his legitimate brother for the kingdome. For Pope Urban had conferred the Crowne vpon him, in regard that Don Peter, king of Castile, had intelligence and confederacy with the King of Granada, who was of the Mahometane Religion. Moreover, he was a tyrant, doing many things vnbecoming the name or credit of a Christian. King Charles sent him fieur of souldiers, vnder conduct of the Constable Bertrand du Guesclin, who (by that voyage) purged France of an infinite number of Theues, the greater part whereof were slaine in that warre. The like did Lewes the cleuenth, who, having peace with all his enemies, sent all his souldiers (that rauaged strangely in his kingdome) to the Earle of Richmond, who passed them ouer with him into England, because he laid claime to the kingdome. By this meane, hee ridde his realme of rascality, and had some reuenge also vpon his ancient enemies.

Augustus Caesar, hauing overcome his Competitor Mark Anthony, and hauing no further employment for war; was not so improvident or indiscreet, as to suffer his souldiers lue idle and negligently; but sent forty Legions into remote Prouinces, and to the frontiers of barbarous nations, still to support their militarie discipline, and to keepe all occasions of ciuill war, so farre off as might bee. But Great Constantine the Emperor, following the counsell of diuers Bythops and Priestes, who were slenderly experienced in State affaires: threw off his Legionaries and men of warre; which was the cause, that ancient Military Discipline became quite lost, and opened a gate to such enemies, as (afterward) invaded the Romane Empire on all sides. For they vnderstood not, that Lawe, Iustice, and the whole State (next vnder God) are in the protection of Armes, as vnder a foueraign & safe buckler of defence.

Yet there is one point more, very considerable, to shew, that Militarie Discipline ought to be maintained, and warre made, vpon good and iust occasions; for there haue alwayes bene (and neuer shall we bee without) some theues, murderers, idle loyterers, vagabonds, murmurers, and sturdy vagrants, which (in any Common-wealth) do hurt and spoyle the honest simplicity of good subiects, & notwithstanding the verie best Iustice that may be vied, yet can no country bee intirely cleared of such Cankers. The best helpe (in this case) is warre, to fend such vnecessary members farre off from home-abiding, whereoeuer any fitting employment happeneth. Because it serueth as a purge-ue medicine, very cordiall and conuenient, for expelling such corrupted humours, out of the Common-wealths vniuersall body. Furthermore, in times of peace, and for better enjoying the benefit thereof; no tolleration is any way to bee suffered, of such as haue not trade or vocation; for idleness and negligence, cause too many cuils in any kingdome. By this discourse then may bee obserued those reasons, why many Princes & Commonweales flourish in times of war, & fell to ruine in the daies of peace; the best meane also in both of them hath briefly bin deliuered.

CHAP. VIII

That Princes ought not to erect sumptuous and stately buildings; as hoping thereby to make their names immortal.

OME Flatterers cannot be sufficiently blamed, that perswade Kings and great Monarks, to build sumptuous houses and Palaces, thereby to make their names immortal, contrary to the iudgment of Count Balthazar the Castilian, in his booke of the Courtier, who (in mine opinion) hath highly erred, to write and approoue such a vanitie. For, the end of all certuous actions (according to the saying of Cicero, in the 3. booke of his Tuſculanes) is honour, glory, and good renown; not a dumb building, which is composed of the sweat, blood, and means of poor people. Palaces cannot moue out of the places where they are builded, nor can they make knowne the generous deeds of such as erected them: And men that dwell

Chap. 8.

Of sumptuous Buildings.

Men's names running out by their buildings.

Princes are apply compared to Swallows in theyr houe to theyr buildings.

Example of Catharine de Medicis, not long since Mother of Fr.

The Qu. Mother of France liked not the building of sumptuous houses, which were indeed to small vie.

by those places, and strangers that see or passe by them, when some fifty yeares (or so) are ouer-passed, can scarcely bee informed, who were the founders, albeit their names may be engrauen vpon some stone or other matter; whereby the erecters of Pallaces and proude Buildings, are often frustrated of theyr hope and intention.

Moreover, if it be well pondered and considered, the sayrest building is but a matter of frailtie, and subiect to no long continuance: for, when men cease from dwelling there, they runne in poasting speede to ruine and decay. And Princes are the occasion hercof: Resembling Swallows, who will neuer neastle twice in one neast: Euen so, the most parte of Princes dwellings become desert, like to King Frances, who buylded a great Tower in the Castell of the Louure in Paris, made after the auncient manner, and ruined the body of the Lodging, by causing another to be erected. Afterward he builded Madrie, and then agayne the house of Fontaine bleau, yet neuer dwelt in any of the sayd buildings.

Catharine de Medicis, widow to King Henry the second deceased, when she was Regent (although shee was well furnished with vnderstanding, and a Lady of great honour) yet notwithstanding, shee suffered her selfe, to be ouermuch perswaded by some flatterers in the Court about her: that, to render her memory to posteritie euerlastingly, shee should erect some goodly Pallace; whereto she yielded, after a long time of sollicitation. Shee had not seene the fourth part of the building out of the ground, but shee began to repent her selfe, saying: Shee knew well enough, that it was meere vanity, to hope for immortalizing by buildings, frailty, & subiect to ruine in a short time, and so left off, from proceeding any further in so fruitlesse a businesse.

The sayd Lady had houses of pleasure abroad, passably fayre and commodious: but in Paris shee had not a dwelling, her children being come to age. The Louure, a royall habitation, was not sufficient to receiue her and her traine: wherefore, seeing that the Court (in those times) kept ordinarily at Paris: shee built an other of indifferent cost, in the place where was founded the order and religion of Adrie

Magdalen, for sinfull women and maides, converted to repentance, and transported the religious women thence, vnto the Abbey of Saint Mary Magdalen, being much more commodious for them. Reproouing the counsell formerly giuen to her, she would vsually say: That money might be better employed, in redeeming the Crowne lands, paying of debts, easing the people oppressed with grieuous taxation; then to bee wasted in such vaine manner, which wordes right well became so great a Princeesse as shee was.

Oftentimes she commended the good Emperour Vespasian, who neuer builded any Pallace, but contented himselfe with such as were erected by his predecessors: yet did hee re-edifie diuers and sundry ruined Temples and Theaters, and gaue very bounteously to Hospitals. As shee like did the Emperour Dominian, who was well satisfied with a small dwelling: and yet builded hee the Capitole, which was greatly decayed by age, and a Temple of his owne, dedicated vnto Iupiter.

The sacred Scriptures tell vs, that the magnificence and ouer great sumptuousnesse of Salomon, in building his pallaces and houses, were the cause, that tenne Tribes of Israel did separte themselves from obedience to his heyre Rehoboam, and reigned onely but ouer two. I will not speake here of the Temples building, for his father left him all the stufte and the meane, as needed for the erection of so holy a Temple. But the immesurable expences layde out on his Pallace, for furnishment whereof, the people themselves so pressed after his decease: that they were constrained to seeke another King, then his Sonne Rehoboam, who would continue the prodigall expences of his father in building, and so (of twelue parts) hee lost ten in his kingdome.

It is right well knowne, by the Text of the Iewish Chronicles, that King Salomon abused the Graces and Blessings both of Almighty God and men: for, it was not sufficient for him, to make walls in his pallace of the very goodliest stones, the best polished, and most splendant in all the world; but hee would needs illuminate them also with exquisite colors, ce- uering them besides with massie golde, as making lesse account of siluer, then hee did of leade or yron. The like is to be vnderstood of the planchers and floores, all made of curious and strange woods, the very worst being of Cedar and Cethin, without corruption, and smelling most sweetly, resembling in color, the beames of the Sun, being so ingeniously handled in the working, that they appeared like most curious shapcs and figures, as no men in the world were able to iment, or counterfeite the like. And yet neuerthelesse, hee couered those costly woods with plates of gold, enshafed with infinite precious stones: so that the very floores seemed to be second starry Heauens; whereby may easily be presupposed, what the other parts of his Pallace were.

Moreover, Saloman did not onely build one Pallace in Ierusalem, but many more beside in diuers places, euen as rich, or rather more costly then the other. As that which hee erected for his Summers recreation, in the Wood of Lybanus, abounding in all variety of vanities. In two Halls he placed five hundred Shields or Targets, of immeasurable greatnesse, and all of massiue gold, each Target valuing (at the least) two thousand and foure hundred Crownes, as Empelemus hath recorded. The said Bucklers or Targets were beaten with the hammer, and engrauen with rare and costly branched workes. He builded another Pallace in Gazer, more sumptuous then the two former were: which was quickly ruined after his death, and at this day the places are not knowne where those Pallaces stood. For the building of these, hee trauailed and molested his people, who reuolted from him, losing thereby his heyre and successe, and (well neere) all his Kingdome; his Reigne (beside) being full of many warres and other miseries. Behold what goodly benefit redounded to him, by erecting such ouer-sumptuous buildings: for, the Egyptian people destroyed and pilld his Pallace before his eyes.

The vanity of Nero Claudius Caesar.

Tranquillus declarcth, that Nero Claudius Caesar, the sixt Romane Emperour, was so ambitious; that he desired to make his name immortal, by the meanes of buildings, which he intended to erect, and valued the price of his life, whereof I purpose to sette downe a briefe description.

First, he would haue had all Rome to be pulled downe, and then to be built againe at the Cittizens charges: saying, that the streets were not strait nor large enough. Heereupon, diuers leud persons (by him subborned) fiered the City in sundry places: hee intending afterward to haue it beare his name, and to be called Neropolis: which partly was put in execution, albeit the eight part could hardly be burned, and because many houses were built all of stone, with engines he caused them to be destroyed. And as he persecuted thus in ruinating the houses, certaine conspiracies (intended against him) chanced to be discovered to him; which made him leaue off, and proceed therein no further. Cornelius Tacitus writeth, that hee caused a false fame to be noysed in Rome, throwing scandalous aspersions vpon the Christians, as if that they had fired the city. And great likelihood there was, that this imposture should proceed from him, and to be imposed on the Christians: because he was a vowed enemy to all vertuous, holy and well affected people. In which respect, so many Christians as hee could apprehend, were bathed and anointed on their naked bodies, with greafe and pitch, and then tyed to pillars, and fire put vnto them, so they seemed as flaming Linkes or Torches, for passengers and night-walkers through the Citie.

For continuance of his names immortalizing, and onely by such buildings he intended; I meane to describe one, another manner of thing, then those which Saloman caused to be erected, what store of gold foueuer he bestowed vpon them: whereof let the Reader be Iudge, for what is heere inserted. I haue traduced out of the said Tranquillus, who both taw that Nero, and his Pallace, and auoucheth, that Nero neuer did more harmes in all his actions, then in his buildings. He erected a house, extending from his Pallace so farre as Mount Esquiline, which hee named, The House of Gold: and being almost finished, it was wholly destroyed with thunder and lightning falling from Heauen, and yet neuerthelesse, hee builded it againe. It was so spacious, that it had a place for him to walke in, which was a Gallery at the very entrance, containing a thousand paces in length, hauing three ranks of Marble pillars, all made with Arches, most proudly glittering with goodly colors, hauing infinite fabulous Histories, and Poeticall figures. In that place also was a Colossus, of an hundred and twenty foote in height, formed after his owne effigie and resemblance. There was likewise a Poole or Pond, seeming as if it had bene an huge spacious Sea: on the Bankes wherof (all round about) were stately houses builded, so that it appeared to be a faire great City.

Within the compassse of this building, were careable grounds, Vineyards, Pasturages, Medowes and Forrests, with multitudes of diuers kinds of Beastes, as well wilde as tame, enclosed within high walles, in the manner of a Parke, and furnished with very artificall cunning. All other parts of this Pallace, were richly gilded, thickly powdered with precious stones, and mother of Pearle, the floores of the Halls for Dinners and Suppers, were all in-layed with Iuory, and curious wrought plates of fine gold, so subtilly turning each against other, that flowers and sweete waters descending from the Roofe, by conuoyes of artificiall conuincance, fell on them sitting at the Table, & after were receiued into the floores. Among all the Halls for banquetting, there was one entirely round, which (by imitable arte) was so composed, that it turned round night and day, like vnto the world.

Ouer and beside all these, hee caused a Fifth-Pond to be made, from Misena, so farre as the Lake Auerna, all engirt with Galleries: where the warme waters of the gulfe Baiæ fell into it. Beside, he had a trench or ditch made, reaching from Auerna to Ostia, for boates to float on, containing foure score French miles in length, and of such widenesse, that two great Gallies, with five ranks of Oares might passe on front. Because if one should mount one way, and the other come againe to meet it: they might freely passe without danger of touching one another.

ry farre off, cutting through Mountaines, Rocks, pulling downe Forrests, and such like: so that it seemed a worke of no mortal power, but as if it were done by God himselfe. To perfect this mighty labour, he gaue command, that so many prisoners as could be found, were it for criminal causes, debts, or any case else whatsoever throughout the whole Romane Empire (which contained then almost our Hemisphere) should be brought to Rome, and there to be employed in this seruice.

And because these mighty workes could not be effected without inestimable expences; he imposed on the City of Rome (without exempting people of any quality) great and extraordinary subsidies, and vpon the whole Lands of the Empire, wherein the Gaulles (among other Prouinces) felt no meane affliction, although they were (well neere) quite ruined by the precedent warres, so that they were constrained to reuolt from his obedience. The like did Spain, and great store of the Prouinces in Asia and Affrica, and (in the end) all Italy. Heereupon, he sent out strickt prohibitions, that no Officer of the Empire should be paid his wages, no, nor the Bishops & Priests, who were paid by the hands of the public Receiueurs; neither could the Legions haue their pay, which caused great hauck in the Prouinces whether they were sent. For he employed all his monyes, about those admirable Workes and Buildings, and yet could not prouide sufficient for that purpose.

In regard whereof, the Senate and whole body of the people, being no longer able to support those prodigall expences; conspired against him. Which coming to his knowledge, & he perceiving approaching danger (being forsaken of all his owne followers) fled out of the City, to a Country Farme belonging to one of his Libertines; where, by the help of one of his friends, he had his throat cut; for he was such a cowardly slaue, that he durst not do it himselfe.

Such was the deferred and miserable end of this Emperour, which happened to him, by employing his reuenues, and the goodes of his Subjects so prodigally, in erecting proude buildings, and to no profit.

The end of Nero like to apalus*.

Neroes Palace was more sumptuous than all them of Salomon.

This one worke of his, was three or foure times more costly, and of greater admiration, then either the Temple, or all the Pallaces of Salomon, King of Israel. Of which (as also of Neroes) not anie kinde of noate or memory remaineth to be seene, and the places are not knowne where they stood. And although men commune and speake of Neroes in these our dayes, it is not in regarde of his sumptuous buildings, whereby hee thought to immortalize his name: but for his abominable whooredomes, parricides, and infamous life, which hee leede so long as hee liued. Whereof, at this time, I desire not to make anie more mention: for so many Historians haue written thereof, and especially Tranquillus (Author of all that hitherto hath bene spoken) as I must fend them to his Volumes, which are desirous to reade any more of his life and actions.

CHAP. IX.

¶ Who was the first, among all other Monarches and Princes, that commaunded, to present by writing, what power was to be negotiated with him.

Very man of iudgement wel may thinke, that a Prince, who hath manie Prouinces vnder his charge, and giueth command to diuers people; must needs be much hindered, from answering all such as are to negotiate with him. And it would be a matter vterly impossible for him to satisfie all suites and demands made vnto him: if hee were not eased by some especiall persons, of good vnderstanding in the State affaires, as a Chancellor, Secretary, and some such other beside. In like maner, that which giueth him greatest contentment, is, when men make their suites to him by writing, as in these dayes is discretely vsed: which was well inuented (and to good purpose) by the Emperor Tiberius, who commaunded it to be so done, for any matter whatsoever, and likewise deliuered his answers by writing.

The reason was, to the end that nothing might escape, till it had bene considered on so well as possibly might be: For, by ouer much talking, and communicating himselfe too often, a Prince may commit diuers errors, which will cause him to be misprised, or meanely esteemed. And it neuer ought to bee (as an ancient Greeke said) That a Prince should speake any otherwise before the people, then as if he were in a fairly Tragedy.

But some may object vnto mee, That this is not the true state of a Prince; for, in doing iustice to his people, hee should heare their complaints and greeuances, vnderstanding from each mans mouth, the vrgent occasions constraining them thereunto, which are ordinarily suppressed, or else disguised by others mannaing.

I am not of the minde, to haue him so conceale himselfe, that hee should not be seene but very seldome, or neuer. As now-a-days the Kings in the East Indies vse to doe, and especially the King of Borneo, who neuer speaketh, but only to his wife and children. When hee is to speake to other, hee doth it by a Gentleman, through a place made of purpose, where he can not be seene, but hath the wordes conueyed from the Gentlemans mouth to his eare, thorow the hollow passage of a Truncke: as hee did vnto the Ambassadour of the King Catholique, and as we reade in the Histories of the Indies.

But although he shew himselfe very little, as standing vpon his greatnesse and maiestie; regarde is yet to be had to his quality and power. For, it is not seemely, that a petty Prince should counterfeite the great Kings of Aethiopia, of Tartaria, Perfia and Turkie, who (indeed) will not haue their Subiects to looke directly vpon them: because, they are not so much repected for power, as they are for maiestie, as they expresse sufficiently, when they will be seene of their Subiects. And if some say, that the Princes of the East and South should gouerne in that maner, and not they of the West and North: I holde it to be all one in the maiue regard. For, it is knowne well enough, that the Kings of England, Sweden, Denmarke and Poland, do containe farre more greatnesse towards their Subiects, then the King of France.

An objection in this case alledged, and to good purpose.

The Kings in the East Indies are daunted of their sight and audience.

Kings more are daunted for maiestie then power.

Difference in the maiestie of princes to their Subiects.

France, and the King of Moscovia, much more then all the rest: and yet perhappes they are not lesse, but (it may bee) better obeyed.

Now let vs returne againe to our purpose, of conferring with a Prince by petition or writing, whereby many commodities ensue vnto him. For first (as hath already bene said) he vseth no communication by that meanes, nor shewes himselfe too familiar with his people, which contayneth him still in the farre greater esteeme.

Another reason is, that either if he will not, or cannot grant the demands moued vnto him: if he make refusal, he can receiue no shame or disgrace thereby: considering, that the written paper will not blush.

Moreouer, answer is returned with the more assured iudgment, by the time allowed to set downe the Princes Will; which cannot be so well done, speaking with him face to face. For oftentimes, he may be incited to anger, by mouing the matter disorderly, or else vpon some other occasion, whereby he may answer farre from his owne minde. Or els it may happen in some intemperate time; for all Princes are not alike in diet; & then, gifts so imment, and of such importance may be granted, as the whole State shall fare the worse for it.

All which approoueth not, that hee should despise to answer requests, being made to him by his people: least it happen to him, as it did to Demetrius, who quarrelled the kingdome of Egypte against Ptolemy. Hee hauing receiued a great number of petitions, kept them all in the lap of his cloake; and, passing ouer the bridge of a Riuer; he let them all fall downe into the water, according as we reade in Plutarch. Whereupon, his Subiects seeing themselves so contemned, conceived capital hatred against him: & (soone after) he was forsaken of his Army, who yielded themselves & the kingdome to Ptolemy, and so hee won it without fighting.

It hath bene obserued also, that princes, listning verbally to the suites and requests of their Subiects, haue mette with bold and insolent confronters. As the woman, who was put off day by day by Philip, King of Macedon, in some matter of expedition which the require of him, whereupon she sayd: If thou neither wilt, nor canst do iustice: depose thy selfe, and another will succie me: faulciely seeming (by this meanes) to take the King with neglect and carelesnesse. The very like words vsed Jaime de Pierre lusiére, a Ladie of Chambare, to King Charles the ninth, he being in the City of Bordeaux, where the demanded iustice of him against the murderer of her husband.

A certaine Rouer of the Sea was taken, who was reported, to bee the most cruell and detestable Pyrat, that euer was heard of. Alexander the Great, would needes see him and speake with him, to the end hee might the sooner condemne him. Wherefore hee demanded of him: whence it proceeded, that he would be a Pyrate, and leade such an infamous kind of life; hauing meanes to provide for himselfe otherwise: As to be in pay with some Warlike Navy, where hee might receiue good respect; considering, that hee was strong, stout, and a good Soldier, as it had appeared by his passed course of life? With a bold and vndanted countenance, the Rouer returned him this answer. I am sayd to be a Pirate and Rouer on the Sea, because I saile with a small Vessel, without any other Followers: and when I meete with another, being weaker then my selfe; then I make some appropriation of him. But thou, that makest thy Navigations, with great multitudes of Gallies, and other Shippes of Warre, robbing and ransacking all Maritime Townes and places, yea, and vpon the firme land likewise: Thou must be called an Emperour and a Monarch. Full well knew Alexander by the Pyrates answer, that his behaviour differed verie little from the others, and that hee deferred as well to bee punished as hee: and therefore, being ashamed of so fowle a detection, hee freely pardoned him.

Frances, Duke of Anjou, and a sonne of France, not long since deceased, being desirous to settle himselfe, and to match with some Queene or Princess that was an heyre: made meanes of marriage vnto Elizabeth Queene of England, letters passing betwene them to that purpose, and their pictures. In the end, the Queen sent him word, that she would neuer contract with any that fought her, except shee might

The Prince, being perſwaded by yong heads (as little aduiled in ſuch a buſineſſe, as himſelfe) and leauing the counſell of more graue experience, went into England to bee ſcene, and with a very ſlender train. But being well obſerued by that Lady, he was found ſo deformed by the ſmall pockes, which had left ſuch a deep driving into his face, his noſe alſo much miſhapen, and ſome kernels riſing in his necke beſide, as might bee the cauſes of looſing the fauour of ſo fayre a Queene. Some were of opinion, that hee ſhould not haue gone, but to haue continued the treatie of Marriage ſtill by Letters; which peraduenture (at length) would haue wonne him grace and fauour.

More wiſely dealt the Arch-duke of Auſtria, and Prince Henry, afterwards King of Sweden, who made ſuite alſo to the ſayde Queene to eſpouſe her, but at ſundry times, and were ſent for likewiſe to be ſcene. But they ſatisfied themſelues to treat with the Queene by their Letters, and not verbally: for, by this means, they were aſſured that ſhe could not cauſe them to bluſh.

I conclude then, that this inuention of Tyberius, was, and is very convenient for great Monarches and Soueraigne Princes, not to negotiate by words with their Subjects; but to expedite by Writings, becauſe thereby they ſhall ſo much the ſooner diſpatch, and a great deale more equally.

Moreover, if Princes or Princeſſes, haue any matters betwene them to diſentangle; to performe the ſame by Letters and Deputies ſent from either ſide: for by enter-view and ſpeaking together, little good can be done, at leaſt verie ſeldom.

CHAP. X.

Of ſuch qualities and carriage, as (neceſſarily) is required to be in a Prince.

Each as couet to command ouer any one whole Nation, ſhould firſt propounde two things to himſelfe: one is, to be liberal; the other is, to be clement and gentle. For the Prince, which exerciſeth liberality, ſhall make his enemies to become his friends; thoſe of all other places to be his owne; and of diſloyall, faithfull ſeruant. Hee muſt bee affable to ſtrangers, chiefly ſuch as dwell in the furtheſt parts of his Land: And as a Prince endued with clemencie, is admired of all men, and honoured as a God: So by theſe two Vertues, Liberality and Clemencie, hee is made like vnto God; becauſe his Office is, to doe good vnto all, and to pardon ſuch as are delinquents.

I confeſſe it to bee true, that a Prince ought not (alwayes) to be facile and benigne to his ſubiectes: but that (with his facility and mildeneſſe) he may commixe a grauity and ſeuerity, ſuch as may be termed a kinde of rigour, at ſuch times as neede requireth; to cauſe feare and terror in bad liuers, and to puniſh them rigorouſly, if neceſſary enforce it, for the preuention of a greater euill. Otherwiſe, the Prince may bee the cauſe of his peoples loſſe, if hee permit too much licence and libertie, in the performance of diſhoneſt actions; like to Alciades, who thorough too much eaſie carriage in himſelfe, corrupted and ſpoyled his people. And yet ſeuerity ought to be moderated; for when it is exceſſiue, and ouer-ſharpe ſeueritie: it aſſiſteth Townes and Citties with great miſeries: euen as when licence is facetiouſly accommodated to the onely grace and fauour of the people, it prooueth to be the cauſe of their ruine, by the lacke of a leuell temperature both in the one and other.

circumſtances and difference of perſons, the Prince ought to vſe, eyther more ſeueritie, or ſometimes more facilitie (according to reaſon) and as Wiſedome iudgeth it fitteſt to be done, or ſpared for general good.

Aſſuredly, in regard that the people is as a Monſter with many heads; there is great neede (as Sophocles ſayth) of a maine and ſtrong bridle. And as it is a principall poynct of Arte in a good Querrie, to make a horſe pace milde and obediently; euen ſuch is the office of diſcipline in a Prince, to render his ſubiectes obedient and modeſt. And yet notwithstanding, to do it in gentle manner, and by benigne means, not rudely conſtraying them alwayes: but perſwading, admoniſhing, and reprehending ſometimes, not purſuing euerie ſuſpition; but conuiuing in light matters, deferring a buſineſſe in time of danger and doubt, to redreſſe it at ſome other ſeaſon, more apte and proper. For, by reſpreſſing and puniſhing all arrogance and wickedneſſe; he may the more benignely entertaine the good, when humbly they preſent their aſſiduations and requests vnto him. All which is the eaſier done, by vnderſtanding the manners and ſpirites of the people, becauſe, ſuch as are of rude and harſh brain (like vnto thoſe of barbarous nations) muſt bee governed with more ſeueritie; then they that be of more docible nature, who ought to be mannaed with mildeneſſe and benignitie, without ſtearne looks, or vnkinde manner of dealing.

The complexions of men are diuers and diſſembleable, eyther by the nature of the place and ayre; or elſe by cuſtome and manner of life. The Athenians, were eaſie to anger and mercy, the Carthaginians ſad, opinionatiue and obſtinate; the Romans great, benigne, louers of their Country, ambitious and couetous of glory and honor. And therefore, ignorance in the manners of ſuch as wee conuerſe withall, doth oft deceiue and diſappoint vs in our opinions and enterpriſes; wherefore, by the diuers nature and cuſtome of the people, Lycurgus was rather a ſeſticator of power, then iuſtice; and Numa Pompilius of iuſtice, rather then of power.

For, as a Prince (in ciuile actions) imitateth the ſkilfull behauiour of a Lute-niſt, who tendeth and diſtendeth their cordes of the inſtrument, to bring an accord of tune as he would haue it; ſo doth hee likewiſe follow the Chirurgical, in order and means for tempering with liſe; becauſe light infirmities hee can cure eaſily, whereas to them of more perill, hee applyeth both yron and fire. In the ſame manner, a Prince maketh vſe of the Rod and the Sword, according to the ſeueral occurrences, and as they appeare.

It ſolloweth, that a Prince ought to entertaine good Lawes, and to obſerue the chiefſt of ſuch as hee hath made: but a boue all other) to haue the honour and feare of God before his eyes. It is neceſſary alſo for a Prince to haue the command of himſelfe, and beare a ſtriſt hand on the bridle of his owne affections: directing firſt a good courſe of liſe to himſelfe, to the ende, that it may ſerue as a Square or Rule, to meaſure the liues of other after his manners. For, very hardly ſhall hee commaund others (ſayth Pindarus) that hath not learned himſelfe to obey reaſon, which is the Queene of all things, and a Law, not engrauen in Marble, but in our ſpirites, commanding to perſorme lawfull actions, and prohibiting ſuch as are contrary, and bad. Her woorthy enſtructions, wicked Kings (being ſlaues to their owne affections) will not immitate: For, if hee were their Queene & Gouernneſſe, they ſhould bee conſtrained to contemne their vilenneſſe, and honeſtly to enter faire Vertues ſeruite.

The Pythian Oracle, by the anſwere it gaue to King Craſus, That he ſhould know himſelfe, was not to be vnderſtoode; that he ſhould know the glory and greatneſſe of his Empire: but Reaſon, Queene and miſtris of humane liſe, which appeareth the perturbations of the minde, and reſtrayneth the mightineſſe of power: For, the Poet Horace ſayth (by way of enſtruction) that it is a matter no leſſe royall, to repreſſe appetites and affections, then to rule ouer people.

then other. Alexander the Great, accounted it much more honest and glorious, to conquer himselfe, rather then to conquer enemies. A Prince should shunne flattery, for if he lend his eares to flatterers, he will not alwayes bee himselfe. Credulity is accompanied with rashnesse and folly, and there is no greater argument of folly, then credulity:
therefore a Prince should not be too credulous, that is, over-light in beleefe.

Ambition also, which is the Mother and Nurfe of many great evils, and the plague of Kingdomes and Commonwealths, should bee excluded from the heart of a Prince. A Prince that remembers himselfe to be but a man, and consequently mortall, will neuer mount vp his thoughts in pride; but pursue equality. If he perceiue all things prosper, and succeed according as hee can wish: hee will then beleefe, that God commandeth ouer humane occasions, whereof himselfe only hath care, and pride is highly displeasing to him.

I would aduise a Prince, to be carefull of what he promisseth, and to whom hee maketh any promise; to be respectiue of mens merits and their faculties, as also the times of his giuing promise, for the better perseruacion of his faith: because there is nothing more vnworthy, and villainlike, then to breake fidelity, and the force of faith is so great, that it ought to be kept, euē with an enemy, if it be promised. And in regard that faith (according as our graue Auncients haue defined it) is constancy and truth in words and conventions: a Prince ought to be true, and to loue truth, in regard whereof, our bet-ters and elders ordained, and by them it was most wisely instituted; that the Booke of the holy Euangelists (wherein the di-uine verity is contained) should daily (in the time of diuine seruice) be giuen to the Prince to kisse, to the end, that being admonished thereby, to pursue and honour truth; he should likewise remember, how studious he must be in louing her vprightly.

I could wish also, that a Prince should suffer no man to depart sad and discontent from his presence: but with cheer-full looks and gracious language, and so expresse himselfe both vnto small and great. Whosoever knoweth his Prince to be endued with temperance, dare neuer urge any vile or vnbebecoming motion to him. Ohappy Marcus Cato (said Cicero) to whom no man durst make any vncommendable demand: He shall bee thought worthy of authority and soueraigne power, and bee reputed a hopefull Prince by his people;

that sharply punisheth wicked men, hateth
the intemperate, reiecteth liars, & flyeth (as from the plague) such as aduise him to follow voluptuousnesse: for whosoeuer takes pleasure in crediting such confellers; his childhood in rule shall be im-modestly, his youth effeminacy, and his age infamy.

Whosoever holdeth gouernment ou-er the people, ought to be free from affections; for anger hindereth knowledge of whatsoever is good; hatred puffeth him on to imperfect actions; loue blindeth his iudgement; pleasure and inordinate will induceth him to violence; passion pricketh him on to reuenge; and enuy enflameth him, with a more hasty and fiery temper, then is expedient in him. One and the same constancy in courage (at all times) is most required and commended in a King, as well in cases of aduersity, as prosperity. And if God please to visite him, with any seuerge of his diuine lu-stice; he ought to reioyce, and remember, that God chastiseth such as hee lo-ueth; learning thereby, to support all with the vertue of patience in contrary fortunes, and not to mount vp in pride, whē affaires are fitting to his owne desires.

Sloth, accompanied with negligence, is greatly hurtfull to a Prince, which in times of safety, begetteth (oftentimes) feare and distrust, whereof the Poet saith,

Optim Reges prius, et beatas Perdidit urbes.

Wherefore, to shunne such inconue-niences, some honest exercise is very fit for him; to play at Tennis (euē till hee sweates) is wholesome for him, and Mu-sicke is very commendable; sometimes to hunt, and to ride great Horses is necessary, for which Virgil gaue recommendations to Picus, King of the Latines.

ging horses, were (about all other) frequent with King Cyrus, for encreasing the strength of his body, and greatly ser-uing for the instruction of Militarie discipline. And patience, to endure both heate and colde, is laudable in a Prince, and is many times more expedient for him, then strict abstinence from meate and drinke.

It is very necessary also, that he should haue good knowledge in Histories, and (if it were possible) not to bee ignorant in Morall Philosophie, which may well be learned the Hunt-vic: also, to understand Naturall Philosophie, the Science of Ciuile right, and Mathematicall Disciplines. He should be assiduate in reading Poets, as Homer, whome Alexander had alwayes in his hand: and Virgill, singularly affected by the Emperor Octauianus Augustus. A Prince being endued with all these Sciences, shall receiue inestimable benefite thereby.

First, he shall become wise, for learning begetteth wisdom, next, they will yeeld him such vnspokeable pleasure, as no delectation can be thought or vttered, comparable to those that come from erudition: for, inquisition after truth, is the proper worke and perfection of the Spirit.
What is more woorthy in a Prince,
then to vnderstand true & honest things?
To discerne falshood from truth, and villany from honestie? In mine owne iudgement, I account an ignorant man,
I will not say onely, like vnto a Statue or Image, or the trunk of a tree: but (almost) differing in nothing from a brute beast.

If the Prince himselfe be not seene in all these Sciences and Disciplines, it shall be a good quality in him, to cherish and affect the Professors of them, alwayes hauing wife and learned men about him, and to execute nothing, vntill he haue first heard the counsell of them; For, Coun-cell is a sacred thing said Epicharmus. And he should strue to be like vnto them, in as much as possibly he may: according to the example of many great Kings, Princes and Captains, who highly loued and maintained Philosophers, Poets and skilfull men.

A Prince may perceiue, what account Great Alexander made of Aristotle, and how much he admired learned men; what dignitie and praisie Pericles wonne by the institutions of Anaxagoras; and Epimi-nondas by the study of philosophy, who (almost of himselfe) subdued the Lacedæmonians, that commanded all Greece. He may further obserue, how Scipio kept company with Panctius and Polybius, learned men; how Augustus would walke betweene Virgil and Horace; and what honours he gaue to Arrius. Finally, what deportments were vsed by many other Emperours and Kings, on the behalfe of learned men; and, by the example of such persons, himselfe ought to performe the like. The Prince that attaineth to the issue of the qualities before remembred, and are required necessarily in him: shall reigne happily, and the people that liue vnder the lawes of such a Gouernor, will finde themselves more happy then he.

CHAP. XI.

That the eldest Sonne ought alwayes to be discreete, following naturall goodnesse, & being nothing so turbulent; they make them beleue, that they are idiots and fooles, confining them in prison, or else appointing them to Church-seruice. This manner of dealing, hath caused much war in the Realmes where it is put in practise:

and the reason is, because it becometh alwayes, to keepe the order and commandment of God. For, although that the eldeldest Sonne be ill-fighted, lame, crooked, and wholly mis-shapen, provided, that hee have a reasonable soule remaining in him; he is not to be excluded from his naturall right. This is not onely to holde, and take place, when question is made about the right of eldership: but also, when the very nearest male by the fathers side, ought to succeed in the crown, how much deformed soever he be. Because, for one inconvenience, a good law should not be infringed, and so daungerous an ouerture made in Monarchies. Nor ought that to be followed, or held as a good lawe, which was made by Lycurgus, commanding, that deformed or mis-shapen children, should be slaine.

Hereupon, Judgement passed for the Realme of Hungarie, by the States of the Countrey, against the disposition of Launcelot, King of Hungarie: who adopted Alanus, the youngest sonne of his brother, to make him King, and sent Colomanus, his eldest brother to study at Paris, causing him afterward, to undergoe the Orders of Priesthood, and bestowed a Bishoppricke vpon him, to deprive him of all hope of succeeding in the Crowne; because he was quinte-eyed, crook-backed, lame and flammered. Neuerthelesse, the State and people expelled the younger brother: and would have none other to be King then the eldest, who was brought backe againe, dispensation being graunted for his Orders, and he married.

Pompey, being gone into the East parts, to make Conquests, and coming into Indea, found it full of warre, because two brethren warred each with other, onely for the kingly dignity. For Aristobolus the younger brother, had invaded the best places of the Kingdome, and quite expelled his brother Hyrchanus: because hee sayd, that hee was not borne for apte for Armes. Notwithstanding, Pompey adjudged the Kingdome to Hyrchanus, and the high-Priesthood to Aristobolus, which was the chiefest degree next to the King; and thus the stowr warriour was stayed from prosecution of his purpose.

Ptolomie, the first of that name, King of Egypt, preferred the youngest before the eldest, Against the Lawe of Nations, saith Justin, and so caused the one to kill the other. In the same kingdome, an other Ptolomie, named Physconius, at the entreatie of his wife Cleopatra, preferred the youngest sonne before the eldest: but after the fathers death, the people repealed the eldest, and excluded the youngest, as Pausanias affirmeth.

In like manner, Anaxandrides, King of Lacedemon, preferred Coricus before Cleomenes his elder brother, because hee was more gentle; and yet notwithstanding, Herodotus in his fourth Booke sayth, That the people would not permit or suffer it, because it was against the rights of Nations.

King Pyrrhus making election of an heyre amongst his Sonnes, chose him that had the best and keenest Sword: neuerthelesse, after his death, the eldest (who was lesse valiant) carried the inheritance away. For, whatsoeuer hardines, gentleness, fayre feature and wisdom, that may be in the younger, more then in the elder: yet it is not anie occasion, whereby the father should forget himselfe, as to preferre the youngest before the eldest, as did the father of Attreus and Tyestes, who would needs preferre the youngest Sonne, because hee had better, and more vnderstanding in the affaires of State, but thereon ensued bloudie tragedies.

Hereunto likewise I may adde, Lewes the Pittifull, King of France, who (at the request of his second wife) preferred Charles the Baulde, before his elder Brother Lotharius, whereby the Realme became embraced with warres.

The like consequence came by Robert, King of France, in preferring Henry, the first of that name, before his eldest brother, who contented himselfe with Borgogne, because he was a coward and false to his owne heart.

Charles the seventh, could neuer obtaine of Pope Pius the second, to advance Charles the youngest Sonne, before Lewes the eleauenth, although the King had then good occasion: because the sayde Lewes made two attempts to take the Crowne, and to teare away the Scepter from his father, without anie occasion whatsoever. And in very truth (as Herodotus saith) Throughout the whole world, the eldest are advanced to the dominion, even amongst the most illiterate and barbarous on the earth, they obserue the course of Nature.

Concerning two Twins.

There might also arise a doubt, to wit, if two infants be twins, which of them both should be reputed the eldest; that must needs bee the eldest, which came forth first to the worlds light. Another doubt also may be moued in this case, that if any man (not being a king) hauing a sonne, shall afterward conquer a Kingdome, or some other such like dignity, be it eith by Armes, or by donation. It falleth out in following dayes or yeares, that he hath another sonne; to which of these shall belong the kingdome or other honor? It is held for certain, that he who was or shal be borne, after that the Father became a king in right ought to succede: for the eldest son was not of royal blood, but holds of his fathers first condition, who was not then royall by nature. But the other younger-borne sonne, though coming longer after the first, is truly & really a Prince by blood. Like as he is not to be accounted for infamous, and out of hope for being legitimate, who was begot by a man neuer made Priest: but afterward, when he commeth to vndergoe the order of Priesthood, he begetteth then another Sonne; that Son is to remaine impeached, and can neuer come to such legitimacy, as the first borne.

Tit. Livius lib. 8. Edo Propt.

A pretence of inheritance decided by combat.

Another difficulty there remaineth yet vndecided, to wit, whether the sonne of the eldest ought to succede his grandfather, or else the Crown appertaine to the younger brother (as it should seeme) because he is the nearest to the King, & the younger standeth withdrawne in degree. It was the opinion of some, and this difficulty hapned for the Kingdome of Nubidia, where the younger son would succede next after his elder brother, without any respect to the children of the eldest. Hereupon, Scipio the Africane being arraigned, not knowing what to answere in this case, betweene the Vnkle and the Nephew: gaue order, that the Kingdome should be enjoyed, by a combat fought betweene them, as it hath often hapned in Germany.

Now at this instant, the Kingdome of Moscovia is deferred vnto the younger sonne, after the death of the grandfather, without any regard of the sonne to him that was eldest. Nay, which is more, the elder brother succedeth to the younger in the Kingdome, although hee haue sonnes: As great Basilus, King of Moscovia, succeeded in the Kingdome after his elder Brother, who had sonnes. And this was vsuall, not onely among the Vindales; but also in all the Northerne countries, according to the affirmation of Procopius, as also in England. And for this cause, Richard, sonne to the heire & eldest, was defeated of the Crowne, which was adjudged by the States to Henry of Lancaster, younger brother to the Father of Richard, in the year 1399. And in the like case, Robert of Naples, the younger sonne, enjoyed the kingdome of Naples, by sentence of the Pope, and the sonne to the elder brother, King of Hungary, was dispossessed. But now adays, this rule holdeth not in the countries hitherward, neither doth it carrie any praefice in the Crowne of France, since then when it happened: the sonnes of the eldest are alwaies preferred before the younger brother, and the English obserue the same course.

Some kings haue bin so superstitiously affected, and (beside) veru ill aduised, that they would needs make search for the natiuities of their childre, to giue to him the Crowne, whose Stars appeared most to fauor him. In the number of whom, was Alphonus, king of Castile, who by this means would needs preferre the younger son before the elder; but he slew the younger, and caused his father to die in prison: by which I find, that he was but a poore Prognosticator. Wherefore, to auoyde ciuile war, which is the ruine of kingdomes and common-weales, the law of nature, (or rather the Lawe of God) ought to be followed, which commandeth, to conserue kingdomes vpon the eldest, as alwaies it was practised among the Hebrewes: and as we further finde, that the kingdome of Inda was conferred vpon Ichoram, because he was the eldest, as the Scripture affirmeth. Which also the wife Lycurgus imitated; for, although the Lacedemonians had created him King, after the death of Charilaus:

CHAP. XII.

The Monarchy of the Cæsars, or Romanes.

Iulius Cæsar, a very gracious Prince, and one of the Worldes cheefest Capitaines; reigned 5. yeares. He vanquished Pompey

& his confederats: Ptolomy he slew, & restored Cleopatra his friend (sister to Ptolomy) to the Kingdome of Egypt. Returning home to Rome, hee was slaine in the Senate house, by Brutus, Cassius, and other Conspirators. Dioscorides then lived: but if you would have more of Cæsars life, reade Suetonius and Florus, in the life of Cæsar.

Octavius Augustus the last Nephew of Iulius, by the sisters side, and h's adopted Sonne, reigned 56. yeares: he was happy in warre, moderate in peace, and liberal to eury one. Then lived Virgil, Horace, Tibullus, Propertius, Vitruvius, Mecenas: And then died Cleopatra, and her husband Marke Anthony, Egypt being then reduced into a Prouince. Herod a stranger (fauoured by Augustus) was then King of Iudea. So the Scepter being wholly taken from Iuda; Iesus Christ, God and man, the Sauour of the world, was then borne of a Virgin in Bethlehem, according to the Propheties of Iacob, Genes. 49. EJay 7. Michas 5.

Iesus Christ came in the yeare of Augustus, 42. and of the world, 3963. Ouid was then in exile: the City of Lyons founded: and then lived Titus Livius, Valerius Maximus, Serabo: and Francus, King of the Sicambrians, in the lower Allemagne: Aquila, Tiberius, Galla, Labrus and Caius, were then Law-giuers, or Law-makers. Herod the great murderer of Innocents; and there were numbered then at Rome, foure hundred, sixty foure thousand men.

Claudius Tiberius, the sonne of Livia, afterward Wife to Augustus, reigned 23. yeares, beginning very well, but prouing afterward to bee most wicked. Iesus Christ (for our saluation) was then crucified in Iherusalem, vnder Pilate the Prouoost of Iudea: he saide, that A good Shepherd should clip his Sheepe, and not deuoure them.

C. Caligula, Sonne of Germanus, a most wicked mā, reigned 13. yeares. This beault, the ruine of men, made himselfe to be adored as God: hee poisoned his Vnckle Tiberius, and deflowed all his Sisters, leauing them then vnto others like abusing.

T. Claudius, Vnckle of Caligula, and monster of men, reigned fouretee yeares. He preferred Nero before his owne Son, by the treason of whom, he was poisoned with a Mithrome. Messalina, his first Wife, peerelesse in all lubricity and wickednesse, then flourished: And Saint Peter the Apostle lived (reported to bee first Bishop of Rome): Then lived likewise Philo the Jew, Perseus, Mela, Pliny the elder, and Columella. Saint Paul the Apostle went then through the World, proclaiming Iesus Christ, accompanied with Saint Luke. Then lived Dionysius Areopagita: And then was the first council of Ierusalem.

Nero, the sonne of Agripina, afterward the Wife of Claudius, reigned thirtie yeares. He was the first Persecutor of the Church, and did put Saint Peter and Saint Paul to death: he slew likewise his Master Seneca, allo his owne Mother, and Lucan the Poet. Then lived Simon Magus, and Appoloni, Nero being expelled from Rome, slew himselfe; after he had set Rome on fire, to make himselfe partake of a Bon-fire.

Sergius Galba, in the seventh Month of his Empire, was slaine by Otho. Suetonius, Egefin, lib. 4. cap. 21.

M. Siluius Otho, hee also most wickedly slew himselfe, in the third Moneth of his Empire: confessing, that hee had cruelly tormented the spirit of Galba. According to Suetonius, and Tacitus, lib. 7.

Aulus Vitellius, brought vp at Bordeaus de Caprea, being a vicious man and a glutton, was hewed in peeces, and cast into Tyber, hauing reigned eight Moneths. He caused himselfe to be seuered at his table, with two thousand seuerall kindes of Fishes, and seauen thousand of Fowles, all at one supper. Suetonius, lib. 9. Iosephus, lib. 5. de Bel. Iuda.

71.

Vespasian, a modest & gracious Prince, a lover of skilfull men, and good Artizans, reigned tenne yeares, accompanied with his sonne Titus, who ruinated Ierusalem: Iosephus, Proculus, Epictetus. This ruine was the most lamentable that euer happened, for therein dyed eleuen hundred thousand men: Reade Iosephus, in his sixe and seauen Bookes of the Iewish wars, and Egeppus.

81.

Titus, the delight and solace of mankind, reigned two yeares. He vied to say, That no man ought to depart from a Prince, with a sad countenance: Cassius, Neracius, Proculus & Pezasus were then Lawyers, and Saint Bartholomew was then martyred in Iudia: Saint Matthias in Iudea: Saint Andrew in Scythia: Saint Matthew in Ethiopia: Saint Thomas in Bragmania. Iherusalem was then taken; the famine being so extreame, as Mothers were compelled to eate their owne children.

83.

Domitian, brother to Titus, was a most wicked man, and persecutor of the Christians: he reigned fiftene yeares: then lived Martiall, Iuuenall, Statius, Trogus: and Saint John wrote the Gospell, as also Iosephus did the warres of the Iewes. Domitian would needs afterward bee called God and Lord of his people, wherefore (being greatly hated of all men) hee was slaine.

97.

Nerva, a good Prince, and the adopted Father of Traian, reigned one yeare: he gaue more then an hundred thousand Crownes, to releue poore Citizens. He tooke away extreame taxations, & (wanting money) he sold his garments, plate and Pallace, esteeming his owne Parents and Kindred much lesse, then hee did the publike benefit. The Christians were in great quiet vnder him, and the banished repealed, among whom was Saint John.

99.

Traian, a good Emperour, but that hee persecuted the Church; reigned nineteene yeares. Being admonished, that he was ouer-gracious to all men, hee answered; That he was such to his Subiects, as hee could wish others should bee to him, if he were a Subiect. Then lived S. Ignatius, S. Eustachius, Pliny the younger, Plutarch, Aulus Gellius, Suetonius, Tacitus, Solinus.

Aelius Adrianus, a man studious and skilfull in all Sciences, and the first Emperour that suffered a Beard on his Face, reigned 21. yeares: Iulius Celsus, Iulian, and Neracius Priscus, were Lawyers and Councillors to the Emperour. Then were living Ptolomy the great Astrologer, Phavorinus, Dionysius the Milesian, and Hicliolus. Iherusalem was repaired by Adrian, who therefore had his name changed, and was called Heli.

Antoninus Pius, reigned twenty three yeares. He was a Prince of such esteeme, as strange Nations would resort vnto him, and make him Iudge of their differences; for he had alway this saying ready: I had rather saue one Citizzen, then kill a thousand Enemies. In this time were Polycarpus, Ireneus, Iustine Martire, Egeppus, Appian, Florus, Macrobis, Iustine, Galen, and Palladius: Lucian the Atheist, also was then torne with Dogs. This Emperour tooke away the wages or hyre of Scrumpties, punished idle Magistrates, and was called, Father of his Country. Reade Europsus, lib. 8. Thelephorus the ninth Pope (as some report) did then institute, or rather restore the time of Lent.

M. Antoninus the Philosopher (called Aurelius, borne in Gaul, with L. Commodus Verus, and called Brethren in the Bookes of the Pamphlettes) reigned nineteen yeares. This yong Prince being vnwilling to oppress his subiects, made sale of all his fairest and richest Jewels, Plate, and wearing garments belonging vnto him and his Wife. Europsus, lib. 8.

Lucius Aurelius Verus, governed the Empire with his brother Marcus Antoninus, the space of eleuen yeares: By some Authors, he is set downe in order before his brother, and by others after him.

L. Commodus, the most wicked sonne of good Antoninus, reigned 13. yeares. He was strangled by his Concubine, & other Conspirators. Europsus, lib. 8. Orosius, lib. 8. cap. 18. Lampridius doth most amply describe his life at large.

Aelius Pertinax reigned fixe Moneths. M m m m Hc

He had refused the Empire, and being desirous to reforme the government, hee was slaine by Iulian his Successor; who bought the name of Cæsar of the Warriors. The people much bemoaned this Prince, crying out aloud: O Father of goodnesse; Father of the Senate; Father of all bounty: Farewell.

V. Iulian, reigned seven Moneths, and being hated of all men, for slaying his predecessor, himselfe was also slaine by appointment of the Senate. Diffention grew amongst the Christians, for the celebration of Easter; And the second Councell appointed the day of Sunday, and five other after, Eusebius lib. 5. cap. 24. Metianus, Seneca, Martianus and Cassius, were now Iurif-consults: Aphrodisius and Aphronius Sophisters.

Presennius Niger, or Nigerius, the sonne of Annius Fuscus, indifferently learned, fierce, proud, and inclined to all vices; was saluted as Emperor, by the Soldiours of Syria, where he commanded, and was slaine by Seuerus.

L. Septimius Seuerus, reigned 18. years. He was a persecutor of the Church, but otherwise a valiant Prince, addicted both to good Letters and Armes. He was so wel beloued, and gouerned so nobly, that the Senate said of him: Ester hee should neuer haue bene borne, or else hee deserved neuer to dye. Reade Spart. and Vit. Then liued Origen, Tertullian, Philastrius the Sophister, and Apolonius.

Cl. Albinus, issued of the Romane Families, of the Posthumians and Albines, made himselfe Emperor in France. He was surprized by the Soldiours, & brought halfe alive to Seuerus: where hauing his head smitten off, he was hanged on a gibbet, and being torne with dogs, he was throwne into the Riuier.

A. B. Caracalla, the sonne of Seuerus, and husband to his stepmother, reigned seauen yeares. He slew Geta his brother, and Papinian the great and famous Lawyer, with diuers other. At last, himselfe was slaine by a Soldiour of his Guard. Herod. lib. 4.

Antoninus Geta, the sonne of Seuerus and Iulia, borne at Milane; After the Partisan warre, wherein hee wonne great fauour, was called Cæsar Antoninus, in the life of his Father.

Op. Macrinus, with his sonne Diadume- nus, reigned one yeare. Both the one and other had their heads smitten off, by their men of warre. Macrinus was learned and seuer, but (withall) cerefiable and crafty, causing his Predecessour to bee murdered.

Marcus Aurelius Antoninus Heliogabalus, the bastard of Caracalla, who was a dishonest whore-hunter, and most abominable in life beside; gaue great estates to wicked Bawds, Panders, Iesters, &c. And being generally despised, hee was slaine by his Soldiours, in the fourth yeare of his Reigne: both his owne body and his Mothers being dragged along the Streetes, and cast into the common lay-stall.

Alexander Seuerus, reigned peaceably without effusion of blood, 13. yeares. He was a good Prince, & did vterly forbid the selling of Offices. Flavianus, Paulus, Pomponius, Apuleius, Affricanus, Callistratus, and other excellent Ciuil Lawyers (the Schollers of Papinian) then liued, with Dion the Historian, and Philistratus. The Kingdome of the Persians was then founded by Artaxerxes, and attert transported to the Sarrazins, and now commanded by the Sophi.

Maximinus, a persecutor of the Christians, reigned three yeares. Being at first but a silly Shepheard; he was made Emperour by the Soldiours (without authority of the Senate) and then by them was slaine.

Gordianus, a Prince of a Noble spirit, with his Son named Gordianus the younger, a good Prince, reigned fixe yeares, and was slaine by Phillip his successor. In his time was a wonderfull Eclipse of the Sonne. Reade I. Capitolinus, who placeth also Pupienus and Balbinus (created by the Senate) with Gordianus the elder.

Pupienus Maximus, a new man, and sonne to a Smith, gaue himselfe alwayes to vertue and Military seruices, prouoing fortunate against the Polonians and Germanes.

M. Calpurnius Bathyas, and Pupienus, after they had bin Consuls, and that the Gordians were slaine in Africa; were created Emperours, by appointment of the Senate, against Maximinus, and both of the were vnderferuedly slaine.

was slaine in a sedition of Soldiours, by Phillip, Prefect of the pretorians.

C. Valens Hostilianus, is not placed in this ranke by some Historians, because immediately hee dyed, smitten with the pestilence, so that scarcely there remaineth any memory of him.

Phillip, an Arabian by Nation, was the first Christian of the Cæsars, and reigned fixe yeares. He gaue (by his Testament) all his rights and treasures to Pope Fabian; and heere began the riches of the Romane Church. He was likewise slaine by his successor, as he had kild his Predecessour.

Decius Traian, a persecutor of the Christians, reigned two yeares. S. Saturnine the Bishop was martyred at Toulouse. S. Laurence, Hippolita, Cecily, Agatha, and Appollina.

Q. Herennius Etruscus, is not by any Historian placed among the Emperours. Neuertheless, in this ranke is his picture found in the Booke of Hubert Goltzius, and there it is recorded of him, that hee was the sonne of Decius, and that he was slaine in Hungaria, in a battell against the Gothes.

Vibius Gallus, with his soune Volusianus, reigned two yeares: Being persecutors of the Church, were both slaine by the Soldiours. At this time there was such a contagious pestilence, and almost so generally dispersed, that in many places ther was left no creature liuing. This pestilence continued fifteene yeares, and seemed to be partly occasioned through the wicked gouernment of this Emperor.

Aemilianus Lybicus, borne in Mauritania, in his young yeares followed armes, and soone after he was made Emperour. He was slaine at Spoleta, being aged forty yeares.

Licinius Valerianus, with his Son Gallen, persecuting the Church, reigned fifteene yeares. He was Captiue to Sapor, King of Persia, who vsed him as a footstoolle when he mounted on horse-backe. S. Cyprian & S. Cornelia, were then martyred. Porphyrius wrote against the christians: The thirte Tyrants vsurped the Empire. Reade Trebellius Pollio, &c. S. Paul the first Hermit began the solitary life.

Gallen the son of Valerian, suffered the Christians to liue in quiet, and reigned 9. yeares alone, after that his Father was led captiue into Persia by Sapor. He was exceeding wise, but addicted to Lust.

Saloninus Valerianus, the sonne of Gallen, was slaine with his Father, being retired to Milane, and was but tenne yeares olde.

Cassius Labienus Posthumus, from being a simple Souldior, attained to great dignities: and being in France, was made Emperour in the time of Galien, where he was slaine.

Flavius Claudius (of whom issued the family of the Constantines) a good Prince, of Noble Linnage, and highly esteemed, reigned two yeares. Dionysius being then Pope, diuided the Diocesess and Parishes of the Christians. Tom. x. de Concil. Lamblicus, Plotinus, and Inuencus Priest, reduced the foure Gospels into Hexameter Verses.

Aurelius Quintillus, brother to Claudius, after the death of his brother, was saluted as Emperour by the Senate, and slaine 17. dayes after.

Valerius Aurelianus, a cruell man, reigned fixe yeares. He tormented the Christians, and repulled the Francomenes, entering out of Germany into Gaul. He was the first that wore an Emperiall Crowne: a louer of Military discipline, and one that rigorously punished the vices of his Soldiours. He vanquished Zenobia, a very Warlike Lady, holding the Empire of the East.

Tacitus was slaine the first Moneth of his Empire. This good Prince caused the Bookes of Cornelius Tacitus to bee recited into all Libraries. The Amnicheans began (from the time of Aurelianus) to infect the Church.

Ammius Florianus, brother to Tacitus, being desirous to reigne, vsurped the Empire as by inheritance: but in a short time he was slaine at Tharfus, by his Soldiours.

Probus, a good Prince, the Authour of peace in the high and lower Germany or Almaine, reigned fixe yeares and foure Moneths. He said, That he had no neede of Warriors, hauing no enemies; and that the Souldior (not doing any thing) ought not to cate up publick prouision.

Carus, a good and wise Prince, reigned two yeares, with his sonnes Carinus and Numerianus, two Brethren of very different nature. The first was most wicked, and full of cruelty: The other was full of goodnesse, valour and knowledge. Then lived Volcatius, Herodian, Lampadius, Spartianus, Pollus, Vopiscus and Capitolinus Historians.

Dioclesian with Maximianus Herculeus, reigned 20. yeares: hee was a most cruell persecutor of the Christians, and would haue himselfe to be worshipped. Katharine, Lucy, Agnes, Barbus, Sebastian, Vincent, Cosmo and Damian, and innumerable other Martyrs through the world (in his Reign, to the number of 17. thousand) were put to death in thirty dayes.

Valerius Maximus, fir-named Herculeus, a man of fierce and cruell nature, was very out-ragious in lust, especially with his owne sisters: blockish in giuing counsell, without ciuility and government, & therefore had Dioclesian to assist him in the Empire.

Constantinus Chlorus, father of Constantine and Galerius, the one gouerned in the East, the other in the West, 4. yeares together. Constantine commaunded in Gaul, Spaine, Africa, and Italy: The other in Greece. Arnobius, Lactantius, Dorotheus, Bishop of Tyre, Eusebius and other learned personages lived at this time.

Galerius Maximianus, rearme'd Armenarius, because he was a Neat-heards son, was made Emperor, being a goodly person, and a fortunate warrior. Maximianus, Nephew to Armenarius by his sister, was Emperor, and persecuted the Christians in the East. Seuerus, Prefect of Italy and Affricke, was published Emperor by Galerius, and fighting with Maxentius, was taken at Rauenna, and slaine.

Maxentius, elected Emperour by his Soldiours, reigned a Tyrant, and was like voto his Father Maximianus. Being vanquished by Constantine, neere to Pont-Miluius, he was drowned in a Gulfe, and his body neuer after found.

Licinius Licinianus, borne of Country Parents, was fortunate in the wars which he had against Maximianus. Afterward, he became a mocker of Christ, and persecuted such as beleued in him; and because he was ignorant, he was a great enemy to all that were learned.

Martinianus, was created Cæsar by Licinius against Constantine; hee was in his Camp at night, but fled before next morning.

310.

Constantine the Great, sonne of Helen an holy woman, with Maxentius and Licinius, reigned 31. yeares. He was religious and affable, and transported the Bible into diuers Countries. He assembled the Council of Nice, against Arius the Hereticke. He builded the City of Constantinople, calling it after his owne Name: whither the Imperiall seate was transla- ted, and changed from Rome into Greece, after he had granted Siluester to be Pope. Eusebius, 10. Nicephorus.

Crispus was made Cæsar by his Father Constantine, but beeing afterward falsely accused to his Father, he was put to death, for that hee would not consent to the inordinate appetite of Faulstine his stepmother.

Constantine the second, with his Brethren reigned 17. yeares, ioyning thereto the three yeares reigne of Maxentius. Themistius, Donatus, and Libanius the Sophister then lived: and Saint Anthony the Hermite was knowne in Egipt; by many miracles.

341.

Julian the Apostata, held the true Religion ten yeares, and was named Emperour by the men of warre in Paris, against his will. Hee forbade the Christians the study of letters: and beeing wounded to death, he cryed out: At length thou hast vanquished, O Galilean. S. Cyrill, Optatus, Basil, Nazianzen, Epiphanius, Hilary, Didimus, Exuperius (all learned Diuines) then flourished.

358.

Iouianus, a kind and learned man, reigned eight Moneths, and made confession to his Warriours, of the name of Iesus Christ. Now was the first order of Monks instituted by S. Basil, vnder certaine rules of living.

368.

Valentinian, a good and Catholique Prince, and Valens his brother, reigned 15. yeares. This man held the error of the Arians, and constrained the Monkes to vnder- take Armes in warre: he dyed vnhap- pily.

368.

Gratian, the sonne of Valentinian, during whose life time, he was an associate in the Empire. He reigned afterward with Valentinian the second, his younger Brother, and Theodosius sixe yeares.

381.

Maximus, rearme'd Emperour by his Soldiours, slew Gratian, and held the Empire foure yeares: after which time, Valentinian returned to the Empire againe sixe yeares.

387.

Theodosius,

395.

Theodosius, after that Gratian was slaine by Maximus, reigned three yeares with his brother Valentinian: the death of who was benomed by S. Ambrose, for the great zeale hee had to Christian Religion. S. Hierome, S. Augustine, and P. Orosius then lived.

399.

Arcadius and Honorius, the sonnes of Theodosius, reigned twenty nine yeares, as well in the East as in the West. About this time, the great empire of Rome began to decline (by the infidelity of Ruffinus & Stilico their Tutors.) The very greatest part thereof was vied by the Scythians, Burgundians, Lombards, Hugarians, French, Goths, and Vandales: And Rome was four times taken by the Goths and Vandals, within one hundred thirty nine yeares. Then lived S. Chrysostome and Claudian.

Rome foure times surprized.

411.

Honorius reigned with Theodosius, Son to his Brother, sixteen yeares.

427.

Theodosius the second, youngest sonne of Arcadius, reigned at Constantinople 27. yeares, after the death of Honorius; ha- uing assisted Valentinian the third, the son of Constantine, and Placida, daughter to Theodosius, who reigned five yeares in the West. At this time, the Frenchmen lea- uing Francia, began to enter vpon the Gauls; vnder Clodion their second King.

453.

F. Valerius Martiannus, reigned in the East, seauen yeares, and Valentinian the third (at the same time) in the West: during their Reigne, the Burgundians and other Westerne Nations, were conuerted to the Faith. The Vandals came out of Spaine into Affrica, and afterward they tooke Rome, vnder the conduct of their King Genferichus. Attila, King of the Hunnes, entered into Gaul with five hundred thousand men: deliuered battaile to Merocius their second King, who had ioynd with Attila, Lieutenant vnto the Emperour. There he lost an hundred and fourecore thousand men, and fled into Hungaria, not any man beeing wounded behinde. About this time was great Arthur King of Britaine.

460.

Leo the first, reigned 17. yeares, associated by Leo the Sonne of his Daughter; who after he had reigned one year alone, gaue vp the Empire to Zeno his Grand- sire, who reigned tyrannically 17. yeares. The estate of the Church was then very greatly troubled, as also that of the Westerne Empire. Italy had then nine Em-perors in twenty yeares, who all slew one another.

Anastasius reigned twenty five yeares: he was an Eutichian Heretique, was smitten with lightning, and dyed (as a iust punishment) for his heresie. Fulgentius.

493.

Iustine reigned nine yeares: hee was first a Swine-herd, afterward a Cow- heard, next a Carpenter, a Souldior, a Captaine, and last of all Emperour, gouerning very well and godly, and expelling the Arrian Heretiques. Then lived Boetius, and S. Benet or Benedict began this Order.

519.

Iustinian reigned thirty eight yeares. All his care and study, was to re- pare the decayed Empire, and re-establish ciuill right; in the execution whereof, hee was seconded by excellent personages, especially by Belisarius, Narces, and Tribonianus. They first chased the Vandals out of Affrica, which they had held 95. yeares: and deliuered Rome from the Goths, who had conquered it, & yet were once more expelled thence by Narces.

528.

Iustine the second, reigned ten yeares, beloued of all men for his liberality. Sophia his wife mocked him with Narces, the Gouernour of Italy, whereat he being offended, called the Lombards, by whose helpe he reuenged himselfe. Now was the Kingdom of the Lombards founded by Clebus, who reigned thirty two kings, vntill the time of Charles the Great.

566.

Tiberius the second, reigned 7. yeares: he was a very charitable man, one that lo- ued God and his Saints, and therefore (no doubt) was beloued of him againe.

The kingdom of the Lombards.

577.

Mauritius reigned twenty yeares: he was defended of very meane Parentage, and (in the end) was murdered for his co- uetousnesse: a vice as much discommen- dable in a Prince, as liberality is becom- ing, and maketh him renowned.

584.

Phocas reigned eight yeares: and be- ing the murderer of his Predecessor, him- selfe was likewise murdered, with all his Race. Now was the contention for the Primacy of the Church, betwene Rome and Constantinople, and now was S. Gre- gory.

the Egyptian and Arabian princes (called Solamans) next succeeded. After them came the Turkes, about the yeare of our Lord God, one thousand and three hundred, Alibonets false doctrine (through the negligence of the Emperors & Christian princes) grew to such an head, that it not only poisoned Asia and Africa, but also a very great part of Europe.

640 Constantine the third, reigned foure moneths, being a good prince, and verie young: He was poysoned by his stepmother, that her sonne might reigne.

641 Heracion, who having his nose and tongue cut out, was banished two yeares after.

642 Constantins, the sonne of Constantine, reigned twenty and seauen yeares: And beeing very courteous, hee was slayne by his owne followers, in the Bathes of Syracusa.

670 Constantine the fourth, reigned seauenteene yeares. Hee ouercame in one battell, thirty thousand Syracusans, and afterward fell to great wickednesse. The learned and venerable Beda lived in this time.

687 Iustinian the second, a wicked man, reigned fixteene yeares, but not without interruption, being delected by Leontius, and Leontius by Tyberius Abismaris, who reigned other three yeares; therefore these three are sayde to reigne fixteene yeares. Now was the beginning of the Dukes of Venice, which had beene gouerned before (for the space of two hundred and thirty yeares) by Tribunes.

The State of the Venetians.

712 Phillip Bardasanes, reigned two yeres. Hee was cast out of his Empire by his Lieutenant: and after that, they plucked forth his eyes. Hee had much talke and little wisdom, disposing badly of the Empire, he became after a schismaticall Monke.

715 Anthemius, called also Athanasius the second, reigned three yeares: He was delected from his Empire by Theodosius chiefe of his Armie, and turned into a Monastery. He had taken away the Empire, and then plucked out the eyes of his predecessour.

718 Theodosius the third, reigned one yeare. He left the Empire, seeing himselfe to be assailed by Leo his succesor, and became a Monke.

719 Leo the third, a wicked man, reigned five and twenty yeares. Hee was called Iconomachus, a Defacer of Images, and would not suffer the Christians to haue any in their Temples. He was excommunicated by Gregorie, and by authoritie of a Councell held at Rome, against his owne of Constantinople. Blond, in his tenth booke. The Sarazins besieged Constantinople three yeares together, in which time died three hundred thousand of the pestilence and famine.

742 Constantine, the sixt of that name, the sonne of Leo the Isaurian, succeeded his father in the Empire of Constantinople, in the yeare of our Saluation, seauen hundred fortie and two. Hee was surnamed Copronymus, because he would discharge his belly in the Font, appoynted for Christian Baptisme. Hee was an viter enemy, not only to the Images of Saints, but also to their Reliques, causing them to be burned. Hee did put to death many of the best and most respected persons, and (amongst others) two Patriarchs of Constantinople. He made warre against the Bulgarians, both by Land and Sea, Fortune smiling vpon him, other-whiles lowring. In his absence, one Artabasdus was made Emperour at Constantinople. But he receiuing news thereof, returned, and either put out, or rent forth the new Emperours eyes, and caused his children to be slaine. In his time, there was so cold a Winter, that the Sea of Constantinople was frozen. After many cruelties, this Emperour dyed a Leaper.

743 Artabasdus, albeith he was descended of meane birth; yet notwithstanding, for the faithfulness, good vertues, and commendable qualities which were in him, he was liked of the Senate and Souldiers, & afterward was elected Emperour by the zealous Christians, for the hatred that euery one bare to Constantine the sixt. Hee became a better louer of the Saints, and fortified the City of Constantinople against Constantine, who had beene expelled from thence. Neuertheless, both hee and it were besieged; and the City being surprized, his eyes were plucked out, and his children put to death.

745 Leo the fourth, was Emperour after his father Constantine the sixt. He was not only heyre to the Empire, but also to his fathers vices: And his mother, who was deuout, and one that loued God, would giue giue no consent, that he should be Emperour. Hee made some attempts vpon the Sarazins that dwelt in Syria. Hee tooke the Crowne, which Mauritius had dedicated vnto Almighty God, and set it on his owne head, it being very richly beautified with rich pretious stones: But soon after, hee had an Impostume in his head, with a fiery Ague, whereof he dyed.

780 Constantine, the sixt of that name, and sonne to Leo the fourth, was Emperour after his father: Hee reigned nine yeares (very young) with his mother, who with his consent also, was perswaded by The-rasius Patriarch of Constantinople, to call a general Councell of three hundred and fifty Bishops. In a short while after, Constantine excluded his Mother from the Empires gouernement. Hee caused the eyes and tongue of Nicephorus to be pulled and cut out, hearing of a secret intention, to make him Emperour. Also he did shut vp in a Monastery, his wife Marie, who was the daughter of King Charle-maine, and then tooke a Concubine, by the counsell of his Mother, who pretended that her sonne was hated of the people. Hereupon not long after, shee caused him to be taken, and plucking forth his eyes, shut him vp in prison, where hee dyed in the yeare 798, and then the reigned alone, about the space of five yeares.

798 Irene, issued from Attica, was Wife to the Emperour Leo the fourth, by whom he had Constantine the sixt before mentioned, and reigned with him nine yeares, & afterward (alone by herselfe) five yeares, or little more, as hath already beene sayd. She was thence expelled by Nicephorus, and sent into exile to the Isle of Lesbos, which at this instant is called Mitilene. At the time when this Lady gouerned the Empire of Constantinople, Charle-maine was sacred and crowned Emperour of Rome, (or of the West) for his vertues.

CHAP. XIII

The ancient and honourable Historie of the life, fortunes and admired vertues, of faire Landgartha, the royall Queene of Norway.

It is a case most certayne and assured, that a generous spirit, a gentle soule, and an vnderstanding fild with cheareful delicacie, is much sooner seized with amorous apprehensions; then that which is farr off from this quēt temper, and which subtilizeth the same perfection of the soule. Considering that loue, pure and perfectly naturall, being a vertue, and vertue euermore biding in such subiects, where the hearts are best and most functioniously nourished, and gentle spirits hauing (I know not how) a rellish more diuine then vulgar, or apted for grosse populartie: It followeth, without any question to the contrary, that men, the more remarkable they are for greatnesse, gentleness, good spirit, & illustrious blood; doe also best discourse on louely occasions, and effect them with clearer iudgement, then such as fayne in the accomplishments of the soule.

And, to fitt this poynt the more seriously; Is it for a Clowne or peazant, to iudge on the raritie of vertues, on the singular giftes of the Spirit, of that which is beloued, and what offices and duties are in the partie affectionate? Effectes doe plainly approue the contrary; for Poets, who are the very subtillest Painters of humane affections, that I know, and which trace Truth vnder the disguised colours of witty Fables, can not better let vs behold the picture of such an impression; then by the iudgement (so often sung) and periourned by the Trojan, on the beautie of the three Goddesses. For, the rudenesse of the Shepheard, hauing extincted the bright beams of bloud frō his Parents, among the base and grosse thoughts fit for flock-keepers, not knowing the spirites forces, the beautie of the soule, the gentleness of vnderstanding, and the galliardie of the bodie it selfe, in being gouerned by interior reason; gaue the p.ize (he knew not how) of beauty, by appearing in the exterior shape of a lasciuious Lady.

Beholde how farre Poeticall Philosophy extendeth it selfe, and iudge, if the forth Shephead degenerat.d not from his Parents, who should more haue cherished vertue, which lieth and continueth for euer; then that which withereth, and looeth it selfe by the steppes of age. And if that indiscreet Iudge pronounced the Sentence, in fauour of the most v. worthie, and lent his affections to the onlie onely tickling of desire, full of wretched folly: so was he as well recompensed according to his merit, and felt in the ende, that a manly Hero's desseignes, saouering of that which is proper to the vertue of a man; was much rather to be chosen, then the light promise of a hurtful thing, how pleasant soeuer in wish, and alluring the sensuall part of a man.

great moment

Also, to speake truly, so many famous women, as haue honoured all the Ages past and ours, by effect and memory of their commendable vertues; if they had had no other rarities to renowne them, but only beauty of the body: questionlesse, their names had long since bin buried in a more obscure graue, then euer time ordained for things to be forgotten. No, no, it was vertue, generosity, height of courage, and great enterprizes; which made them immortal, and equalled their glory with the renowne of men, yea, of the most signall and illustrious.

Against the venomous tongues of such, as neuer cease to taxe the reputation of so honourable a sexe; no boast need to be made, either of search into the valliances of Semyramis, whose memorie is somewhat too farre off; neyther the incredible forces of the Amazones, the History being (I know not how) doubtfull in the occurrences. Nor will I induce Zenobia the Asian Queene, the dreadfull astonishment (sometime) of the Romane Empire: whose wisdom also was as much to bee commended, as any of the very chiefest Generals, her direction, policy and good carriage, all making her reputed (long time) for one of the Worlds Monarchs. Nor am I willing (feareing to make men bluish, by reading how many women haue managed Armes, and with no meane felicity) to insert Cinana, Daughter to Phillip King of Macedon, who made head against the ingratefull successours of her Brother Alexander, pursuing the vttter ruine of his blood that had advanced them. After many foughten Battailles, hauing carried herselfe beyond the compasse of man-like valiancy; in the ende, the affected rather to dye, then to see the vttter ruine of the famous House of her Ancestors, being vnable any way to helpe it. I will be silent also, in speaking of the braue Valasica, a young Lady of Bohemia, who arming the Ladies of her Country against their Husbands; made a happy course of long warre against the men: vntill such time, as (being betrayed) shee crowded into the throngs of her enemies, of whom (before she could be slaine) shee slew a great number.

I will not (I say) discourse so many examples, being satisfied with a History most true and memorable, collected from famous Antiquity, and from among the Ladies of a people, heretofore accounted very barbarous: wherein (by my slender opinion) honest Gentlewomen shall receive some taste of vertue, without learning the fierce obstinacy of any; and Gentlemen, may haue meanes to see and consider, how to make choise of vertue in louing; and faire minded Maidens, obserue a rule, how to contain their thoughts in loyall affection, to them whom they haue dedicated their desires.

In the time when Dayobert, sonne to Charles the Great, reigned in France, and ouer the Empire, there was a King in Swetia, named Froll, or Frollo, a cruell man, a tyrant, and insupportable to euery one. This King, being neuer contented with his owne Royalties, began to insult obstinately on his neighbours lands; but especially to flesh on the King of Norway, vpon whose Countries entering without challenge or defiance, he made such great spoyle; that hauing pilld, sacked, and well-neere ruined the whole Country, he vanquished and slew the King, with all his Family. Nor did it suffice this rauenous Wolfe, to haue shed so much innocent blood, for the glutting of his greedy desire: but hee must needs also foyle his name with all kindes of cruelty and villany, in somuch, that hee left neyther Lady of the House Royall, nor any other that he could lay hold on, but he abused them as villanously, as wickedly hee had robbed other of their inheritable rights. They that were not (as yet) fallen into the gripes of this abominable Goate, and not knowing how to thinne falling into his cunning and treacherous snares, made such a private consultation among themselves by secret intelligence; that at length, they mette together in a corner of the desert belonging vnto the Kingdome, to haue a more free understanding of particular grieuances, and how they might best defend their honor and innocence.

Newes likewise ran cursorily among them, that the Nobilitie of the Country (who had withdrawne themselves into Denmarke) solicited King Reyner, to bring thither his forces, in reuenge of a dishonourable injury done to his owne blood (for his mother was illused from Norway) and the Dane being easily spurred on to warre, in regarde he was very youthfull, his blood chearefully boyling, and desirous to archieue honour by Armes, gaue the easier eare to the motion. Beside desire of reuenge, to see his reputation so much interested, by the tyrannies of Swetia, with pretending a right and title vnto the kingdome of Norway: These were no meane motives to incite him on the foener. And these considerations, gaue hart also to the distressed Ladies, for hope of good successe thereby: but feareing, that matter and meanes (in this case) were not as yet sufficiently ready; this intimated perswasion vanished into smoake, euen (well-neere) as sodainly as it was conceived, being no way able to resolue on anie thing.

At length, one in their goodly troupe, and (almost) one of the youngest, fairest and gentlest Virgines, and such a one as had propounded to herselfe, neuer to submit vnder any Lawe, that gaue a man power ouer his wife: She, beholding the sad astonishment of the whole company, and what iust reason they had to be so dreadfully dismayed; making a reuerent obedience vnto them all, deliuered her minde in this manner.

The Oration of Landgartha, to the whole Company of Ladies.

Can it be (faire Ladies of Norway) that illustrious blood, appeareth only in the strength and dexteritie, which fondly wee presume proper and peculiar to men: and we that haue hearts, spirits, bodies and members like vnto theirs, must make them reuengers, and defenders of our continence & chastity? If Fate be so maleuolently affected, that our fathers, brothers and husbands, can obayne no succour, to recover their lands, and expulse the Tyrant out of their territories: shall it therefore be said, that we must needs serue the inordinate appetits of a villaine? Frollo must abuse those remaying Ladies, that neuer tasted his abominable embracements. Let Landgartha live no longer, if she be voyde of allover duties and deuotion, then to attend the pleasures of a Tyrant, and (without resistance) suffer violence to be done to her honour and modestie.

Why Ladies, the Lyonesse and Tygresse whet their claws and sharpen their teeth, to defend their young ones, and preserve their luses from the Hunts mens hands. The wren (smallest Bird will vyle both the beake and Wing, to reuenge the wrong offered by rape of her brood. And we, that surmount the one, in sense and reason, the other in strength, & all in wisdom and counsell for bolde attempts; shall we suffer that a Stranger (not one iate stronger then our owne Countries strength) shall make a mockery and abusive pastime, of the most honourable Matrones & Gentlewomen in our Land? No, no, it is not for Landgartha to endure such indignities, or that (without effusion of her blood) can geeld to the best-like Prince of Swetia.

Are we inferior in courage and generosity of spirit, to braue Aluinda, who so long time fought on the Seas, and amazed the very boldest warriors of the world? Are wee defective in any thing she had? We are healthfull, young, gallant, strong and rich enough, to winne what soeuer is needfull for vs, by service eyther on Sea or Land. And if Aluinda (moued by vnjust means) prosper in her actions, and had Fortune fauorable to all her attempts: can you imagine, that Heauen hath not farre sayrer successe in store for vs, hauing Reason and vertue on our side, and vpright iustice to support our cause? were our iourney to death onely, and that the ending of this wretched life, could appease the Tyrants cruelty, without proceeding any further: I would be the foremost, freely offering myselfe as a Sacrifice, to satiate the furie of his raging lust. If hee conetied and would haue nothing else but our wealth and treasure; I would aduise you to deliuer all, and rather then spare aught, let vs goe seeke future fortune, and beg our bread through all strange countries in the world.

Al, no, no, (sweete Ladies) hee likes our liues too well, and by taking pleasure in them, defresh our euertlasting dispaire. He will suffer nimation vnto the reit of the Ladies, as (with one consent) they made a league, vowing louing alliance, and (sollennly swearing faith, loyaltie, mutual succour, and assistance among themselves;) Land-gartha was elected chiefe commandresse, tie, being the mortue to such a maine and important businesse.

It is no common matter,
that mouth

Now beganne a muster of all the Women and Maidens, of the most noble and famous houses throughout the whole Country: but not without much amaz-ment in Frollo, wondering whereto tended such an assembly. Hee, perswading himselfe, that they intended fight to their friends and kindred in Denmarke, sent commaund vnto them, that (on perill of their liues) they should retorne home to their houses, for enjoying the benefite of their libertie; which he was content to graunt them, in regard of their beauties and gentle behaviour.

But Landgartha, the man-like woman champion, hearing the peremptory commaund deliuered by the Tyrants Heralds; sent them backe with blows and iniurious speeches, telling them; that they would not take their liues, in regarde of any respect they had to their Lord: but onely, because they should let him vnder-stand, in what deuotion and readinesse they found them, & or seeking some conuenient means and way, whereby to make him tender an account for his tyrannic and cruelties.

When Frollo heard these tidings, at the first he made but a scorne thereof, laughing extremely, at this womanish enterprise and Arme of Ladies, saying: They did well, to make a present of themselves, because he should haue the easier way to find them, and if they came into the field, the bootie would suffice for his Souldiers pay, and likewise for their pleasure beside,
in regarde he would bestow wnes vpon them all, and saue them a labour from any further fighting. But this pleasant humour soone forooke him, and conuerted into fury, when he was aduerted of their being in the field, & making such a strange massacre of his men, as the like was seldome seene or heard of. Nor spared they the liues of any, that durst reclaime himselfe from following his seruice, which made him curse and sweare, threatening them with a thousand kinde of torments and afflictions, going now (in good earnest) to arme himselfe; as being perswa-ded, that this feminine iune had extended so farre, that it was no light matter that could allay it. Hee grew also into such suspition of himselfe, that he kept a strong Guard about him: as holding but small assurance of his life, amongst the armed troupes of his owne Souldiers: yet hee made many large promises vnto them, of the very fairest and richest amongst them, with all their lands and treasure, to shew themselues valiant and coragious, against this giddy headed army of women; which encreased daily more and more, both in number, victuals and munitions, brought continually to them from euery part.

to his spirits, and the fauour which his ly on the other side: yet he seemed to set a good countenance on his fears, declaring no outward doubt of perswauing atations tolde him dreadfull tydings. Ne-uertheless, being already in the field; and preparing his equipage, to get the best aduantage he could, of the place where the Ladies were encamped: a Courtier came galloping in post to him, bringing newes of the king of Denmarks descent into Norway, with a very potent Arme. What a stonishment forer seized on his soule, to see himselfe inclosed (as it were) with two puissant enemies, and knowing how highly he was hated, by them whom hee had ouercome and subiect: yet notwithstanding, perceiuing that flight was pre-iudiciall to his honour; and (moreouer) almost impossible, in regard that the ways whereby he should passe into Swetia, as also euery port and passage were in the enemies power: he resolved, first to runne his fortune on the men, who being defeated, the fight would be farre easier against the women; and thereupon, in the forme of an Oration, thus he spake to his Army.

¶ The Oration of Frollo, King of Swetia, to his Soldiers.

When men be

ging.

If you were not those valiant Gother and Swetians, that haue tamed and beaten this kennell broode of Norwegians, and now conquered their land: If it were not your valiancie, that hath often made pillage and spoile of the Danes; If your invincible force were not well knowne to the world: I should then haue now entreated you, to remember your Ancestors, and the glorious conquests of your predecessors: I should also let before your eyes, how many Kings, People and Nations were vnder-yoked, by the greatnesse and deedes of your famous fore-goers. But, seeing that your proper vertue sufficiently sheweth it selfe, and auoucheth you to be the worthy sonnes and successeurs, to so many valiant and famous Fathers, and that your deedes are no way indebted to the glorie of their greatnesse: Let vs goe

then, gentle and worthy warriors: Let vs pace on, and giue Reyner to know, that this is no Countrey for him to reigne in, nor to deale in actions of Armes, with the most furious and brauett Nation of Europe. Let vs on (bold spirits) to chafe them againe, which haue so many times fled before vs; and let vs chastice the rebellion of the Norwegians, who falsifying their faith sworne vnto vs: haue called in our enemy to their succor, to quar-rell with me for that, which is yours by right of Conquest.

In the meane space, while Frollo marched on to meete the Danes, observe the wisedome and diligence of Landgartha, and her Ladies, who stepped before him with such poasting speeche, that ere the time, as any intelligence could be obtained of her departure: tydings were suddenly brought him, that both the Camps were ioyned together, and came mainly marching onward to bidde him battaile.
Now, although this did not alittle startle his minde, and intimated a suspicious kind offeare, left Fortune should turne her backe on him, hauing formerly fauored him in all his proceedings: yet being a man of high heart, valiant, and borne for Armes: he shewed no semblance of dread or distrust, but rather still sollicitous his men, to shew themselues such as alwayes they were knowne to be, and to account the enemy no stronger by the womens combination; but rather to hope, that fortune had conducted them purposely thither, for the larger encreasing of their benefit, and to heighten their corage against any, that durst presume to deprive them offo faire a booty.

On the other side, King Reyner, being come within the view of the enemy, rode among the ranks, encouraging his people, proposing to them his right, and the inualion made by the Swetian. He required them, to reuenge the wrong doone to so many honourable houses, vterly ouer-throwne by the Tyrant, and to sustain the cause of womens modesties, for whome,

Ensignes of valiant Landgartha, and to irritate by their force, that which weak women had undertaken, to free themselves from the violence of a Tyrant. Also, that they might assuredly be persuaded, beside the gaine and bootie, in getting the baggage and baggage of the Swethians: himselfe would (moreouer) vse such rewarde and courtie to well deservers; that they should for euer haue iust cause to commend his munificence. He declared to the Norwegians, that (for the loue to them) hee would aduenture to fight against Frolo, whom if he conquered, hee would spare him no more, then the rest of his race formerly had doone. And therefore, to shew themselves valiant, and now to bee fully reuenged on the Swethian tyrannies; seeing Fortune had almost (with great advantage) deliuered him into their hands.

Landgartha, beholding how enery one encouraged other to the fight, and observing some rare galliardie, even in the gracefull lookes of her female followers; in steade of further animating, thus she spake vnto them.

Another Oration of Landgartha, made to the Armie of Ladies.

Her action, gesture and behaviour in fained the desires of all her faire followers

It is for vs (faire Ladies) that the glorie of this battaile is referred, and to none else is due the reuenge, for our parents, kindred, friends and familiars. Men may fight (if they will) in their owne quarrell, and deale with whom themselves thinke best: but the valorous Ladies of Norway, will pursue none other then the very Squadron of the Tyrant, and there will vce in the midst of our endeavour, or make this the last day of his miserable life. Let our horses seeme to steale among the ranks, that we may be obserued to surmount the prowesse of men, and that wee can quickly re-write our strength againe, if any disorder should chaunce to diuide vs. Fair Fortune be our guide, and fauour vs to die gloriously, or vanquish (with hearts becoming our Sex) the onely infamous Prince in the world. In a spirit gentle and generous, see (I beseech you) what power Disdayne hath, to behold it selfe offended, and of what worth illustrious blood is, (touched with wrong) received by women and maydens, tender, soft, and delicately borne and bred, not irrued to the trouble of struts, but driven by desire of reuenge onely. For the rapes made on their violated kindred and friends: must needs bee now acknowledged, by the ornament which sayrest embellished our faces, and exposeth vs to all manner of hazards, amongest the gallantest troupes of men.

King Reyner, hauing giuen the assaults signall, aduisedly obserued the behaviour and warelike order of the women, seeing Landgartha perourme both the actions and discrete conduct of a good Souldier, making way through the throngs, and entering (even in mere despite of the enemy) with her faire-locked troups of Ladies, into the Tyrant of Swethias Squadron. Hee stood as astonied at so braue hardiment, and (in this astonishment) he felt a kind of softning in his manly soule, rauishing both his eyes and thoughts, with admiration & contemplation of this chaste Damofell: he forthwith followed her fighting, yet knew he not the cause of so sodayne an alteration, and beholding her wonderfull carriage in the fight, saw no stroke returned against her, but it seemed to cleaue his heart in sunder. Hee wished himselfe neere her, to free her from all penill and danger; yet he tooke great delight to beholde her braue behaviour.

So long his eyes were led by this amorous contemplation, that (very soone after) he saw the Ladies presse on with such impetuous furie, into the maine body of the battaile; and where the king of Swethia was in person: that (in a short while) it became so throwly shaken, as, both the vanquishers, and the vanquish confessed, that the victory was more to be attributed to the wife leading of Landgartha, and valiant following of her Ladies, then to the long breathing and loose courage, either in the Souldiers of Denmarke or Norway: for they neuer ceased to pursue the point, till Frolo was hewne in peeces amongest them; as the corrupter of blooming youth, and violator of their chastities, whom he ought (in honour and duty) to defend. Thus in an instant, Frolo payed the crueltie due vnto his disgracefull life, & was punished by celestiall Iudgement, for inuading the land and inheritance belonging longing to another, and abusing the honor of so many chaste Ladies.

King Reyner attributes the victory to the valiant Landgartha, & her Ladies.

The victory won by the Dane, he freely confessed, that he enioyed it by the valiancy of the Ladies, and about all the rest by the wife and hardy conduct of hir, who commanded ouer the female troups. But concealing (as yet) the fire crept into his heart, and which stole on still to the verie depth of his soule; he cunningly enquired (as one rapt with amazement, among the rest, at the dexterity of this woman Warriour) what the was, of what house, and in what country she receiued her Originall? Answer was returned to him, that she was a Maiden to be married, so chaste as possibly might be, as vertuous as any that liued in Norway, in blood Noble, of a famous house, and inferiour to no Ladie in wisdom. The vertue and wife carriage of Landgartha in war, hauing won the heart of this youthfull King, gaue yet a far larger entrance to loue, that left no part of his soule vnbesieged: when he heard say, that she was a Virgin Lady, and of great birth.

The kings passion encreases the more, by her commendable reports.

But because he could rather haue wisht her to be his lovely friend, then wedded wife; he saw how short hee came of any such hope, being truly informed of her virgin modesty, standing cleere from all possibility of corruption: neither might he dare to attempt it, seeing how respectfully she was esteemed, affected, and reuerenced, & hardly enough to suppress all such sinister enterprises. Moreouer, as elsewhere we haue declared, though rapes had bene too common in that Scandian country; yet it was no easy offer to her; that knew wel how to reuenge such wrong, and had made good prooue therof so lately, in the iust infliction on a lustfull tyrant. In which respect, hauing a faire and gentle spirit; he resolved, to cloath with grace and good acceptance, whatsoeuer might appear vn-equall in her, to sure with the greatest of a King, and to satisfie his owne desires, by contracting honourable Marriage with her. And because common fame had noised of her, that she had concluded to keep her virginity for euer, without admitting any man to triumph ouer her chaste honor: he laboured the more to win her, & to break this vncharitable purpose in her; affecting her as dearly as his owne life; accounting her the most compleate creature in the world, & such a Jewel, as none could be more precious.

If this opinion, concerning the rare vertues of Landgartha, had alwayes continued charactered in the soule of this prince; and if he had respected her as well after the enioying her, as before hee had the happinesse to be possessed of her: she should haue receyued no occasion to complaine of him, and he neuer had stood accused of such infidelity and ingratitude to her. But (the more the pity) there is not any thing so precious, rare, or of greatest consequence; but if a man bee possessed of it, and hath it freely at his owne command: he groweth distastefull of it; accounting his appetite loathingly glutted therewith, and nothing can seeme more contemptible to him.

Reyner, how great a King soeuer hee thought himselfe to bee, and how powerfull in his cheefest commands: yet, he felt himself a slaue to Loue, not daring to discover his thoughts: he was become (contrary to precedent custom) a friend to solitude, full of passions, compassed with feares, troubled in spirit, martied in his senses, scarce sustaining any hope, but very coldly, and breathing forth sighs incessantly; so that all were amazed at this strange behaviour in him. Notwithstanding, no one durst enter into such boldnesse, as to demand of him, whence came the causes of such comfortlesse solitude. At length, hauing considered sufficiently on what he had to do, and finding the power of loue so potent, that it exceeded all possibility of resistance, as hauing a priuiledge about nature, and Landgartha no way to be enioyed, but by the chaste embraces of a marriage bed: he sent for the Lady and her friends, imparting his mind to her in this manner.

I know well (gentle Damofell) that it may moue some admiration in you, vpon what occasion I haue thus sent for you: albeit, the obligation wherein I stande bound to your high deferings, might haue commanded me to do it much sooner, & yet a matter no more then reasonable. But to hold you in no longer suspence the hope I haue, & you wil continue heere in court; was the motive to my mission, & the power I might pretend ouer your parents & friends, shold with their willing advice to you, and enioyne you to grace vs with your company. I know what you are, and am informed of your house and breeding; but much more am I assured of your valor and other vertuous merits, by the commendable partes and singular rarities, whereof mine owne eyes haue bin a witness. You also are not ignorant who I am, what my power is, and the meanes to make my selfe sensible, either of fauours or iniures, from whom fouet I happen to receiue them. I confesse, that if there be any thing extrauagant in Loue, or surpasseth the greatest power in man it hath taken foundation in my soule, enflaming my best desires to with you wel: but I am vncertaine, whether you be so courteous or no, to take a liking or acceptable allowance of this affection, and so much the rather, because you appear aboue the reach of other Ladies. Neuertheless, if you measure the greatnesse of a King, and of him that is your Soueraigne, with the lustre of your choise perfections: you shall see, that both these rarities paired together, do make but one vnion, & the most excellent that any man can imagine. In brieue, all my wish, intent, and affection consisteth in this, that if you thinke good, or I may seeme worthy in your eye, to be a fit husband for Landgartha; I would take you to Wife, and make you Queene of Denmarke and Norway. You may thinke heereon, it is in you to conclude all, and to whom I referre my selfe: for, of this my submission, I make your parents and friends witnesses, calling for them purposely hither, to heare my motion, and your answer.

Landgartha, who was as apprehensiuely, courteous and modest, as high in corage, and strict in opinion: considering who it was that made the motion, and how much he imbold himself in the demand, returned this answer.

SIR, although my deliberation from mine infancy, and continuing to this flourishing condition of mine age, hath alwaies beene, neuer to subiect my selfe to the lawes ordained for marriage, because freedom euer seemed more conforme to the disposition of my spirit, then such obedience as a wife owes to her husband, not that I haue vowed or sworne to any estate whatsoever: yet notwithstanding, hauing regard vnto the duty I owe my Prince, and seeing how iustly I may deserue blame and punishment, in refusing him that hath soueraignie ouer mee and mine; I beseech you to thinke, that your thoughts being so direct as they pretend declaration, and respecting one of so meane merite as my selfe: I am also the onely Maiden of the World, ready to do you most humble seruice. Thanking the great God, that seeing I owe duty to the fancy of a man (albeit against my former resolute) it falleth so successfully, as in seruice to the most wise and valiant Prince, that of long time hath reigned in these countries. Neuertheless Sir, thinke it not strange, I humbly beseech you, if I speake (perhaps) more boldly then becommeth me, to vse a silly virgins aduice, to take longer and more deliberate consideration in a case so seriously important as this is: humane affections being so light in cases of these and the like impressions; that (many times) they as sodainly wipe themselves out of the soule, as at the first they came to be characterized there. Not that I will accuse so great a King of leuitie, nor suspect his faith any way in firme: but to this end, that hauing made a neer view of my complexions, and more exactly enquired the list of my life; you may the better censure my merit, measuring for hereafter, what you may now most valew in my meannes and insufficiency: so shall you be sure, neuer to vsay your owne words, or be sorry then for that which you make so great account of now. For know Sir, that the honor which you please to do me at this present, is nothing in respect of the great infamy, redounding then both vpon you and me, & those that gaue you no better counsell in this case, whom it may as neerly concerne. This would be a worthy recompence, for the intire affection you beare me now, and I should dedicate my life to you in deeper deuotion, remaining for euer your most loyal & dutifull seruant.

With such a graue and seuer countenance she vttered these speeches, that the king, amazed at her wisdom, but more at the Maiestieall delivery of her wordes, and freedome of so faire and complete a spirit: swore instantly such loyalty to her, as fitted with a king and faithfull husband; wherein he plainly forswore himselfe, as you shall hear in this discourse following.

Verie worthie aduice touching of a discreet and well settled judgement.

Consideration before marriage is verie necessary, because repentance afterwards cometh too late.

At

At this time the Maiden was not married to the youthfull king (who longed after nothing so much, as to crosse the sayre flower of her chastity) but she returned home with her parents and friends again; hoping, that the heate of this royall fire, would be quailed in time, and her absence would be the meanes to effect it. But Reynar, who could not forget her that had so worthily asisted him, and whose figure was liuely imprinted in his soule: followed her to her Fathers dwelling, and scorning to be delayd by many daies access, espoused her, to the vnspeakable comfort of her parents and friends, but som dread and great distrust in her self, as fearing the continuance of this feruent affection, and hauing won the heart of a King, doubted to be dispossessed thereof. Neuertheless, such was her wife and commendable carriage, as to conceal her fears with maiestie modesty: submitting her self to the Kings delightful pleasures, and the yoke of marriage, which formerly she had contemned.

But, as no ioyes are durable, being perpetually followed by worldly occurrences: so Reynar (being a yong, wanton, and lasciuious king) after hee had bene Father to three children by his Queene, two daughters, and a hopefull yong Prince, filled, or rather ouer-fatisfied with the embraces of this poore Lady (who brought him no other dowry but bright beautie, and vertue vnmarchable in all the country) coueting after matter of greater moments, withdrew thence into Denmarke, leaving his truly elected spouse in Norway, not with any purpose of sending for her, or returning to her againe, but vterly to abandon & forsake her. Being in Denmark, he heard report of the K. of Swetia daughter, whom he desired to inioy, accusing his indiscretion, that he had embased the greatnes of a king, and much blemished his royall title, by marrying with a fillic damofell: and sending a solemne Ambassage into Swetia, he obtained (without war or any other great difficulty) her whom he coueted to enioy in marriage.

Heere behold, how constant the Kings affection stoode to vertue, and howe the maske of fained loue discovered it self. He had sworne fidelity vnto his best beloued Landgartha (notwithstanding her wife & worthe aduice of inconueniences to follow) with no meane admiration of her vertues and perfections: but Vertue was then bound to the Idea of pleasure, and therefore of as little lasting, as ease hath continuance in occasions of the flesh. Beside, no sooner had he receiued answer to his minde, from the king of Swetia; but forthwith, he aduertised Landgartha of a second intended marriage, although vnlawfully; yet praying her patiently to endure a diuorce.

The poore Lady hearing this determination (although long time before, she had both diuined and feared such disaster) was ready to dy with conceit of greefe, to see her selfe despised, without the least occasion of offence giuen, or why he should so vnkindly refuse her. At length, considering that the king had some reason for this repudiation, by seeking better alliance, which might succour him in his serious affaires, because he had an enemy that contended with him for the Crowne of Denmark, & incited the Emperor to lend him ayd, vnder colour of becoming a Christian, if he would help him to compasse the kingdom: she began somewhat to assuage her minds perturbations, answering the that brought her these bad tydings, thus.

The King (my friends) should not thus abuse Landgartha, because he needs not to seek any further, for strenghtning his house by stronger alliance: and well may I accuse him of lightnes, whereof I aduertised him in the beginning; and which (to my greefe) I finde now by ouer-deare experience. But if I were as reuengefull for the shame I suffer, as hee is vnjust on my behalfe: I could (perhaps) finde him as busy and troublesome employment, as these can yeeld him pleasure, flouour, or defence, with whom he hath such hast to marry. He knows what means I haue to diseale him seeing he felt part of my power in fauouring him, and should periwade himselfe, that Landgartha was neuer so much offended by the tyrant of Swetia, as by him, who vnder the flattning name of marriage, hath wronged the modesty of her, that discerneth now, how men the greater they are, so much they thinke themselves dispensed withall, in breaking those Lawes, where-to they binde other in obedience.

Yet one thing causeth me somewhat to pardon his fault, and also to accuse mine owne indiscretion, that he being blinded by loue, and I, by sole reuerence vnto the name Royall: we haue both sayled in one kinde, but not equally punishible, his shame being not so great as mine, because (being free, & without passions) I would submit my selfe to the will of him, who durst not vse any violence towards mee; whereas he was a slave to his owne cogitations, and transported with desire, which maketh fooles of the very wisest in the world. Let him enioy the embracings of his new elected Lady, at his own pleasure and contentment; but I pray, (in regard of the faithfull loue I beare him, and to shall doe for euer, being such as I am) that hereafter, he may neuer be so light & changeable in affection, lest some one (of far lesse cunning then himselfe) make him not doe penance for wrong to all the rest. And assure him, that although hee hath wounded the heart of Landgartha to death, by preferring another of much lesse merit, and forgetting the debt, which maketh him mine by bond: yet notwithstanding, the Image of King Reyner shall remaine perpetually engrauen in my heart, and no accidents of the greatest disaster, can euer deface the sacred and sincere affection, which his faithful light so lately imprinted in my soule.

God report vnto him, the offer of my seruice, and the desire I haue to please him, instead of seeking any reuenge. Set before his eyes, not any despayring cogitations in mee, but vnconquerable patience. Tell him, I am not a little ioyful, to see my selfe free from subiection to a husband: but yet so sorie as possibly can be, to loose him whom I loue more then my selfe, and without whom, my dayes for euer are dedicated to mourning. Report vnto him, that Landgartha will liue, not to be reuenged vpon the disloyaltie of King Reyner; but to the end, that by the effusion of her owne blood, she may yet make him once more to know, that she is more his friend, and more carefull of his States conseruation, then himselfe is. Tell him also, that such Ladies as resemble me, haue their hearts more generously disposed, and farre more fairly furnished with vertue: then base minded men, that alway carry gentlenes in their looks, but villanie truly stamped in their hearts. For a finall conclusion, I pray God giue more ease to my vnfaithfull husband, then through his disloyalty he leaues sorrow and affliction in the soule of his loyall wife: and that she who usurpeth my place (in regard the fault is not hers) may long enioy peace in that bed, which vertue and merite once made me Mistresse of, and the King taketh from me, I know not by what disaster, but in meere malice and hatred to mee and my fortune.

What greater constancy could be wished, in the heart of the very wisest Philosopher, that euer Greece or Asia yielded, then appeared in the inuincible soule of this Norwegian Lady? What deeper despit could be done to a worthy woman; then to reiect and throw her off, as if she had beene wicked and immodest? Or what greater occasion may bee giuen, for betraying a husband; then causelesse suspension, and diuorce or refusal, where reason and iustice can shew no cause why? Poets haue liuely depicited in their Verses, the desperate transports of Medea, forsaken by Iason, and the fearefull cruelties vied by her, to bee reuenged on such an iniury. Marke Anthony, by refusing and forsaking the faire sister to Augustus, attracted by foolish affection to blacke Cleopatra; both Europe, Affricke & Asia, were inhumanely bathed with the blood of men, the brother endeavouring to reuenge the iniury, which was offered vnto his sister and the whole Family. And tell me (I pray yee) what a wound in France was sometime made, by the diuorce of Elienor, Countesse of Poitiers, and Duchesse of Guiane; the meanes whereof gaue way to the English, & that they made themselves so strong in France?

Notwithstanding all these, and many more that I could speake of, we see Landgartha so humble, wife, discrete, and such a louer of quietnesse, that, hauing meanes to be reuenged on so high a wrong done her; so farre was she from pursuit, heate, rage or tempest, that making Patience proude of her example: shee offered seruice to him, by whome she was contemned and despised, presenting all duty to an ingratefull husband, and promising fresh supply, after receit of a former disloyall recompence. You which are ieaalous of Ladies honour, and complaine of a giddie madnesse in their braines, and of imortal enmity and hatred engrauen in their Soules; behold this rare woman, declaring declaring truly a Christian minde, although the neuer receiued baptisme: Of her you may learn, that Ladies haue something in them rightly heroycall, which men can neuer comprehend nor taste of, but by long, studious and wise experience.

And yet Landgartha stands not alone in this example, for France can make boast of many more great Ladies, that imitated her mildnesse and constancy, & of whom I could enter into a large Discourse: if French Histories were not so frequent among you, wherein you can lesse time to bee continually reading. But yet we haue not said all, that Landgartha (not hurried with ieaousie, or tempest with fury for this refusal) fought a many meanes whereby she might be reuenged: but in doing much more, surmounting all opinion and iudgement, giuing aide to him that had so shamefully left her, and doing good for euill, contrary to some flearne and combustious natures of her sexe, and as the sequell will more amply deliuer.

Reyner, being a Prince greatly addicted to Armes, seeing himselfe at home in peace, and that none of his neighbours solicited him by warre; because his Subjects (being naturally giuen to warre, and inured to courses both by Land and Sea) might not liue ydle and slothfull: he permitted them to pursue their fortune, passing them into the Isles of Ireland, Britain and Scotland. Whereupon, the Tutes, and some other of the Scandian Territories, that bare him but bad affection, taking occasion by the Kings absence with his Forces, elected and created for their king, a Prince of royall blood, named Harolde, who shaping his course to the Emperour Lewes the debonnaire, that made his abiding then at Magance, hauing receiued baptisme with his followers: was sacred and crowned King of Denmarke, by authority Imperiall, doing homage to the Emperour for his Kingdom.

Harolde, being fauoured of his owne people, and affected by the most of them that embraced Christianity (to whom Reyner was no way pleasing) and re-enforced by a goodly band of Germanes, wherewith the Emperour furnished him, to put him in possession of his lands: went into Denmarke, to expell Reyner thence, and all such as followed his Faction. Reyner, waxing weary againe of his wanton desires, returning home secretly into Denmarke: found strange alteration since his departure thence. His owne people he encouraged to stand fast with him, called the Sweatians also to his succour, and dispatching letters into Norway: requested assistance of her, from whom hee might more iustly expect warre then defence, and severity of reuenge for his vile dealing.

What would an angry heart haue done in this case? A minde neuer satisfied but in doing ill; What opportunity had it heere to worke vpon? How would a man haue carried himselfe, hauing bene notoriously iniured, and to faire a way set wide open for him, as neuer was the like to bee expected againe: what haste would he make now to be fully reuenged? Without all contradiction, the breach of faith is very abominable, and wrongs receiued by Noble natures, are not easily qualified, when times and seasons shape out reuengefull meanes, such as was this wauyppon the faithlesse Dane. Neuertheless Landgartha, hearing in what anguish her vnkind husband was, and considering with her selfe, that his ruine could not returne her any benefit, seeing also, that shee had two louely Daughters by him, and a Princely sonne, named Frideflaus (who afterward was King of Norway) motives sufficient for his longer abiding with her: shee leuied an Army of sixe score Ships, euery one being worthily furnished, wherewith she intended to succour her distressed Husband, to whom shee sent tydings of her preparation and coming, in these few Lines.

The Letter sent by Landgartha, to her Husband, King Reyner.

[F this my second duty may proue as happy, in the recovery of thy Lands & Kingdoms, as my first was against a Tyrant, and yet honouring thee with the victory: I shall account my paines well employed, and neuer expect any other recompence. Landgartha.

The Rebels afraid of Landgartha coming with her forces.

The Rebels, being advertised of this supply from Norway, laboured by all means possible to provoke King Reynor to the fight, before the coming of Landgartha, whom they knew to be wife, and very skilfull in the Art Militarie. And the king knowing their intention, delayed the day of battell, by marching further off from them, towards the place where he expected Landgartha's landing, that their two forces might the sooner ioyne together, & then to give the enemy battell. Which Harolde well perceiving, and knowing, that such delay would redound to his disadvantage; he pursued after Reynor with such expedition, laying such traines and ambuscadoes for him, that he compelled him to handy blowes, euen at the verie same instant as Landgartha landed.

The fight fell out to bee very furious and bloody, and great numbers of men fell as well on the one side, as on the other, the chiefe Commanders being fiercely animated, the one to defend his Crowne, and the other to vnrue an estate, whereto he pretended a iust title, by reason of the quarrell betweene the King and his Subjects. And both of them standing on the aduenture of life, as well vnderstanding, that no fauour was to be expected, which side sooner prooued to bee Conquerour.

The Danes put to the worst by Harolde, & Landgartha worth assistance in very great extremitie.

Now, though the Danes that followed Reynor, performed so much duty as warriours could do, sustaining many impetuous efforts of the assailants; yet were they constrained to turne their backs, beginning to fall into rout and disorder. By this time was Landgartha come neare to the Campe, where she made a pause a while, to see which side behaued it selfe brauest; and perceiving Reynor's men in no meane extremitie, valiantly she entred amongst the thickest of them, encouraging her husbands soldiers on thus: On them braue spirits, set on them manfully, they are our foile, as valiantes not deservuing to lue, seeing traitorously they lift up their weapons against their king. On then (say) vndaunted spirits, bee it Landgartha, who hath brought you victorie, as well against Harolde, as sometime she did against Frodo in Norway.

In deliuering these wordes, the deale

such bold blows among the Rebels, as they hardly knew which way to bestir themselves. Now the battell grew to be more fierce on either side the before: the Danes, to repair their disorderd flight, th'other, to maintaine their hope of victory, wherof they doubted not, but disdained a woman should deprive them of the occasion, of wholly ruining Reynor and his Army. Neuertheless, whatsoever manhood Harolde and his men declared in the fight, yet they were oppressed by multitudes, being wearie, spent, & closely followed by the Norwegians, who were fresh, chearefull and aduice, conducted by a woman of very high resolute, and as furious in warre, as modest and gracious in her Pallace. Thus were they enforced to fight, not without great losse of the very worthiest men in the Army, and the vanquished deliuered to the Conquerours mercie. But, though Reynor triumphed of the victorie, yet hee enioyed it by the fortune of her, who, albeit he might boast of her happinesse in life, and thereby attained to a great marriage; yet her other infelicity was a great corsie to her heart, to be disdained where she ought to be most beloued & esteemed.

Reynor now was growne sensible, of the shameful wrong he had offered to his first wife, accusing himselfe of disloyaltie, and detesting his former leuitie, entreated her to take such reuege on him, as she thought fittest in her own iudgement. But she, being a Lady of vnmatchable mind, fearing lest the king (conquered by this obligation of duety to her) should commit an other fault, by leauing the K. daughter of Sweden, who had brought him diuers children also: pardon all his passed injuries to her, & vowing her selfe to a widdowed estate of life, neuer more to conuerse with him or any man living: after a solemne parting betweene them, she returned home into Norway, to gouerne the Countrey by her discrete care, till her son Fredrik should attaine to yeres of rule, and whom the K. there had constituted as his lawfull heire.

The remainder of this discourse, being more at large pursued by the Annals of Denmarke, Sweden and Norway; I purpose here to conclude the Historie, which I haue in this place set downe, more to relate the valour, counsell, aduice, good conduct and wisdom, seldom wanting in Ladies deriued from good birth: then I

Whence the stone is brought, and how it is engendred.

The Stone of the Bezaar or Pazer is a true and assured Antidote against all poysons, venomes, bytings of venomous Beasts, infections of the Ayre; As pestilence, carbuncles or plague-sores, Purples, the small Pox, the Meazels, and in briefe, against all diseases popular and contagious. And because experience hath made this stone to be in daily request, and causeth it to be sought for by people of good meanes; therefore sale hath bene made thereof at extraordinary rates, and auarice being so great among men, hath therefore practised and compassed the meanes whereby to adulterate it, as heerebefore they did the like by Baulne or Balsamum. But before I write any further thereof, I will tell you from whence they bring it, and how it is engendred in the bodies of certaine creatures, which are like vnto Goats heere among vs; but they haue no horns, being of a reddish colour, and feed not but on good and wholesome Hearbes, wherof are plenty on the Mountaines, and where they startle at the least noise of a Piece. But for our better vnderstanding this History, I will insert a small parcel of a Letter, written from Peru by a Spanish Gentleman, to Monardus a Physician of Lisbols, dwelling then in Seuill, whereby we shall perceiue how they are found.

The Letter of a Gentleman residing in Peru.

The fifteenth of June, 1568, being at the exercise of hunting, with diuers of my friends, among the Mountaines in this Countrey of Peru, continuing at the sport for the space of five dayes, and having slaine some of the Beasts called Bezaars, we dissected their bodies, to finde the stones. But it being a matter impossible for vs to do, because wee were not used thereto: we demanded of the Indians, which we had brought with vs: whether to attend vpon vs; in what part of the body we might soonest finde them; whereto they made vs answer, that they knew it not. But a young Indian Lad, aged about tenne yeares, and being then in our company, shewed vs where it was, and we found it in the first stomacke, where the food of the Beast falleth down, to be ruminated or chewed afterward. Which when the Indians saw, they would haue killed the Boy, as being offended at this instruction given vs; but we would not suffer them to doe him such violence, and although they are subject to vs Spaniards, yet they are our deadly enemies. Notwithstanding, while we followed our pastime of hunting, they got the Boy aside and slew him, and afterward sacrificed him, as we were giuen to vnderstand.

The Indians hold those stones in great esteeme, placing them for Ornaments in their Temples, which they call Guacas, adorning also their Images with them, and many other things beside, as Gold, Silver, precious stones and rich leuels. And I repute it a matter of some admiration, that this Beast is not found in any of the hither Indies, but in the Mountaines of Peru, neither could I see them any where else: albeit I haue trauielled through all the Kingdomes of Mexico and Peru. In the Provinces and Isles of Naragon, Florida, and the Western Islands, I haue bene diligently informed, and by the Indians heere among vs, vpon vrging them to what use these stones are proper: And they haue assured mee, that they are singular against all venomes, eyther applied outwardly, or receiued inwardly; but especially against all harmes of the heart, and it expelleth wormes out of the body. Be asgiuen into wounds, made by impoisoned Arrows (as heere it is too much in use) it is an assured healing, and no other remedy could be found for it, but this onely.

In the first Beaf that we difsected, wee found in a Bagge like a little Purffe, 9 stones, which Nature had there engendered, only by the benefit of feeding on good and wholesome hearbs: and in all those which we difsected afterward, we found in some more, in others lesse, according as they were aged in yeares. It is to be noted, that although they are found also in Beasts of the same kinde, which browse and feede on the Plumes: yet they are not so vertuous, as in those bred upon the Mountaines.

Thus you see in briefe, what was written by this Capitaine (and indeed a very worthy Gentleman, living then in the Indias) to Nicholas Monardus, a learned Phylitian, and dwelling in Scutly; whereby may be vnderstood, how and fro whence these stones proceede. Now wee will heare what the Portugals say, who haue made their conquests farre off fro thence, to know, whether they agree with the Spaniards in this report, or no.

Garcias d'Orta a Portugize, Phylitian to the Viceroy in the Indias discovered by the Portugals, saith, that in Corasine, and in the Countiees of Persia, there is another kinde of Goates, of meaneer greatnesse, which they call Pazans, in whose stomack or bulke are found stones of the Bezar, the beginning of them being a small little straw, growing on to a certain greatnesse, by recouering many coates or tunicles: whereof some are found to bee as big as our common Beanes, others as Acornes, and other of more or lesse quantity, smoothe for the most part, and in colour resembling a darke greene. The greatest, because the rarest, are more fought for then the lesser sort, by them of the Country where they are found, as reporting them to haue the most vertue. He reporteth, that he saw one which weighed five Ducates, and which was brought into Portugall, that would not be bought for three score Ducats, albeit it was more worth whence it came: and in all those stones which are brought out of the Persian Countiees, a little straw or stalk is found in the very midst of them, as hath bene often approved.

This Stone (saith he) is not found in Persia onely, but also in Malaca, and in the Ile which is named Pacai, not farre off from the Promontory of Comorina. For,

as they can betray those Beasts, so they kill them, and being well salted or powdered, they sence as good provision for their Armies. In many of them are found very great stones, vnknewen to the people there inhabiting, or why the Portugals labour so much in search of them: which (indeed) is more for the said stones, then any loue they haue to the flesh, although it is very fauoury.

The Bezaars stones which come from Persia, haue no straws or stalks in the midst of them; but onely a little cavity or hollownesse, wherein may be found some thicke dust or sand, which is of far greater efficacy then the stone it selfe. I haue sene five graines of this stone (in a little water of Mugwort) given to a Gentlewoman, who had bene seven dayes in child-birth trauaile: and she was instantly deliuered of a child dead and putrified. At the Castle of Luke, in the lower Lymosine, there was a great pestilence, whereof (in lesse space then foure & twenty houres) dyed three persons: afterward it tooke hold on the rest of the household, which were eighteen in number. Each one received two graines of this stone: euery morning, with a little water of Aquila Campina, continuing so for seven daies space together, and not any one dyed afterward, or became further touched with the pestilence. Diuers beside, that had carbuncles and sores, by vsing this stone, preferred their liues: It is very good also in application, to botches, bycles, and all irksome paines or swellings.

A young Gentleman, with whom it was my chance to be bathing in a Riuer, was bitten in the leg by a Serpent, so that his leg was become very black, and greatly swollen: hee was aduised, to take foure graines of Bezaars stone, with a small quantity of Rose-water, and a graine also was put into the wound; which caused the rankling and paine to cease, and he was fully cured within twelve dayes space.

Monsieur le Vicome de Conborn, and Lord of Chasteauneuf, Lieutenant for the King in Lymosine, reported to me, that he was touched with a pestilential Feauer at Paris, and whereof many dyed, of euery quality, age and sexe, and abandoned of all Phylitians. By the aduice of his Father in law, the Marshall de Biron, he took Bezaars stone for some few dayes, & within a little while after, he recouered, grew to indifferent strength, and was much more lustily disposed, then any of them that had bene offended by the same disease, to the no little admiration of all them, that had knowledge of him and his sickness.

The Inhabitants of Ormuz (an Island that is most rich, situate vpon the red sea, and subiect to the Persian) after they haue purged themselves in the Spring & Autumne: vse to take ten graines of this stone, in as many spoonfull of Rose-water, for five mornings following each other, by which means (they say) their health is soundly preferred, and youthfull disposition maintained. Against an inueterated scurffe on the head, or body, a loathsome itch, the wilde scab, called S. Martins mange, and (about all) against a confirmed lacy or leprosie; there is not any remedy like to this. As can well be witnessed by a Prelate of Languedoc, living at this day, who would haue flaine himselfe an hundred times, and throwne himselfe out of windows (if hee had not bene carefully respected) onely being tormented with that disease of S. Martine. But by vsing this stone, which hee tooke three Months together euery morning, and good government otherwise directed to him; hee is perfectly recouered. Now let vs see how true and naturall stones are to bee discerned, from such as are counterfeir, and meerey adulterated.

The Moors are exceeding skillfull in knowing them, and especially, from what parts they are brought, in the doing whereof, the Moore will lay one in the palme of his hand, and closing it then fast together, he will breathe or blow strongly into his hand: if hee feele his breathing to passe through his hand, he is assured then, that the stone is falsified. A great number of them are oftentimes to be folde at Lisbonne, the cheefest Metropolitane City of Portugall, where is one of the most frequented Portes in all Christendome. And such as there buy them, content not themselves, with this order of triall made by the Moors: but dip a twined thred in the iuyce of a very venomous hearbe, which they call Balistera. Then passing it thwart the foote, or other part of any Beaf (as of a Dog) with a Needle, hee fo leaueth it in the wound, vntill such time as hee feeleth those accidents, which commonly seize on them that are poysoned. And when he is perceived to draw neere death; then to make him swallow three or foure graines of Bezaars stone, mingled with water: if it preferue his life, it is an apparant signe of the stones goodnes and perfection; but if not, it is adulterated.

The Beaf in whose body these stones are found, in Persia and other parts of that Climate, as in Comorina (according to the writing of Garcias d'Orta, who had sene of them in diuers places) hath horns bending backward; but those in Persia haue none at all. Theues saith, that they haue but one, and that the skinne of the saide Beaf is kept, to be laid to the stomacke of man or woman, possesed with any paine or anguish there, and to procure digestion, and that (without all question to the contrary) this skinne healeth all such diseases, although the persons bee aged and decrepit. Moreouer, that he saw a stone of the Bezar, or Bezar, in the custody of the Greeke Patriarch of Cayro, which was as big as a good great Nut: if it were so, that stone was worth no meane summe of money. It were a thing miraculous, to finde a stone of such greatnesse; & yet he further saith, that an Arabian Captain had it giuen him, because hee was secretly converted, and became a Christian.

It is not to be thought, that this stone hath bene knowne but within some small compasse of time; because antiquity speakes of it more then fve hundred yeares since. For prooffe whereof, Rafis, an Arabian Phylitian maketh mention thereof, though not relating from whence it was brought, or where it is to bee found: yet he affirmeth, that it resisteth all kindes of poyson, and that hee made experiment thereof vpon a child, that innocently had eaten a venomous plant, called Napellus, which causeth death immediately; and yet by giuing him a small quantity of this stone, his life was preferred. This stone hath bene so highly esteemed, and especially in those precedent times; that, as it is reported by Abdara Narachi, an Arabian Doctour in physicke, who was then at Corduba, about those later yeares, when the Sarrizans made their vlturpation in spaine: he saw a Bezaars stone, in the hand

And the said Abdara further saith (alleadging the forenamed Rafis) that this stone being worne about a mans necke, and kept so neere to the heart as may be; defendeth it and the party from all infection, & no payson can offend the body of him, that hath it thus about him.

Seeing then, that this Stone hath so many good and singular vertues in it, methinks, men (of meanes and worth) should fildome or neuer be without it, for a present succour in such weighty infirmities. Beside, Apothecaries of skill and iudgement, should euermore be well provided of them, because Physitians continually prescribe it in their directions, which they would not do, if they knew men to be vnfurnished of it. For more assurance is to be reposed in it (next to the afflitting power of Heauen) then in Treacle or Mithridatum, the concoction of Alkermes, & of Zacinth. As is too well knowne by many barbarous Kings; governing in those Regions, where the Beasts are bred that engender these stones, reposing full confidence in them, and making so precious estimation of them; as they cause the expressly to bee brought from all parts. And when they are possessed of them, it is a difficult case to get any one from them: which partly is the reason, why they are so deare and rare to be had.

Heere the Reader likewise is to bee admonished, that some of these stones are not pointed, or sharply cornered; but blunt, edgelesse and rounded, like to the little fingers ende, or as an Acorne. And although some are found to be great, yet commonly they are but as our ordinary Almonds, and not pointed. They haue also diuers foldes or lappings, one wrapping ouer another, like vnto Onions, all floecke and smoothe: for if you finde the otherwise compacted, they are to bee rejected as false and counterfeit.

One of these stones was presented to Charles the ninth King of France, hee being then at Molins, which he caused to be essayed vpon two persons, that had deserved ignominious death, & both of them hauing payson giuen them to drinke.

One of them was holpen by the stone, who neuertheless dyed; and the other that tooke it not, dyed also. The stone being broken, was found thicke and massiue, not diuided by Spherical robes or foldings, and was throwne into the fire: And the giuer, who expected to deriue some great recompence from his Maiesty; had nothing at all, but frowning looks of the King, and the Queene his Mother, for his reward.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning the generation of Pearles; where, and how they are found; from whence they are brought; and of their value and estimation.

I Haue read many Authors, to be refuted assuredly, concerning the generation of Pearles: but I could finde none of one consent, or agreeing together, and namely, such as frequent the Indies in these dayes, are diuers and doubtfull also in their answers. For some say, that they are engendered in Fish-shells, like to those of our Oysters heere among vs, but much greater, and somewhat longer. And when they are desirous to conceiue (vrged thereby by nature, and at a certaine time) they open of themselves, to sucke in and draw the dew of heauen: when, if the Ayre bee cloudy or lowering, then they engender troubled Pearles; and if it be windy, they cannot conceiue, so long as the wind continueth. But how fabulous this is, I refer to others iudgement: because in one and the same shells, are found Pearles troubled, cleare, & of diuers colours and formes.

Others say, that the proper birth and production of the Oyster, is by eggs, whereof they are produced, and that the Pearls come forth of the sand and grauelly dust, whereby they are nourished, & wherein they hide themselves: which grauell refineth it selfe, & encrease in them, as the graines of the Raisin in the Grape. And this sandy seed losineth it selfe, the Oyster being in the water: but so soone as it is out of the water, it hardneth of it selfe, as we may see daily: and this is another opinion of our Pearles production.

The

Variety of opinions concerning the generation of Pearles.

The iudgement of Charis of Mitlen.

Americus Vesputius recordeth what himselfe had seene.

Of Pearles found among rocks.

The Merchants of Aegypt, that at this day Traffique with them, and bring them from the Persian Sea, make men here beleue that negotiate with them: that pearls are engendered in the stomacke of a flatte Fish, round like to a Trencher-plate, and as big as a common plate, which is found on the shores of Nilus; and that it drinketh the dew of heauen, as wee formerly sayd of the Oyster, all which is a meere fable. And although the Egyptians of these dayes know the matter truly, yet notwithstanding, meaning to mocke such as are ignorant in these things, they publish lies for apparant truths. Astrabenes sayth, Pearles are engendered in Oysters, as certaine white and solide graines are in the flesh of Swine, which we use to tearme Meazels, & is made of a clammy slime, congealing and hardning of it selfe. Which I thinke to be very likely: For, being at Paris in the year 1566. and (in assistance with others) at the dissecting of a womans body, long troubled with a discaise in the reines, in each of the reines was found a solide substance or body, as big as a common Pearle, glittering, cleere and round, like vnto Pearles.

Charles the Mitlenian saith, Pearles are made of the bones of the Oyster: but therein he is much deceyued, because the bones are alwayes in seruice to strengthen the body: but Oysters haue no need of bones: and likewise Pearles are not found in all of them; and if they had bones, then they would be found in all Oysters.

Americus Vesputius, in his booke of Indian Navigations writeth, that he obserued the opening of many, & out of some certaine Pearles, which had not attained (as yet) to their maturity and perfection, being in some pretty store or number: but yet those Pearles perished of themselves, and came to nothing. But in them that were more aged, Pearles were founde in the flesh of the Oyster, easily parting from it, and those were the best. And they that are found in them so aged and ancient, were wrinkled and very darke; which is likely to be true, if we do well consider thereon.

It is a meere Fable, which some haue divulged, that Pearles are found among the Rocks, by reason of many fishes laying their Egges, and because they cleaue to the flesh, or to the shell; but this happeneth very rarely. For, all Oysters are not apt to procreate Pearles, but only such as are rude, white, and pointing, like to the teeth of a Combe; which the Persians call Cherippo, cleere and verie smooth within: of which shelles are made Cups, Boxes, Spoones, and other very lightly things. Some are found in other kinds of Oysters; but they are neither so great, nor so good, as these that the Cherippo produceth, which some haue termed mother of Pearles.

Heere we may note the variety of opinions, concerning the production of Pearles, the knowledge whereof is much concealed: for Oysters keepe alwayes at the depths of the sea, because their shelles are great, and therefore they are so deepe in the sea. If sometimes they are founde neerer to the shores, it happeneth by tempests of the sea; also they swim heere and there, to seek their best nourishings; which when they haue found, there they stay, vntill they haue eaten all they can find. Then if they sene, or perceiue such as secke for them, they will fasten themselves so strongly to the rocks & stones, out-courting one another: as very hardly can they be forced thence, but oftentimes labour is bestowed in vaine, and they left there, as being imagined to be stones.

They are fished for in store of sundrie Countreys and Regions; but the goodliest and those most common, are fished for in the Isle of Baharem, an Island bigge enough, and well peopled; being subiect to the Viceroy of Ormuz, and is neere to the Cape of Alasina, in Arabia Felix, & there is no meane fishing for them. In the Isles of Mariola also, is continual fishing for them (they being as good there, as those of Baharem) and the Isle seated on the Persian Gulfe, an hundred Leagues or thereabout, from Calicut, and almost throughout the inner India. In the Isle of Zeilan, in the Isles called Vicques, and so thorow the great Empire of Mexico. At Tarat, more then in any of the forenamed Ilandes, and in the Isles of the New World, they haue beene fished for in such plentie: that the Casico or Prince of the said Isle, made a present of a Casket full of Pearls, to Gaspard de Morales (a Spanish Commander) which weighed an hundred and ten pounds. He promised beside, to giue yearly a Quintall weight of Pearles, as a Tribute to the Emperor, and (among them) some were as great as small Nuts, others as big as Nutmegs; & one (about the rest) was found to weigh fixe and twenty Carrats, and another one and thirty: it had the shape of a Muske-Pearle, being very perfect and orientall.

In what parts the Pearles are usually fished for.

A Merchant, being named Peter du Port, bought the said Pearle of Gaspar de Morales, for eightene hundred Ducates of gold, and after he had bought it, hee could not sleepe for melancholy, and inward griefe he conceived, because he had giuen so much money for a stone: yet hee sold it againe on the next morrow (& for the same price) to Pedarias d'Anila, for his Wife, the Lady Isabella Boudillia, who also sold it to the Emperesse, Madame Isabella. A few, named Daniell, bought of a country peazant of Baharem (no long time since) a Pearle, of the greatnesse of a Musket Bulle, for no more then the summe of eight shillings; and afterward sold it to a Lord in Sclauonia, for three thousand Crownes. There was a present made to Fernando Magellano, in one of the Isles of the Molucques, of foure Pearles, each one of them being as big as a Pigeons Egge; and they were esteemed worth an hundred thousand Crownes, at the least.

Returning now to our former purpose, which was to describe where Pearles are found, I say, that not onely they fish for them in the fore-named places: but likewise in all other Seas, bee it eyther of the South or Ocean of Peru, the Antarctique, Florida, Canaia, Guinea; yea, even heere in our neerer Seas, of England, Scotland and Denmarke; but in some place they are better, fairer, greater and rounder, then in other. And namely in some parts of France, as at Rouen, Dieppe and Rochelle, where some are found very rare and passable. Now let vs observe, how, and in what manner they fishing is for them.

Such as are appointed for this manner of fishing, entering into their Barques; and (leaving some to tend and haue care of them, and to keepe the Oysters after they are brought to them) leape by great numbers into the Sea, remaining sometimes vnder water halfe an houres space, before they be seene againe, and to continue at the bottome: hauing strong pockets, or small twisted nettings hanging about them, wherein they put their Oysters. Which being thus taken, they ascend about water againe, and are receiued into their Ships: where hauing a while taken the ayre, and strengthened their bodies with some sustenance; they put on their wrappers againe before their faces, which commonly are thin waxed toylets, as fine as the bladders of Swine, that they may the clearer see in the water. Five or fixe times in a day, thus they throw themselves into the water, and towards night returne home with their takings, I meane such Oysters as they hope to finde Pearles in.

Vpon the Sea-thore there are a great number of slaues, as well women as men, who as often as the Oysters are brought on land; fill their Scutles and Baskets, made of Sea Rushes, carrying them to Vessels full of fresh water, wherein when the Oysters haue continued foure and twenty houres space, and feeling a contrary fauour to the Sea-water; they open of themselves, and so soone as they are open, the Pearles sunder themselves from the flesh of the Oysters. Afterward, the Merchants emptying the shells out of the vessels, finde all the Pearles in the bottome of the fresh water, and thus they gather the Pearles of Peru, and likewise in other places. Neuerthelesse, they are not the hundred part to good, nor so fair, as those of Baharem and Manila: And obserue withall, that Pearles are not found in euery Oyster, but in some few; in other more, some breeding the greater, other smaller.

The Pearles being thus taken, sometimes they eate the Oysters, and otherwhiles they throw the away, as being wearie and ouer-glutted with them by too frequent vse. These Fishers are slaues, seruing (for this purpose) the Christian Merchants, Maronites, Iewes or Indians, which traffick in Baharem: and according to their taking pearled Oysters, so are they cherished and respected by their Masters euery night, which maketh euery one strue to be most beneficiall by his paines. Some times the Seas are swolne more high & boisterous, then the Fishers would haue them to be, because then it is an hinderance to their tarrying long vnder water; and then they make prouision for them-themselves in this manner. They haue a corde, at each end whereof they fasten a stone, which cord they binde about their backs, and so sincking downe into the Sea, by the weight of those stones, they continue firmly vnder water, and gather the Oysters at their ease: and when they would mount vp to the Shippe, lightly they cast off the stones, and swimme nimbly in their rising. Such as would meddle in fishing for these Oysters, it behooueth them to be very expert in swimming and diuing, because many drown themselves, through want of taking winde, or else are drawne into the depth of the sea, by huge and mighty Fishes, which there they meet withall, and then by no means can escape drowning.

Marcus Paulus saw this kind of fishing in the kingdom of Para, which is in India, where it was performed in the same manner, and he sayth, that they fish not but in the moneth of Maie, and then the Peasants or Bootes are set on worke by the Merchants. The King hath his Tenths or Tithes, and certain Sorcerers or Enchanters, there called by them Abraimins, haue the twentieth part, and the Peazants haue their payment in money. Here you must know, that without these Enchanters, they that fish in this manner for Oysters, should bee deuoured by certaine greedie and venomous fishes, as Crocodiles, Whales, and other such like deuourers: but they conuie them in such sort, that they escaped from them without any daunger. But when night commeth, and the fishing must be forborne till the morrow; the Enchanters release and make their coniuurations to cease: onely to preuent theeues, who else (in the night time) would plunge and diue into the water, knowing they may doe it safely without perill, and so carry away the pearly Oysters, and frustrate the Merchants of their expectation.

Moreover, there is no people in all the Countrey, that can enchant those terrible fishes, or doe know the words belonging to this coniuuration, but onely these Abraimins. And it is to be noted, that all such as traffike in this fishing; doe not cause the Oysters to open themselves in fresh water; but in some Countries, they open them with little knives, or sharpe pointed bodkins. And in many other places, as in the Indies lately discouered, they set their Oysters ouer a fire, and so by heat procure them to open, by which means they finde the Pearles; but then those pearles appeare of a reddish colour, and carry no chearefull water.

Also it is to be obserued, that all pearles are not white of themselves naturally, but in some places they are found to bee red; as in the Island of Zipangrie, situate in the East Indies, according as the said Venetian Paulus reporteth. And yet there they haue great plentie of them, very singularly excellent, both for greatnes and roundnesse: and in those Countries, they are of deareer value, price and estimation, than those white do carry no comparison with them. Somewhat I can say of my selfe, that I haue seene seauen redde pearles, and no more, belonging vnto the late deceased Dutchesse of Valentinois; which had a most goodly lustre, and I was (for a while) perswaded, that they wonne that colour by some artificiall means: but after I had read the Discourse of Marcus Paulus, then I became to be of another opinion.

Heere likewise will I insert a great secret in nature, and (in my minde) very merauilous, reported to mee by men of good credite, that haue seene the fishing for those Oysters, and found it true by their owne experience. In a certaine season of the year, these Oysters of pearles, doe belch and cast forth a red and blood-like moisture, in great abundance: so that many (of the best in iudgement) among those barbarous people, imagined them to suffer a fluxe of mensstruositie, as other fishes in the same Ocean doe. These Oysters haue their passages, like to all other fishes in Seas or Riues, so that in some places great store of them is to be found, and within a while after, a rare matter if tenne remayne there to be had, but all are fallen downe about tenne miles farther off. Sometimes, they which fish in another Countrey, where scarcely one is left on the morrow or next day, shall light on more then euer was there before.

The Persians haue moreover inuented another manner of fishing, more commodious, and of lesse charge and perill. By making of hurdles of Oiers or Palms, well knit together with strong bindings, in such manner as the fishing obserued in our Xantonge Seas for Castlerons, vñg certain Rakes, which rath into the Sea sands, and when they find the beds of Oysters, so to force the enter into those hurdle. Others walke along amongst the Rockes and Stones, which appeare aboue the water, where oftentimes, they finde some of those Oysters, so fast knit to the Rockes or Stones, as very much labour can scarcely get them off, without breaking the rocke or shell of the Oysters, and then taking from thence the Pearle, so soone as the shell is broken; for otherwise it diminieth, and doth loose the true and naturall colour.

Barbarous nations made no account of pearles in egipt time.

The Indians, Arabians, Perfians and others, in ancient times, made no more account of Pearles, then of ordures and corruptions which the Seas cleered them selues of, during the seasons of their turbulence and boyling. But now wee haue so well enstructed them, in knowledge both of the worth and profite, that they can skill of the goodnesse, and value of things in such sort, as they will sell those commodities at rates deare enough. The Egyptian hath bene quicke witted alwayes, as hauing knowledge in good letters of longest continuance, adding his studious contemplations, to vnderstand the secrets of Nature: so that Pearles and precious Stones, at all times hath tasted of his approbation and esteeme. The slauers and basest peazants in the Isle of Babarene, and other adiacent partes of firme Land, neighbouring vpon the Sea; haue oftentimes found Nacres and Oysters on the shoares, being dead, and yet they made search into them, and often they found very fayre and also rich Pearles.

Phylis. 12. c. 1. A king among the Oysters, and yet it is doubted, whether Oysters haue any vnderstanding, or no, and a great question among the best Naturalists.

Pliny saith, that Oysters haue a King amongst them, according as the like is affirmed of the Bees, Antes, and a guide allotted to the Cranes, and that this king is elected and chosen (by being the very fayrest and greatest) to take a carefull charge of all the rest: And that is the Oyster, which the fishers or diuers couer most to finde, being then assured, that the rest will not feare to followe. Athenens alleadgeth another Fable, as thus: That they doe strue to reuenge themselves on the fishers, by opening their shells so to catch holde of their fingers. But such opinions are merely frivoulous, and they which ordinarily fish in the Oyster-Seas, make a mockerie of such reports. Beside, our Naturalists stand in doubt, whether Cockles, Scallops, Muscles, Oysters, and such like shell-fish (liuing in the water) haue any part of vnderstanding. And, by the same reason, if they haue the meanes of withdrawing themselves, vpon sight of the fishers comming, or from any other fish (opposite or contrary to them) endeavouring to cate and deuoure them.

There is a fish, which is very opposite to the Oyster, being termed by the Perfians, Taruphall, or Taball, and is of the bignesse of a midling Salmon, hauing a hard skinne, yet without scales, and his finnes of an azure colour. This fish hath a little head, a sharpe nose or snout, serving for his mouth, which is full of sharpe teeth: and these pearly Oysters are his delicious diet, liuing (almost) by no other kind of foode. When he is desirous of feeding, he watcheth till such time as the Oysters beginne to open, as oftentimes they doe, being in the Sea: whereof making his aduantage, and thrusting in his nose, hee deuoureth the fish quickly, leaving the shell quite empty. The fishermen of the Islands, labour diligently to catch this fish, and first of all they open her bowells, wherein they finde store of very goodlie Pearles: then feede they on the fish, because it is dainty and delicate meate. The fewer number of Pearles they finde in an Oyster, so much the greater and fayrer they are, and where they chauce on anie store, they are the clowdier and small. Some are found to be so little, that they can not bee drilled by any meanes; and therefore they call them Seede-pearles, which are purposely kept for Apothecaries, who employ them according to their owne knowledge and experience, or as they are aduised by the Physitian.

The most commendable forme and shape of the pearle, is said to be that which is roundest; yet that in fashion of a Pearle or Akorne, is not much worse; and next to these is that like to a little Nutte: nor doe they reiect such as are writhed and wrinkled, nor the very smallest, but all are employed and made vse of: the best for the richest people, and the other for them of lower qualitie, because they are worne by all degrees of persons, as well men as women; in regarde they are growne to be so common. No Prouince doe I know, whereunto more Pearles are brought, then into Spaine, and next into France, within some small compasse of time, which makes mee so much to maruell at them the more.

In briefe, Pearles haue surpassd the riches of gold and silver, and of Emralds brought from forth the Indias. And yet I would gladly know the reason, wherefore our graue Auncients made such estimation of Pearles; considering they knew them not to haue any medicinable vertue, and in regard also, they grew quickly olde, as we plainly perceiue, when they haue lost their lustre, clearenesse and whitenesse. For my selfe, I cannot imagine what should be the reason, except it be in regarde of their whitenesse, which is not common to other precious stones: and I perceiue, that no account is made of them, which are of another colour, although they be of the self-same substance. Some haue enstructed mee in an other reason, to wit, because they haue bene brought from the new-found world, and likewise, that in times past, they fetch them from very farre remote Countries, which needs must vrge the more affection to them, because they come from farre hence: Or else wee make such deare estimation of them, in regarde that (many times) they cost the liues of men in fishing for them, as partly we haue before reported. The greatest Pearles are called in Latine Vnioues, because sildome or newer we shall light on two, that are alike eyther in greatnesse, roundnesse, or splendour, or answerable in weight: for wee finde them alwayes separated one from another, and not ioyned together; And the lesser sort they vse to call Marguerites.

After that the Merchants haue them in their power, they permit them to be persecuted by diuers people, wherein the Indians and Perfians are the best exercised, as becine naturally enclined thereto by frequent practise. Nor do Pearles continue still in one and the same condition, for the truth is, they will fade, wither and waxe light by course of times: especially such as are caught after the full Moone. But being kept in the floure of Rice, mingled with Bay-Salt, they will recouer their former beauty and weight. But they which are caught deepest, and in the new Moone, are neuer subiect to any such inconueniences.

The flesh (as they vse to call it) or body of the Pearly Oyster, is most wholsom, and of great nourishment; excellent good against melancholy, and for such as languish, or are in a consumption, and also for Hectiques and Tificks. But the Indians make no vse of Pearles in their medicines, although the moderne Physitions of the Arabes and Moores doe, which hath bene learned of them by some of ours, and vsed in all cordiall medicines, being good also for the eyes, finely beaten into powder, and held as an especiall preservative for the sight. O o o o

The Indians and Perfians haue the greatest skill in Pearles.

Emperor Charles the fourth, also brought an Army against them. In like manner, in the warre of them of Basile, against Katherine of Bourgogne, the widow of Leopold, in the year one thousand, foure hundred, and nine, the Bernians & they of Sollewrs sent succour: the other Cantons employing themselves carefully, to accord them with the house of Austria. Moreover, at the time of the counsell of Basile, when as Lewes the Dolphin of France brought a great Army into Germany, to breake the counsell, and made warre on the Switzers, by the instance & working of the Duke of Austria, who had procured him to come: the Switzers maintained and defended the city and counsell, against the encountering of a strange enemy; as an example very remarkable, it being not above sixtene years, since they had coped with great troops of the French. True it is, that they all (well nere) lost their liues there: but yet they did so weaken their enemies troops, that he tooke part with the which fled fastest.

They being thus auoyded, the men of Basile ioyned their forces with the Switzers, and so made warre together on the Duke of Austria. In like manner, when Charles, Duke of Bourgogne, made himselfe so terrible, and affrighted all the world, they of Basile ioyned in alliance (for ten yeares) with Strasbourg, and other cities on the Rhene. Afterward, with Sigismund, Duke of Austria; René, Duke of Lorraine, and with the Cantons. In this warre they shewed themselves both faithfull & valiant, for their confederates. Finally, a great warre being moued betwene the Emperour Maximilian, the Switzers and Grisons: they of Basile remained neuters, without giuing succour to eyther side, nor receiued their Garrisons; but they furnished them both with victuals and munition. In this war there was a battaile giuen (almost) against the walles of Basile, afterward at Dorneck, where the Switzers wonne a faire victory ouer the enemies, whom they did beat backe to the gates of Basile. But during all this war, the citizens of Basile fauoured equally both the one and other side. To conclude, by the diligence of Lodouico Maria, Duke of Atillane, the Ambassadors on both sides met at Basile, & peace was made between the Emperour and the Switzers.

The Switzers allowed well of this expedient, in the men of Basile during this warre, and the Emperour Maximilian (for his part) seemed not to improoue it. But the Noble men, who were deadly enemies to the Cantons, held Basile (almost) in the ranke of a foe, because the city did not then shew itselfe openly, as an enemy to the Switzers; and not onely the subjects to the house of Austria, but many more, who till then had bene citizens; with-drew themselves to the Count of Ferrara, and about Montebellard, into Hal-sais, and to Brigow, countries appertaining to them of Austria. Being in those places, they ceased not to outrage (both with words and deeds) the inhabitants of Basile, who being moued with such indignities; the yeare after the war ended, to wit, one thousand, five hundred and one; made a perpetuall alliance with the Cantons, and so were left in peace with their neighbours, who stood in awe of the Switzers succour.

CHAP. XII.

At what time Schaffouse was receiued into the number of the Cantons; and the antiquity thereof.

Schaffouse, accepted the very same yeare, to be numbered among the cantons, is not of so great age and antiquity. It is seated on the River of Rhene, within Germany, and yet notwithstanding, the Bridge is in Suetia. In the time of the Emperour Henry the third, the Counts of Nellenbourg builded there an Abbey, which standeth yet to this day, and it is thought, that it gaue a beginning to the citie: as likewise the cities of S. Gall, Lucerna, and many more in Germany, haue deriued their originall from Abbeyes. The Rhene is also another cause of the cities encreasing, continuing so for some thousand of yeares since, beneath the city, where selues from his gouernement, and obtained many good priuiledges and franchises of the Emperours. But Lewes of Baunaria (weakened by long warres) could not pay the Duke of Austria, such monies as he ought him, according to an agreement made betwene them, which caused him to alienate and sell Schaffouse, together with some other Townes, and so (by that means) it became dismembered from the Empire. After that time, Schaffouse remained subiect to the Dukes of Austria, for the space of fourescore and five yeares, euen vntill the counsell of Constance: for then Fredericke of Austria, because hee brought Pope Iohn the two and twentieth out of the counsell, was banished by the Emperour Sigismund, who caused him to bee so narrowly pursued, that all his goods were partly pilled, and partly confiscated to the Empire, without any other meanes of helpe.

In this warre, Schaffouse became re-vinted to the Empire, and the citizens (hauing giuen a good summe of money, to the Emperour) obtained great priuiledges vnder Letters patents: and therein was plainly exprest, that (thence forward) their City should not any more be alienated from the Empire. But Fredericke the third, of the house of Austria, being Emperour: laboured to subiect it againe, and that the city of Schaffouse might remaine to his successors. And therefore hee permitted Duke Sigismund, to compell the citizens to sweare fidelity to him; which they refused to doe, but with exception of their priuiledges, and they would not receiue the Princes Ambassadors into the city, but vpon that condition. Contrariwise, the Ambassadors pressed them earnestly, to oblige themselves to the Prince, without any exception, and propounded certaine Articles, for the maintenance whereof, they required oath: threatening the citizens with very great harmes, if they would not yeelde to that which they demanded of them.

The men of Schaffouse, seeing the Ambassadors persist still in their opinion: to make good their owne part, receiued the Switzers Ambassadors into their city, and made alliance (for some yeares) with them of Zurich, Berne, Lucerna, Suits, Zug, and Glaris, so that the Ambassadors of Austria returned backe, and performed iust nothing.

Before this, they of Schaffouse were in good amity with the Switzers, and from the yeare, one thousand, three hundred, forty five, made alliance (for some time) with them of Zurich. But because they were Subjects to the house of Austria, against whom, the Switzers had (well nere) continuall warres: they could not then entertaine friendly this amity, but were compelled, to go in war against the Switzers, vnder the Ensignes of the Austrians. But after this last alliance, they were very good and faithfull friends vnto the Cantons, and bare them company in many warres and battailes. For immediately after the alliance began: the Austrians came and assailed the Switzers, and namely them of Schaffouse.

The Cantons made war on Sigismund of Austria, by the Popes command.

The men of Schaffouse accused by Peregrin de Hewdoff.

It came to passe, that the Cantons obeying the command of Pope Pius made war with Sigismund of Austria, which being pacified, they of Austria tooke Armes againe, because Mulhouse and Schaffouse had ioyned themselves with the Switzers, who ledde a great Army to the Count of Ferrara, and into the quarters about Montebellard. At the same time, Peregrin de Hewdoff, accused them of Schaffouse in the Imperiall chamber of Rotwil, and solicited so much, that they were put to banishment from the Empire. Among others, he charged John and Conrad de Fulach, brethren & citizens of Schaffouse; of a noble and ancient Family, who sometimes possessed a Castle, neere vnto the downefall of Rheine, whence Albert of Austria had expelled them, but soone after they entred it againe by intelligence. In regard whereof, they & the other citizens that maintained their iust quarrell, were proseribed. In this war the Cantons sent a good Garrison vnto Schaffouse.

Incurrires made on the Austrians, and b. them of Schaffouse.

While these helps and succours lasted, the citizens made diuers courses into the lands about, appertaining to the house of Austria; as in the Mountaines of the black Forest, in Hegow, Kleckow, and other limtrophing lands of Suaba and of Basile. Finally, having laide siege before Wallshout, which is a Towne at the entrance into the Blacke Forest, where the Riuer of Ar falleth into the Rheine, and which was vnder the Austrian government, peace was made; wherein they of Suaba were exempted, & stood banished from the Empire, at the pursuite and charges of Sigismund. Thus then the Cantons having experimented in these warres, the faithfulness of them of Schaffouse, and knowing well withall, what commodities they received from such a city, feared in so apt a place on the confines of Smetia; And reciprocally, the men of Schaffouse, feeling themselves to be deliuered from their enemies, by the good alliance of the Switzers; they thought it very expedient, both for the one side and the other, to prolong the alliance. And accordingly, in the year 1479. they made an alliance for twenty five yeares following; wherein were comprehended, the men of Vrs and Unterwald, with whom Schaffouse (till then) had not any particular acquaintance.

Thenour of this alliance, is (almost) answerable to that of the ancient Cantons. For in the first place, they binde themselves to aide one another. Afterward, they establish a forme of iudgement, for reconciling or auoyding such differences, as should happen between them of Schaffouse and the Cantons. Then followeth in what manner debts ought to be paide, & what meanes are to be vied in such cases. Then for the punishment of homicides, or men-killers. The last Article concerneth the new & ancient alliances, to wit, the one side shall make no new alliance, without the will and consent of the other: And that the ancient alliances shall alwayes be esteemed of most advantage, & to preceede all the other.

After all this, the warre of hoargoune hapned, and some yeares consequently, that of Suaba, mooued by the Emperour Maximilian, against the Switzers. In both these warres, they of Schaffouse did their duty exceeding well, furnishing men and money for the weale-publike: by which meanes, they entred into the good grace of the Cantons, much more then ever they did before, and wonne great honour. Also, the year after the last warre, to wit, 1501. they made perpetuall alliance with the Switzers, and were enrolled in number of the Cantons, obtaining the 12. ranke or roomie.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the warres of the Switzers, since such time as they came to be in number of the Cantons, in making them inuolue.

AFTER that Basile and Schaffouse were numbered with the cantons, and that they were 12. during the alliance which they had made with King Lewis the 12. in the year, 1503. some among them (in great number) went for him in the war of Naples, without leaue neuertheless, and against the Edicts of their Magistrates. As the Switzers and French might brag of small happinesse, in the last warre of Naples, vnder King Charles the eight: so their fortune proved a little better in this last warre. They, who (during the first warre) were left in Garisons, in strong places and Fortresses of the Kingdome; dyed of diseases for the most part. Such as escaped in this warre, in recompence of their traualle, brought home to their owne houses, that villainous contagion of the Pockes, which afterward was termed the Spanish disease, the Neapolitane cull, and the French Pockes: At the last war they were ouercome in two batailles, and lost a great number of their men. The year 1507. the Cantons sent succour vnto the King, who (by their meanes) made himselfe Master of the field, which the Genoises had planted in a Mountaine, that commanded ouer their city, which (soon after) yielded it selfe.

At the same time, the Emperour Maximilian demanded men of the Switzers, and they promised him a lenye of 6000. men, provided, that he should not leade them against the King of France, their alie: but because he would not accept this condition, the lenye remained, and was not made.

Soone after, to witte, in the year 1509. the league of alliance betweene the King of France & the Switzers, tooke ending, and the Emperour, Pope Julius the 2. the Kings of France and Spain, leagued themselves together, and made warre on the Venetians, wherein the Switzers serued the King of France for wages. The year following, Pope Julius made alliance with the Switzers, by the meanes of Matthew, Cardinall of Sion, who immediately after the alliance concluded, led fixe thousand Switzers into Italy; vnder pretence of defending the lands of the Church, against the Duke of Ferrara. But his true intent was, to surprize and expell the French out of Milaine. The Switzers hauing discovered his purpose, would not follow the Cardinall against the French, and their Lords had likewise forbidden them: so that the Pope sent them into Smetia, without paying them their wages, wherat they were very highly discontented.

In the year 1511. perpetuall alliance betweene the Switzers, the houses of Austria and of Bourgonie, was renewed. On the other side, the Ambassadors of France desired the Switzers to renew the alliance with their King: but the molt part of them were displeased, because to soone as the first alliance was expired, the King had denied them all their payes and yearely pensions.

And albeit that a very great number among them, were no found well-willers or friends to the Pope, who likewise had not payed them: yet notwithstanding, fearing lest hee should excommunicate them, they durst not alie themselves with the King of France, who then was enemy to the Pope. Heereupon, hapned a disgrace to be done them by the French, for they had taken at Lugano, a Herald of the Switzers, with letters from the Seignoury about him: first, they drowned him, and to despight the Switzers, the Coate of Armes, which the Heraulds and Officers to the Cantons vse to weare, they folde at open port-sale, or out-cry, as we commonly call it.

The Switzers, in the very strongest of winter, led their Army ouer the Alpes, where hauing burned some Villages, they returned backe againe, without performing any other memorable deed. But the year following, Pope Julius (who had lost a great bataille at Ravenna, at encountering there with the French) called them to helpe him, and therefore they sent into Italy, an Army of twenty thousand men. They being ioyned with the Venetians (then reconciled to the Pope) tooke at their arriual Cremona and Paria, driuing the French out of the whole Dukedome of Milaine, so that nothing remained to them, but only the Castle of Milaine. In regard of these worthy exploits, the Pope gaue the Switzers the title, of Defenders of the Church; enriching their Standards with diuers Inuages, and publicly gaue to the whole Nation of the Switzers, two great Standards, which they call, Paner, that is, The Sword and Bonnet, as a noted marke of liberty. Maximilian Sforza, re-established in his paternall domination by the Switzers succour: made alliance with them, and gaue to the Cantons Lugano, Lacarna, Mendrisa, and the Vale of Madia.

He gaue also to the Grisons, their confederates, the Vale Telma or Faltrena. Likewise Charles, Duke of Sauoy, whose predecessors had particular alliance (long time before) with some of the Cantons:

made alliance with all the Switzers, for 25 yeares after following.

In the same year, the King of France solicited the Switzers, to become againe allied with them: but because hee would not see free the Cattle of Millaine, and some discouery was made beside, that his Ambassadors laboured to corrupt some particulars by gifts, and to buy their voyces for faire money layde downe; they were commaunded to depart out of the Leagued countries; and so the warre was renewed again. For the King sent a great Army into Italy, vnder the conduct of the Lords of Triualse and Trimouille, who besieged Maximilian Sforza in Nouara. Hee was then accompanied with four thousand Switzers, to whose ayde, eight thousand more were sent. Their vantage being arrived at Nouara, and they within being ioyned with them, they gaue the battell to the French, vanquishing & driving them out of Italy. Guichardin the Italian, an Historian much renowned, writes that the Switzers won such honor by this victory, as many haue made no difficulty in equalling this happy successe of theirs, with (almost) all the braue exploits of the Greekes and Romanes. Notwithstanding, the field was decreed enough bought by them, because fourteen hundred Switzers were there slaine, and the most part of them by the Cannon, before that they could come to handie strokes. Which made the people of Swetia to murmur in many places, and all blame fell on them that tooke part with the French: so that diuers withdrew themselves from Swetia for a time onely, and two only had their heads smitten off in those mutinies and commotions: for the rest, all was well pacified, without any effusion of blood.

After this victory of the Switzers, the Emperor Maximilian, quitting the amity and alliance of the King: aduised the Switzers, to enter France by Bourgogne, with an army of six thousand men; where (well-neere) sixteene thousand other voluntary ioyned themselves, together with some troupe of horse belonging to the Emperor, vnder the conduct of the Prince of Wirttemberg. There they besieged Dijon, the capitall City of all Bourgogne. But the Lorde of Trimouille, an olde Capitaine, being not of strength to defend well the place, agreed with the Switzers, on conditions, that the King should acquit whatsoever he pretended to the Dukedome of Millaine, and paye them (at certaine appointed times) fixe hundred thousand Crowns for assurance whereof, he gaue them foure Lordes of marke, as hostages, with whom the Switzers departed thence immediately.

Nowe, although it was a matter most palpable and notorious to all men, that this composition warranted the kingdom because that Dijon being taken, the Switzers might haue run vp so farre as to the gates of Paris, or ioyned themselves there with the English; and beside that king Lern hadde not a sufficient Army to make head against them; yet notwithstanding, he would not ratifie his composition. For he would not admit (by any means) that his rights to the Dukedome of Millaine, should be so much as talkt of. The Switzers seeing themselves thus handled, and highly offended with such flye trickes: threatened to kill the Hostages, except the confirmation might be brought within a certaine time. Neuertheless, the winter grew extreame vpon them, and yet they refused to re-enter France in the month of November: But the King sent his Ambassadors, who laboured (by all means) to make a perpetual peace with the Switzers. In the meane while, they could no way ioyn, because the conditions which the King propounded, were very vnreasonable: which was the cause that the time spent it selfe in dayes and deliberations, in meere talke and fruituol disputes, whereby the enterprize of marching into France, was quite broken. Concerning the rest of these meetings and assemblies, they were thus considered on, that in the month of December, the same year, they of Appenzel were added to the Cantons number, and held the thirteenth place.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Originall of Appenzell: how it tooke that name. The Lawes, Customs, & manner of government there obserued.

A description of the situation of Appenzell, and the villages thereto belonging.

Appenzel is the name both of a Country, and of a Village.

The country is situated somewhat about S. Gall, betwene the high Mountains, and on the Frontiers of the Grisons country. The inhabitants liue (scattering) in Villages, and among the number of them, there are eight chiefe and principal, which haue euery one their Temple or parish church. The maine head of all is the village of Appenzell, whereof all the rest of the country beareth name.

This Country was sometimes vnder the government of the Abbots of Saint Gall, and because they alwaies vsed to dwell in the chiefe town or village, where they build a very strong Castle, named Clawx; the village was therefore calld Appenzel, which in Latine is, Abbatis Cella: that is to say, The Chamber or dwelling of the Abbot.

The people of Appenzel aimed at liberty, first by armes, and after peace made, they bought liberty for themselves & their children, by means of a great sum of money, which they paid to the Abbot. They had wars which continued seuen yeares, against Cuno de Stouffen, Abbot of S. Gall; to whom the townes about the Lake of Constance, and belonging to Frederick D. of Austria, the bishoppe of Constance, the Count of Wirttemberg, & many Counts & Gentlemen gaue succour. Yet they of Appenzel would not yeeld themselves for all this, but being ayded by the Citizens of S. Gall, who, at the beginning, were partakers with the Abbot, but afterward ioined with them of Appenzel, won som battels, tooke five Townes, and more then sixty Cattles, part whereof were quite ruined. In this war, they leagued themselves with the Switzers, who were enemies vnto the house of Austria. Some say, that they allyed themselves with Suits and Glaris onely; but others doe maintaine, that it was with Lucerna, Vri, Saites, and Viterwald. This Warre tooke ending in the year, 1408. and by means of the Emperour Emper, agreement was made betwene them of Appenzel and their enemies, in the City of Constance.

This being done, the men of Appenzel framed a forme of government to themselves, which yet they hold vnto this day. For till then, each village had her ensigne, and her estates apart, or by it selfe. Now there was but one Ensigne, one assembly of their estates, and one Councell, composed of the most honest people, and the notablest persons in all the Villages throughout the country. Then three yeares after the peace was made, the Abbot of Saint Gall attempted a new suite against them: but then they made alliance with Zurich, Lucerna, Suits, Vnderwald, Zug, & Glaris, which so offended the Abbots of Saint Gall, as, about the year, one thousand four hundred twenty five, Henric Mansdorff (then Abbot) prevailed so far, that they of Appenzel were proscribed by the Emperour, and excommunicated by the Pope. Banishment was no great hurt, or inconvenience to them in any manner whatsoever, because the country (being round engirt with Mountaines, and not Trafficking almost with any bodie) no inuasion could bee made vpon them. As concerning the excommunication sent from the Pope, they resolved in an assembly of all the country, not any way to care for it. And therefore they expelled all the priests (that obserued the command of the Pope) out of their Country, and would not permit them to administer the Sacraments: amongst all which they killed but one.

The Abbot of Saint Gall, perceiving that this course did him not any service; and that (on the other side) the men of Appenzel ranne verie fiercely vpon such, as durst teare them to bee excommunicate, and ruined the Castles of manie Gentlemen: Finally, by helpe of the Bishoppe of Constance, and the Nobles of Swabia, hee accused them before the Electours of the Empire, imploring theyr helpe and aide in this extremitie. The Electours sent to the Switzers, and to the Cities of Subs, that they should bring them of Appenzell vnder obedience. But the Switzers would not make any war on their neighbours and fellow citizens: but rather laboured to make peace, which was agreed on foure yeares after this excommunication, the men of Appenzell hauing bene (before) overcome in two encounters, by the Count of Toggenbourg.

This peace lasted not long, for the Gentlemen, neighbours to Appenzell, about the Lake of Constance, assembled a great number of horsemen, wherewith to invade them of Appenzell. But they disappointed their hope, and got before them; possessing themselves of Rineck, & of the Vale of Rheynse, in the year, 1445. The Lords of Hagenwill, who helde that country in pawne or pledge: caused them of Appenzell to be censured with banishment, by the Imperiall Chamber established at Rotwill. But gaining nothing by the bargain, they sold them their right, for the summe of fixe thousand crowns, and tooke off the censure. In the yeare, 1452. they made perpetuall alliance with seauen of the Cantons, and (after that time) ioyned themselves with the Switzers, in the warres against the Dukes of Austria, of Bourgonne, and the league of Subs, wherein they shewed themselves both faithfull and valiant. Afterward, in the yeare, 1513. they were received into the number of the Cantons.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning the alliance made betwene the five last Cantons; And a breuete of their Articles, binding them together in confederacy.

ALL the latter cantons, except Basle, long time before their receiving into this ranke, were allied to the other ancient Cantons, and then afterward, at sundry times they were received and numbred with the cantons, according as wee haue noted already.

Now those Cantons doe hold this right about their confederates, that they deliberate, and giue aduice in their dayes of consultation, for all occasions concerning (in common) the common wealth of the Switzers. They haue a share or part, in all commodities and dilemmities of the communalty. They gouerne (in equall authority) all the Baliwicks by them obtained, and partake equally and publicly, all booties gotten in warre. For the rest, the Articles of alliance of the old Cantons, and latter with the first, are almost alike.

The first and principall Article, concerneth mutuall succour or assistance, wherein there are diuersity of clauses. The Cantons which shall be called, ought to succour their associate or companion, without any fraud or delay. If a Canton be so suddenly engirt by the enemy, as he cannot call the other, neither by Letters nor Ambassadors; yet shall not they forbear (for all that) from giuing succour, and in as speedy manner, as if they had received expresse aduertisement. If the latter Cantons doe conceiue, that a wrong is done vnto them; yet notwithstanding, they shall moue no warre against any person, without the will and consent of the olde Cantons. If their enemies will debate their cause in iustice, and accept the Switzers for their Iudges, or others of equall and indifferent judgement: the Canton may not attempt to pursue his right by Armes. Euery one of the Cantons, at their owne charge and expences, shall come to succour the other, and send such numbers of men as they would haue, and according as they shall see it commodious, wherewith the other Canton must content it selfe. In like manner, the limits are prescribed, wherein the ancient Cantones stand bound to send helpe to the new: And the limits are the confines of the Cantons, as they then stand. There is likewise mention made, concerning charges and expences, at the besieging and battering of Townes and Castles. And the Lawes agreed vpon at Stans, touching the partage of booties, which also are here confirmed.

The second Article declareth, what kinde

kinde of course is to be obserued, if a difference doe happen between two Cantons or many: But wee shall speake in our second Booke, what forme of iudgement is in the case to be kept. Moreover, there is mention made, concerning actions in cases of injuries betwene particulars, and what Iudges they are to take note of in that kind. Then for the exacting of names: Concerning commerce, and free Trafficke, and what bargaining ought to stand free for buyers, as well on one part as the other. That no Canton shall receive the citizens and subjects of another Canton: till they be first left at liberty, by them vnder whose dominion they were before. That the new Cantons shall not make alliance with any whoeuer, without consent of the olde Cantons. If war is moued betwene the old Cantons, the latter shall remaine as newters, and labour onely to agree the parties. Each Canton shall keepe his or her ancient priuiledges, rights, and customes in their true integrity.

Behold the principall conditions of the latter alliances, wher namely it is decreed that the new Cantons shal not moue any warre, without aduice of the old, neither refuse that which is right, nor any honest condition of the countrey; and other such like things, concerning warre, are established fully. And because that the most part of the latter Cantons, are vpon the limits and euen out (as it were) of Suetia; they ordained, that no one shoulde attempt to make any warre, except it were for some matter of very great importance: and so much the rather, because it is very hard to conduct and maintaine an army in those quarters.

CHAP. XVI.

Here we are to speake of the Switzers wars in Italy, when the French undertooke to recouer the Dukedome of Milaine.

IN the yeare of our Lord, one thousand, five hundred, & fiftene, King Lewis the twelfth dyed. He had newly fought by his Ambassadors, the amity and alliance of the Switzers. Neuerthelesse, in the meane time, he made great preparation for war, pretending to recouer the dukedome of Milaine. Frances de Valois, his kinsman, and his sonne in law, came after him (as successor, to his crown; who following the deliberation of his father, had also his minde and eye fixt on the Altilaneses. The Switzers (on the other side) allied with the Emperour Maximilian, Ferdinand King of Spain, Sforza Duke of Milaine, and with Pope Leo the tenth: undertook to defend Milaine against the French. Wherefore, after they understood the King of France his preparation they sent (at their first leuy) six thousand men to the Duke of Milaine. Afterward, the tenth of Iune, they made another leuy of 13000. men, which they sent also to ioine with the first.

King Frances passed ouer the Alpes in the meane while, by vnaccustomed waies, shunning the Garrisons of the Switzers, which were vpon the vsuall passages, and entred into Italy, with an Armie verie potent, of French and Germanes. This was the reason that the Cantons sent twelue thousand men more therether, so that the campe of Switzers onely, consisted of one and thirty thousand men. Now, although the Kings troopes were well provided and resolute, yet they would not hazard any thing, nor set vpon so great an Army of Switzers: it being such indeed as hardly (at any one time) had so manie euer before bene in the field. Hereupon by their Deputies, they began to treat on peace with the Colonels of the Switzers: who likewise (for their part) were not far off from it in disposition, because they considered, that their confederated princes did not march on roundlie with them.

For first of al, their wages was not paid them, according to promise. Moreover the Emperour had not sent his companies of horsemen, as he stood bound to do by the confederacy. And contrarywise, he had not prohibited the Lance-Knights (which hee might haue done in regard of his authority) from going in seruice with the King: but suffered them (by troopes) to depart from Germany, and enter into France. Finally, although the forces of the Pope and King of Spain were neerer

yet notwithstanding, they could hardlie be perswaded to passe the Pan, and ioyne themselves with the Switzers. Beside, there were messengers going and coming betweene the French and them, & from them to the French. Wherefore, the Switzers seeing themselves without money, and forsaken of their Confortes: made peace in the village of Galleras, with the Deputies to the King of France, vnder honest conditions. Which having bene confirmed by some Cantons, immediately twelue thousand Switzers took their way to Coma, and returned home to their country, without tarrying for the rest, who likewise prepared to depart the next morning. But the Duke of Millaine would not accept the conditions of this peace; and the Cardinall of Sion, (a great and perpetuall enemy to the French) laboured by oblique meanes, to break & frustrate all.

It came to passe, that by cunning tricks and plottes, the thirteenth day of September, the Switzers of the Guard to the Duke of Millaine, and some others beside offended with the King, in the night time brake in vpon the French, sending worde instantly to aduertise their companions, in what danger they were, and intreated their present succour. The other, imagining that it would be a great shame vnto them, to forsake their friends in such a neede, and being made to beleuee with all, that the French had begunne this broyle, went with all their troopes to assist them. The fight was very sharp on all sides; but the night parted them. In this charge was slaine Frances, the Lorde of Bourbon, the Lord of Imbercourt, also the Count of Sancerre, the Prince of Tallemont, sonne to the Lorde of Trimouille, the Lords of Bussy d'Amboise, and manie other; which made some to holde opinion, that the Switzers were Maisters in this conflict, and a brute ran thorow Italy, that they remained conquerours. But the very same night, the King having mounted his Artillerie on their carriages, levelled the battalions of the Gascoignes and Germaines, re-assembling the horse-men vnder their Regiments, and sending Bertelmeo d'Aluiana with the Armie of Venetians: very early in the Morning, he gaue battaile to the Switzers, whom he vanquished, after they had lost manie of their men.

The Switzers seeing the victory in a contrary hand, withdrew them-selves to Millaine; yet in such sort, that their retreatate fauoured not of flight. For, they brought backe the Artillery which came out of Millaine, and marched in ranke of battaile, hauing their wounded Men in the midst among them, and going but a very softly pace: yet in all the French Army, not a man, eyther Horse or Foot, durst pursue them. On the morrow, hauing lesse the Duke of Millaine fiftene hundred men, to strengthen his garrison in the Castle, they returned into Suetia, by the way of Coma. But, by reason of their foile, the French recouered the dukedom of Millaine.

The Emperour Maximilian contested hardly to take it from them againe, & the yeare following, he ledde into Italy (to effect that hope) an army of Germans and Switzers: but he could doe nothing, and so was glad to come backe again immediately. As for the King of France, hauing well felt how deare a price this victory cost him: he neuer ceased till hee hadde made peace and alliance with the Switzers in the end. Perpetuall peace, betweene the French and the Switzers, was made in the yeare one thousand, five hundred, and eightene, the last day of Nouember: and the alliance was confirmed three yeares after, to wit, in Anno one thousand, five hundred, twentie and one. The Articles both of the peace and alliance, are set downe in their due place, heereafter following.

nestly sollicit by the rest, to ioyne in this league with them: yet for all that, they could neuer bring them to the point of yielding to this alliance. In the first place, the yeares going before, Mathew, Cardinall of Sion, who came verie often to Zurich: by his Orations and perswasive speeches, had wholly estranged them from the French. On the other side, Huldrych Zwinglius, being then a principal minister at Zurich, in his ordinary preaching and Sermons, ceased not to turne the people, from taking wages to goe in warre seruices. Shewing by arguments & remonstrances of great weight, that it was not lawfull for a Christian man, to set himselfe to sale for a price of money, and go shed the blood of such as are (oftentimes) innocents, and neuer did him any manner of wrong. He sayd, they ought to follow the manners of the ancient Switzers, who (by their manhood) had planned liberty in their country. All which while, they wholly estranged themselves from such course of liuing; their lues were maintained by their trauell; neuer binding themselves vnto any Prince, neither hadde they any freedome that was to be sold.

And as hee had words verie readie at command, so he approved by great store of sound reasons and arguments, that such alliances did but enervate & meerely prostitute the liberty of the Switzers to forraigne Kings and Princes. So that the men of Zurich, being (otherwise) people of peace, and little addicted to martial affaires, were much moued with his speeches, and abhorred this new League. On the other side, the Captaines that hadde bene in the warres in the times of King Charles the eight, and Lewes the eleventh, dissuaded them from the league, as being farre vnlike to the alliances with former Kings. For, in precedent times, after that the Switzers had well vnderstood & comprehended the occasion of the war; they made choise of such Captaines and soldiers as they should send to the king, according to their promise. But in the Newe League, the Cantons neither chose Captaines nor Soldiers, neither cared what became of all, what the occasions of the warre were, nor whether they were iust, or no. But, if the King were to deale with any people, he chose such Captains of the Switzers as himselfe pleased, and caused them to come whether he thought good. By which meanes, the Cantons had not any power ouer their Men for warre, except they might counter-mand them, when any warre was moued in the country.

Moreouer, many saide, that this newe League was contrary to the ancient and perpetuall alliances of the Switzers. For, in the first Article they stand bounde, to guard all the Prouinces of France, against all enemies whatsoever they are. True it is, that the first alliances were exempted, but immediately is added, that if the ancient allies begin to make warre vpon the French, the Cantons ought to send succour to the King, against the other: whereon ensued (as it seemeth) that if any one of the Cantons, or of the Confederates, could not haue reason (in friendly manner) of the King of France, and would pursue his right by Armes; the other Cantons are bound to warre on him, according to the new League, and contrarie to the promises of the ancient alliances.

Moreouer, it is not any long time, since the Switzers denied their troopes to the Emperour Maximilian, alleading (for their excuse, because he would haue had them serue at his Coronation) that they were occasioned (for many reasons) to keepe their men of warre (as then) at home in their owne country. Therefore it appeared to them verie vnfitting, that they should then allye themselves with the King, who would make a Leuée of them, so soone as the alliance was concluded.

They conceyued also, that it would be farre off from their ancient grauity and magnanimitie, if they should league themselves so strictly with the King of France; of whom (but a yeare and an half before) they had written vnto the Electors of the Empire; that it was no way expedient that he should govern the affaires of Germany, so that if he should be elected Emperour, they were not minded to giue him obedience. And, as concerning the commodities of the alliance, which many did make lowd proclamations of: there were others of opinion, that the profite would fall into some particular purses, and especially of such, as enriched themselves by the pensions of France; but the Common monwealth of the Switzers would be no way benefited by the bargain; as very easily was to be proved.

For in the first place, the country had no neede of any strange horsemen or infantry, having worke enough to doe in nourishing their owne breed for that employment. Moreover, the hope of helpe, and money from France, robbed the Switzers of all their true force and courage. In following the example of their predecessors, they were best to let their hope leane and rest vpon God, to serue and honour him in sincerity of heart, and vprightnesse of conscience. That not onely hope in God would faile and diminish by such a League, but also it was to be feared, that it would very strongly break and corrupt their ancient manners, cause all husbandry to cease, giue ouer honest trades and exercises, and engender nothing but idleness. And then is easily known what followeth; dissolusion in diet and apparrell, drunkennesse, whoredomes, adulteries, thefts, and blasphemies. For these are the fruites of warre, and the Arts that are learned in the armies of strange Princes.

For a full conclusion, the euent and successe of precedent alliances, haue both instructed and guarded many (especially the men of Zurich) to weigh well & consider on nouell combinations. For, albeit that some fewe did sufficient seruice to the nation, as that which was made against the Duke of Bourgogne; yet notwithstanding, the most part of those alliances, brought it into great extremities. Because in such strange warres they lost many of their people: or els in those countries, they were rudely hurried and agitated, by factions and seditions. For these reasons, and diuers other considerations; the inhabitants of Zurich could not (as then) be induced to ally themselves with the king of France.

But the other confederates, who were not of any such opinion, maintaine what they did, by reasons enow. First, they declared, and would prouoe it, that euery voyage in war was not condemned by the word of God: but that many holie persons had made wars; wherein they were ayded and succoured by others, as in like manner they had assisted their Allies. Secondly, that the war of the Switzers was not mercenary nor vaine ble, because they went to the seruice of a King onely, (with whom they were ioynd by an honest alliance) with the will and consent of their Lords.

Thirdly, that if the King should moue a warre, which all men knew to be iust; then it remained in the power of the Lords of the Leagues, to deny him succour. But if the occasion were doubtfull and vncertaine: the souldier had nothing to doe to make any curious inquisition thereof: it only appertained to the King and his Councell, to render a reason for it. Fourthly, that the Switzers Countrey was greatly peopled, but narrow, hard, & barren in many places, and could not furnish so many men with nourishment: wherefore the commodity was not to be condemned, which the King had offered voluntarily.

To these we will adde, that the Switzers ought to consider, with what neighbors they were enclosed, from wherof enuyed them, and others pryed into their Liberties: so that it was both well and wisely done, to fortifie themselves with strange succour against them, and that trust and hope in God, did not prohibite the vse of humane assistance. Also, this was a means to traine vp the Switzers in martial discipline, which is necessary for all Commonwealths: and in regard wherof, warlike people haue euermore beene highly respected. Finally, although that some alliances haue discommodited the Countrey; yet notwithstanding, the Switzers haue sped well in the more part, especially, in those which they had with the kings Leues the eleuenth, Charles the eight, and Lewes the twelfth. And therefore they must needs expect a happy issue of this which they contracted with a King powerfull & fortunate.

This was the discourse then made concerning alliance with the French as I learned of my predecessors, which liued in those times. The selfesame question hath bene often and seriously debated & handled, euery in my time, by men well grounded in the affaires of State, to whome (as yet) I referre the further knowledge of the case.

hitherto wee haue shewne what the Cantons & confederates are, making vp a whole body of the Switzers Commonwealth, and what hath beene the estate and condition of euery one of them before they were leagued. Also, for what causes, at what times, and with what conditions they assembled themselves in a body polittic. Now we will discourse of the affiliates of this Commonwealth, according to the same order: and we will heere shew, wherefore, when, and vpon what conditions they allyed themselves with the Cantons. And because the Abbot, and the City of Saint Gall do holde the first ranke, wee purpose to begin with them.

The City of S.
Gallhouse
house as first dwelt Gallus, a Gentleman of Scotland.

Gallus, of whom the city of Saint Gall hath taken name, was a Gentleman of Scotland, and Disciple or Scholler to an Abbot, named Colombanus, with whome hee came into France, and thence transported himselfe into Germany, to a place called Tuggen, neere to the Riuer named Limuz, at the mouth of the Lake of Zurich. There he preached the Gospel with great zeale and affection, to the people of the Countrey, then bewitched with diuers kindes of Idolatry. Hee continued (soone after) at Bregens, at the mouth opening of the Lake of Constance: next, at Arbonna, and in diuers other places of Swetha, for the space of sixteene years, or thereabout. Conzo Duke of Sabia, hauing called him to bee Bythoppe of Constance; he would not accept that charge: but counselled the Duke to giue it to one of his schollers, named John, whom hee thought to be more fit for the place. As for himselfe, about the yeare six hundred and thirty, he retired into the Mountaines, about the Lake of Constance, into a very solitary place; and in the very same plot or square of ground, where the Citie and Abbey of S. Gall now stand: hee builded a little Cell or house, wherein he spent the rest of his dayes, with some of his schollers, in the studie and meditation of holy matters.

Gallus refused to be Bythop of Constance,
and preferred
one of his schollers to it.

After the death of S. Gall, his schollers liked well to liue in that place, and according to his manner of life: neuertheless, without making profession then of any certaine rule or order. But the Kinges of France, and the Dukes of Sabia, taking delight in their deuotion, did them many kinde Offices: where by the number of these religious men encreased, & (by little and little) the small silly house of Saint Gall, became conuerted into an Abbey. For foure score yeares after the death of S. Gall, they requested Counte Bernard, Governor of the countrey for the Kinges of France, that hee would giue them an Abbot. He sent them a Priest, named Omer, bred and brought vp in a Colledge, called Caire of the Grisons, and towards Pepin, Prince of France, some to Charles Martell: who following the aduice of his father, established this Priest the first Abbot of Saint Gall, and then (first of all) the Monkes made profession of the rule of S. Benet.

After that time, the abbey became vrierich and powerfull, so that the Abbot of that place, was sette in number of the Princes. And in ancient times, he was vnder protection of the Emperours, who tooke the Gentlemen of Suaba to be Gouernors of this abbey. Afterward, warre being kindled betweene the Abbot, and them of Appenzel: the Monkes well perceiued that their Conuent stood in neede of some good Protectours, because the Townesmen or Citizens of S. Gall, who were (as within the abbey) ioyned with them of Appenzel, who were also fauored by many seruants of the Abbot.

For this cause Gaspard Landberg, then the two and fiftieth Abbot (by the aduice and counsell of the Monks) requested the Cantons of Zurich, Lucerna, Suites, and Glaris, to receiue him into their alliance: establishing them patrons, fathers, & defenders of his freedom, & of all his goods, possessions, vances, and priuiledges. This right is perpetuall and at all times, and as often as a new Abbot is to be elected, hee promisseth this accord, and that al the places of his Seigneury, shall alwayes lye open to these foure Cantons, and they to haue free access thereto. And if difference shall happen between him and any other, he shall commit it (continually) vnto the hearing of the foure Cantons, and be iudged by them.

The successour to Landberg, named Huldreich, and sir-named Le Noux, added to this first alliance, that the foure Cantons should send (one after another) one of their Councell, that should remayne two yeares with the Abbot, to bee Captaine of all his country. He gaue assistance in pleadings and iudgements, & the moiety of all fines remained to the Switzers. Moreover, it was ordained in this alliance, that in all warres the Abbots subjects should goe to the succour of the 4. Cantons.

As concerning that which Abbot Huldreich renewed, and the League also, ioyning himselfe more strictly vnto the foure Cantons, the cause was thus. Sometime before, the Citizens of Saint Gall, the times of Appenzel, and the subjects of the Abbot, had conspired together, and ruined the abbey of Rosach, which the Abbot had newly builded. So that the foure Cantons hauing sent for the other Cantons to their assistance, defeated the Abbot in his rites, and reprooued his aduersaries very stoutly. This association endureth yet to this day, and although al the Cantons are not at agreement with the Abbot, as concerning matter of Religion; yet notwithstanding, according vnto the articles of alliance, they send him a Captaine, who manageth and gouerneth ciuill causes, conseruing (in this regard) the rights and priuiledges of the Abbot.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the Towne or City of S. Gall.

THE Citie of Saint Gall, oweth her originall and encreasing to the Abbey, and hath bene enfranchised by the Emperours, who vnted it to the Empire, and gaue it many priuiledges and immunities. In the time of the Emperour Arnould, the citie began first to be enclosed with walles: as fearing the courtes and surprizals of the Hungarians, and both it and the Couent were vnder the Empires protection. The citie was subiect vnto the Abbey in many things: meane while, the citizens had their rites, which they augmented by their industry, & by means of the Emperours liberalities.

Now, when the number of citizens, and the riches of the Abbey beganne to increase: many debates and contentions also tooke Originall, betweene the Abbot and the citizens. Oftentimes, the Townes round about it, and the Imperial chamber, would set them at agreement again. Sometime likewise, they were glad to satisfie the Abbots demands with money, and encreased their liberties, by buying their rights of him. But when they of Appenzel moued warre against Abbot Cuno de Stauffen, the men of S. Gall beganne to take part with the Abbot, and got nothing for their labour but blowes, which caused them (soone after) to make alliance vwith them of Appenzel. This warre being ended, and some other after, Abbot Landberg, being made a fellow-Bourgesse with Counsaers of alliance kept, though not in Religion all alike.

The Abbey began and increased the city of S. Gall.

Wealth and estate are the first causes of debates and contentions.

with foure Cantons: the citizens of S. Gall, to maintaine themselves by the like expedient, entred perpetual alliance with Zurich, Berne, Lucerna, Suits, Zug, and Glaris. This alliance was sworne on the Eue of S. Iohn Baptit, in the yeare, 1434. And they of Saint Gall made a publicke banquet for the Ambassadors of the Cantons, whereto were present aboute fiftene hundred men. Before this alliance, they were leagued with some Cantons for certaine yeares: as with Zurich, Constance, and Schaffhouse, in the yeares, 1312. and 1347. And at other times often with Zurich and Constance. Afterward, with Zurich, Berne, Vri, Suits, & Vnderwald, in the yeare 1339. But I haue purposely omitted those alliances made for so short times, contenting my selfe onely with this last mentioned, which continueth to this day

CHAP. XX.

Of the Leagued Grisons.

It is generally agreed on that the people of the Grisons are very ancient. For some ages before the birth of our Saviour Iesus Christ, the Tuscan being driuen from their houses by the Gauls they possessed the Rhazians. Heretofore this country extended it selfe greatly in length & largenes, so that the Romane Emperours made two Rhazian Provinces, named the first & second Rhazian: which comprehended not onely the Alpine regions, but also a great part of Suaba & Buaria. Now it is well knowne, that this first Rhazian beginneth at 4. foures of Rheme, & taketh a sufficient great quarter of the Alpes, and all the valleyes on both the sides. Almost all the people there are (to this day) called Grisons; and in former times they were termed Gris: as likewise the Almain gaue them the same name, & call them betide Graw punder, that is to say, Leagued Grisons. For, in regard that these Rhazians are leagued, not onely with the Switzers, but also among themselves, and that of verie long time, we call them Leagued Grisons, & sometimes the Switzers names them simply, punder, that is, Confederates.

Wee are to obserue three leagues of the Grisons. The first tooke name of her antiquity, and of the situation of the country: for they called it, The High League, or high Grisons. It containeth nineteene Communities or Fellowships, among whom (heretofore) the Abbot of Dissentis, and the Baron of Rhatia, & the Count of Misauk held the chiefe rank: but the families of the 2.

latter are expired. Neuerthelesse, among them in common, they which possesse the Castle of the ancient Barons of Rhatia, are called Lords of Rhatia, a title which (some short while after) the Lordes of Marbrée took; and after them, they which are named Plantes. They of Taufsch, Lininer, and Misoxerial are the principall people of this league.

The second is called, The league of Gods house. I thinke it to be so termed, because the byshop of Caire is comprized in this league. It also comprehendeth nineteene Communities, two whereof doe speake the Germane Language; the other, vs the Rhazian or Grison, which is their nother tongue, & cometh neere to the Italian. The principall people of this league are the city of Caire, which is the bishops See. Also they of Pregant and of Engadin, out of which countries run two renowned riuers, to wit, Esch and Inn.

The third league hath ten Communities, and is called, The League of ten Iurisdiccions. Therein are comprized them of Ruchenberg, and of Tunelch. The former two leagues had (at the beginning) amity and alliance a certaine time, vwith the Cantons neerest to them. For, in the yeare, 1419, the byshop, the Chapter, & the citie of Caire, made Alliance vwith them of Zurich for one and fiftie yeeres. Also, they were sometimes allyed vwith them of Glaris. And the Grisons of the high league, wer long time confederated with them of Vri. Then after, with them of Gods house they made a perpetual alliance vwith feauen of the Cantons. But the thirde League is not comprized in this alliance, and yet notwithstanding in entertaine this amity and society with the confederates, euen as firmly and faithfully, as if they stood tolemlly bound thereto.

The Abbot of S. Gall desires to be receiued into the number of 4. Cantons, and to bee ordered by them.

First then, in the year 1497. the high league, more properly called, The Grison league, made perpetuall alliance with seauen Cantons: and the year following, the league of Gods-house ioyned it selfe with them, by this occasion following. Some years before, the league of Gods-House had had certaine great differences, with the dwellers in the county of Tyrol. In the end, by the will of the Emperour Maximilian, it was decreed; that the parties should chuse an equal number of Iudges, to take knowledge of their variance, and that Thomas, Bishop of Constance, should be Arbitrator about all the Iudges. But while the Councellers to the King delayed to end this discord, the Bishop of Constance dyed: and in his stead, Maximilian subrogated Fredericke, Bishop of Ausbourg. But the Kings councellers taking no knowledge of this other Arbitrator, prolonged (from day to day) the decision of the suite, as before they had done: all this while molesting the Grisons, and charging them still with nouell impositions.

They perceiving no cessation, deputed two of each league, and sent to Innspruk, insisting, that this difference should end, according to the order of the Emperour Maximilian. Which the councellers pretended not to know, albeit diuers of them, and (among the rest) the chancellor was present when the decree was set downe. Yet notwithstanding, because the Deputies should not be sent backe without answer; they assigned a day at Velure, in Lent the next year ensuing. In the meane while, they of Austria planted Garrisons vpon the Frontiers, and strong Artillery in diuers places, making (vnder hand) their preparation for warre. For they had appointed that day expressly, because they would set vpon them at vnawares, & vnto overthrow the Grisons, no way standing on their guard: where in the Bishop of Cotre lent his helping hand to them of Austria. But the league of Gods-House, hauing discovered the enemies intent; sent men to the cantons, who kept then a day at Zurich, and gaue them to vnderstand this eminent danger.

The Ambassadors declared, that beside the olde quarrels, new differences were moued, betwene them of Austria and the Switzers, so that there grew an appearance of warre: therefore for the profit & security both of the Switzers & Grisons, it seemed good, that they should be allied together. For by that means, the Grisons should easily expell the enemy out of their country: although they gaue them but little ayde, or almost none at all. On the other side, the Switzers should haue a Bulwarke to back them, and so might the more strongly make head against the enemy. The Cantons, who had bin well affected to the Grisons before, and knew those Mountain-bred men, to be a warlike disposed people, and how beneficiall this alliance would be both to the one and other: concluded and established a perpetuity of loue with the Grisons, in the year 1498. and the Moneth of December, and the Articles of the alliance are these that follow.

The Articles of alliance, betwene the Switzers and the Grisons.

1. First, that they shall be friends, & giue mutual succour one to another.
2. The second Article concerneth the agreeing of differences, which may happen betwene confederates.
3. The third is that no man shall giue or sell away, those actions that he hath against his debtor, or the answerer, or surety for him.
4. The fourth concerneth victualles, according to one anothers trading: And to be freely in the Markets, without standing bound to pay any new tributes.
5. That neither the one nor other side, shall make any new alliance, wherein these Articles shall be comprised, but with exceptions: And that in times of warre, the one side shall not make peace, except the other be thereby comprehended also.

These are the Articles and principal points of the alliance. But the year following, the warre of Snab happened, wherein the Grisons valiantly defended their Frontiers, against the men of Austria. And by the ayde of their people, many times in like manner, and by the assistance of the Switzers, diuers braue batailles were

were wonne against the enemy. Yet after these victories hapning on either side, peace was (at length) made in the city of Basle, by the Emperour Maximilian; in which peace, the Grisons are also comprised. By this means, the beginning of the alliance was wholesome and happy to both parties, and afterward, in many wars where the Switzers were present, vnder wages of strange Princes their confederates: the Grisons alwayes marched as kinde companions with them.

It came to passe, that in the year one thousand, six hundred, thirty and one: John Laques de Medeu, who afterward was Marquesse of Marijnino, getting v. furped possession of the Cattle of Mus, vpon the Lake of Coma, and hauing taken Cluenna from the Grisons, foraging the country thereof: many Cantons, according to their league of alliance, sent succour to the Grisons: by means whereof, the enemy was overcome at last, and driuen far off. In our time, the Grisons were allied with the French, and with the cantons of Swetia, and went to warre together for the King: yet in such fort neuertheless, that they fend oftentimes a regiment separated of the Switzers, & which hath his Colonell & Captaine in chiefe.

CHAP. XXI.

The Alliance of the Valaisians, or people of Valais.

THE name of Valaisians, or them of Valois, comprehends three distinct people, enclosed within the most high Mountains, and dwelling in the Valley, from the fource of Rheine, so farre as the Lake * Lemans. They were anciently called Fiberines, Sedusians, or Sequians, some say, Sebusians, and Veragrians. At this day, the Fiberines and Sedusians, are called the high Valaisians, and are diuided into seven Diocesses, or Wards of ten Parishes. The Veragrians, or lowe Valaisians, are subiects to the other: but the Bishop of Sion is Prince of all the country, hauing the souerainty both temporall and spirituall, and he is called Count, or Governour of Valois. We haue deli-bed in another Tract, apart by it selfe, not onely this Valley, but likewise all the most remarkable things of the Valaisians.

Five Wards or Diocesses of the Valaisians, made first alliance with Lucerna, Vri, and Vnderwald, in the year 1417. They were then in warre against a Bishop, named William de Raron, and his Father Guiscard, whom they had (by a popular tumult) forced from their houses. The Bernians gaue assistance to the Bishop and his Father, who were of their Bourgeses: And for this cause the Valaisians desiring to haue succour elsewhere: allied themselves with the fore-named 3. Cantons. Now fearing lest this might be an occasion of breeding quarrell betwene the Bernians, and the three Cantons allied with the Valaisians: the other cantons, who were as neutrals to the business, laboured so earnestly, that the difference was pacified, and the Lords of Raron re-established in their goods. Before this alliance, the Valaisians had made one (for the space of ten years) with them of Berne, in the year 1250. Again, after this warre, they contracted another alliance (for certaine time) with the Bernians. But in the year 1475, they made a league defensiu and offensiu. And in the same year when wee wrote this History (to wit, 1575.) an hundred years being expired, after the beginning of this league: they renewed and confirmed it on eyther part, by magnificent Ambassadors. Two years before they were leagued with the Bernians, they made a certaine agreement with them of Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald.

To conclude, in our time, vpon great differences moued, concerning matters of Religion, Ceremonies, life and manners of the Cleargy, whereof reformation was required, Swetia being diuided into contrary parts; Adrian, Bishop of Sion, and seuen Wards of the Valaisians, in the year 1533. made alliance with seauen Cantons, in the Towne of Fribourg, which Cantons made profession of the Roman Religion, as namely, Lucerna, Vri, Suits, Vnderwald, Zug, Fribourg, and Sollemre. CHAP. XXII.

Of Rotuill, or Rotuill.

Some haue imagined, that Taxagatum, whereof Pro-lomy ſpeaketh in his Geography, was Rotuill or Rotuill, which Glaucanus calleth Erythropolis, hauing changed the Aleman or Germane word, into a Greek word: but they much deceive themſelves. For Pro-lomy placeth Taxagatum in the country of the Griſons, and Rotuille is ſituated beyond Danubius in Germany, on the left ſide of the Riuer Niera, and very neere to the Spring-head of both thoſe Floods or Riuer. This city is ſufficiently renowned among the Imperials, for therein is a chamber of the Empire, which is vulgarly called Hofgricht, whereunto all the round neighbouring countries reſort, for cauſes of appeale. Such as are contumacious, and fayle of their appearance there; are ſent (by ſentence of the Iudges) into baniſhment from the Empire. It is ſaid, that this chamber was eſtabliſhed by the Emperor Conrad the third, and that it is 424. yeares ſince.

The firſt alliance that they of Rotuille made with the Switzers, was in the time of the Emperor Fredericke the third, in the yeare 1463. This alliance was renewed diuers times betweene them. At laſt, in the yeare 1515. they contracted perpetuall alliance with all the Cantons of the Switzers. During the warre of Suaba, they of Rotuille (engirt with enemies on all ſides) ſhewed themſelves alwayes faithfull to the Switzers; offering them amiably and liberally all their riches and men: which the Switzers could not accept, but onely deſired them, to defend their city againſt the enemy. Now in regard that Rotuille is ſituated along the limits of Swetia, and that ſuccour cannot bee brought to one another, but with danger, conſidering, they muſt paſſe through other mens lands: the alliance ſpeaketh expreſſely, that they muſt be carefull for drawing any war vpon them, or vpon any of their confederates.

And firſt of all; It is ſaid, that they may not make war with any whoſoeuer, without the knowledge and conſent of the Cantons. They ſhall giue no ſuccour to any perſon out of Swetia, without the will and conſent of the Cantons. Moreover, if they would haue reaſon by Arms, for any injury or out-rage done vnto the; they muſt attempt nothing, but by aduice of the Cantons. If their enemies will vndergoe iudgement, ſuch as the Cantons ſhall thinke to be honeſt and equall: the men of Rotuille muſt alſo conſent thereto. If warre chance to bee moued among the cantons; they of Rotuille are to follow that part, which the moſt part of voyces do allow. The cantons are to conferue (with all their power) the Imperiall chamber of Rotuille; which (in the mean while) ſhall vie no authority againſt the Switzers, or any of them. And if any ſtranger ſhall cite or ſummon thether a Switzer; they are to make knowne, and he likewiſe, how farre he is to bee defended by priuiledge. In breefe, they are not to moleſt any Switzer in that iuriſdiction.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of Mulhouſe.

Mulhouſe is a Towne in the county of Ferrara, or (as ſome do hold opinion) in the Territory of Biſſe. It is thought that in ancient times it was called Arribinium. For in the Guide or Director of wayes, appointed by Antonius Auguſtus; this place is ſet betweene Auguſta Auarica (which is Biſſe) and Prunina, which ſome do thinke to be called at this day, Enſteym; then Mount Briſſar, Heluetum, and Strasbourg are named. In times of antiquity, Mulhouſe was in number of the Imperiall townes: but the Biſhop of Strasbourg was Gouvernor thereof, alſo of the Towne Rotuille is ſituated ſo neere the middle of Swetia.

Her firſt alliance with the Switzers, was made about the yeare 1464. For in regard that the neighboring Gentlemen moleſted the Towne, and narrowly watched all occasions to aſſault it: the citizens made alliance with them of Berne, for ſixteen yeares, as alſo with Fribourg and Soleurre. and by meanes of the Bernians interceſſion, the other ſeuen Cantons tooke the Towne into their protection. Which proued ſo diſpleaſing to the Noble-men, that theſe priuate enmities conuerſed themſelves (ſoone after) into open warre: which cauſed the Switzers immediately, to ſend and plant Garrifons in Mulhouſe. Afterward, all the Cantons brought their troopes into the field, and came with great aſſiſtance to releue Mulhouſe.

In the end, hauing beſieged the towne of Waldſhout, appertaining to the houſe of Auſtria: they compelled the Gentlemen, to come to ſome equall conditions of peace. Afterward, they of Mulhouſe were receiued for fellow-Bourgeſſes with them of Biſſe, and thereby more ſtrictly vnitied to the Switzers. Nine yeares after, the 19. day of Ianuary, they made alliance with all the thirteene cantons. The conditions were all alike to the alliance of Rotuille, as well in regard of warres, as leagues with ſtrangers.

Bienna is at the end of a very pleaſant Lake, abounding with plenty of fiſh & round engirt (on all ſides) with goodly Vineyards. It is vnder the government of the Biſhop of Biſſe; and yet it enioyeth lawes and regiment a part by it ſelfe, as alſo liberall franchiſes and priuiledges.

The firſt alliance of the of Bienna, was made with the men of Berne, in the yeare 1303. to ridde the country of certaine robbers and theues, which wandred there in ſo great numbers, as almoſt no way had any ſecurity for paſſage. In this alliance, they of Strasbourg, Biſſe, Eribourg and Soleurre were alſo comprized. Three yeares after, in regard of ſome great differences, which they had with their neighbours: they made a particular alliance with the Bernians. Their third alliance was made in Anno 1352. and fifteen yeares after, becauſe John de Vians, Biſhop of Biſſe, (a man of turbulent ſpirit) would not ſuffer any of his neighbours to liue in quiet: they of Bienna, deſirous to provide for their owne eaſe and tranquility, ioyned themſelves more ſtrictly with the men of Berne, by giuing each to other the right of fellow-Bourgeſſes. The Biſhop very angry at this vnion, muſtered together ſome troopes of horſe, and (at vnawares) ranne vpon them of Bienna, and clapt vp in priſon the Authors of this aſſociation.

When the men of Berna heard of this deeſe, they came to ſuccour their fellow Bourgeſſes, tooke (by force) the Caſtle, which the Biſhop had in Bienna, ſet the priſoners at liberty, and made warre vpon the Biſhoppe, as alſo on them of Soleurre, his affociates. In this warre, they tooke and ruined many places, which were in ſubiection to the biſhop.

John de Vians Biſhop of Biſſe, a man troubleſome to his neighbours.
